Summary. In the opening tale, the great man Job loses his wealth and children and is subjected to a painful disease after discussions between God and a character I will call the Prosecutor. Expected to curse God because of this experience, Job refuses to do so. Three friends come to comfort him and sit with him in silence for seven days.

Job opens the dialogue by cursing his birthday (chap. 3), and the friends then reply, urging Job to admit his fault and return to good terms with God. Job insists that he has done nothing to deserve the punishment he is receiving. Neither side persuades the other of anything, and Job closes with a long speech (chaps. 29–31) describing his pleasant past life and lamenting its loss. With a series of curses on himself, he calls on God to answer him. Elihu, a previously unmentioned friend, suggests that both Job and the friends were wrong about the suffering (chaps. 32–37).

Now the deity speaks to Job "out of the whirlwind," asking hard questions about the universe and the habits of various powerful animals, challenging Job to reply (38:1–40:2). Job is non-committal (40:3–5), at which the deity insists that he answer and invites him to control human evil, a monstrous creature named Behemoth and another named Leviathan (40:6–41:34). Then Job speaks in a conciliative way, saying that he now has firsthand knowledge (42:1–6).

At the end (42:7–17), God criticizes the friends and reinstates them in his favor. Job is comforted for his troubles, receives twice his former wealth and a new family of children, and comes to a satisfactory death.

The opening and closing tale are prose narrative, and the middle three sections, all speeches, are in poetry (save for one-line introductions to the speeches and a brief introduction of Elihu in 32:1–5). The dialogue between Job and the friends falls into a consistent pattern. Job speaks (chap. 3), and Eliphaz replies (chaps. 4–5). A second speech of Job (chaps. 6–7) is followed by a speech of Bildad (chap. 8), and after Job's third speech (chaps. 9–10) comes one by Zophar (chap. 11). The same pattern occurs in chaps. 12–20, with Job speaking between each of the friends. The third cycle begins like the others, with a speech of Job (chap. 21) and one of Eliphaz (chap. 22), then Job again (chaps. 23–24) followed by a short speech of Bildad (chap. 25). Job then speaks without interruption (chaps. 26–31), and there is no speech by Zophar in this cycle. Thus the speeches create three cycles, the third slightly skewed in structure; Job has both the first word (chap. 3) and the last (the summation speech, chaps. 29–31).

Elihu's speech is divided into four parts by opening formulas; the dialogue between Job and Yahweh (38:1–42:6) also falls into four parts, two long speeches of Yahweh and two short ones of Job.

Origins of the Book

Language. Job is written in an extremely sophisticated, "learned" Hebrew, with a higher proportion of words unique to itself than any other book of the Hebrew Bible. The issue of language is raised otherwise only by some theories that the book was originally composed in Aramaic or in Arabic. Such proposals cannot be demonstrated. That a work so subtle and complex in style is a translation seems unlikely, and theories that it was not originally Hebrew have found very few supporters.

Authorship. One Jewish tradition names Moses as the author of Job, but otherwise there was little speculation about it. Reticence about attempting to identify the author is well advised. Some scholars believe there was more than one author, others that one or several editors gave the book its final form. Surely it is the work of more than one mind, if only in the sense that it underwent changes in the process of copying and, perhaps, of editing. But authors or editors left no discernible traces of identity.

Location of Writing. Because chaps. 40–41 describe animals that some scholars identify as a hippopotamus and a crocodile, they have argued a location in Egypt, where these animals are native. The commentary will show that I do not think Behemoth and Leviathan are those animals. That the language is Hebrew indicates that the book was written in Israel. No regional dialect is identifiable, and no specific part of the territory can be determined. The book is not, however, set in Israel. Its characters come from places in Edom, southeast of Israel (→ Edom). Yet that setting is no more reason for thinking Job was composed in Edom than the setting of Hamlet in Elsinore is reason to think that Shakespeare wrote the play in Denmark. Some passages betray knowledge of desert travel and of various wild and domestic animals, but geographical location plays no part in the book's meaning.

Date. If we cannot say where Job originated, it is equally difficult to say when. Ezekiel referred to Job as an important person alongside Noah and Daniel (Ezek. 14:14–20). Moreover, tradition put him in the patriarchal period and made the book one of the oldest in the Bible. Modern scholars are skeptical of this claim to antiquity, but dates proposed range from the tenth to the third century B.C. The book itself is completely silent about its time, with no allusions to historical events or topical subjects (some take 12:17–19 as a depiction of the Exile). If we could be certain of the history of the Hebrew language or of the relations between one text and another, we could more confidently assign a date. Some affinities of Job 3 with Jer. 20:7–18, for example, do not allow certainty of which passage came first. Stylistic similarities between Job and Isaiah 40–55 have also been alleged. Those connections suggest a time either before the early sixth century B.C. (if Job is prior) or in the late sixth or early fifth century B.C. (if Job is later). Job 7:17–18 is almost surely a parody of Psalm 8, but no one can be sure when Psalm 8 was written. Job 3:4 is a parodistic allusion to Gen. 1:3, a creation account usually dated after the Exile in the sixth century B.C. Such evidence suggests but does not prove that Job was composed and completed after the Babylonian exile.

Composition. Here we ask about the process through which the book achieved its final form. One supposes either that an author “composed” the book over a long or short period or that it is “composite,” brought together from diverse sources. But our modern assumptions about books are inappropriate for ancient ones. The process of copying by hand, the only way ancient books could be circulated, means that we cannot be sure we are reading what an “original” author wrote. The structure of the book outlined above may provide some bases for guesses. Chaps. 1, 2, and 42 are written in a relatively simple prose style that some scholars have compared to folktales. The poetry in the middle of the book is very complex and difficult, full of unusual words and unusual thoughts. Supposing that a single mind tends not to produce such different kinds of writing, scholars propose that one or more poets took an existing folktale (to which Ezekiel referred?) and inserted the poetic dialogues into it. On the other hand, Elihu turns up in chap. 32 without prior mention and disappears at the end of chap. 37 without later mention. Most scholars think that the Elihu speeches were interpolated into the book by another poet; they note the Hebrew style in these speeches differs from that of the rest of the book. Some scholars have argued that the speeches of Yahweh (chaps. 38–41) were added or modified later.

More complications: chap. 28 breaks suddenly into the debate with a puzzling discussion of mining, metallurgy, and wisdom. Arguing that it was inserted later, scholars seldom explain why. In the third cycle of speeches, Bildad's (chap. 25) is unusually short, and Zophar has no speech at all. Some scholars, noticing what seems self-contradiction in Job's speeches around Bildad's, wish to add 26:5–14 to Bildad's speech and put together a speech for Zophar from such passages, now in Job's mouth, as 24:18–20, 22–25 and 27:8–23. Such observations lead scholars to postulate several stages in the book's composition. All such conclusions can be no more than guesses, as we have no copies of Job representing these stages. In my opinion, a poet probably used the existing prose tale as an occasion for the debate, Elihu's entrance was staged by a later editor, and perhaps chap. 28 was added by someone with great sensitivity to the argument around it. I doubt that the third cycle is garbled, and I think the Yahweh speeches belong. In any case, the book as it now stands is the one we have to read, and omitting later additions gives us no demonstrable access to the minds of earlier authors.

Relations to Other Works

The Relation of Job to Other Literature.

No book is an island, unrelated to any other. Some literary theorists think that every book is but a comment on other books. Job has forerunners in Mesopotamia, Canaan, Egypt, and perhaps even Greece in the use of dialogue form, and some of those dialogues deal with the meaning of suffering. But Job seems unique in the ancient world, with no clear indications that its dialogue was influenced in style or form by these other works. The problem of undeserved suffering is a staple of ancient literature from early in the second millennium B.C. on, and the problem was solved in varied ways. But I find no ancient Near Eastern work that has influenced the ways in which Job handles the problem.

The book is often classed among other Near Eastern and biblical works as "wisdom literature" on the basis of a high value placed on wisdom in those works. The term is modern, not ancient, referring in the Hebrew Bible to Job, Ecclesiastes, and Proverbs, along with a few psalms. Job is the only one of those books with the dialogue structure and a short but not fragmentary narrative; its point of view is diametrically opposite, for example, to most of the proverbs, in which wise people are righteous and good and fools are wicked and unsuccessful. Job's friends display the attitudes of the wise in Proverbs but show them false and unproductive. Perhaps Job belongs in the wisdom literature as the exception to its rigidities.

Job in the Biblical Canon. In the Hebrew Bible, Job appears either before or after Proverbs among the Writings (Heb. Kethubim), the third division of the canon. Such different placements have yet to be explained. In the Christian OT, Job appears most often as the first of the Writings, preceding Psalms (where it is in Christian Bibles today), sometimes at the end of the Writings before the Prophets, sometimes after the Prophets. We do not know how Job was used in the Jewish community, whether it had a place in synagogue reading or in what contexts it was studied. Early Christian sermons indicate that Job provided texts for preaching, and some church fathers, e.g., Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and Chrysostom, wrote commentaries and treatises on Job. The book was translated into Greek in the Septuagint, but modern scholarship has shown how thoroughly this version eviscerated the hard edge of the Joban arguments. Since most Christian interpreters dealt with the book in Greek, they had a rather pale text to read.

Job and Modern Culture. In modern times, when people are willing to ponder a Bible not blandly consonant with the central strands of their religious traditions, Job has come into its own. Since William Blake's rather wild engravings, and Kierkegaard's independent interpretation of Job in Repetition, many modern writers have used the book to comment on human problems, e.g., Archibald MacLeish (J.B.), Robert Frost (A Mask of Reason), Joseph Roth (Job, a novel), the Yiddish author I. L. Perets (Bontsyne Schwaig), and Robert Heinlein (Job, A Comedy of Justice). Some critics interpret Franz Kafka's The Trial as a transposition of Job. The modern Italian composer Luigi Dallapiccola has set parts of Job to music, and the English composer Ralph Vaughan Williams wrote Job, A Mask for Dancing. Like much of the Bible, the book has become an important artifact of culture and no longer the exclusive property of religious communities.

COMMENTARY

1:1-2:13

The Opening Tale

Ezekiel mentions Job, with Noah and Daniel, as one of the most righteous ancient worthies (Ezek. 14:14, 20). The righteous Noah we know from Genesis 6-9; the Daniel referred to by Ezekiel we know not from the Bible but from a Canaanite epic about a good king named Dan'el; Job we know only here. All three figures, Noah, Dan'el, and Job, were able to save others by their righteousness. Ezekiel's reference suggests that, like Noah and Dan'el, Job was a folk hero, the epitome of "righteousness," whom our story calls "scrupulously moral" (Job 1:1, 8; 2:3).

The story in Job 1-2 and 42:7-17 resembles a folktale in some respects; it has the "once upon a time" beginning (1:1-5), formulaic structural markers ("It was the day," 1:6, 13; 2:1), the messengers' refrains ("And I escaped all alone to tell you," 1:15, 16, 17, 19), the formal greetings between Yahweh and the Prosecutor (1:7; 2:2), and the repeated formula describing Job (1:1, 8; 2:3). Yet this narrative is not naive—it is pure in its simplicity and density. If calling Job 1-2 and 42:7-17 a folktale leads readers to expect something rough, we should not call it that. It seems unnecessary to designate the genre more closely than as story or narration.

The story structures itself in six parts, the first general and introductory, the others successive episodes:

Episode A (1:1-5): Job's character and circumstances

Episode B (1:6-12): First scene in Yahweh's court

Episode C (1:13-22): Job's first calamity

Episode D (2:1-7a): Second scene in Yahweh's court

Episode E (2:7b-10): Job's second calamity

Episode F (2:11-13): The arrival of the friends

The outer episodes frame the story, the first describing Job, the last showing a ritual action, seven silent days (2:13), which make us expect that something is about to happen.

The middle four episodes alternate between Yahweh's court and Job's troubles in the land of Uz, a balanced regularity that is underscored by the formal similarity between episodes B and D. Yet balance is also upset by the change from episode C, told from Job's point of view as the messengers come one by one, to episode E, which narrates the calamity objectively and comments on it in the dialogue between Job and his wife. Moreover, episodes B-D all begin with the same phrase, "It was the day when," and end with similar conventional formality, but episode E plunges abruptly into action with no structural prelude.

The tale drives from a beginning in permanence and certainty to a transitional conclusion, though it presents a mixture of symmetry and difference. The similar remarks made about Job in 1:22 and 2:10 suggest that he has successfully met the Prosecutor's challenges to his moral integrity, though neither he nor his possessions remain intact. The issue has apparently been resolved. On the other hand, at the beginning and in both scenes in Yahweh's court, Job is described as "one who avoids evil" (1:1, 8; 2:3), but the friends come because of "all the evil that had come upon him" (2:11). The "feast days" of Job's sons in episode A (1:4, 5) turn to a death day in episode C (1:13); the meeting "days" of Elohîm's sons in B and D (1:6; 2:1) issue in Job's suffering; and all give way in episode F to seven "days" of silence (2:13). By this point, it seems that the tale's problem has been intensified: evil formerly avoided is now present; days formerly joyful are now tragic and painful.

With the transition implied in the seven days of silence, we must wonder: what is the problem of this story, and is it resolved or intensified? To the latter we must say, "Both." For the former we must look again at the transactions between the Prosecutor and Yahweh.

To Yahweh's incautious boast about Job (1:8), the Prosecutor's response is heated: "Is Job religious [fears God] for nothing?" (v. 9). The rhetorical question calls for a negative answer, and the heat of the Prosecutor's reply overrides logic: Yahweh has "hedged around" Job and his goods with "blessing," but those goods have "burst out over the earth." If Yahweh ensures so responsive a piety as Job's, he ought not to boast about the man as if he were responsible for it.

The Prosecutor's challenge is extremely powerful. He proposes that Yahweh "touch" Job's possessions and goes on: "If he doesn't curse you to your face . . ." (1:11). The statement is a self-curse that omits the result clause. The curse formula is, "If A happens (or does not happen), may B happen." Usually the "B" clause is omitted (Job 31 presents a series of such curses, and in some, e.g., vv. 7-8, 9-10, the "B" clause is present). According to Job 1:11, the Prosecutor is willing to call down a calamity upon himself. He proposes neither a test ("Let's see if he flunks") nor a wager. The Prosecutor puts his own welfare on the line: the present clause implies the continuation, "May something awful happen to me!"

The word "bless" (Heb. brk), occurring several times in these chapters, sometimes seems to mean "to bless" (e.g., 1:10, 21), its usual meaning (→ Curse and Blessing), but sometimes appears to mean the opposite (1:5, 11; 2:5, 9). In the latter sense, have we a euphemism, a word substituted to avoid saying the unacceptable (e.g., that a person might, heaven forbid! curse the deity)? Or does the text present a deliberate ambiguity?

The Prosecutor proposes to call down a presumably nontrivial calamity upon himself if Job fails to "curse" (brk) Yahweh. That seems only fair, if Job's calamity is to be serious. The fact that in chap. 2 the Prosecutor is as healthy as before suggests that the curse has not been fulfilled. Indeed, Job did brk Yahweh, in the hymn in 1:21: "May Yahweh's name be blest." But in 2:5, when the Prosecutor repeats his self-curse, Job's wife urges him to do what the Prosecutor was sure he would do: "Curse (brk) Elohîm and die!" (v. 9). Job accuses her of talking foolishness (v. 10) and does not do it, arguing that only good comes from God (if 2:10 is an assertion; if it is a question, he expects to receive both good and evil from God).

The Prosecutor never reappears. The reason is quite clear: Job did not brk Yahweh the second time, and the Prosecutor's prediction was fulfilled. This eventuality indicates that the ambiguous "bless/curse" is a structural element in the story.

Who is this "Prosecutor"? Most translations refer either to "Satan" or to "the Adversary." The Hebrew reads "the satan," the definite article showing that the word is a title, not a proper name. The term occurs several times in the Hebrew Bible meaning a legal opponent. He is certainly not the devil, who in Judaism had various names, "Satan" among them, while Christianity preferred Satan to others (→ Satan). In Job 1-2 and in Zechariah 3, "the satan" is a member of the divine court whose job is to maintain law and order, a kind of district attorney who brings malefactors to justice. The term "Prosecutor" shows that the word is a legal title, while "the Adversary" still suggests the later idea of a principle of evil. Understanding "the satan" as Yahweh's opponent has raised unnecessary questions about divine morality in the treatment of Job. By ancient lights, there is no such problem. A curse operated objectively, automatically, and without moral entailments.

Job has done nothing to put him in trouble with Yahweh, and yet at the end of chap. 2, his trouble is deepened, not resolved. His possessions are gone, his children are dead, his suffering is unrelenting, his wife's support is ambiguous, and the friends who arrive to "console and comfort him" (2:11) perform funeral rites as if he were already dead (vv. 12-13). The debate in Yahweh's court is apparently settled, but the debate in the land of Uz has only begun.

The Dialogue

3:1-11:20

The First Cycle of Speeches

3:1-26, Job. Job had refused, even on serious provocation, to curse God. Now, after a week's silence, he curses (3:1) not the deity but "his day," i.e., (v. 3) his birthday.

His curse (vv. 4-5) alludes to creation: "That day, let there be darkness" (v. 4a) parodies Gen 1:3: "Let there be light." By images of God's and light's absence, of darkness dominating, avenging, and terrifying day, Job curses his birthday as a reversal of the first process of creation. In vv. 6-7, his curse on the night of his conception cancels time, which creation set in train (v. 6), and human procreation, which imitates divine creation (v. 7). Calling for those who by magic can control the Sea (a mythic enemy of the deity in Job) and Leviathan (see 40:15-41:34) and for the reversal of night and dawn (v. 9), Job further invites the undoing of the creation. Light (v. 9) has become "toil" (v. 10). Job comes very close to cursing the deity without actually saying the words. Cursing the creation and all of its cosmic and human effects covers everything the deity has done.

The rest of the speech focuses on himself in two stanzas each beginning with "Why?" (vv. 11-19, 20-26). In the first, Job wishes he were dead, stillborn (vv. 11-12, 16), asleep (v. 13). Death is the leveler, sleep in company with kings, counselors, and princes (vv. 14-15), the absence of oppression and power (vv. 17-19). Death wishes are unusual in Israelite culture (see Elijah, 1 Kings 19:4; Jonah, Jon. 4:3, 8). Still, because Israelites thought the deity did not visit the realm of the dead (Ps. 139:8 and Amos 9:2 are startling exceptions), Job's perception of death as freedom must include the notion of liberation from God.

Even though extending the idea to toilers and the world's weary (Job 3:20-26), Job is thinking primarily of himself. The Prosecutor's description of Yahweh's protecting him by "hedging" around him (1:10) feels to Job like constriction (3:23). He is reduced to animal conditions (v. 24), but, most surprisingly, "I was terrified of something, and it arrived, / what I feared comes to me" (v. 25). A most intriguing statement! Has his remarkable piety been motivated all along by the fear of suffering?

The last couplet (v. 26) drains away emotion. Life's positives, "tranquil," "quiet," "rest" (cf. vv. 13, 17), have given way to the negative, "turmoil" (cf. v. 17). Job's questions here flow from his curse on the creation and his birth: "Why am I alive? Why is anyone who prefers to be dead alive?" He does not ask, "Why did this happen to me?"

4:1-5:27, Eliphaz. This is the longest and most elaborate of the friends' speeches. Praising Job for strengthening others in trouble (4:2-5), he is sure that, because Job is religious, he will never experience the troubles of the wicked (vv. 6-11). But his frightening vision (vv. 12-21) has taught him that every human is liable to error (5:7a). Describing the fool's brief career (vv. 2-5), he counsels Job to turn to God, who puts down the strong and raises the weak (vv. 8-16). Finally he assures Job that the "discipline" of suffering (v. 17b) will bring him to a satisfying end (vv. 17-26).

But the speech is not as generously positive as that summary suggests. In 4:6, for example, Eliphaz says, "Is not your religion your confidence, / your hope, and the integrity of your ways?" The question is very ambiguous. "Religion" (lit., "fear") and "integrity" (Heb. tom) characterized Job in chaps. 1-2 (see, e.g., 1:1; 2:3), and here they are sources of his "confidence" (kislah). But in Job (8:14; 31:24) and elsewhere (Ps. 85:9), that word and its cognate kesel appear to denote misplaced confidence, and they are related to the noun kesil, "fool, stupid." Again in 4:8, Eliphaz says, "As I have seen, those who plow iniquity / and sow toil, harvest it too." The parallelism indicates a similarity between "iniquity" and "toil." Job has said that he received "toil" (3:26); Eliphaz must think that he has also "plowed iniquity." Thinking that "the race is born to toil" (5:7) does not remove the difficulty, for Eliphaz says in the same breath (v. 6) that humans are responsible for it.

Eliphaz is at least unkind to describe the plowers of iniquity as "finished by [God's] nostril's wind" (4:9) after the "great wind" that killed Job's children (1:19). He tactlessly refers to the sons of the fool who "are crushed in the gate, no rescuer near" (5:4). Job suffers very much as Eliphaz describes the fool's suffering (vv. 4-5). The generous advice, couched as "If it were I, I would . . ." (vv. 8-24), sounds rather hollow in the light of these implicit similarities between Job and the fool or the wicked. Eliphaz is good at promises: "In six troubles he will rescue you, / in seven, evil will not touch you" (5:19). But evil has "touched" Job. The Prosecutor urged Yahweh to "touch" his goods and himself (1:11; 2:5), and Eliphaz himself said that it "touched" him (4:5). He is clearly not on Job's side emotionally or rationally.

Eliphaz has introduced a new term into the discussion. Job did not ask about justice, but Eliphaz brings it up very quickly: "Think, who that was innocent has perished, / where have moral people been destroyed?" (4:7). Those rhetorical questions expect negative answers, and they are modified, if at all, only by his idea that all human beings sin by virtue of being human (4:17-21). Eliphaz's question contains the idea, common in the Hebrew Bible, of divine retributive justice. The deity governs justly, rewarding righteous people with health and prosperity and punishing wicked ones with calamity and suffering. The suffering of the innocent or the happiness of the wicked are contradictions in terms. If suffering is punishment for wickedness, a sign of the deity's just handling of human affairs, there can be no undeserved suffering.

Job did not raise this issue. He skirted it in 1:21 with the idea that Yahweh both gives and takes, and in 2:10 he avoided it either by ascribing both good and evil to the deity (if 2:10 is a question) or by asserting that anything the deity does must be good (if it is a statement). In chap. 3, he damned the whole creation, wishing he were dead; but he did not wonder why he, being good, suffered. Eliphaz has brought up the question, and by his apparent identification of Job with fool and wicked has proposed that Job deserves what has happened to him. From now on the question of deserved suffering becomes a central issue.

6:1-7:21, Job. "Passion," said Eliphaz (5:2), "murders the fool." Job clearly takes it personally: "Would that my passion could be weighed" (6:2). Eliphaz said that the deity "wounds" in order to heal (5:18). Job hopes God will "crush me, free his hand and cut me down" (6:8-9). So Job defines "hope" as "crushing," a word Eliphaz used to describe general human ephemerality (4:19) and the particular fate of the fool's sons (5:4). Job's second speech is a wild, stream-of-consciousness spray of confusing, contradictory images, as if it depicted a man trying to think in the throes of pain.

In chap. 3 he wished that his life could be cancelled; now he both complains that the deity attacks him (6:4) and desires that he would attack him and put him out of his misery (vv. 8-9). Job lacks the strength to continue and wishes for help to die (vv. 11-13). Yet the metaphor (vv. 15-20) of wadis in the desert that store water in winter ice but suddenly go dry in the summer, causing death to caravans, shifts toward a wish not to die, as the caravans are first "eager" (v. 19) and then "ashamed because they trusted" (v. 20). The friends are like them: "You stare at ruin, and you're scared" (v. 21—the pun is in Hebrew too).

They fear that his "ruin" may put them in a dangerous legal, moral, or physical situation (vv. 22-23). Or do the healthy, being sure they know what suffering means, worry that it might happen to them? Is it the fright Job admitted in 3:25: "what I feared came to me"? It is important that just here Job begins to use legal terms. The friends are planning an "indictment" of him, they accuse him of having "erred" (6:24-27). He asks them (v. 24) to "instruct" him about his guilt. For the first time Job has become conscious of the issue of guilt, and his "innocence" is at stake (v. 29). Why is he being dealt with as if he were guilty? "Does not my palate understand a disaster?" (v. 30). He now thinks in terms of Eliphaz's understanding of the relation between suffering and wrongdoing.

Perhaps that is why Job turns at 7:1 to address the deity, who could solve the problem if he so wished (6:8-10). All through the dialogue, Job addresses the friends in the plural and the deity in the singular (some apparent exceptions are troubling). Verse 7 includes a singular imperative in Hebrew ("Consider that my life's a wind"), and in v. 8 a singular second-person pronoun ("Your eyes will be on me").

Describing his pain and desolation (vv. 1-6), Job emphasizes his evanescence in vv. 7-10. He is a "wind," invisible, disappearing. "Your eyes will be on me, but I'll not be there"; the last clause reappears as the last word of the speech, v. 21, with a similar idea: "You'll search for me, but I won't be there." God must act soon, before it is too late.

When complaining bitterly, Job likens himself to the Sea or a sea monster, opponents of the deity in combat myths (v. 12), imagery ironically opposite to his actual insubstantiality. Like Eliphaz, Job has dreams in which the deity terrifies him (v. 14). He cannot understand why he is worth all this attention, expressing his amazement (vv. 17-19) in a splendid parody of Psalm 8:

What's a man, that you magnify him so,
 set your mind on him,
 visit him every morning,
 test him every moment?
 How long will you not turn your gaze away,
 let me be till I swallow my spit?

He is not perfect ("I sin," he says in v. 20), but he cannot see that it is that big a thing. "Why not lift my guilt, carry away my iniquity?" (v. 21). There is the guilt again. His perception of his situation has changed from seeing it positively as God's doing in chaps. 1-2; now he is guilty. Surely God has but to see how ridiculous it is for him so to treat Job. But it will soon be too late (v. 21).

8:1-22, Bildad. Bildad's bluntness would be refreshing if he had any ordinary kindness. After one sarcastic couplet comparing Job's words to "a gusty wind" (v. 2), he jumps into his ideas, that God is unbendingly just and always responds favorably to the right human approach. Job has but to "search" for him and "ask mercy" (v. 5) to be repaid with a greatly improved future (v. 7).

Bildad shows, in a metaphor of a plant, that wicked folks receive what they deserve (vv. 11-12), admitting that bad people, like plants, may look prosperous for a time (vv. 16-17). But their hope "perishes" (v. 13), and they are "swallowed up" from their places (v. 18). He even brutally assures Job that "if your sons have sinned against him, [God] has sent them off in custody of their guilt" (v. 4).

He is sure, however, that good people are in no ultimate danger. Job will live happily later (vv. 7, 21). But the theory fails to solve an inconsistency: Job is good now, and by the theory, his goodness ought to be recognized now. Bildad implicitly acknowledges that God is treating him as if he were not what he is: "If you are pure and moral, though now he rouses up against you, he will repay your innocent dwelling" (v. 6). Just that "later" upsets Job, for little time is left.

Bildad's closing comment (8:22) alludes rhetorically to the end of Job's previous speech: "You'll search for me, but I won't be there" (7:21). Bildad uses the same final word: "The tent of the wicked will not be there." However, it is not exactly comforting. "The tent of the wicked" becomes the analogue of the sufferer.

9:1-10:22, Job. Job begins with a near quotation from Eliphaz (4:17): "How can a man be innocent with El?" (9:2). Eliphaz was talking morality, but Job is talking law: "If one wished to enter a case against him, he couldn't answer him once in a thousand" (v. 3). Although using the same word ("innocent"), they do not mean the same thing by it. Participants in this dialogue often talk past each other.

Job's speech intertwines a number of images around the central theme of law. God is both powerful and in charge of justice. The power is unreasonably directed against Job, and he sees no justice at work. Borrowing the language of hymnic praise of a God who does wonders in nature (as in Ps. 136 or Isa. 40:12), Job reverses its implications: "He who removes mountains, and they don't know / whom he's overturning in his anger; / who shakes earth from its place, / and its pillars shudder; / who speaks to the sun and it does not rise, / and puts a seal on the stars" (Job 9:5-7). This is chaotic power that does not maintain order but undoes it, that prevents human comprehension of the divine: "Ah, he passes me by, and I don't see him, sweeps on, and I don't discern him" (v. 11). Reverting in v. 14 to the language of trial, Job emphasizes his inequality with an opponent whom he "though innocent, couldn't answer" (v. 15a) and from whom he must "beg mercy" (v. 15b). The judge is also the prosecutor who "enlarges my wounds" (v. 17) and brutally "gorges me with bitter things" (v. 18).

Innocence is of no use, and Job's emotion rises to hysterical pitch as he describes himself as "perfect" (Heb. tam, v. 21; cf. 1:1, 8; 2:3). The deity is indifferent to moral stature: "He finishes off both perfect and wicked" (v. 22). Job moves very quickly from seeing God as amoral to accusing him of immorality: "Earth is given over to a wicked hand; / he covers its judges' faces— / if not, then who is it?" (v. 24). Only God can be the subject of that astounding statement. He is not merely amoral but so "wicked" that he does away with his own kind (v. 22).

In v. 27, Job speaks directly to God, as he did in chap. 7. His pain is evidence that God thinks him guilty (v. 28), and he has no hope of a fair outcome to the trial: "I'll be condemned" (v. 29). He is already condemned, and the muck of guilt will cling to him (vv. 30-31). Turning away from address to God (9:32-10:1), Job resumes it only at 10:2.

Meanwhile, he reflects on the difference between human and divine: "For he's not a man like me whom I could answer" (9:32). That is not just theology but represents the problem of the trial. Because God is both wicked and not human, no fair trial is possible. Job introduces and at the same time rejects the idea of a third-party advocate: "There's no arbiter between us / to lay his hand on us both" (v. 33). We will meet this "arbiter" and others like him in chaps. 16, 19, and 40.

Address to God resumes at 10:2 as a report of what he intends to say. In v. 3 it is sarcastic: "Is it good to you that you oppress, / despise your hands' toil, / and beam upon the counsel of the guilty?" Is God actually "not a man"

(9:32)? "Have you fleshly eyes; do you see as a man sees?" (10:4). If God is the creator (vv. 8-11), it seems either that he is no greater than a human being, thus not deserving so much power, or that he is undermining creation: "Recall that you made me like clay, / yet you're turning me back to dust?" (v. 9). Job is put under guard (v. 14), hunted down (v. 16), attacked as if by troops (v. 17). He has proclaimed his "perfection" (9:21) and the deity's "wickedness" (9:24), but he cannot know whether he is guilty or innocent (10:15).

Discouraged, worn down by pain and by the assaults of friends and deity alike, he closes his part of this cycle of speeches (v. 18) by returning to the theme of his beginning: "Why did you bring me out of the womb?" In chap. 3 he thought it would be better to be dead, and in 7:16 and 19 he proposed to be left alone. He ends with a figure of the darkness to which he will go, "deep shadow, all disordered, which shines like dusk" (10:22). It is the mirror image of his beginning at 3:4: "That day, let there be darkness."

But Job has come to a different point. Then being alive was too terrible; now he wants to be dead because his structure of assumptions has fallen apart. Divine power is not correlated with divine justice, and, though he deserves the latter, he is subjected to the assaults of the former.

11:1-20, Zophar. Job was worried in chap. 9 about answers. Zophar is sure that if Job received an answer directly from God (11:5) he would understand that he is getting off easily: God "lets some of your guilt be forgotten" (v. 6—or "exacts from you less than your guilt deserves"). But Zophar is more concerned with Job's understanding of the matter than with objective facts. Job does not comprehend (vv. 7-9) that the deity is so transcendent as to be unknowable. There is no hindering him (v. 10), no contradicting him (v. 11), because humans are invincibly stupid. That appears to be what Zophar's proverb means (v. 12): "A hollow-headed man will be intelligent / when a wild ass colt is born human."

"Be intelligent" is a verb cognate to the noun "heart," the organ in which Israelites conceived thinking and planning to take place. Yet if the race's problem is a flaw of the heart, how can Zophar so lightly propose (vv. 13-14) that Job just "prepare [his] heart" and "if guilt is in your hands, send it away"? If only all human flaws could be so readily mended.

Zophar is sure that nothing more is wanted than what Job has known to make the vision of a better life reality: "Your life will rise above noon [like the sun?] / gloom will become like morning [past—a strange image]" (v. 17). Yet he must have his last twist of the knife: "The eyes of knaves will be exhausted, / refuge perished from them, / their only hope to breathe their last" (v. 20). Job said in 6:8-9 that his "hope" was to be crushed and cut down by the deity. Zophar implicitly identifies Job with the knaves of this world.

The Second Cycle of Speeches

12:1-14:22, Job. In the first cycle, the friends argued for God's moral governance of the world, and Bildad and Zophar explained Job's punishment by his guilt. At first Job wished he could get out of his life of suffering and appealed to the created order, but shortly he began to think more about the question of justice and a trial that would establish his innocence. Yet Job thinks that justice has gone wrong, as his situation reverses the structure that everyone assumes. If there is to be a trial, is Job already presumed guilty?

In this opening speech, Job spends about half his time addressing the friends (12:2-13:19a) and about half addressing God (13:19b-14:22). He flings the friends a textbook example of sarcasm: "In truth, you are the people, / and with you dies wisdom" (12:2). If Zophar knows the divine secrets (11:6-7), Job can claim at least as much intelligence as they (12:3). They, on the other hand, are contemptuous in principle of any sufferer (v. 5) because they have the security available to "violent" people (v. 6).

He appeals to the creation, to "Behemoth" (cf. 40:15-24) and to birds, plants, and fish (12:7-8), all of whom know God's control (vv. 9-10). But the friends mistakenly persist in thinking that such control is fair and just, and Job piles up evidence that it is no such thing (vv. 13-25). God's "wisdom" is the arbitrary, unprincipled power to change nature (vv. 13, 15, 22) and to overturn human order (vv. 14, 16-21, 23-25). It might remind us of prophetic descriptions of the reversals of human power, except that Job describes divine retribution on human power with the insidious language of subversion (v. 19), deprivation of discretion (v. 20) or of "mind" (v. 24), contempt (v. 21), consignment of people to precreation "chaos" (v. 24; cf. Gen. 1:2) and to "lightless dark" (Job 12:25). As in chap. 9, this control, far from sustaining the created order, disintegrates it.

But Job persists in wanting the trial (13:1-2): "I want to speak to Shaddai, / desire to argue the case to El" (v. 3). Is that not strange? If God is so cynically careless of order and principle, why does Job want a trial over which he is judge? He continues to hold inconsistently both that the deity's justice is untrustworthy and that a trial is the solution to his own problem.

Meanwhile, he is fed up with arguing with the friends. Silence would be their wisdom (v. 5), as they speak "perversely" (v. 7) and try to "trick" God (v. 9). They argue with "dusty proverbs" and hold up "shields of clay" (v. 12). Job wants to speak with God, "whatever happens" (v. 13). Verse 15 is a famous passage:

He's going to slay me; I cannot wait, but I must argue my ways to his face.

The first line has been discussed a great deal, especially because the KJV translators rendered it wrongly: "Behold, though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." It is a splendid religious concept, but it does linguistic damage to the line. The verb "he will slay me" is not a subordinate clause, and the verb KJV renders "trust" means rather "to wait, tarry" (RSV says "hope," which is also not quite correct). The words "in him," moreover, reflect a traditional interpretation of the Hebrew lo', "not." The interpretation, pronouncing the word in the same way, leaves out of account the letter aleph (') and reads a preposition with an object, "to him or it" (Heb. lo). It is too bad to lose from Job so valuable a religious concept as that of trusting in the deity no matter what the deity does, but other passages propose the same idea (see, e.g., Hab. 3:17-18). Here the notion is a sudden, radical contradiction of what Job says otherwise in this and other speeches, and he never returns to it. I do not reject the translation for that reason; I reject it because the text does not say it.

This is a moment of the most powerful intensity. Job must gather all of his courage (13:14) to declare that he has "marshalled a case" and to insist that he knows he is "innocent" (v. 18). But he looks forward to no positive outcome, and as he begins his address to the deity (v. 19b), he must request that God "remove your hand from me, / and don't fall on me with terror of you" (v. 21). We have seen something of that terror in Job's descriptions of God's awful, chaotic power.

Now he calls for an accounting: "Let me know my guilt and sin" (v. 23). Punning on his name (Heb. 'iyyob), he wonders (v. 24) why God counts him as his "enemy" (Heb. 'oyeb). He assumes that he is being punished for guilt. But he, the human, is too worn out and ephemeral to justify all of this divine attention (13:24-14:6). He compares himself to a "drifting leaf" and "dry straw" (v. 25) and wonders in passing if such weakness may be the very reason that God watches and tries him (14:3). The trial and the creation come together in v. 5: "You've set him limits he cannot exceed" may mean both limits of nature, as in the images of ephemerality (13:28-14:2), and legal regulations that humans may not transgress. It is as if God forces the human to be guilty simply by being created. "Gaze away from him [the human], and he'll cease" (14:6). Only if God leaves us alone can we even die in peace.

The implication of v. 6 leads to the remarkable analogy between a felled tree and human evanescence (vv. 7-12). The tree has hope, does not "cease" (v. 7), can sprout again with the right water. "A man lies down and doesn't get up" (v. 12). The Hebrew Bible has no expectation of a pleasant afterlife, and the analogy to the tree has a rueful tone. Job goes on to wish (vv. 13-15) that, as a special case, he might have an afterlife, that God might conceal him among the dead ("in Sheol," v. 13; → Sheol) until he is ready to deal with him. He would wait eagerly for a positive outcome (v. 15). But it is for nothing. The idea is raised only to be dropped. The physical world wears away, "and you destroy a man's hope" (vv. 18-19). Nothing is there for Job except "his flesh's pain" and a lamenting soul (v. 22).

Job had said in 12:10 that "every living soul" is in God's hand. Now he sees that to be in that hand is only pain, to be not merely in contrast but in opposition to God. Job (Heb. 'iyyob) has definitely become enemy ('oyeb).

15:1-35, Eliphaz. Speakers in this debate typically begin with sarcastic remarks about the others' arguments (Bildad, 8:2; Zophar, 11:2-3; Job, 12:2-6). Eliphaz too shrugs his shoulders at the notion of answering "windy knowledge" (15:2) and arguing against "useless talk" (v. 3). Job threatens "religion" (lit., "fear" [of God]) and constrains "complaint" (v. 4). Ancient Israelite piety saw no contradiction between fear of a powerful God and willingness to complain about what that God did to them. Both were central elements of the concourse between humans and deity. Eliphaz seems to worry that, because Job is unacceptably guilty, he may undermine his religious freedom to complain. Job is becoming the prosecution's star witness in this trial. Every word he speaks ensures a guilty verdict. "Your mouth condemns you, not I, / your lips testify against you" (v. 6).

Job is claiming too much. "Were you born the first human?" (v. 7). Eliphaz pours scorn on the grandiose idea that Job thinks he is Adam's equal. He is only asking questions, to be sure, but they imply that Job thinks of affirmative answers to them. And Eliphaz is sure that he and the others know as much and understand as well as Job does (vv. 9-10).

It is not at all clear that he is right to think that. His next question is incredible: "Are El's consolations too slight for you, / the gentle word against you?" (v. 11). If that is irony, it is stupidly insensitive. "Consolation" is the wrong term for what both he and Job assume the deity has done to Job, and if the situation proposes a "word" to Job, it is hardly "gentle" (but Zophar said in 11:6 that it is gentler than Job deserves).

Eliphaz goes on to criticize Job for losing his mind and talking wildly (vv. 12–13). He can hardly be both ironic and critical. If, on the other hand, he is serious, he has abandoned rationality. To think that God is both consoling and gentle with Job is to refuse to experience the real world.

But perhaps he is doing that. In v. 14, Eliphaz repeats the theological doctrine he had proposed in chap. 4, that the human race is condemned before it starts; and he echoes Job's parody in 7:17 of Psalm 8 and the nature of divine attention: "What is a man, that he can be pure, / innocent, one born of woman?" Did Job misconstrue God's heed to humans as serious, though vindictive? Eliphaz insists (vv. 15–16) that the deity finds everyone less than himself, and, especially a human like Job, contemptible: "He doesn't trust his holy ones, / and the sky is not pure in his eyes. / What then of one horrible and corrupt, / a man who drinks wrongdoing like water?" The "holy ones" are probably members of the divine court, such as the "sons of Elohim" in chaps. 1–2, and the drinker of wrongdoing is surely Job.

The image leads Eliphaz to a detailed, conventional description of the fate of wicked people (vv. 20–24), "terrible sounds" and destruction in a time of well-being (v. 21), darkness (vv. 22–23), starvation (v. 23), "strain and stress" and attack (v. 24). Verses 25–27 portray the aggressive rebellion and active, if temporary, prosperity of the wicked. Verse 29, at least, proposes that it will be temporary; but Eliphaz confuses himself in v. 30 by saying both "He won't escape from darkness" and "He'll escape with the wind in his mouth."

Eliphaz is sure that what looks like a good life for the wicked is at best fleeting, cut off before its prime (v. 32), dropping blossoms and fruit before ripeness (v. 33). An image of sterility in v. 34 gives way to an oddly mixed metaphor of fruitfulness and uselessness: "conceiving toil and bearing guilt, / their womb fosters deceit" (v. 35).

The entire speech contains not one word of encouragement. In his first speech, Eliphaz ambiguously assured Job that the matter was not hopeless. Here Job is the outstanding case of corruption in an already corrupt universe (v. 16). Eliphaz seems to have given up on Job's rehabilitation.

16:1–17:16, Job. In the first cycle, speakers alluded to one another a good deal, sometimes in indirect rather than direct reference. In the second cycle, we find less such interaction, though it is not absent. In 16:2, for example, Job turns Eliphaz's closing shot at the wicked as "conceiving trouble" (15:35) back on him, calling the friends "troublesome comforters." He wishes that "windy words have an end" (v. 3), echoing Eliphaz's condemnation of his "windy" wisdom (15:2). Eliphaz had criticized him in 15:6 as testifying against himself, but Job replies, "my emaciation . . . testifies against me" (16:8). Later, describing God, who "runs against me like a warrior" (16:14), Job ironically reverses Eliphaz's image of the human rebel, "playing the hero," who "runs toward" God in attack (15:26). These responses are almost explicit answers. It is simply that there were more and subtler responses in the first cycle; as the dialogue proceeds, one discerns more talking past one another than before.

Except for chap. 3, Job turned, in earlier speeches, to speak directly to God, complaining of mistreatment or requesting special attention. Here he addresses God only twice, very briefly, with a couplet at 16:7b–8a and a quatrain at 17:3–4, both with second-person pronouns. After these speeches, he immediately discusses God in the third person. Later speeches contain very little address to God. It is important to our perception of Job's character and feelings that he drastically reduces his direct speech to the deity in the latter parts of the dialogue. Job's isolation increases as the book goes along.

Yet the dialogue is painful. The friends do not diminish Job's pain by "piling up words" against him (v. 4), and his own talk does not stop it (v. 6). After complaining that God causes his alienation and forces him to be a witness (vv. 7b–8a) so that his very condition is legal testimony ("my emaciation . . . testifies against me"), he describes how God increases his pain with a metaphor of attack by a beast that "tears" its prey (v. 9; cf. Gen. 37:33). God uses human mobs against him (v. 10), "abandons me to the vicious, / flings me to the hands of knaves" (v. 11). Job suffers military assault: he is used for target practice (v. 12c), troops surround him (v. 13), besieging forces break through a wall (v. 14). He emphasizes the deity's immediate, physical force: "He shook me up, grabbed my neck and broke me apart" (v. 12a–b). The troops stand aside while God (the verbs are masculine singular) "splints open my guts without pity" (v. 13) and "runs against me like a warrior" (v. 14). It is a most unpleasant image of a violent God, and the irony is deepened by Job's certainty that his despair has no effect on this viciously tyrannical deity (vv. 15–16) and that his purity ought to justify the opposite treatment.

Even that graphic image of Job's feelings does not prepare us for the outburst in vv. 18–21. Job expects to be murdered and calls on the earth itself not to conceal the evidence: "Earth, do not cover my blood, / do not provide a place for my outcry!" (v. 18). Since God knew that Cain had murdered Abel because "the voice of your brother's blood is crying out to me from the ground" (Gen. 4:10), Job wishes no concealment of the traces of his murder by God.

Earth is not the only witness. "Even now, Ah! my witness is in heaven, / my supporter is on high" (Job 16:19). This passage moves beyond 9:33, where another third party, an "arbiter," was denied. Here Job asserts the "witness's" presence and his power to "interpret" Job to God (v. 21a) and to make a decision in the case (v. 21): "And he will decide for a hero against God, / between Adam and his friend." The translation is controversial; JPS prefers "let him arbitrate between a man and God," and RSV has "that he would maintain the right of a man with God." But the verb means to decide in a case, and I believe that it is a decision "for" Job (the "hero") and "against" God.

It is fascinating that Job refers to a third party with power to carry out a legal decision against the deity. It causes some difficulty, no doubt, with the idea of the Hebrew Bible's unequivocal monotheism, though one might argue (somewhat lamely, I think) that bitterness leads Job theologically astray. The provocation to be bitter is very great.

From this emotional highpoint, Job slides quickly down into deep discouragement. Time is running out, and "I own the grave" (16:22-17:1). Even the somewhat feisty-sounding demand addressed to God (17:3-4) has a certain formulaic tone to it. His heart is not in it. People suffer on him (v. 6), and he is reduced to a shadow (v. 7). The temperature rises a bit in vv. 8-10. Job's suffering moves "good" people not only to shock but to opposition: "The guiltless rouses up against the impious" (v. 8). People who conceive themselves as good oppress those who, they think, deserve punishment. Job's suffering hardens the dogmatism of those who think themselves pure. It is the same contempt for the sufferer that Job noted in 12:5, and it rests in the same fear he saw in his friends' eyes (6:21). More helpful would be a wise person, but Job knows better than to expect to find one (17:10).

So he falls back to lethargy and the wish for death: "My days are past, / my purposes shattered" (v. 11). He has no hope except death (cf. the ends of chaps. 7 and 10), no companions except "muck" and "maggot" (v. 14). Death would be better.

18:1-21, Bildad. Job himself predicted that his outburst would anger the friends (17:8-9). However, he seems to have confused them, since Bildad begins almost unintelligibly. Verses 2-3 are addressed to someone plural (plural verbs and pronouns), criticizing them for delaying the friends' speaking ("we," v. 2b) and for considering them as stupid animals (v. 3). Such charges would be perfectly comprehensible if addressed to Job in the singular. Is Bildad so upset that he has forgotten his grammar? Or is he speaking to Eliphaz and Zophar? If the latter, his criticism of their failed arguments and of a supercilious attitude toward him (editorial or royal "we"?) introduces a serious disharmony among the friends.

In v. 4, he speaks directly to Job in the second line: "Will earth be abandoned on your account?" But no more; from then on, Job is included only by the implication of context. These disputants are talking past each other! Like Eliphaz, Bildad proffers no word of assurance or positive expectation, but his series of images is interesting. He goes from the metaphor of cattle in v. 3 to the image of a beast of prey who tears only itself ("preys angrily on his soul," v. 4). "Will earth be abandoned on your account?" The rhetorical question expects a negative answer, and a quotation from Job ("A rock disintegrates from its place," 14:18) ridicules Job's pretensions to greatness and influence. The extinguished lights in 18:5-6 continue the ridicule (Bildad is still having difficulty with singular and plural; v. 5 refers to "knives," v. 6 to a singular "he"), and vv. 7-10 play out an elaborate image of trapping, which harks back to the beast of prey. He then moves into an image of sickness and death, which begins with "shiver" (v. 11) and moves to famine, disaster, and the minions of personified Death snatching a sick person from a tent (vv. 12-14).

Reference to the tent leads to the poignant picture of a tent occupied by someone else and the dwelling sprinkled with sulphur (v. 15) to disinfect it and then shifts to the metaphor of a tree that dries away from root to twig (v. 16). The dying tree merges in vv. 17-19 with the picture of the dying or dead person whose very "memory" and name die (v. 17). He is chased "out of the world" (v. 18) and deprived of survivors (v. 19). The ancient world, expecting no future life, laid its hopes on the memory of the descendants, which Bildad summarily rips away from Job. The images of disintegration from v. 5 on illustrate Bildad's quotation from Job in v. 4 ("A rock disintegrates from its place"), which seemed scornful there.

But Bildad closes with another self-contradiction: "They shudder over his day in the west, / in the east the hair stands on end" (v. 20). Having depicted the wicked person as lost from the world and memory, he now describes the castastrophe as notoriously worldwide. The dwelling, dissolved in vv. 15-16, returns as "the evil dwellings" in v. 21. Bildad seems confused from beginning to end of the speech. Its multiple images would be interesting if they did not result in a contradiction.

19:1-29, Job. Job begins by repeating Bildad's opening words, "How long?" (cf. 18:2). We can imagine this indignant quatrain spoken in a parodying tone of voice: "How long will you pain my soul, / pulverize me with talk?" (v. 2). It is also exaggerated: "These ten times you've insulted me" (v. 3). It has been only five times, but ten is a good round number, even if an exaggeration.

Much of the rest of this relatively short speech revolves around images of distance and closeness, of travel and staying at home. Job asks, "Have I truly strayed?" but insists that "my straying stays at home with me" (v. 4). In 6:24, he asked about error with the same verb, and perhaps here he suggests that his "error" is like a house guest who goes nowhere and bothers no one. Echoing Bildad's metaphors of trapping, he describes how God "circled his net" over him (19:6). Justice is undiscoverable (v. 7).

The next stanza (vv. 8-12) piles up travel images: blocked roads and darkened paths (v. 8), devastation around the walker (v. 10), God's "gangs" who build a highway and camp around his tent (v. 12), the latter an image of home set against words of journey. These images are combined with military ones. Job experiences again God's attacks (v. 11) and the gangs (the word often refers to raiding parties) building a highway for an army to pass on the way to siege. The object of all of these military attentions, Job notes, is merely his "tent" (v. 12). Proportion has been abandoned.

Images of distance become psychological rather than physical in vv. 13-19. Job begins with the verb "to distance" and lists those who were once close and are now, by God's agency, far: brothers, acquaintances, visitors (vv. 13-14), strangers given hospitality (v. 15), slaves (vv. 15-16), his immediate family (v. 17), social inferiors (v. 18), and social equals (v. 19). The reversals are ironic. "Those who know me are alien (Heb. zaru) from me" (v. 13), and his maids think of him as "alien" (zar) and foreign (v. 15). A slave refuses his commands, and the young "heckle" rather than respect him (v. 18). His wife recoils from his "stinking" breath (v. 17, zur, a pun on zar, vv. 13, 15). Most surprising, "I am loathsome to my own children" (v. 17). Has Job forgotten that they are dead?

Suddenly, images of distance give way to those of unbearable closeness: "My bones cling to my skin and flesh" (v. 20); God's "hand has touched me" (v. 21)—the same verb as in 1:11 and 2:5, used also of the wind that "touched" the house and killed his children in 1:19; both friends and God "pursue" him (v. 22). Yet in the midst of these metaphors comes a poignant plea for a positive closeness: "Pity, O pity me, you my friends" (v. 21). It is a very brief change from the sarcastic invective that Job and the friends usually use on each other.

"Would that my words were written, / would that they were engraved in an inscription / with an iron stylus and lead / forever in rock they were incised." As in 16:18, where he called on earth to testify to the martyr's blood, Job is anxious that his complaint not be lost. He wants the testimony not of mute fact but of "words," the unmistakable meaning of his story, to be permanently "incised" in a public monument.

If only what he says next could be deciphered! Ironically, it was written not in rock "with an iron stylus and lead" but on papyrus or parchment. I can read the first line of v. 25, but the six lines following (vv. 25b-27) are unintelligible to me. Each word is readable, but the words do not join in sentences that make sense. Nearly every interpretation of these lines rests on a scholar's proposal to rewrite some part of them. Since I reject doing that, I can give readers no help with them.

The first line of v. 25 is clear: "As for me, I know that my avenger lives." The line is familiar to music lovers from Handel's Messiah: "I know that my Redeemer liveth." But the word is not "redeemer," much less "Redeemer." Job is not referring to a divine savior or to Jesus. The Hebrew go'el alludes to a custom known from passages such as Num. 35:19 and Deut. 19:6, 12, that refer to "the avenger of blood." When someone was killed by a member of another tribe or clan, the injured clan appointed one of its number to take vengeance on the murderer on behalf of the deceased. The person so appointed was the go'el, the "avenger," not a "redeemer," because Job's go'el furthers the opposition between God and himself. God is attacking Job, not enhancing friendship, as we have seen in chap. 16 and earlier in this chapter. The figure of the "avenger" is born of Job's desperate awareness that God "considers me like his foes" (v. 11). It reminds us of the earlier third parties, the "arbiters," whose existence Job denied in 9:33 but who could hypothetically intervene between two parties in a dispute, and the "witness" of 16:19-21, whose presence with God Job affirmed with great certainty and who has, he thought, the power to decide the controversy. Job makes a more serious move with the avenger. This is the kin who takes vengeance on the guilty enemy for damage done to the sufferer.

The exploration of divine justice has come to this pass. Because that justice, so confidently proclaimed by the friends, turns out on examination to be injustice, its solution cannot be acquiescence, the mediation of the "arbiters," or the controversy of the "witness." Only revenge is left. The avenger, moreover, "lives." A commission of vengeance is given only on the death of someone. For Job to be avenged, he must, it seems, be dead, but by the same token the avenger must be alive. Significantly, Job does not address God in chap. 19. For the first time since chap. 3, his speech is entirely within himself or to the friends. Conceivably, part of the garbled passage in vv. 25-27 could have been addressed to the deity, but there is now no way to know.

When the text returns to intelligibility in vv. 28-29, Job is warning the friends of danger to themselves from a "sword" as "fury on wrongdoing" (v. 29). Whose sword is it? Does he threaten them with the avenger's attentions or with God's sword, which has so far pursued no one but Job? Like him, the friends will soon learn about judgment. The sword will make them "know that there is a trial" (v. 29). Something legal is still in Job's mouth as he ends his part of the second cycle.

20:1-29, Zophar. Zophar can hardly wait to leap into the discussion. He begins with "therefore," which we would expect in the middle of a sentence, and his first quatrain, vv. 2-3, seems breathless. He is taking it personally: "I hear indication of an insult to me" (v. 3), of which Job also complained (19:3).

Like the other friends in this cycle, Zophar has no word of reassurance or support. He emphasizes images of sudden, radical reversal. Bad people's "triumphal shout" and "joy" are short (20:5), and they themselves disappear like dreams (v. 8). They "ascend to the sky" and "reach into the clouds" (v. 6; an allusion to the Tower of Babel, Gen. 11:4?), then perish like dung (Job 20:7). The seen becomes unseen (vv. 7b, 9). Their lusty bones will "bed" in the dust (v. 11), a painfully ironic consummation of lust in the bed of dust, echoing Job's expectation of going down to Sheol's dust with his hope (17:16).

The images of 20:12-23 center on eating and oppose sweet to bitter (vv. 12, 14), good taste (vv. 12-13) to vomit (v. 15), and gall and poison (vv. 14, 16) to honey and butter (v. 17). The knave cannot see the latter (v. 18), because moral retribution is at work. The wicked person, oppressing the oppressed, taking what is not one's own, having ulcers (vv. 19-20), gives the signs and causes of wrong. Zophar proclaims the justice that meets injustice: "There's nothing left for him to eat, / therefore his property cannot increase" (v. 21). He is not the model of consistency here. Verse 21 pictures the person with nothing to eat, v. 22 with plenty to eat, v. 23 with something to eat. Eliphaz too exaggerated the case and contradicted himself (15:20-21). Perhaps Zophar is discussing different situations at different times. Yet the friends claim the certainty of correlation between sin and suffering, between goodness and prosperity. That they contradict themselves as they describe it suggests that the principle is itself self-contradictory.

Zophar's images of battle and storm (20:24-28) are also not utterly meticulous. "He flees an iron weapon, / a bronze bow cuts him down" (v.

24). The crescendo from iron to bronze would be effective if a "bronze bow" were good for anything or even if a bow could "cut down" someone. Perhaps one expects too much: Zophar called attention to his own agitated state at the beginning. Yet the rest of the speech has some relatively consistent pictures of reversal and opposition and a nicely developed bit on the shift from sweet to bitter. Here his reversal of situation pretends precision but fails to deliver it. The battle moves to the cosmos itself. Supernatural fire (v. 26), sky and earth (v. 27), storm and flood (v. 28) fight to bring the sinner down. Zophar sounds very like a hellfire preacher, with his reference to "the wrathful day" (v. 28).

His conclusion reverses two positive terms: "This is the lot of evil humankind from God, / the heritage that God bespeaks him" (v. 29). One may receive a "lot" (or "portion") in a special banquet (see, e.g., 1 Sam. 1:4-5), and "heritage" is usually a bequest. The images of food in Job 20:12-23 and those of property in vv. 19-21 come to climax with this ironic promise. The knave—Job's category—has no positive gift from God to anticipate.

The negativity of the friends in this cycle is thorough and consistent. It is hard to suppose that they could go further in the third, but they do.

The Third Cycle of Speeches

21:1-34, Job. The second cycle (chaps. 12-20) was an unfriendly one. The friends turned unfriendly to Job, concentrating on lurid visions of how the wicked are punished, with the implication that Job is undergoing some version of these punishments. Job turned unfriendly to God, progressively diminishing direct speech to him from the long passage in 13:19b-14:22 through the brief remarks in 16:7b-8; 17:3-4, to the absence of address to God in chap. 19. Twice he asserted a new assurance for the presence of third parties to his dispute: a "witness," whose power to decide he affirmed in 16:19-21, and an "avenger," whom he "knows" to be alive in 19:25. These figures of Job's imagination are, as it were, "anti-Prosecutors," who advance beyond the "arbiters" whose existence Job denied in 9:33. Job has implicitly agreed with the friends that he is being punished and has continued to desire a trial to clear him, though his references to the helpers may indicate doubt about it. But the vivid, horrific terms in which he has described God's attacks on him match the friends' visions of divine punishment on sinners.

The third cycle takes the argument into interesting, unexpected turns. Eliphaz wondered (15:11) whether Job found God's "consolations too slight." Job suggests sarcastically that, if the friends listen carefully, they may receive "some consolation" (21:2). Their increased certainty that he is hopelessly guilty may console them. But v. 3b presents a strange singular: "And after I've spoken, you [masculine singular] can scoff away." Is he addressing Zophar, as most scholars think, or Eliphaz, who, in the established pattern, will speak next? Or, as the singular has been before, is it addressed to God, a passing, truculent shot—"You up there!"? The latter may be implied by his next questions (v. 4): "Now for me, is my complaint with humans? / Why shouldn't my breath be short?" The answer to the first must be negative: "No, the complaint is with someone other than humans." The second, like Job's exhortation to the friends, suggests the magnitude of the complaint: "Face me and be appalled, / lay your hands on your mouths. / If I recall it, I'm frightened, / and my flesh grasps a shudder" (vv. 5-6). The friends refuse to realize that the problem originates not with the sufferer but with the punishing deity.

That is what is so appalling. Job's condition requires the thought that God has done this without any good reason. If God punishes by suffering—and Job and the friends think he does—the effect ought to result from a discernible cause. The friends have not found one, and Job can find none in himself that is proportional to the suffering. Not only has he not done enough to justify the divine reaction; he has done nothing whatever to justify it. An inexplicable blow from the back of God's hand has thrust rudely away Job's entire system of laws, assumptions, assurances, and truths on which his daily living rested comfortably. "My flesh grasps a shudder"—a strange expression. Perhaps he can find nothing more solid to grasp.

In the rest of the speech, Job proposes an understanding of life and the world exactly the opposite of the one that has just dissipated. Job and the friends have supposed that God rewards with prosperity those humans who please him and punishes with suffering those who displease him. They have assumed that prosperity rewards virtue, suffering punishes vice. Turn it upside down, Job proposes, and one has just as accurate a view of the world. "Why do the wicked live, / mature, and increase strength . . . ?" (v. 7). He does not ask whether the wicked live this way; he asks why, assuming that they do. Verses 8-12 provide a series of pictures of healthy fertility in family and flocks (vv. 8-11), happy children and music (vv. 11-12), exactly the opposite of what Job experiences. His herds are destroyed, his children neither dance nor sing. But he is the model of virtue, and those who prosper are "the wicked."

They manage, moreover, to keep God at arm's length, tell him to his face that "knowing your ways does not please us" (v. 14), that service to him is unprofitable (v. 15). Yet something less attractive lurks in their thoughts (v. 13): "They wear out their days with good"—an odd but somewhat attractive way to picture decline to death, but not so odd as the next line—"are terrified at the moment of Sheol." Such terror of death might motivate the distance from God articulated in vv. 14-15. An alternative reading of v. 13b is: "They go down to Sheol in peace." I see no basis except personal preference to choose one reading over the other. The duality persists in v. 16. "Their good is not in their hand" might mean that it is in the deity's hand, whether the wicked like it or not, or, if the line is a question, as RSV has it ("Is not their good in their hand?"), that prosperity or happiness is actually in these people's own power. Job wishes (vv. 19-20) that those people would receive a deserved punishment, but he does not see that they do (v. 17). The person who dies "all secure and at ease" comes to the same dusty end as the bitter one who has never had it good (vv. 23-26). But the thought is different from the one in chap. 3. There the sameness of destiny was pleasant. Here it is unfair that the unhappy righteous have no better prospect than the prosperous wicked.

The friends apparently try to appeal to contrary evidence (v. 28), but Job proposes unaccustomed sources of wisdom (v. 29). Wayfarers, gypsy nomads, traveling caravaneers—not the polite society Job and his friends know—have a different sense of the world: "On a calamitous day a wretch is spared" (v. 30). People do not receive what they deserve (v. 31): "When he has done something, who pays him back?"

The wicked wealthy person has a funeral attended by crowds, and the "clods of the wadi" where he is buried "taste sweet to him" (vv. 32-33). As the images of death throughout this chapter put the cap on the images of life, so Job turns upside down the friends' reflection on life. Certainly God rewards those who please him and punishes those who displease him. But they are completely mistaken about who pleases God: he rewards the wicked. Job cannot imagine their being more wrong: "How you console me with empty air, / and your replies leave only fraud behind!" (v. 34). He began the speech by saying that they might receive some "consolation." He closes it with the irony that they "console" him only with puffs of wind.

22:1-30; 25:1-6, The Friends. I will look at the speeches of the friends in the third cycle together. There are only two; Zophar has no third speech. Bildad's speech is unusually short, and he says nothing new.

climax: "Are you not in fact greatly wicked, / with no end to your misdeeds?" (22:5). He has not said that quite so bluntly before, and his process of getting there is interesting. Asking if a human "benefits" God, he answers that one "benefits only himself" (v. 2). Verse 3 repeats what he said before, that God is indifferent to Job's "innocence." Appearing to grant that "innocence," the next rhetorical question, "Does he charge you out of your religiousness?" (v. 4), calls for a negative answer. Seeming to say that God does not accuse Job for being good, he really says that Job must be guilty if God charges him. He makes a similar point in v. 5, still retaining the form of the rhetorical question—but "Are you not?" demands the affirmative answer "Yes, I am." It is a sneaky switch in a series of rhetorical questions that call for negative answers.

Eliphaz now leaps at Job with a series of specific accusations. In vv. 6–11 he specifies Job's moral crimes, and in vv. 12–20 he describes theological faults. In his conclusion, vv. 21–30, Eliphaz proposes a solution to Job's dilemma. He delivers the accusations with utter certainty, and we must imagine Job's jaw dropping in astonishment. The whole is a tissue of invention. Job has done none of what he is accused of in vv. 6–9. Eliphaz's assurance that wicked people suffer means that people who suffer are wicked. Thus, if Job has not crushed the arms of orphans (v. 9), he must have done something just like it. His accusation is structured exactly like certain oracles of the prophets. The opening "because" governs the accusations in vv. 6–9 and introduces the resulting punishment by "therefore" (cf., e.g., Hos. 2:7–8; Isa. 8:6–7, and many other passages). But "because" is followed by sheer fiction, made the more ironic by contrast to the praise of Job's compassionate care for those in trouble, an allusion with which Eliphaz began his first speech (4:3–4).

He now moves to the theological sins (vv. 12–20). Assuming that Job must grant God's transcendence (v. 12), he purports to quote Job about the limits of divine knowledge: "And you say, 'What does God know? / Does he give order through the thick cloud? / Clouds conceal him, and he does not see, / and he walks around on the circle of the sky'" (vv. 13–14). Job has said nothing of the sort but has consistently complained that God "sees" too much (e.g., 7:19–20; 13:27; 14:3, 6; 16:9). To accusations of deeds Job has not done, Eliphaz adds criticisms of thoughts he has not expressed. He nearly gives his game away when he blurts out about those who remain distant from God (v. 17) that God "filled their houses with good" (v. 18)—which was precisely Job's claim in chap. 21, namely, that God showers good on the wicked. And v. 19, "the righteous see and rejoice, / the innocent mocks it," remarkably echoes Job's sarcasm in 17:8–9 about how his plight hardens the attitudes of "good" folks.

As suddenly as he began his frontal attack, Eliphaz leaves it to propound a solution (vv. 21–25) and to predict a happy future (vv. 26–30). However, his head is not yet quite together. "Then benefit him [God]," he says, forgetting that in v. 2 he denied that a human could benefit God. The advice is conventional: take instruction (Heb. torah, with a hint of submitting to rules), turn to the deity, put wrongdoing at a distance (vv. 22–23). He should give up crass materialism in favor of the divine treasure (vv. 24–25), a metaphor wearied by vast overuse. The result will be a future filled with success: pleasure in God (v. 26), prayer answered and vows paid (v. 27), decision definitively made (v. 28), rescue of lowly sinners from the depths (vv. 29–30). It sounds so easy, but it ignores the depth of evil Eliphaz ascribed to Job earlier in the speech. Is this the work of a rational mind?

If Eliphaz's last contribution combines unjust accusations with ostensibly warm hopes for Job's future, Bildad's hardly has time for more than a "good-bye." His style is the tersest of the three, but this speech is short even for him, only ten lines. He makes but two points. In 25:2–3, he affirms the utter power of God, and in vv. 4–6 he argues that nothing in the creation can measure up to divine standards. Neither point is remotely new, and the second, interestingly, circles back to where the discussion began. Bildad echoes Eliphaz's point (4:17–18): "How is any man righteous with God, / how is one born of woman pure?" (25:4) and adds another (cf. 15:15), even the moon and stars are not pure (25:5). So we return to the beginning, and it seems that the friends have learned nothing. Eliphaz lambasts Job but, strangely, promises him a future; Bildad closes with Eliphaz's cynical view of the human race; and Zophar—well, Zophar is reduced to silence.

23:1–24:25, Job. In chap. 21, Job argued that the converse of the conventional notion of retribution is correct: the wicked are rewarded and the good punished. In this speech he focuses on the divine absence. "Oh that I knew, and could find him, / could enter his throne room" (23:3). I have wondered before, why, given Job's strictures against God, does he insist on a trial with God as judge? If, as he argued in chap. 21, God rewards evil, what is the trial's attraction? He even talks about it in positive terms, anticipates that God will say something that he will understand (v. 5), expects personal attention (v. 6), and thinks that he may win a case rationally handled (v. 7). In chaps. 9 and 13, the trial seemed already decided—and lost.

Discouragement resumes in force, as Job boxes the compass in unsuccessful search for God (vv. 8-9). He is "not there" in the east, cannot be discerned in the west or perceived in the north, and when Job reaches the south (v. 9b), he understands: "He hides in the south." God deliberately avoids him, and Job thinks he understands that too: "Because he knows the way I'm on; / he'll test me, I shall emerge as gold" (v. 10). God avoids the sufferer precisely because the trial will turn out in Job's favor or because God will be publicly shown unjust. Job, after all, has been flawless in his conduct (vv. 11-12). But God is arbitrary: "His soul wishes something, and he does it" (v. 13). There is no time between desire and deed, and the thinking comes later: "He will come to terms with my sentence" (v. 14). That is enough to raise Job's abject fright (vv. 15-16). Yet that terrorism does not "silence" Job with the prospect of darkness (v. 17).

God is still irresponsibly absent. "Why are not proper times treasured by Shaddai, / and those who know him don't see his days?" (24:1). The proper times are probably times for trial, which God simply ignores. The divine absence, however, becomes for Job an explanation of errant behavior by humans, as he accuses God, in chap. 24, of responsibility for human wrong. The accusation is implicit, since Job does not address God directly.

Chap. 24 is very difficult, complex in images and ambiguous in language, full of verbs with unspecified subjects and pronouns with unclear antecedents. Translators have an inordinately hard time with it, changing singulars to plurals and finding conjecture necessary. It is no wonder that modern scholars have tried to recover from chap. 24 traces of "lost" parts of Bildad's speech (chap. 25) and of Zophar's nonexistent one. Any interpreter must confess uncertainty about this passage.

God's absence explains why humans go bad, oppressing the weak, stealing their goods, and behaving arrogantly with them (vv. 2-4). Job compares them with the wild asses (vv. 5-8), who live by the wits they can muster. Humans live in the same way, whether they are the oppressors (v. 9) or the oppressed (vv. 10-11). But the comparison to wild asses suggests that Job is not criticizing these people morally. It is the fault of God: "From the city the dying cry out, / the throats of the wounded call, / but God thinks nothing amiss" (v. 12). If God fails to give people guidance because he is absent, and if he ignores trouble about which he ought to care, can one expect anything but beastly behavior? Job makes an interesting advance on his revised theory of divine retribution. In chap. 21 he argued that God rewards misbehavior. Here he implicitly argues that God causes it.

In the two following stanzas, Job draws an opposition between humans and God, vv. 13-

17 specifying the evil humans do, vv. 18-24 the deeds of God. The controlling image of vv. 13-17 is the opposition of light and darkness. Human wickedness depends very much on darkness, from the murderer who can kill in broad daylight but expands his activities at night (v. 14) to the adulterer's use of twilight (v. 15) and the thief's dependence on darkness (v. 16). But all of these wrongdoers are "rebellers against light" (v. 13) and "familiar with darkness's terrors" (v. 17).

The subject of v. 18 must be God. Verse 13 began with the emphatic Hebrew pronoun "they." Likewise, v. 18 begins with a pronoun "he." As the implicit cause of the human sins in the earlier verses, God is the obvious referent of this emphatic singular. Verses 18-24 are, if anything, more difficult than vv. 13-17. Divine curses cause barrenness in soil and humans (vv. 18, 20-21), dryness overcomes melting snow (v. 19). In one line, "Wickedness is bought like wood" (v. 20c), Job explicitly blames God for social disorder. God seems to raise up strong people in order to cast them down (vv. 22-24). Some of these images modify the earlier emphasis on God's absence, but Job reaffirms it: "They are exalted a little, and he is not there" (v. 24). This claim is the divine counterpart to Job's threat (7:21) that he would not be there. God departs "swiftly" (24:18) from the scene and leaves behind disaster and chaos. All of this reflects the absence of which Job complained when he looked for the trial among all points of the compass (23:8-9).

And again we must wonder why Job wants a trial with this God. Not only is he absent; he is corrupt and a corrupter. Delving deep into the ground of human evil, Job finds there the work of God. Will such a deity acquit an uncorrupted human being? The statement about God in this chapter is devastating, and Job challenges the friends at the end: "If it is not so, who will prove me a liar / and bring my words to nought?" (24:25). The friends are not equal to the challenge. Bildad returns, in the next chapter, to a conceded point, that God is mighty and transcendent, and Zophar falls back on silence. Elihu (chaps. 32-37) tries to meet the demand of 24:25 but surely fails, and Yahweh (chaps. 38-41) makes no effort to do so. Job has already won the argument. But he still has a good deal left to say.

26:1-27:23, Job. The opening reply to Bildad is sharply sarcastic, emphasizing Job's weakness and the poor argument directed against him. "By whose help have you declared these words? / Whose breath is it that comes out from you?" (v. 4). It sounds like a nearly sinister accusation of guilt by association. It is even more devastating that vv. 2-4 are cast entirely in the second-person singular, which Job has used otherwise only to address God. Is he speaking to God or to Bildad? One may try taking it both ways. To Bildad, he tramples on whatever remains of kindness, and scorns their wisdom and help. To God, he criticizes help, "deliverance to the arm without strength," advice, knowledge—none of which God has conveyed to him. The divine absence, indeed, is his subject. Verse 4 even suggests that God must have help from someone else to speak.

Verses 5-14 characterize the creation in terms of power. This identification might appear to agree with the friends' assessment of God's transcendence (and therefore some scholars assign these verses to Bildad). Yet the tone, tinged with the foregoing sarcasm, is not normal theology. The cosmos is under the thumb of a cruel, harsh tyrant, who causes the dead to "writhe in agony" (v. 5), strips the place of the dead naked (v. 6). The universe lies passive under his rule (vv. 7-10), or "the sky's pillars tremble, / stunned by his rebuke" (v. 11). The usual divine enemies, Sea, Rahab (Isa. 30:7; 51:9-10), the "fleeing Dragon" (Isa. 27:1), who are respectively "stilled," "smashed," and "pierced," are joined in Job 26:12-13 by a surprising one, "Sky," who has also been somehow undone (the crucial verb is obscure). The presence of Sky is surprising because sky deities are never displaced in ancient mythologies. It is as if Job is making up mythic themes and dubious theologies. And he responds to the friends, implicitly, that they have trivialized God's doings: "Oh, these are but the edges of his ways. / What whispered word do we hear of him, / and the thunder of his might who understands?" (v. 14). Only a tiny corner of God's power reaches human knowledge, and therefore Bildad's and Eliphaz's certainties are misplaced (Zophar's confidence seems to have left him). Bildad's limping reference to moon and stars is blown apart by Job's account of the cosmic powers.

Yet we do not know how Job has received his knowledge. Why should we believe his account more than theirs? It is never clear that we should. The first surprise in chap. 27 occurs when Job takes an oath on God's own life. From what he said in chap. 24, an oath on the life of a radically unjust God would seem a strange thing. The oath is, as so often in Job, a self-curse, calling down an unspoken disaster if he speaks "viciousness" or "deceit" (v. 4). And its basis is Job's staunch statement of utter certainty about his own "integrity" and "righteousness" (or, as I have sometimes translated the word earlier, "innocence"): "I'm damned if I'll say you [plural: the friends] are right; / until I perish, I'll not turn away my integrity. / To my righteousness I hold fast, will not weaken it; / my heart finds nothing from my days to taunt" (vv. 5-6). In effect, Job claims here that he is the exception to chap. 24, that the God who has corrupted the whole world has failed to corrupt him.

He now proceeds to redefine God—the second surprise. In 13:24 Job wondered why God thought of him as "enemy," and in 19:11 he decided that God "considers me like his foes." Moreover, in 16:9 he referred to the deity as "my foe" (same word as in 19:11), and in 9:24 declared that in God's hand, the world is in a "wicked hand." At last, in 27:7 he combines two ideas, that God is his enemy and that God is "wicked" and "vicious," unlike himself (see v. 4): "Let my enemy be considered wicked, / the one who rises against me, vicious." The thought is out: Job has but one "enemy." Not only is he alienated from this God, but he condemns him, claiming implicitly that he is the moral superior of God. Job is the righteous (v. 6), God the wicked (v. 7).

The third surprise: Job has redefined God, and now he redefines himself: "For what hope has the godless when he is snipped off, / when God carries off his life?" (v. 8). "Godless" is not quite right for the Hebrew word, which has to do rather with ritual pollution. The important thing is that, having condemned God, Job uses the term to describe himself, defines himself as not only distanced from God but repugnant to God. To maintain the integrity of his own moral stance, which he has solemnly sworn, Job redefines God as wicked enemy and himself as polluted, alienated, godless. The meanings of these words are radically turned on their heads. Job has no more "hope" of a better fate (vv. 9-10) now than he did back in 6:8-9, when he wished God would "crush" him and finish the matter.

He cannot imagine, though, how the friends can miss the truth of what he says. Offering to help them understand (27:11), he reminds them of what they have seen and of their incomprehension: "You, of course, have all seen it, / and why, then, are you so utterly vapid?" (v. 12, more literally, "why do you puff a gust of wind?"). To underscore his point, he slightly skews a quotation from the end of Zophar's last speech (20:29), which described the desperate fate of the wicked as their rightful "lot" and "heritage" from God. "They receive this lot of evil humankind with God, / this heritage of oppressors from Shaddai" (27:13). Zophar spoke of the "lot" from God, Job with (the connivance of?) God. And Job refers in the plural to those who "receive" the heritage from Shaddai. He divides, then, the plural "evil humankind" who are on God's side from himself, the singular "godless" (v. 8). And he proceeds, in vv. 14-23, to use that singular term to describe the sufferings of the hopeless opponent of a powerful deity. It is a scathing parody on the friends' conventionalized visions of the sufferings of the wicked—so effective that many modern scholars propose to assign these verses to Zophar's missing speech. He even proposes (v. 17) that the "righteous" and the "pure" will profit from looting the wealth of the "godless." But one must remember that Job has inverted the terms, and the “righteous” and “pure” are on the side of God, who is the “wicked enemy.” And, as we might expect, the very forces of nature, which are under the complete control of God (26:5–14), participate in the destruction of God’s hapless enemy (27:20–23). Job closes with an ambiguous description of mockery, ambiguous because it is not clear whether it is the “east wind” (v. 21) or God himself who “claps his [or its] hands over him, / whistles derisively at him from his [or its] own place” (v. 23).

28:1–28, Job. The consensus of scholars is that this chapter, usually referred to as the “Hymn to Wisdom,” was a late addition to the book. Still, here it is, a beautiful poem that makes very good sense in its context. But it is surprising. Immersed as readers have been in issues of righteousness and virtue, it is unexpected to find a description of mining and metal-working technologies. But these topics bring readers to the center of “wisdom,” for the ancient world understood wisdom, it seems, principally as skill.

The first part, vv. 1–11, runs a kind of circle from the knowledge implied in mining (vv. 1–2) through distance (vv. 3–4) and discovery (vv. 5–6), around ignorance (vv. 7–8), and back to the hard work of knowledge (vv. 9–11). At this point, one encounters the first question about wisdom and where she is to be found (vv. 12–14; the Heb. noun “wisdom” is feminine, but we have the example of Prov. 1–9 for thinking it may be personified). Neither humans (Job 28:13) nor the cosmic powers of Abyss and Sea know where she is. The knowledge in the first part gives way to ignorance about wisdom. The middle section (vv. 15–19) is a somewhat repetitious catalogue of gems and other objects of great value, none of them in any way commensurable with the value of wisdom. Question and answer, very like vv. 12–14, again ask whence wisdom comes (vv. 20–22) and then respond with another answer of ignorance. Neither earthly life (v. 21) nor cosmic powers (v. 22; → Abaddon; Death) know more than “rumor.” But in the last section (vv. 23–28) God’s understanding and knowledge come into play. He is the origin of wisdom and even “dug her out” (v. 27; the same verb as “digs” in v. 3). And he has informed humans about wisdom: “Now, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, / and avoiding evil is understanding” (v. 28). The contrast with the standard understanding of wisdom in vv. 1–11 is complete. Wisdom has nothing to do with knowledge, and the ancient Israelites would have found our research universities, laboratories, and government grants unthinkable. Wisdom for them arises from religion (“fear of the Lord” = religion) and from morality. To be wise is to be religious and to avoid evil. Where have we seen that remark before? We were told that Job “feared God [or was religious] and avoided evil” back in 1:1. More than that, God himself described Job in the same terms (1:8; 2:3). Job possesses what the poem presents as the divine definition of wisdom. This chapter adds to Job’s powerful assertion of his moral righteousness (27:4–6) the claim to divinely certified wisdom. Yet one has the hunch that, just as Job redefined righteousness and wickedness as they applied to God and humans in chap. 27, perhaps this very claim to wisdom also has its ironic twist. Perhaps insofar as wisdom involves “avoiding evil,” as v. 28 has it, it constitutes avoiding God. Job surely has no illusions left but has, in Nietzsche’s famous phrase, “transvalued his values.”

Job’s Summation

The summation divides itself into three parts, corresponding to these three chapters. Chap. 29 describes the “good old days” when Job was happy. Chap. 30 sketches the miserable present. Chap. 31 prepares for the trial, as Job pronounces a series of curses to clear himself from the cloud of accusations over him. The speech, then, is a final preparation for the trial, about which we have heard so much. With the self-curses in chap. 31, moreover, Job circles back to the curses on his birthday, with which he began the dialogue in chap. 3.

29:1–25, Job’s Past. Job describes his past situation in a symmetrical structure (which coheres with that shown by Habel, The Book of Job):

- Part One (29:2–6): Past blessing
- Part Two (29:7–10): Past honor and admiration
- Part Three (29:11–17): Administration of justice
- Part Four (29:18–20): Expected blessing
- Part Five (29:21–25): Past honor and admiration

The thematic connections of parts four and five with parts one and two are evident, and the content seems simple enough. Beloved by God (vv. 2–6), respected by the people (vv. 7–10), helper of the weak and scourge of the wicked (vv. 11–17), flourishing in prosperity (vv. 18–20), influential as if he were a king (vv. 21–25), one might almost think Job has forgotten his pain. However, he has not, and what he says is not as simple as it seems.

“Would that I were as past months, / the days when God watched over me” (v. 2). When Job discussed God’s “watching” him before, it has included sometimes “guarding” (10:12), sometimes “stationing a guard” (7:12; 10:14), “watching” his paths in connection with putting his feet in stocks (13:27). God "watches" him too much, more like a hostile prison guard than like a benevolent hospital nurse.

Though 29:4-5 is generally positive ("my autumn days," v. 4a, refers to his youth, as autumn in Palestine is the beginning of the year, not the end), an odd duality appears in v. 6. "My steps were washed with milk" seems a pleasantly positive image of luxury. But one is able to translate with the word "milk" only by correcting the word in the Hebrew text on the plausible supposition that it is misspelled. What is there in Hebrew is a word that means "rage" ("footsteps washed with rage" is quite a different metaphor) or, even more interestingly, "poison." Multiple meanings may be confusing, but they can also be interesting. In this instance, it sounds as if the great man is in danger of assault or assassination.

Job's description of the people's respect for him (vv. 7-10) is equally interesting. We might have thought from chaps. 1-2 that Job was a nomadic herdsman, but he speaks here of "going out to the gate of the city / to take my seat in the square" (v. 7). The city gate was where legal business was done in Israel. There was no professional judiciary, it seems, and wise, elderly men were expected to sit in the gate to act as intermediaries in disputes and to hear legal cases. Job speaks of his "seat" as if he always occupied the same one. But most interesting is his description of people's attitudes toward him: "Young people saw me and hid, / old ones rose and stood, / princes restrained words / and laid their hands on their mouths, / the voices of leaders were hidden, / and their tongues stuck to their palates" (vv. 8-10). Respect is there but also terror. The young hide, not only in admiration; princes are quiet by self-restraint, leaders silenced by voices that refuse in fright to work. These lines point to respect, but they also bear a negative connotation. Job's self-satisfaction at well-deserved success conceals underneath an arrogant man's testimony to the success of his arrogance.

As Job describes his administration of justice, one discovers that he is an activist jurist, personally leading and assisting the handicapped and punishing the hurtful (vv. 12, 15, 17). Besides acting justly, that quality describes his very character, the "robe and turban" that he wears (v. 14). In contrast to the silence of his social inferiors in vv. 8-10, this justice is accompanied by sound, the "cry" that calls attention to the need for justice (v. 12) and the joyful "song" of the widow (v. 13). But Job is also violent, breaking the wrongdoers' jaws (v. 17 recalls the princes' "hands on their mouths," v. 9).

Job's expectation of future blessing (vv. 18-20) has interesting and mixed images. Just what "I'll die with my nest" means ("with" is odd in Heb. too) is not clear, but it seems a bit contradictory to "multiply days like sand" (both v. 18). Then one finds a pleasant image of a plant with well-watered roots and misted twigs (v. 19). Yet the second line, "Dew lodging on my twigs," is ambiguous. Dew notoriously disappears at first sun, and "lodging" explicitly means a temporary stay. The line at least exhibits a somewhat strange choice of words. There is even a hint of double meaning in v. 20, where "my bow successful in my hand" points at first to military prowess. But the word "successful" might also mean something like "changed" or "exchanged" in a less than positive sense.

The last stanza, vv. 21-25, repeating the silence idea but less harshly than in vv. 9-10, points to motifs of kingship, i.e., "they waited for me as for rain, / opened their mouths as for showers" (v. 23; see Ps. 72:6), and "I chose their way, sat at the head, / lived like a king among the troops" (v. 25). The phrase "the light of my face" (v. 24) is also a royal reference (see, e.g., Prov. 16:15) as well as a divine one (see Num. 6:25; Ps. 4:6). Is Job claiming divinity? After chap. 27, anything seems possible. The old duality appears here too. "If I smiled at them, they did not believe it," he says (29:24). Why not? Was it so rare that people were pleased? Or so unusual that they are surprised and incredulous?

What is clear throughout the speech is Job's satisfaction with his past honor. What is not nearly so clear is whether, even as he himself describes it, others were so satisfied.

30:1-31, Job's Current Plight. In 29:24, Job remarked on others' reactions to his smile (the verb could also be translated "laugh"). As chap. 30 opens, the reversal has taken place: "And now they laugh at me" (v. 1) in derision. They "shout" (v. 5) and "bray" (v. 7). He is "their [mocking] song" and "word" (v. 9). And as he closes the chapter, Job refers to his sounds: weeping (vv. 25, 31), crying out (vv. 20, 28), disgusting noises in his bowels (v. 27). In chap. 29 the oppositions of sound and silence showed Job's power and others' weakness. In chap. 30 sound and silence show Job as weak, his opponents strong. The movement is visible even in the structure of the chapter. Three times (vv. 1, 9, 16) he begins a new thought with "And now." In vv. 1-8, he expresses contempt for his tormenters' worthlessness. In vv. 9-15, he describes the terrifying brutality of their tormenting. And in vv. 16-19, he ascribes this torment directly to God. He goes on to complain to God about the mistreatment and his expectation of death. In vv. 24-31, he returns to his feelings of pain and hopelessness. From being the king "who consoles mourners" (29:25), Job has become the mourner: "My lyre has become mourning, my flute a weeping voice" (30:31).

Job's contempt for his tormenters comes to the surface in a vivid figure: "And now they laugh at me, / those much younger than I, / whose fathers I disdained / to station among my sheepdogs" (v. 1). He is still thinking of inferiors and superiors. The rest of the section (vv. 1-8) is a confusing mixture of prepositions with singular and plural verb forms. For example, "What is their hands' strength to me?" (v. 2a) surely refers to the tormenters of v. 1. But the next line includes a singular preposition (lit., "upon him [or it] perishes vigor"), which might refer to "strength," giving something like "the vigor of which is gone," or might be an unusual third-person reference to Job himself, giving "whose vigor is gone." Depending on how one reads that preposition, vv. 3-4 either continue Job's description of his tormenters or describe his own bad state. Complication arises again in v. 5: "From the community they cast out, / shout over him as over a thief." Who are they, and who is he? The singular, we would think, ought to refer to Job, and "over him" repeats "upon him" in v. 2a. Then one would want "vigor" in v. 2 to be Job's and vv. 3-4 to describe him. But the plural verb, "they cast out," works best if it continues the "they" that began at v. 1, with vv. 2-4, referring to the laughers. To make sense of both vv. 2 and 5, it seems that one needs vv. 2-4 to refer at the same time to both Job and his persecutors.

These details are indicative of the trouble the book of Job can present readers. Such trouble is compounded in vv. 5-8, where the tormenting pursuers ("they cast out") in v. 5 seem suddenly and fantastically to merge with the pursued, described like wild donkeys ("bray," v. 7; cf. 24:5-8) and social outcasts.

The next stanza (vv. 9-15) has some images familiar from chaps. 16 and 19. Job has become the (mocking) "song" of his pursuers (v. 9; cf. Ps. 69:12; Lam. 3:14). They "detest" him, "spit" at him (v. 10), because God hates him. The disdainful God "has loosened his bow-string," casting aside the weapon to show the victim's complete helplessness, "and humiliated me" (v. 11). Motivated by God's contempt, Job's tormenters "put off the bridle," which might mean casting off restraint or becoming wild beasts (cf. the donkey's bray, v. 7). From v. 12 on, one returns to a siege metaphor, as in chap. 19, with "building up roads" (v. 12), coming against Job like a "breach" (in the wall, v. 14). In v. 15, he becomes both the dumping ground ("Terrors are dumped over me") and airy, evanescent vapor ("my standing is driven off like the wind, / my safety sweeps away like a cloud"). The controlling image seems to be military attack by God and his agents, an attack motivated by hatred and contempt.

God is responsible. He "bores out my bones" (v. 17; cf. 16:12-13), an image of surgery that gives ceaseless pain: "my gnawing pain never lies down." After the unintelligible 30:18, he refers again to God's contempt, "He has flung me to the muck" (v. 19; cf. 9:31), as if the useless corpse were dropped in the sewer. Job presents a verbal conclusion to his being "song" and "word" to his tormenters (30:9): "I'm a cliché, like dust and ashes" (v. 19). The first phrase stems from the activity of making proverbs, and it suggests the proverbs and metaphors bandied about by "miserable comforters." He is indeed a cliché to an entire culture. Mention Job, and someone will invariably speak of patience. So does the misreading of Job in James 5:11 control our implicit reading.

Now Job addresses God (30:20-23), almost exactly in the middle of the summation. Since the long speech in 13:19b-14:22, Job has spoken to God only briefly, in 16:7b-8; 17:3-4; 21:3 (one line); 26:2-4. He will do so only twice more (40:4-5; 42:1-6). But he says nothing new here. God responds to him inappropriately, no matter what he does: "I cry out to you, and you don't answer me, / I stand [silent], and you examine me" (30:20). To complain that God has "been changed to cruelty toward me" (v. 21) may seem odd, since Job has complained about cruelty for some time. But his main complaint is the unpredictable, inconsistent character of tyranny: "You lift me to the wind, make me ride, / you dissolve me, level me" (v. 22). The first line reminds us of God riding the clouds (Ps. 68:4) or the wings of the wind (Ps. 18:10), but the second returns to the ground with a thump. Job can be sure of nothing but death (Job 30:23). And he has been sure of that for a long time.

In the difficult last stanza (vv. 24-31), Job curiously changes his tune. Verse 24 is nearly unintelligible, but in v. 25 Job claims constant concern for other sufferers, using the same kind of curse formula the Prosecutor used in chaps. 1-2: "If I did not weep for a difficult day, / or my soul grieve for the poor . . ." He ought to be rewarded for that. "I hoped for good, and evil came, / waited for light, and darkness came" (v. 26). His body is ravaged by suffering (vv. 27, 30), his colleagues are indifferent (v. 28), his only company "is the animals of the uninhabitable desert (jackals and ostriches, v. 29), and his musical instruments, usually employed for happy song and dance (as in chap. 21), now become mourning and weeping. And he has apparently reverted to the friends' position. He has been good, and he deserves reward. Has Job reversed himself so suddenly?

31:1-40, Job's Oaths. Job has received good press for this part of his speech: "The Code of a Man of Honor" is Robert Gordis's title (see Gordis, p. 339). The ethical system involves not only external action but also inner attitudes and principles of ethical thinking. The chapter is a series of oaths, some in the form we have seen without a result clause, some in the more complete form with result clause. These oaths are often interpreted as Job's final preparation for the trial, whose ups and downs in his mind we have followed since the idea first came up in chap. 9. Yet the redefinitions in chap. 27 seemed to render the notion of a trial impossible. If God has become Job's vicious enemy, and if Job is as righteous as he has claimed, the trial will be unjust by definition, and he can hope only for death (30:23).

It is a very complex, powerful series of oaths and other kinds of statements. An outline may help to see it clearly:

- Questions: retribution (31:1-4)
- Oaths and statements (31:5-12)
  - Oath without result: fraud (31:5)
  - Statement: integrity (31:6)
  - Oath with result: impurity (31:7-8)
  - Oath with result: adultery (31:9-10)
  - Statement with "for": crimes (31:11-12)
- Oaths, questions, and statement (31:13-18)
  - Oath without result: justice (31:13)
  - Questions: God and common origin (31:14-15)
  - Oath without result: aloofness (31:16-17)
  - Statement with "for": care for poor (31:18)
- Oaths and statement (31:19-23)
  - Oath without result: clothing for poor (31:19-20)
  - Oath with result: fairness (31:21-22)
  - Statement with "for": fear of disaster (31:23)
- Oaths and statement (31:24-28)
  - Oath without result: wealth (31:24)
  - Oath without result: power (31:25)
  - Oath without result: idolatry (31:26-27)
  - Statement with "for": crimes (31:28)
- Oaths and statements (31:29-34)
  - Oath without result: arrogance (31:29)
  - Statement: curse (31:30)
  - Oath without result: food (31:31)
  - Statement: hospitality (31:32)
  - Oath without result: hypocrisy (with "for") (31:33-34)
- Statement and oaths (31:35-40)
  - Statement (exclamation): challenge to trial (31:35)
  - Oath without result: pride (31:36-37)
  - Oath with result: soil (31:38-40)

Such a design enables readers to visualize what Job is saying. At first glance, the speech looks rather disjointed. From the covenant of v. 1 (where Job is denying not lustful thoughts about young women, but connection with a goddess) to the covenant with his soil in vv. 38-40, he ranges over sins he has not committed and attitudes he has not had. Some are like those of which Eliphaz gratuitously accused him in chap. 22. The subjects, as indicated in the outline, comprise an impressive claim to moral honor, interspersed with statements of assurance that God knows his integrity (31:6), that some crimes are notoriously actionable (vv. 11, 28), that he has not cursed loosely (v. 30) and has hospitably opened his doors (v. 32). He denies improper attitudes such as despising justice due to the slave (v. 13), being pleased at others' misfortune (v. 29), concealment of something out of fear of displeasure (vv. 33-34). These are sins we take seriously, attitudes we are taught to avoid. We respond positively to this epitome of the ethical person. Such a response lends credence to the first characterization of Job we saw as "scrupulously moral" (1:1, 8; 2:3).

We must remember, however, that these are actually curses that Job calls down on himself. The curse in the ancient world was no casual expression but was the most powerful way one had to set in motion forces of action and reaction. The curse worked itself out, objectively and irresistibly, and even God could not hinder it. Our culture has nothing that corresponds to it, and we tend not to understand why other cultures have taken curses so seriously. As the Prosecutor did in chaps. 1-2, Job lays his own future and welfare on the line. If he is mistaken about anything in his claims to moral integrity, the unspoken catastrophe will strike him still further down.

But not only himself. Unusually, four of these curses do contain the statement of the catastrophe (what I have called the "result"). In 31:21-22, the result matches the evil denied: "If I have shaken my fist at the orphan / because I saw my helpers in the gate, / may my arm fall from my shoulder, / my forearm be broken at the elbow." In vv. 38-40, the evil of exploiting the soil is matched by the soil's growing inedible produce. In vv. 7-8, the penalty for having "strayed from the way" and having an impure stain on his hands falls partly on Job ("may I sow and another eat") and partly on others ("and my descendants be uprooted"). It is surprising, as in 21:19-20, that Job opposed the idea that one's descendants might be punished for the person, though the law allows it (Exod. 20:5). But worse comes in Job 31:9-10: "If my heart has been fooled over a woman, / and at my neighbor's door I have lain in wait, / may my woman grind for another, / others kneel over her." Job calls for the effects of his sexual misdeeds to fall not upon himself or upon his partner in adultery but upon his innocent wife!

With this series of curses on himself, Job demands divine attention as the Prosecutor did at the beginning. He calls for the trial again: "Oh that I had someone to hear me — / here is my mark; let Shaddai answer me — / and the inscription my accuser has written!" (v. 35). He even reverts to royal language about himself: "Like a prince [I will] approach him" (v. 37), having tied the "inscription" (presumably the written indictment) on himself "like a wreath" (v. 36). Yet that picture of the emaciated victim getting up from the ashes to march around with a "paper crown" (a phrase from Habel, p. 439) provides a comic parody of Job's arrogant parading to his seat of justice in 29:7–10. Does the comic occur to Job?

The most interesting aspect of this speech is 31:2–3: "What is God's portion from above, / Shaddai's inheritance from on high? / Is it not disaster for the vicious, / calamity for evildoers?" We have seen several of those words in chap. 27. "Portion" and "inheritance" were God's reward to the "evil" and "oppressors" in 27:13 and are now punishment to the "evildoers." "Vicious" characterized God in 27:7. Job has reverted to retributionism. The curses exhibit him as the model of the ethical person, the follower of the rules and the attitudes inculcated by the ancient Hebrew superego. He has climbed from despair about a fair trial (chap. 23) and the savage redefinition of terms that portrayed him as the deity's moral superior (chap. 27), and he trots out the weary old rewards and punishments to which he so furiously objected before. He deserves acquittal because he is free of the improprieties he describes. How has Job made so stark a shift of position? Was he so enraptured by his memory of past power and influence as to wish to recapture them? Does he suppose that, getting them before by obedience to the rules, he might regain them by the same route?

And what now? Surely the next activity must be God's direct entry on the scene. At the very least, he must respond.

The Speeches of Elihu

Thinking we would hear the voice of God, we get instead Elihu, who is angry at the elderly incompetents who cannot show Job how he is wrong. Elihu is young and brash, given to long prefaces and pretentious language, not a very attractive character. Most scholars think his speeches were inserted into the book. They speculate variously about the interpolation, e.g., that Elihu gives a different answer to the problem of suffering from the others or that he gives the right answer to the problem, thus relieving God of answering it (a popular Jewish understanding of Elihu in the Middle Ages and later). Perhaps Elihu is here because we expect God, and his often boring speech maintains tension by delaying the entrance of the divine voice. That seems indeed a better reason than the other two. His idea of suffering is only marginally different from the others, and it is evidently not the "right" one.

The speech is boring, and we need not devote a great deal of space to it. After the introduction, the speech falls into four basic sections: 32:6–33:33; 34:2–37; 35:2–16; and 36:2–37:24.

32:6–33:33, Elihu I. Most of the speech (32:6–33:7) is preface, grumbling about the others' inability to deal with Job. They are old but not wise; he is young but "full of words" (32:18), which are about to burst him "like unopened wine, / like new wineskins" (v. 19). He reassures Job with a straight face that there is nothing to fear from him (33:6–7).

At 33:8 begins the one-sided debate, to which Job never replies. Quoting Job's claim to moral perfection in skewed form ("I am pure, without transgression, / I am clean, have no iniquity," v. 9), he argues, like Eliphaz, that no human can claim purity, and one must admit imperfections and sins (v. 27). To Job's claim that God has made him his enemy (vv. 10–11), Elihu opposes a divine revelation that shows humans where they are wrong. As Eliphaz said (chap. 4), messages come through dreams (33:15–18), and Elihu interprets suffering as God's education that transforms the sinner into a righteous person (vv. 25–26). He even alludes to Job's witness-interpreter (16:19–20), postulating an "angel over him, / one interpreter out of a thousand" (v. 23). Suffering, like dreams and angels, is a medium for the divine message to restore the sinner. God "does all these things / twice, thrice with a man, / to turn his soul back from the Pit" (33:29–30). If Job does not want to debate, Elihu will proceed: "Be silent," he says pretentiously, "and I'll familiarize you with wisdom" (v. 33).

34:1–37, Elihu II. The second speech is addressed to the friends—or the world: "Hear my words, you wise people" (v. 2) and "Therefore, intelligent men, listen to me" (v. 10). It is strange that Elihu would compliment the friends, when he so disdained them in chap. 32.

Elihu says, as did Bildad (8:3), that God "does not bend justice" (34:12). But he and the others know what justice is: "Justice we will decide for ourselves; / we know among us what is good" (v. 4). Job does not qualify, for he "wanders in company with evildoers, / walks with wicked men" (v. 8). Elihu's vision of the divine control over humans (vv. 19–30) is perhaps more detailed than that of the friends, at least as vivid in its depiction of punishment, and more aware of divine compassion than either Job's or the others'. Job is wrong about God: "He hears the outcry of the oppressed. / He gives content—and who finds that bad?" (vv. 28-29).

At the end, Elihu addresses Job briefly and a bit cryptically (v. 33): "Does he repay you out of what is yours because you despise?" But he turns back to the "intelligent men" (v. 34) and quotes them: "Job does not speak with knowledge" (v. 35) and "adds to his sin, / in transgression jeers among us" (v. 37).

Elihu may be a bore. But one thing can be said for him: only he among the friends both refers to and addresses Job by name.

35:1-16, Elihu III. Sometimes one feels an unreality in Elihu, as if he were not quite in touch with this world. He quotes Job: "Is this what you consider justice, / that you say, 'I am more righteous than God'?" (v. 2). Job said the opposite of that in 9:2. Elihu goes on, "For you say, 'How is he of use to you? / How do I profit from my sin?' " (35:3), putting into Job's mouth a word ("to be of use") that only Eliphaz has used (22:2, 21). Of course, Job implied in 27:6-7 that he is God's moral superior, and perhaps one should credit Elihu with shrewd insight. His promise that he will "refute your words" (35:4) after quoting words that Job has not used is nevertheless pretentious.

In vv. 5-8, Elihu repeats Eliphaz's idea that a human's action has no effect on God (22:2-3). Sin does not diminish God, nor does excellence add to him. Job had agreed with the former in 7:20, as he had agreed with Elihu's next contention (35:11), that humans should accept instruction from animals (12:7-8). And he has staunchly agreed with Elihu's remark (it sounds inadvertent, as if Elihu were not perceiving reality again), "There they [the beasts, perhaps] cry out, and he [God?] does not answer, / before the pride of the evil ones" (35:12). Elihu can only assure Job that he is wrong to think that God pays no attention to him (vv. 13-14; Job has complained that he does).

36:1-37:24, Elihu IV. The last speech verges on an exalted vision of a world filled with God's glory. But Elihu nearly throws it away by bragging: "Certainly my words are not lies, / faultless knowledge is in your presence" (v. 4).

In vv. 5-25, he amplifies his point made first in chap. 33, that God instructs humans through suffering. "If they are bound in fetters, / trapped in cords of misery, / he is telling them their deed / and their transgressions" (36:8-9). If they pay attention, they will have pleasure (v. 11), and if they do not, "They will cross the channel, / die without knowing" (v. 12; "channel" implies the myth of a river before the place of the dead). Suffering itself is the opportunity to learn: "He rescues the miserably in their misery, / opens their ears in their torment" (v. 15). Job must avoid wickedness and despair (vv. 17, 20) and join in praising God's power and instruction (vv. 22-25).

In the rest of the speech (36:26-37:24), Elihu expands on God's power in nature without abandoning his theme of divine instruction. The wonders of rain (36:27-30) are a means for informing humans about "judgment" (v. 31) and for telling people about "wickedness" (v. 33). A remarkable picture of a storm, complete with sound and light effects (37:2-4), underscores the divine control. Elihu's account demonstrates how important water was in that culture, where rain, frost, snow, clouds, moisture, and storm were central. Both humans and animals depend on it (vv. 7-8), and God controls to his ends not only storms (vv. 9-11) but also events involving dryness, "the things that whirl" (v. 12; e.g., "dust devils, cyclones"). He makes everything "find its goal" (v. 13). Elihu insists that Job is far inferior to this powerful God. Moreover, vv. 14-20 anticipate Yahweh's following speech. Elihu asks questions in some of the same ways as will Yahweh: "Do you know about the cloud-rolls, / the marvels of perfect knowledge, / you whose clothes are hot / when the land lies still from the south wind? / Can you hammer out the clouds with him, / strong as a cast-metal mirror?" (vv. 16-18). In these verses, Elihu points to oppressive qualities of God's control. In the final stanza (vv. 21-24), he emphasizes both positive power ("From the north gold comes forth," v. 22) and negative ("Shaddai—we cannot find him," v. 23). Yet just his righteous power, which "does not oppress" (v. 23), arouses fear: "Therefore men are afraid of him, / he does not see any who are wise of heart" (v. 24). Elihu does not recollect his earlier claim for exalted wisdom.

The effect of Elihu's intervention is an odd one. He proposes a new meaning for human suffering, as a teaching device from God, and he shows a high appreciation for God's natural power, for both support of life and its destruction. But he surrounds the nuggets of semiprecious metal with so many clods of ordinary dirt as to weary the miner beyond reason. The style is wordy, convoluted, often hardly intelligible. Translating excellent poetry is hard but exhilarating; translating Elihu is just hard.

Dialogue with Yahweh

Each character has two speeches. Yahweh speaks "from the whirlwind" in 38:2-40:2, and Job responds in 40:4-5. Yahweh resumes at length, 40:6-41:34, and Job answers in 42:1-6. Never has Job been so terse.

38:1-40:2, Yahweh. Yahweh is not terse. Having been silent for so long, it is as if he bursts into speech as the sea bursts out of the womb (38:8). Why he comes from a "whirlwind" (v. 1) is not entirely clear. Storms were portents of divine presence in Israel (e.g., Ps. 18:7-16; 77:17-19), though whirlwinds were not especially prominent in this regard. The whirlwind is devastatingly powerful, and it certainly lends an awesome atmosphere of darkness and noise to accompany God's cosmic outpouring.

Does he refer to Job at all? "Who is this who darkens counsel / with ignorant words?" (v. 2) could as well mean Elihu, whom we might picture scuttling away in terror. God has heard enough questions; he will now ask them and expect answers (v. 3). The questions are hard, with more than a tinge of sarcasm in them. "Where were you when I laid earth's foundations? / Tell me, if you know so much. / Who set its measurements—surely you know!— / or who stretched the line out on it?" (vv. 4-5). Verses 4-38 pass across the regions of the universe: earth, whose foundations rest on pedestals, the laying of which elicited the song of the morning stars (vv. 4-7); Sea, limited by "bar and doors" and clothed in cloud (vv. 8-11); morning, which shakes the wicked out of "the skirts of earth" (vv. 12-15); the watery Deep (v. 16) and the realm of Death (v. 17); the roads of light and darkness (vv. 19-21); the realms of weather, snow and hail (vv. 22-23), winds (v. 24), storm (vv. 25-27, with the lovely picture of rain falling in a kind of divine exuberance on uninhabited barren ground); the origins of nature's water (vv. 28-30); the stars and constellations (vv. 31-33); and back to the rainstorm (vv. 34-38, with a side glance at the Egyptian gods Thoth and Sekwi, v. 36). He draws an astounding portrait of a world full of complicated, powerful forces and uses it to ask whether Job can control it. "Have you commanded morning?" (v. 12). "Have you entered Sea's springs?" (v. 16). "Can you raise your voice to the cloud?" (v. 34). Yahweh promised questions, and we have questions. What is the purpose of this series of questions, the answers to which must be, "No, I haven't" or "No, I can't" or "I don't know"?

The same may be said for the rest of the speech (38:39-39:30) about the animals and their qualities: the lioness and her prey (38:39-40); ravens and their food (v. 41); the birth season of rock goats and fallow deer (39:1-4); the freedom of the wild ass (vv. 5-8); the untamable wild ox (vv. 9-12); the ostrich's stupidity and speed (vv. 13-18); the war horse and its courage (v. 19-25—the only domesticated animal in the group); the hawk and eagle (or vulture; the Hebrew word means both) and their affinity for height (vv. 26-30). Does Job control the animal or give it its quality? "Can you hunt prey for the lioness?" (38:39). "Who sets the wild ass free?" (39:5). "Do you give the horse his strength?" (v. 19). They are again questions the answers to which are "No, I can't" or "No, I don't" or "I don't know."

After asking these questions, Yahweh speaks directly to Job: "Will an accuser of Shaddai yield, / God's arbiter answer it?" (40:2). It is a fascinating echo of Job's agents. He had denied the existence of the "arbiter" in 9:33. By implication, Yahweh wonders whether any of the helpers (the "witness" of 16:19 or the "avenger" of 19:25) can be of assistance to Job with this deity, whose universe has just been described so vividly.

Does this mean, as is often said, "What makes you think you have anything to say? Shut up and do as I tell you"? Is it an answer to any of Job's questions? Yahweh makes no reference to suffering or to justice. Is the cosmological outburst simply irrelevant to the book? Are Job's suffering and his questions about it beneath the notice of the God who at least allowed it?

40:3-5, Job. Job seems to feel so, in his non-committal reply: "Oh, I am small, what could I reply to you? / I put my hand on my mouth. / I spoke once, and I will not answer, / twice, and I will add nothing" (vv. 4-5). Is that "All right, I will shut up," or is it "If you're going to be like that, I have nothing more to say"? The former is acquiescence to being trampled down, the latter is resignation to the inevitable but not acceptance of it, Job the "refusenik." In either case, Yahweh looks and sounds like an overwhelming tyrant. But we cannot be sure of the outcome, as each has one speech yet to give.

40:6-41:34, Yahweh. Yahweh begins the second speech like the first (v. 7), and we think more strongly than ever of the tyrant. He refuses to accept Job's prior response and requires a better one. If Job's answer was acquiescent, Yahweh wants either a more heartfelt agreement or something else. If the answer was refusal, perhaps he wants agreement.

He asks a new question (v. 8), aimed at Job and his questions: "Would you even annul my order, / treat me as guilty so you may be innocent?" To make the issue one of guilt and innocence, of wickedness and morality, a duality whereby, if Job is right, then God is wrong and vice versa, is to "annul my order." "Order" can also be translated "justice," and it has to do with both moral justice and cosmic structure. Yahweh means it in both senses. The world does not spin on the axes of guilt and innocence, and ever since Eliphaz raised the question of justice back in 4:7, the conversation was deflected, at least in Yahweh's judgment, from its proper aim. Suffering is not a sign of guilt, and the dialogue between Job and the friends went off on a wrong tangent.

If Job still thinks guilt and innocence is the issue, Yahweh has some friends he wants to lend him. If God is guilty, then let Job deal with the problems of justice and immorality in the human world (40:9-14). Let him be the king he said he was in chap. 29 and exert his power against the wicked: "Strew about the furies of your anger, / see everyone high, bring them low, / see everyone high, humiliate them, / and trample wicked people where they stand" (vv. 11-12). Once he has won Yahweh's own acclaim for that "victory" ("I will praise you," he says, v. 14), he can go on to Behemoth (vv. 15-24) and Leviathan (41:1-34).

Scholars once interpreted those two astonishing creatures as a hippopotamus and a crocodile, respectively. More recent awareness of various mythological beings in the Bible and the discovery of Leviathan in Canaanite mythology have led scholars to view Behemoth and Leviathan as imaginary monsters, creatures of myth and fantasy. Behemoth belongs to the same act of creation as does the human ("whom I made with you," v. 15) but primal in that creation ("the first of God's ways," v. 19) and extremely powerful (v. 16). "His bones [are] tubes of bronze, / his limbs like iron rods" (v. 18). He can even withstand the power of the river (vv. 23-24), which may be oceanic water rather than a freshwater river. Yahweh describes him as living where "all the wild animals play" (v. 20), suggesting an aspect of pleasure. Behemoth may be a lovable monster.

Leviathan is emphatically not, for he is beyond any sort of human control (41:1-8). One does not fish for him (41:1-2), make him a pet (v. 5—a ludicrous image: "Can you play with him like a bird, / put him on a leash for your little girls?"), market him (v. 6), hunt him (v. 7). "Put your hand upon him— / think of the fight; don't do it again" (v. 8). He is a frightful monster, frightening even to God (41:9) and the gods (v. 25). The description of him emphasizes his unbreachable armor (vv. 13-17), his fiery breath (vv. 18-21—even his sneeze is a flash), his immovable bulk (vv. 23-24). No weapon is of any use against him (vv. 26-29), and he churns up the surface wherever he goes, whether on land (v. 30) or in the sea (vv. 31-32). No one surpasses him for power or terror. "He looks on everything lofty, / he, king over all proud beasts" (v. 34).

Yahweh does not taunt Job with these animals. He simply describes them in all of their unconquerable might. His invitation to Job to rule presents a progression: first the realm of humans (40:9-14), then the realm of natural power beyond human force (Behemoth, vv. 15-24), and finally the realm of supernatural, mythic power above creation (Leviathan, 41:1-25). The implication is clear: if Job wants to control the deity by the power of his moral innocence, he must contend with forces that, though less than the deity, are more than Job can handle. But Yahweh has already suggested (40:8) that guilt and innocence are not the issue.

42:1-6, Job. Job begins by acknowledging God's overwhelming power: "I know that you can do everything, / no plan is inaccessible to you" (v. 2). Job alludes to omnipotence in the first line, omniscience in the second. Now, thinking about what Yahweh said to him, he quotes 38:2 (inexactly): "'Who is this who obscures counsel ignorantly?' Therefore I told, and didn't understand, / wonders beyond me, and I didn't know" (42:3). It is an odd sentence, in which the first phrase of the second line completes the first phrase of the first, and the second parts of the two lines are parallel. Job admits having spoken beyond his competence. He quotes again, more exactly, from 38:3 and 40:7: "Hear, and I will speak, / I will ask you questions and you instruct me" (42:4). Yes, Job has heard, and he says so in v. 5: "With ears' hearing I hear you, / and now my eye sees you." Some scholars think "hear" ought to be translated in the past tense, and some think it ought to read "I heard of you." Either reading conveys the idea that secondhand knowledge is replaced by firsthand knowledge, the immediate sight of God that Israelite tradition firmly refused (e.g., Exod. 33:20; though there is the counterinstance in Exod. 24:9-11 where seventy-four people "saw" God and—amazingly—"he did not lay his hand on" them). But "now" does not necessarily stand in contrast with the first line. Both lines claim firsthand knowledge as opposed to the lack of knowledge attested in Job 42:3. The knowledge has a most surprising result, a "therefore": "Therefore I despise and repent / of dust and ashes" (v. 6). An astounding shift! Job takes a religious action to forswear religion. "Dust and ashes" stands for the ritual surrounding repentance, the machinery and concept of guilt and innocence as the central issue of human life, and Job rejects all of it. Accepting what Yahweh said in 40:8, he takes it a step further. It is another indication that Eliphaz moved the debate off center when he introduced the notion of retribution, categorizing the world by guilt and innocence. Job was so sure of his own moral purity that the slur seemingly cast on it by the friends' retributionism seduced him into seeking a way out. The friends urged him to repent. And so he does, but not as they thought. He repents of repentance.

The Closing Tale

To many readers, the closing tale is an anticlimax. The fireworks are over, the point has been reached, and people are bothered that, after all the talk about rewards and punishments, Job gets back his fortune twice over. We have been led to think that "Hollywood endings" are sentimental and tacky. But here it is, and we need to examine it.

42:7-9, The Friends. Yahweh comes immediately to the friends with an angry criticism: "You have not spoken truth of me, as has my servant Job" (v. 7). He requires of them a sacrifice, in Job's presence and with Job's intercession (v. 8). On performance of that requirement, everything will be all right. It is interesting that the friends, whose theology is most impeccably Deuteronomic and prophetic, are so thoroughly condemned. That suggests, as other parts of the book do, that Job is not as close to the center of the biblical tradition as is sometimes thought—or at least the text itself, apart from its interpreters, is more radical.

42:10-12, Job's New Wealth. Job is restored to his friends and relatives (v. 11), who reverse the alienation of which he complained in 19:13-19 and succeed in "consoling and comforting" him. The three friends came originally to do that (2:11), and Job complained bitterly in the dialogue that they failed miserably. The consolation and comfort are for "all the evil that Yahweh had brought upon him" (v. 11). The tale assumes, on the one hand, that it was evil, not in a moral sense, but in the sense of something unpleasant to endure, and, on the other hand, that Yahweh did it. Not only did the Prosecutor disappear from the story, but the story seems to have forgotten him entirely. In any case, his action did not preclude the principle that God is in charge. The relatives also give Job rich gifts, "each one qesitah and one gold ring." A qesitah is a large unit of exchange; Jacob bought land at Shechem for one hundred qesitahs (Gen. 33:19). This is not coinage but probably a weight of precious metal, and, with a gold ring, it adds up to a large sum. Yahweh has "blessed" him more now than before. He acquires twice the number of animals he had before (Job 42:12), but we see no mention of slaves. Does this "blessing" reverse the rejection of the retributive theology in the dialogue with Yahweh? One could argue that, just as Job knew better than to take literally the intercession to restore the friends (v. 9), he knows better than to take the flocks and herds as a sign of his virtue. They are just flocks and herds.

mentioned, and the one we met in chap. 2 was the mother of ten grown children. Suddenly, with no reference to the passage of time, she is the mother of ten more, and in a trice, they are grown. Job's wife deserves better than she receives in this book. Not only does she seem mainly a machine for producing babies, but one of Job's curses on himself turned her in prospect into the slave and sexual toy of other men (31:9-10). All the sharper is the contrast with the daughters, more beautiful than anyone and, unusually, sharing the inherited wealth with their brothers (42:15). They are carefully named: Jemimah, "Dove" (or perhaps an epithet for a Canaanite goddess, which might mean "progenitress"); Keziah, "Cassia," used anciently for perfume and incense (or perhaps "bow"); and Keren-happuch, "Horn of Antimony," used anciently as mascara is used now. It is interesting that the text deals so carefully with the daughters, seeming to tell us so much while actually telling us very little. But Job himself remains the focus, a grand old man whose 140 years after the catastrophe are twice the normal life span (Ps. 90:10) and more than Moses' 120 years (Deut. 34:7). "Then Job died, old and satiated with days" (Job 42:17).

Any summary of this huge, sprawling, complex book would gravely insult its integrity and its depth. The only thing to do is to read it again.

PSALMS

CARROLL STUHL MUELLER

INTRODUCTION

External Format

Unique among biblical books, the book of the Psalms is not subdivided into chapters but into five books of uneven length (Pss. 1–41; 42–72; 73–89; 90–106; 107–150). Each psalm, moreover, typically begins with a title or descriptive label, except for 34 “orphan” psalms. In the Greek version (the Septuagint [LXX]), which tends to add new titles, 18 of these “orphan” psalms are given supplementary information. The enumeration of the 150 Hebrew psalms (in the Masoretic Text [MT]) also is different in the Greek version (the LXX has 151):

HEBREW (MT)	GREEK (LXX)
Pss. 1–8	Pss. 1–8
11–113	10–112
114–115	113
116	114–115
117–146	116–145
147	146–147

Both divisions are ancient and neither one is objectively preferable: i.e., Psalms 9–10 in the Hebrew were originally a single psalm, favoring the Greek division; Psalms 114–115 are two psalms, favoring the Hebrew; both traditions divide a single psalm into Psalms 42 and 43. The liturgical books of the Greek and Latin churches have followed the Greek enumeration. This commentary adopts the Hebrew enumeration of the individual psalms, as do most English versions of the Bible.

The Hebrew text generally considers the title a separate verse. Because Christian liturgical tradition included the title neither in song or recitation nor in theological discussions, the titles were not included in the versification. The Hebrew form is followed by the NAB, JB (French ed.), and JPS but not by the RSV, KJV, NIV, TEV, or the JB (English ed.).

This commentary considers titles as separate verses. Citations of verses in the Psalms in this commentary will therefore differ from the verse numbers in the RSV and many other English versions. Titles receive considerable attention in rabbinical commentaries. They offer important information, even if obscure for us today, about the attitude for praying the psalms, as well as their liturgical usage and accompaniment by musical instruments. As an integral part of the psalms, the titles declare that the spirit and style of worship in any age belong to the inspired tradition of the Bible.

Date of Composing and Editing the Psalms

The division into five books offers some clues to the date during which Israel's sacred songs were collected in postexilic Israel and to the religious spirit of those times. (See the introduction to each of the five books in the commentary.)

Book One (Pss. 1–41) consists almost exclusively of “Psalms of David” (except Pss. 1–2, 10, and 33) and is dominated by laments. Book One reflects the decadent or, at best, the despondent state of religion after the return from exile, as seen in Haggai and Isa. 56:9–57:13; 63:7–64:11. The fact that the royal Davidic psalms are scattered and that the titles refer to David's shared humanity, not to his royal status, reflects the demise of the dynasty.

Book Two (Pss. 42–72) gives new attention to Jerusalem's Temple liturgy in the psalms of Korah (Pss. 42–49) and Asaph (Ps. 50). These may date from the time of the religious reform of Ezra in the latter part of the fifth century B.C. (Ezra 7–10; Neh. 8–9) and the composition of the two books of Chronicles.

Book Three (Pss. 73–89) belongs almost exclusively to Asaph and Korah, while the psalms in Book Four (Pss. 90–106) are almost completely untitled. Psalms 96–99 enhance the Temple liturgy as prefiguring the final or eschatological age. These books were added as the momentum of Ezra's reform continued.

Book Five (Pss. 107–150) is the most liturgical of all, with attention to Jews in the Diaspora on pilgrimage to Jerusalem, a situation possibly reflecting international stability and communication effected by the conquests of Alexander the Great. Psalms 120–134 constitute a booklet for pilgrims; Psalms 113–118, for the three major pilgrimage festivals. In Books Four and Five, composition of psalms has definitely passed from the control of the guilds under the names of David, Korah, and Asaph, to a wider group of worship leaders.

The collecting and arranging of psalms did not stop at that time. The Greek version added Psalm 151. At Qumran, the manuscripts disclose a tendency to stabilize the order of psalms according to that of our Bible by the middle of the first century A.D. The Psalm Scroll (11QPs<sup>a</sup>), with a different sequence especially for Books Four and Five and with new psalms, including Psalm 151 of the Greek, represents either an earlier stage or a freer approach for worship.

The Literary Form

The psalms collected in the five books can be classified as hymns of praise; prayers of supplication, of thanksgiving, of confidence, and of wisdom; as compositions for the royal family of David; and as processional and entrance liturgies.

Hymns begin and frequently end with a community call to joyful worship; the body of the psalm consists of a motivation to praise Yahweh based upon his great deeds in creation and history as remembered and reenacted liturgically. These psalms center upon life and joy.

Laments or supplications exhibit a strong prophetic influence, especially from Jeremiah, in which Israel came to realize that suffering, even that provoked by sin, individual or national, has a positive role in returning the people to Yahweh and in appreciating the personal compassion of Yahweh. These psalms are grammatically divided into the singular and the plural. Yet even the voice of a single suffering person voiced the faith and prayer of the community.

Confidence and thanksgiving become central to a smaller series of psalms. Thanksgiving psalms are the most difficult to identify. Even the Hebrew word for thanks basically means praise and only derivatively does it express gratitude. In giving thanks, Israel is only responding with praise to what Yahweh does.

Wisdom psalms, like Proverbs or Ecclesiastes, represent a nonliturgical origin, mirror a piety of sophisticated scribes, and concern themselves with retribution for virtue and sin. Because earthly results do not provide for adequate reward and punishment, these psalms begin to infer belief in life after death (Ps. 1: 49).

The table "The Psalms: Classified According to Their Form" lists some psalms more than once since the determination of literary form is uncertain. Psalms, as well as literary and liturgical forms, evolved over the centuries. Psalm 14 is repeated as Psalm 53; Ps. 40:14-18 exists separately as Psalm 70; Psalm 108 is composed of Pss. 57:8-12 and 60:7-14 (→ Biblical Criticism; Poetry).

Book One

The first two psalms are united by the exclamation "How happy" (Heb. 'ashrey; Pss. 1:1; 2:12). In fact, the same phrase bonds together the first book of Psalms (Pss. 1:1; 41:1), forms a link with the second and third books (Pss. 89:16; 106:3), and is a frequent refrain in the fifth book (Pss. 112:1; 119:1-2; 128:1; 137:9; 146:5). This word, more secular than baruk (Heb., "Blessed"), reaches out into daily life. The psalms were intended as everyone's book, even though in the postexilic age the collection became more formally liturgical. Psalm 2 was originally composed for the coronation of a Davidic king and keeps alive the memory of David and his dynasty.

Psalm 1. The opening psalm manifests its close contacts with the wisdom tradition (→ Wisdom). The opening phrase, "Happy that one," occurs frequently in Proverbs within the context of reward and punishment (e.g., Prov. 28:14); other statements about meditating upon the law day and night are found in Josh. 1:8; and the sequence of "walk, stand and sit (or abide)" in Ps. 1:1 recalls the exhortation in Deut. 6:4-9. A comparison may be made with Jer. 15:5-8. Yet Psalm 1 is less tragic in tone than Jeremiah, less legal and ritual than Deuteronomy, and closest of all to wisdom literature. Psalm 1 presumes a body of instruction upon which to meditate. It reflects a person of experience, totally dedicated to the traditions of Israel. The psalm can be divided into vv. 1-3, the way of the righteous; vv. 4-5, the way of the rebellious; and v. 6, conclusion.

Verses 1-3 move from the past tense, where one has taken a clear position with Yahweh (v. 1), to a present tense of satisfaction (v. 2), to a hope for a happy future (v. 3). The Hebrew term derek, "way," indicates the conduct of individuals (Ps. 37:5-7) or of all Israel (Isa. 40:3), a way mysteriously directed by God, yet clear in its moral expectations.

Some interpreters discern anticipation of reward and punishment beyond the grave here: v. 3 may refer to the tree as "transplanted" beyond the present conditions of earth; v. 5 employs a definite article with judgment, possibly foreseeing a final reckoning. Early Christian writers interpreted the tree as the cross and the life-giving water as baptism.

Psalm 2. Composed very probably for a royal coronation at Jerusalem, perhaps for one of the last kings such as Josiah (640-609 B.C.), who pledged himself, as Psalm 1 would enjoin, to obey the ancient laws and traditions (2 Kings 22–23), Psalm 2 moves with skillful balance: vv. 1–3, earthly kings, who speak in their own voice, in revolt, (v. 3); vv. 4–6, a heavenly setting of peace for ratifying the choice of a new Davidic king, concluding with an oracle from Yahweh; vv. 7–9, the words of consecration (2 Sam. 7:14; Isa. 9:6–7; Pss. 89:27–28; 110:3) and other ritual actions; 2:10–12, advice to princes and, indirectly, to the new king.

Some psalms are listed more than once since they can be classified in more than one of these categories.

In v. 2, the term “anointed” indicated a special relationship with Yahweh, as it does elsewhere for altars (Exod. 29:36), priests (Exod. 28:41), prophets (1 Kings 19:16; Isa. 61:1), and especially kings (1 Sam. 10:1; 16:3). Ps. 2:4, “The Lord laughs” denotes his supreme control (Ps. 37:13), not necessarily a laugh of ridicule or disdain (Ps. 59:9). God paralyzes the efforts of all opponents (2:5) and with a decree fixes the limits of chaos (v. 7). Israel’s land is created anew in peace (Jer. 5:22; Job 28:26). Beginning with v. 9, the text does not appear to be in its original form, perhaps by disuse after the end of the dynasty. As a result, one may say that the text here is disturbed or “corrupt.” “Shatter the clay vessels,” like the symbolic actions of the prophets (Jer. 19:10–11; 28:10), announced the end of all opposition. The action has some overtones of ancient magical practices (Num. 5:11–31), yet here Yahweh clearly determines the outcome by obedience to the divine will. Despite a tone of fierceness within the psalm and its exclusive concern for the king, Psalm 2 modulates into a statement of calm protection for all who take refuge in the Lord.

Through this psalm, especially v. 7, the early church proclaimed its faith in Jesus’ messiahship and divine enthronement at his resurrection from the dead (Acts 4:25–26; 13:33; Heb. 1:5; 5:5).

Psalm 3. The first major collection of psalms, attributed to the guild “of David,” begins with Psalm 3 and extends to the end of Book One. This guild under the patronage of David (1 Sam. 16:18; Amos 6:5) had, at first, exclusive rights to psalm writing. Psalms 3–4 have traditionally been considered prayers for morning (Ps. 4:5, 9) and evening (Ps. 3:6). A sequence of words identical in the Hebrew further bonds these psalms together: foes or distress (3:2; 4:2); many say (3:3; 4:7); my glory or honor (3:4; 4:3); I call and the Lord hears (3:5; 4:2, 4); and I lie down and sleep (3:6; 4:9).

Although the title refers to David’s flight from his son Absalom (2 Sam. 15–18), the reference to “my holy mountain” (Ps. 3:5) presumes a date after Solomon had constructed the Temple (2:6). The title declares that no darkness is bleaker than betrayal within one’s family.

This individual lament begins with a cry for help to Yahweh (3:2–4), continues with a meditation about Yahweh, one’s true confidence (vv. 5–7), and concludes with a stirring supplication for help (v. 8) and a final ritual blessing (v. 9). Two key words set up a strong tension between the foes who are many (vv. 2 twice, 3, 7) and Yahweh the source of salvation (vv. 3, 8, 9). Many of the lines begin dramatically: “Yahweh, how many!” (v. 2); “Many say” (v. 3); “But you, Yahweh” (v. 4); “My cry to Yahweh” (v. 5); “I” (v. 6); “Rise, Yahweh” (v. 8); and “With Yahweh is salvation” (v. 9). Verse 8 resonates with the traditional summons (Num. 10:35; Pss. 7:7; 44:27; 68:2) and links the rise of a new day to Israel’s march into the mystery of its divinely directed future.

Psalm 4. More serene than Psalm 3 but with a more disturbed text, the prayer of supplication in Psalm 4 sustains confidence within a setting, or at least a remembrance, of Temple sacrifice (v. 6). Possibly composed by a priest betrayed by colleagues (v. 3), the psalm concludes with renewed assurances for the person faithful to Yahweh (Lev. 26:3–45). The final reference to sleep intimates the practice of prayer at night (Ps. 119:62) in the Temple and the reception of favorable dreams from the Lord (Gen. 15:12–21; 37:5, 9).

An opening cry for help (Ps. 4:2) is followed by reflections addressed either to persecutors or fellow worshipers (vv. 3–6); the psalm then modulates from ridicule to gratitude (vv. 7–9).

Verse 2 appeals to a just God fulfilling covenant promises to Israel and asks that “in distress you open wide” my horizons and remove oppressive borders. The same Hebrew word, here translated “open wide,” occurs in Gen. 26:22 for the name of a well within a spacious area for living. Ps. 4:3–6 blends the thinking of wisdom literature (the good are blessed, the evil punished, Ps. 1) with references to the covenant and Temple ritual. The difficult v. 5 is translated in the Greek, “Be angry and sin not,” which is quoted in Eph. 4:26. The Hebrew infers anxiety within extended periods of prayer.

Ps. 4:7b, spoken by the “many” in Psalms 3–4, declares sarcastically that the light of Yahweh’s face has vanished. Verse 8 announces that a person receives greater joy from one’s interior peace than from abundant material resources (Pss. 17:15; 84:11).

Psalm 5. A morning prayer for accompanying Temple sacrifice (Pss. 3; 4) or possibly a ritual at the Temple gate (Pss. 15; 24), Psalm 5, a supplication, repeats in its second half the sequence in the first. The introduction (vv. 2–4), like the entire psalm, is addressed to Yahweh, worshiped as holy (vv. 5–7) and good (vv. 8–9); the wicked fall (vv. 5–7, 10–11) but the upright are joyful (vv. 8–9, 12–13).

Verses 2–4 begin as though God, alive within the Temple, may be deaf and silent (Ps. 22:2–3). Salvation is given to the righteous, who in faith wait upon the Lord (Isa. 7:4; 30:15–18) and follow the way of the Lord (Ps. 5:8). Verse 3, “my King and my God,” recalls Isaiah’s vision in the Temple (Isa. 6). Dawn was the time of sacrifice (2 Kings 3:20; Amos 4:4) and salvation (Ps. 46:6; Isa. 33:2; 37:36).

Ps. 5:5 can be translated: “A no-god takes pleasure in evil; but you, no evil one is ever your guest.” This rendition leads to an entrance liturgy, proclaiming the purity of the true worshiper (Pss. 15; 24). The psalmist in entering the Temple submits to God’s mysterious ways (Ps. 5:8; Ps. 1; Isa. 40:3–5; 43:16–20).

Ps. 5:10–11 points to deceit as the most serious sin, for it reaches deeply into communication between friends (12:3–5). “Let them bear their guilt”; possibly such openness will bring a conversion (34:22). “All who take refuge in you” repeats the antiphonal response in Psalm 2.

Psalm 5 states that righteousness, not birth as an Israelite, brings one into God’s presence; it hints, if only vaguely, to opening that presence to righteous Gentiles.

Psalm 6. The first of the seven penitential psalms (Pss. 6; 32; 38; 51; 102; 130; 143) is a filigree of stereotypic phrases found throughout psalms of supplication, with repetition of words (hear and shamed, twice; terrified, three times; Yahweh, seven times). Yet it remains a poem with high emotional intensity established by the I-Thou relation, the life-death polarity, and the effective use of questions and commands.

Verses 2–4 involve supplication and petition, beginning with imperatives and ending with a question; vv. 5–6, emotional fear of death, again with imperative and question; vv. 7–8, acute physical suffering; vv. 9–10, confidence, beginning with imperative and concluding with a clear statement.

The psalm labors under the relation of suffering and sin, whether this be the sin of an individual or of the group. God as healer never addresses simply physical or emotional ailments but the whole person as bonded within Israel. Healing includes conversion. This psalm became very popular within Israel, at first as morning prayer, except on Sabbaths and festivals. Because of the reference to “the eighth” in the title, it was sung at circumcisions; for Christians, it announced the resurrection on the day after the Sabbath.

“In Sheol, who offers you praise?” (v. 6). Sheol is the grave, a place of murky silence and of no return, with little or no contact with Yahweh (Pss. 94:17; 143:3; Job 7:9). Only very late in the postexilic age was the notion of God’s presence with the dead in Sheol accepted (Ps. 139:8). Belief in life after death is found earlier only within popular religious beliefs (1 Sam. 28:8–25; 2 Kings 2:11; → Hades; Sheol).

Psalm 7. A person betrayed and persecuted seldom follows clean lines of response and closure but reacts with melancholic, abrupt transitions, with anger and imperfect grammar. Such is the case in Psalm 7. The editor, however, has imposed a reasonable development; vv. 2–3, summary introduction; vv. 4–6, confession of innocence; vv. 7–9a, trial beginning; vv. 9b–10, prosecution of the wicked; vv. 11–12, hymnic interlude; vv. 13–17, verdict and punishment; v. 18, thanksgiving. This lament wrestles with the biblical problem of reward and punishment, particularly when the question touches personal relationships. God is present as one seeks to sort out the parts from a web of emotions and confusion. The title, as interpreted in the Aramaic Targum, asks readers to reread David’s persecution by the Benjaminite Saul in order to respond to betrayal by leaving the outcome in God’s hands (1 Sam. 18–31).

The introduction is relatively calm, repeating the stereotypic phrase “I take refuge in you, Yahweh, my God” (Pss. 11; 16; 31). In view of 7:8, the reference may be to Yahweh’s presence in the sanctuary where disputes were sometimes settled (Exod. 22:6–8; Num. 5:6–10). Lions (Ps. 7:3) were to be found in Israel up to the time of the Crusaders. In pleading innocence and taking no initiative to punish evil-doers, the psalmist will risk death if there is any dishonesty (vv. 4–6). “Guilt on my hands” refers to a deliberate breach of personal trust.

The trial gets under way, presided over by the Lord in an assembly of peoples or, as some scholars read the text, of lesser gods (Ps. 82:1). The style is suddenly majestic and definitive, as befits action in God’s throne room. Ps. 7:9b–10 modulates into a calmer, legal action of indicting the wicked party. Verse 10b reads literally, “Searcher of heart and kidneys,” a reference to the seat of reason and emotions.

Verses 13–17 appear excessively stark in their realism. Yet not even God can forgive, much less reward the unrepentant sinner. Such people do not need divine punishment, for they destroy themselves (Prov. 26:27). Ps. 7:18, a liturgical conclusion, reminds us that God takes seriously each betrayal of trust.

Psalm 8. Psalm 8, a hymn of praise, resolves into peaceful joy the somber and at times agonizing outcries of Psalms 3–7, yet in v. 4 it is linked with them as a prayer at night. Verses 2 and 10, calling for praise of Yahweh, form an envelope, technically an inclusio, around the body of the psalm that provides the motive for singing to the Lord's name. The language reaches high poetical flights, yet the thought is simple enough: humanity, which feels overwhelmed by the universe, if redeemed by the Lord, has this world at its feet.

This psalm's history of composition and use is long and complex. Originally it was composed in honor of a Davidic king; the phrase "our Lord" was a title for kings (1 Kings 1:11, 43, 47); only in the postexilic age was it directed to Yahweh (Neh. 10:29; Ps. 135:5). The king empowered by Yahweh was considered the source of harmony. Like Genesis 1-3, Psalm 8 delicately blends human excellence and human lowliness. In the postexilic age the psalm became a popular night prayer and still later was sung in the New Year's festival celebrating creation. Job 7:17-21 reversed the sense of v. 5, while the LXX made "the son of man" (possibly to be translated more inclusively as "the child of earth") "for a little while less than the angels" refer to the small stretch of time till the Messiah comes. The NT calls upon the psalm to announce the messianic presence in Jesus (Heb. 2:6-10; 1 Cor. 15:20-28). Matt. 21:15-16 recalls the early link with the Davidic dynasty. Not surprisingly, Christian liturgies reserve the psalm for Sundays and major Christological feasts.

The motivation for praise is sung by special choirs, narrating, questioning, and answering (Ps. 8:3-9). Verse 3 announces definitive victory with only a hint of the violent struggle over chaos in creating the good order of the universe (Pss. 29; 89:6-13; Isa. 51:9-10). New creation delights in the sound of new life in "babes and sucklings." Ps. 8:6, "little less than gods," like Ps. 7:8; 1 Kings 22:19; Job 1:6; and Isa. 6:1-7, refers to the divine assembly; later these figures are renamed angels. Humankind, redeemed and lifted up from its lowly state by the Lord, shares in the divine governance of the world. The harmony of nature depends upon the harmony of men and women among themselves and with their God. Ecology belongs to the theology of redemption.

Psalms 9-10. While the question is not completely settled, many solid reasons support the unity of Psalms 9-10. First, ancient manuscripts, especially the LXX and the Vulgate (Vg.), unite them. For this reason, after Psalms 9-10, the liturgical tradition of the Greek and Latin churches generally numbers its psalms one behind the Hebrew (see Introduction above). Second, very unusual for psalms in the first book, Psalm 10 has no title. Third, similar words, especially for the poor and the wicked, some even rare in biblical Hebrew, occur in both psalms. Third, some scholars discern an acrostic pattern uniting both psalms, an arrangement by which new lines begin with successive letters of the alphabet. Yet in Psalm 10 considerable ingenuity is needed to locate the proper letter. The acrostic form is frequently associated with the wisdom movement (or "tradition"). Yet Psalms 9-10 do not share the tranquil spirit of wisdom nor its distance from the Jerusalem liturgy.

While the literary form varies between hymn, supplication, reflection, thanksgiving, and confidence, the atmosphere is generally somber, at times anguishing, and therefore one understands Psalms 9-10 best as a lament from the individual. The clue to the form of Psalms 9-10 is to be sought in liturgical ceremony at the Jerusalem Temple where the Lord is enthroned (Pss. 9:5, 8, 12; 47:6). Part One of the service includes 9:2-13, praise and thanksgiving, with an introduction (vv. 2-3), motivation for praise in God's protection of the individual and the nation (vv. 4-11), and a hymnic interlude (vv. 12-13). Part Two includes 9:14-21, an appeal for justice, with prayer (vv. 14-15, 20-21) and reflection (vv. 16-19). Part Three includes 10:1-18, a cry of distress over the prosperity of the wicked (vv. 1-11), followed by prayer (vv. 12-15). Part Four includes 10:16-18, hymnic conclusion of confidence.

The opening hymn (9:2-13) begins with "I praise the Lord with all my heart; I announce all your wonders!" (For translating the first word as "praise" instead of "thanksgiving," see Gen. 29:35; 49:8.) The word "wonders" occurs forty-five times in the OT, twenty-seven in the Psalms, and refers to the Lord's great acts of creation and redemption as they reach the ordinary Israelite (Ps. 71:17) and all the nation (Ps. 75:1), both in Israel's history (Ps. 44:2) and in cosmic creation (Ps. 136:4). Problems arise later in Psalms 9-10 from this broad perspective concerning earth and history. Praise involves faith in the Lord's justice (9:5) to fulfill every promise and hope of the righteous person (Exod. 34:6-7). The psalmist does not flinch from stating clearly at the outset that the Lord is always dependable and just (Ps. 44). Beneath 9:11 lies the rich theology of knowing or cherishing the name of the Lord and all that the Lord personally stands for in relation to Israel. "Those seeking you" is another phrase so frequent (about 165 times in the OT) that we cannot adequately unpack its richness. In v. 13 it is translated "avenger of blood," referring to the obligations of a kinsperson to "seek" the integrity of the family by executing anyone who murders a family member (Lev. 25:23-55; Num. 35:16-29).

Ps. 9:14-21 comprises an appeal for and reflection on justice. The gates of death are contrasted with the gates of daughter Zion in vv. 14-15, so that justice is the door to life, injustice to death. Because the gates of death were firmly closed forever, does the psalmist also imply eternity for life with God? Not clearly, but these intuitions prepare for such a theological development. The end of v. 17 includes two Hebrew words difficult to translate, higgayon selah. The first implies meditation (1:2), the accompanying sound of the harp (92:4), and the movement of the heart (19:15). The second word probably indicates a pause. The liturgy calls for silent reflection, to be terminated abruptly: "Rise, Lord!" (9:20).

In 10:1–15 the acrostic arrangement is no longer clearly visible; the tone is somber, even desperate. The psalmist confronts the just Lord with the proud and prosperous wicked: "Why, Lord?" in startling contrast to the confident "Rise, Lord" (9:20). A personal bonding in faith enables the psalmist to be this forceful without being arrogant or skeptical. The statement about the Lord's forgetfulness surges with agony (v. 11; Pss. 13:2; 44:25; 77:10). Here the conclusion is carefully arrived at "in the heart," or seat of reason. It will be repeated more vigorously in the final appeal.

Even though the external situation has not improved in 10:16–18, the faith of the psalmist has been strengthened by describing it as it is; and the conviction emerges that "you hear, Lord," a phrase that is the turning point. The final Hebrew words are somewhat uncertain, yet even so they reflect the simplest and deepest human desire for peace and shelter.

Psalm 11. A psalm of confidence, Psalm 11 witnesses to the faith of a devout Israelite, weathering the collapse of the nation's leaders and the betrayal of personal friends. The psalm begins and ends with strong trust in the Lord (vv. 1a; 7); in between we encounter the advice of false friends (vv. 1b–3) and the motivation for loyal confidence in the Lord (vv. 4–6).

In v. 1a, rather than "flee like a bird to your mountain" (Gen. 19:17; Judg. 6:2; 1 Sam. 14), the psalmist declares, "I take refuge in the Lord" (Pss. 2:12; 7:2; 16:1). Some understand this to be a statement about the right of asylum in the Jerusalem Temple (Exod. 21:12–14; 1 Kings 1:50–53). Yet in Ps. 11:1b–3, all the underpinnings of life are obliterated, be they laws or leadership or buildings.

Nothing but Yahweh is left for one's confidence. Verse 4 follows the tradition that the Lord's normal throne is above the heavens (Pss. 18:7; 20:7; 29:10; 1 Kings 8:27); the Jerusalem Temple is an earthly mirror of the heavenly house of the Lord, yet only on condition that Israel remains faithful (Ezek. 10). Ps. 11:4b denotes a God who sees hidden reality and explores unknown places. Verse 6 bursts with the Lord's fierce anger against the wicked, recalling the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19:23–24).

Psalm 12. A communal lament, Psalm 12 involves people suffering from deceit, particularly at the hands of their own religious leadership. In fact, the key words all center around speaking. The structure follows a chiasmic arrangement, forming a letter X (Gk. chi), so that the second upward stroke follows the steps in reverse of the downward stroke. After the call for help (v. 2a), we find A lament, vv. 2a–3; B prayer, v. 4; C words of the wicked, v. 5; D Yahweh's own words, v. 6; C' choral response of the devout, v. 7; B' prayer, v. 8; A' lament, v. 9.

As the psalm advances to its center moment in v. 6, symbols and other people drop away and God speaks directly in an oracle of salvation. God saves, not by changing the human situation, for in the final verse nothing changes. That verse even repeats a phrase from v. 2, "sons of men" or "children of earth." Yet if people "wait upon me," as the Lord here advises, salvation has already begun.

Verse 7 poses a serious question: how can God's pure words be purified seven times over? This notion seems to result from the suffering of faithful ones who thereby attach themselves ever more personally to the Lord.

Psalm 13. A personal lament, Psalm 13 describes a desperately sick person (v. 3), abandoned by friends who gloat over this miserable end of virtuous living. The psalm consists of lament (vv. 2–3), petition (vv. 4–5), and statement of confidence (v. 6).

"How long?" (vv. 2–3), a biblical formula for fright and exasperation, demands an explanation from the provident God who has let things get completely out of control. God even "forgets" (Pss. 9:19; 10:12; 42:10). Verse 3a can be translated, "How long do I lay up counsel in my heart," as though to say, "must I keep on learning forever from my pain?"

"Look! Answer me!" These strong words (vv. 4–5) challenge God to scrutinize me through and through. The phrase ends with the affectionate, "My God! Illumine [or open] my eyes," which long for life and not death, for God and not oblivion.

"I indeed will scrutinize your steadfast love and rejoice in your salvation . . . you care for me tenderly" (v. 6; cf. 2 Cor. 12:9–10).

Psalm 14. Psalm 14 is textually disturbed (yet repeated again in Ps. 53 in much better condition) and mixes features of prophetic diatribes against evil (Jer. 5) with a discussion of foolishness that recalls wisdom literature. The overall attitude seems to reflect a personal lament, possibly composed during the decadent reign of Manasseh (2 Kings 21:1–18; 698–642 B.C.). After the introduction (Ps. 14:1), the universal collapse of morals is described (vv. 2–3), a verdict against the wicked awaits fulfillment (vv. 4–6), and a prayer begs for the Lord's return to Jerusalem (v. 7).

"There is no God," displays a practical atheism (v. 1). God is useless and ineffective, so why bother? Verse 3 is quoted in Rom. 3:10–18 along with six other OT passages, all of which found their way into some Greek manuscripts of Psalm 14 and even into a Hebrew manuscript.

Psalm 15. Composed for a service at one of the Temple gates (Ps. 118:19), Psalm 15 along with Psalm 24 enabled a person once guilty or at least under suspicion to be declared worthy of acceptance. The liturgy did not remove the requirement of confessing one's fault and making full restitution (Num. 5:5–10) but recognized the need for a final arbiter to ensure that all prerequisites were properly fulfilled.

The psalm combines the question-answer method and the concern for morality as in prophecy (Isa. 33:14–16) or in wisdom literature (Prov. 30:2–6). After the initial question, probably spoken by a representative of the congregation (Ps. 15:1), the officiating priest or Levite responds (vv. 2–5a) and officially welcomes the party (v. 5b).

In v. 1 the words for sojourn, dwell, and tent recall early, nomadic days and remind the worshiper that even at Jerusalem there is no unconditional assurance of eternal presence (Ps. 11:4).

In vv. 2–5a the list does not include ritual requirements (Lev. 15) or serious sins like apostasy but those faults that disrupt family and neighborhood. The prohibition of lending at interest reflects the ancient practice of the extended family and its obligations to help. Currency did not yet exist and precious items were given as pledge. In the ancient Near East, interest rates were exorbitantly high (e.g., 33 1/3 percent in Babylon; 50 percent at Nuzi).

Psalm 16. A prayer of confidence, especially for Levites, Psalm 16 addresses a time of severe sickness and disqualification from the sanctuary (Lev. 21), a time as well of moral collapse among fellow Levites. The parallels with Isa. 56:9–57:13 place the composition in the early postexilic age around 500 B.C. After a call for help (Ps. 16:1a), the confusing religious scene is put before us (vv. 1b–4), followed by an expression of confidence (vv. 5–8) and rewards (vv. 9–11).

Significantly, the psalmist does not take refuge in anything sacred, not even in the sacred word but states that his good comes only "in you, Lord." Verses 1–3 are disturbed in the Hebrew, mirroring confusion and degeneracy in levitical ranks.

"The Lord, my portion and cup" (v. 5) identifies Levites who, though they possessed no property (Josh. 13:14; Deut. 10:9), were a symbol of an attitude proper for all Israel (Pss. 73:26; 142:6). Verse 7 refers to prayer at night (Pss. 4:9; 91:5–6; 119:62).

The rewards of confidence included a return to health (16:9–11). Yahweh will not allow this devout worshiper to be consigned to the grave. In the Hebrew text, v. 11 repeats six key words or ideas from the psalm and is clearly the finale. The Greek translation, reflecting a later clear belief in resurrection and personal immortality, read v. 8, "I see Yahweh before me always [in paradise]" and shifted the conclusion to v. 10 where the psalmist is "not consigned to corruption." The LXX reading was accepted at Qumran (1QS 4:11–14) and in Acts 2:23–28.

Psalm 17. Word parallels and the act of praying at night (vv. 3, 15) connect Psalms 16 and 17. Sorrow and outrage, which Psalm 16 pushes to the background, Psalm 17 brings forward prominently. Psalm 17 may also expand upon the conditions, listed in Psalm 15, for entering the sanctuary. While the Hebrew text is seriously damaged, the sense and structure seem clear: first, an appeal to Yahweh (v. 1) with a protest of innocence (vv. 2–5); second, a request for an oracle (v. 6) with prayer (vv. 7–9b) and lament (vv. 9c–12); third, an appeal to Yahweh (vv. 13–14a) with lament (v. 14bc); and fourth, the conclusion (v. 15).

The opening appeal may be translated either "Hear, just Lord" or, with justifiable emendation, "Hear, Lord, my plea for justice." Verses 1 and 15 reason from the psalmist's righteousness, not God's. Again one encounters deceit among religious people (Ps. 12).

In vv. 2–5 the psalmist protests his innocence, derived from the pure light of the Lord's presence (v. 2), which searches the mysterious darkness of each person's heart (Jer. 12:3) during prayer at night (Ps. 17:3). The image extends from heart (reasoning) to mouth (speaking) to feet (acting).

After the initial request for an oracle from the Lord (v. 6), lovely images of divine care are introduced: "at your right hand" (Ps. 16:8); "apple of your eye," literally, "the little image in the pupil of your eye" (Deut. 32:10; Prov. 7:2); "shadow of your wings" (Deut. 32:11; Isa. 51:16; Lam. 4:20), possibly an allusion to residing in the shadow of the wings of the cherubim, which were located on either side of the Ark (Exod. 25:20; Isa. 6:1–2; Ps. 36:8). In 17:9c–12 the psalmist speaks with the agonizing accents of suffering and betrayal (Jer. 12:3).

Opposite: The coronation of David; illumination from a tenth-century A.D. Greek manuscript now called The Paris Psalter. Psalms 2 and 110 are coronation psalms, probably composed for the royal coronations of Davidic kings.

Ps. 17:13–14 is textually corrupt. The message seems to be all earthly gifts are from God, but only for the righteous do these gifts lead to peace. The difference comes from bonding with the Lord.

Liturgy seems to reach beyond orthodox limits (v. 15). “I will see the vision of your face,” yet no one can see God and live (Exod. 33:20; Isa. 6:5). “Upon awakening I rejoice before your presence” (Num. 12:8), yet belief in the resurrection will not be clarified till Dan. 12:1–3, around 165 B.C. Or is the text referring simply to awakening after a night vigil in the sanctuary? In a context of visions at night, intuitions of resurrection ought not to be dismissed.

Psalm 18. A biblical masterpiece and a majestic ode of thanksgiving, Psalm 18 summons a universe of cosmic images to announce Yahweh’s giant steps through the life of faithful Israelites. Rather than be terrified at the roaring darkness and the grinding of people into dust, one is instead caught up in ecstatic wonder at Yahweh’s immediate presence in Israel’s history and in the marvelous protection of the chosen people. Thanksgiving, however, centers less in Yahweh than in the work that Yahweh is accomplishing among the Israelites. Images describing manifestations of God, exalted vocabulary, and stately Temple ceremonies, enable one to envision the awesome world of the spirit where each person battles for salvation (cf. Eph. 6:10–17).

Although this psalm seems to be repeated in 2 Samuel 22, only vv. 9, 10, 17, 22 are identical. Stylistically, Psalm 18 reflects many features of Israel’s earliest poetry (Deut. 32–33; Exod. 15; Hab. 3). Rather than an eschatological poem dealing with the final age of complete divine renewal, Psalm 18 reflects Canaanite literature about the yearly struggle of the gods’ creating the world anew in harmony and fertility (Pss. 29; 89:10–14; 93). The psalm was composed in an early age, with additions in v. 51 about the Davidic royalty and, in v. 2, the title “my strength,” a word very similar to the Hebrew name of King Hezekiah (727–698 B.C.), who saw Jerusalem survive the massive army of Assyria (2 Kings 18–20).

The psalm proceeds: introduction (vv. 2–7); theophanic presentation, with Yahweh’s departure from heaven (vv. 8–13), upheavals on earth (vv. 14–16), and deliverance (vv. 17–20); historical presentation, with the righteous rewarded (vv. 21–31) and military victory (vv. 32–46); and epilogue, with thanksgiving (vv. 47–50) for the Davidic royalty (v. 51).

Most probably, the opening line of the psalm belongs to the title and could be translated, “I Yahweh have pity on you, Hezekiah.” This line is missing in 2 Samuel 22; the verb “pity,” sometimes translated “love,” never has God as its object. In Ps. 18:3, “my rock” is a title given to Yahweh only in Jerusalem psalms (Ps. 95:1).

Ps. 18:5–6 voices a litany of death! “Breakers of death” refers to the angry sea, which swallowed its victims, never to release them. Israelites were not seafarers and dreaded the open waters. God answers “from his [heavenly] temple” (Ps. 11:4). In 18:7–8 the clash of symbols is typical of Semitic poetry: raging waters, smoke from Yahweh’s nostrils, and fire from the Lord’s mouth. Symbols such as these communicated a mysterious divine presence that could not be rationalized as in the stately symbolic world of Greece and Rome. The psalmist is delivered against all odds, “because the Lord delights in me” (v. 20b).

The psalm leaves aside theophanic symbolism and enters the world of conscience (vv. 21–31). Verses 21–25 recall the entrance liturgies of Psalms 15; 24. This fact raises the question whether or not the preceding verses were also part of Temple ritual, inaugurating a solemn service. Ps. 18:26–27 stuns readers with its lapidary style after the extravaganza of the preceding section. At times, one needs the sober truth. God does not tolerate being mocked or the covenant being ridiculed. The measure for divine righteousness is gauged from caring for the lowly. In vv. 32–46, the language reflects “holy war,” a phrase found in Mic. 3:5 and Joel 4(3):9. It refers to warfare in the book of Joshua as well as in the very late apocalyptic literature (Zech. 14; Dan. 7–12). As Israelites kept the ancient law (Josh. 1; Dan. 1), the mighty power of Yahweh was on their side to fight their battles. “Holy wars” seemed to be more religious instruction and Temple liturgy than actual military venture. Yet if conflict occurred, Israel would be mightily empowered. Vengeance must be left to Yahweh, who sets the record straight (Ps. 18:48). Paul, in declaring that vengeance belongs to God alone, substantiates his words by appealing to the OT (Lev. 19:18).

Psalm 19. Resting between the royal Davidic Psalms 18 and 20, Psalm 19 may have found its place in the Psalter because of the relation of vv. 5b–7 to Isa. 41:1–5, which refers to royalty. Ps. 19:5b–7, which acclaims the resplendent way of the sun, acts as a bridge from the first part, praising the glorious Creator in vv. 2–5a, to the praise of Israel’s glorious law in vv. 8–11. According to Babylonian mythology, as exemplified in the prologue to Hammurabi’s law code, the sun god Shamash grants the code of laws to the king. Verse 12, in turn, provides a transition from the glory of the law in vv. 8–11 to the darkness of disobedience in vv. 13–14. The psalm concludes with v. 15.

universe and within the law, which in turn casts its shadow should there be any opposing disobedience, and secondarily through the rubric of God's mysterious word, manifest through the good order of the universe (vv. 2–5a) and in Israel's law (vv. 8–15). Each section expresses the sense of mystery, the first concerning all the world by using the common name for God (Heb. 'el), the second specifically for Israel by using the proper name Yahweh. The first section comes from an early period, possibly that of David around 1000 B.C., and the second section from the days of Ezra around 428 B.C.

The luminous yet mysterious wonder of the world proclaims not only God's glorious presence (vv. 2–5a), but its orderliness and balance set the stage for appreciating the law in vv. 8–11. The structure of v. 2 is chiasmic: A B C C' B' A': "The heavens proclaim the glory of God; the work of God's hands is revealed in the heavenly vault." The imagery in v. 3 is exquisite: water gurgling from rocks in the daytime, wind breathing through the space of the night (cf. John 3:8). Ps. 19:2 can be compared to the sacred place, v. 3 to the liturgical action within it. While v. 4 denies that any voice is heard, v. 5 announces its message throughout the universe (Rom. 10:18).

Ps. 19:5b–7 unabashedly incorporates the mythology of Babylon and Egypt about the sun god, so that the sense of mystery is not lost. The natural law of the universe that lies behind the laws and traditions of Israel reaches beyond rational understanding.

Law in vv. 8–11 embodies early clan traditions, enactments in the Torah, and later practices—all that governs the good order of Israel. Most of all, law expresses the qualities of Yahweh—perfect, loyal, luminous, pure, sweet, and just. So described, law almost becomes the immediate presence of Yahweh with Israel.

The transitional v. 12 speaks of "your servant" (so v. 14) and of law's abundant reward (so vv. 8–10). In vv. 13–14, sins of inadvertence or ignorance are mentioned first, the stage after willful sins have been confessed and restitution made (Num. 5:5–10) and before the ceremony at the temple gate (Ps. 15). Then more serious, presumptuous transgressions are cited (Gen. 20:6; Exod. 32:21, 30–31).

Ps. 19:15 concludes: "How pleasant is God's word and the rhythm of one's heart in meditation before you, Yahweh, my rock, my redeemer." Redeemer carries the early meaning of the Hebrew word go'el, one's kinsperson with the obligations of blood relationship (Lev. 25:23–55).

Psalm 20. The sequence of verses in Psalm 20 follows that of a service before battle: v. 2, introduction as the king arrives at the Jerusalem Temple; vv. 3–6, ritual sacrifices and intercessory prayer; vv. 7–9, priestly assurance of victory; v. 10, concluding prayer (1 Sam. 7:9; 13:9–12; 2 Chron. 20:1–19). Because the Ark is not said to be carried into battle (1 Sam. 4:1–11; Psalm 68), one may presume a date of composition in the late pre-exilic period.

"A time of crisis" (Ps. 20:2) grips the nation (Gen. 35:3; Ps. 50:15). "The name of the God of Jacob" extends God's pledge of fidelity and compassion (Exod. 34:6–7) to "Jacob," possibly all Israel (Isa. 2:5–6) or else to the southern tribe of Judah (Jer. 5:20), God's chosen people (Exod. 19:3; Isa. 41:17).

Ps. 20:3–6 summarizes Temple services. "Offerings" of grain or animals were partially burned on the altar with the rest used for sacred meals (Lev. 2–3); "holocausts" were completely consumed on the altar in total adoration of the God of life (Lev. 1). The practice of raising banners has biblical precedence (Num. 10:13–28). "Victory" is the same Hebrew word generally translated "salvation," one instance among many of deriving sacred vocabulary from nonreligious words.

An oracle may have been given by the priests (Ps. 12:6) before the response in 20:7–9. The phrase "holy heavens" shows that the earthly tabernacle was a symbolic replica of God's dwelling in the heavens (11:4). While Israel prepares for war, the people confess that victory does not result from instruments of war (Isa. 30:15–17). "Lord, grant victory to the king" or "Save the king" in Ps. 20:10 inspired the joyful shout honoring royalty in England.

Psalm 21. The royal psalm Psalm 21 has a less defined setting within the Temple ritual than does Psalm 20. After the introduction in 21:2, Yahweh is addressed in the name of the king (vv. 3–7); the transitional v. 8 leads to an address to the king in the name of Yahweh (vv. 9–13). Verse 14 functions as a conclusion to the ceremony and repeats a key phrase of v. 2, "in your strength."

"Victory" (v. 2) is understood according to its use in Ps. 20:6. "Heart's desire" is a request granted to those possessed of God's spirit (1 Sam. 10:7; 13:14). God never jealously hoards divine gifts but gives them freely. "Path of days for ever and ever" implies not only a mystery reserved to Yahweh (Ps. 8:9) but also a fulfillment through offspring (2 Sam. 7:16; Ps. 89:30).

The blessings for the Israelite king are reversed for the enemy in 21:9–13. Although the language is figurative (Isa. 13:7–8; Lam. 5:10), one must never underestimate the inhuman fury of warfare (→ War). It took OT religion many centuries to extricate itself from linking military means with establishing God's kingdom.

Psalm 22. Consecrated by the dying breath of Jesus on the cross and frequently chosen by NT writers to communicate better the mystery of the cross (thirteen times, nine in the account of the Passion), Psalm 22 has equally deep roots in OT religious life. The motif of being called from the mother's womb (vv. 10–11) links Psalm 22 with Jeremiah (Jer. 1:5; 20:14–18), the songs of the suffering servant (Isa. 49:1; Gal. 1:15) and Job (3:3–12).

The role of Psalm 22 as a carrier of Israel's faith in times of distress appears in its stages of composition. First, after a long ordeal of sickness and imprisonment (vv. 2–22), an individual sufferer realizes that God is truly listening (v. 22) and so anticipates a liturgy of thanksgiving in the Temple, including a sacred meal (vv. 23–27). Then by its exquisite beauty, the psalm found its way into Temple liturgy and became the property of all Israel. Within this communal setting, the psalm absorbed later developments about outreach to the nations (Isa. 56:1–8; Jonah) and life after death (Dan. 12:1–3). At this point vv. 28–32 were added. Then from the cross, Jesus again individualized the psalm. Jesus cried out according to the vernacular form of the Aramaic language, not the classical rendition of the Hebrew. In death, human cords and childhood memories hold firmly. Finally, the Evangelists in their preaching and writing gave the psalm a new communal setting, weaving its phrases into their story of the Passion.

The long opening section is divided into seven units: vv. 2–3, introductory cry of agony; vv. 4–6, confession of faith; vv. 7–9, lament; vv. 10–11, prayer of confidence; v. 12, prayer; vv. 13–19, lament; and vv. 20–22, prayer.

Verses 2–3 and 20–22 form an inclusio by repeating three key words: distant, save or salvation, and hear. Translations sometimes appeal to the LXX for modifying the starkness of the Hebrew thought. Verse 2, "Distant from my salvation," and v. 22, "You hear me," are made to read "Distant from my outcry" and "my wretched self." The Greek version is less threatening to the theology that God always hears prayers. Keeping the Hebrew intact, one not only preserves the inclusio, an important Hebrew rhetorical device, but one also realizes that the transition to a prayer of thanksgiving (vv. 23–27) came from a silent perception of faith, "God hears!"

Three times repeating in vv. 4–6 "our ancestors trusted in you," the psalmist will not abandon faith, even though seemingly abandoned by God. Yet is the psalmist protesting too much and about to give up? It is difficult to distinguish the mystic darkness of faith (Ps. 139:11–12) from the black void of unbelief (1 Sam. 28:8–25; John 13:30).

Ridicule and shame besmear the psalmist in 22:7–9. He is like a worm (cf. Job 25:6). Though the ancestors were not shamed (Ps. 22:6), the psalmist definitely is and so is experiencing the reverse of what faith teaches. When v. 9 is paraphrased by the leaders against Jesus on the cross (Matt. 27:41–43), the Evangelist was associating Jesus with the devastated psalmist.

A series of metaphors in vv. 11–19 articulate physical and psychological pain. Therefore, it is better not to take literally "they pierce my hands and my feet" (v. 17b). In fact, the Hebrew does not support this reading but declares, "Like a lion [they maul] my hands and my feet." This phrase is never quoted in the passion narrative.

It is not at all surprising, as in vv. 23–27, for a psalmist who has endured extreme physical suffering and severe psychological onslaught on faith to align himself with the isolated outcasts of society. He invites the poor and lowly to a thanksgiving banquet. In vv. 28–32, the group is swelled by other outcasts: foreigners (v. 28), the sick, the dying and possibly the dead (v. 30), all excluded from public worship (Lev. 21; Deut. 23:2–9). If the dead are included in the invitation (the Hebrew text is uncertain), then these lines would not have been added until around 165 B.C. (cf. Dan. 12:1–3). Yet, if Psalm 22 circulated principally within popular religious circles, where belief in the afterlife was accepted more readily, then this final section could have originated much earlier.

Psalm 23. The early church sang Psalm 23 as the baptized person emerged from the font and proceeded into the newly illumined church for Eucharist. Contemporary churches turn to this psalm for Holy Communion and funerals, depending whether one stresses the early walk through darkness or the later banquet.

The psalm shows an overlay of covenant traditions about journeying through the wilderness and renewing the covenant; the release of an individual from trial (Ps. 121); the return from exile (Isa. 40:1–11; 41:10; Jer. 31:10); a liturgical ceremony of thanksgiving and sacred meal (Pss. 111; 118). If we keep the Hebrew reading of 23:6b, "I will return," the psalm is one of confidence; or if we follow the Greek and read "I will dwell," as in Ps. 27:4, the psalm turns into a thanksgiving.

In 23:1b–4, the language is metaphorical about the "Lord, my shepherd" (Gen. 49:24; Isa. 40:11; Ezek. 34:11–31; → Shepherd). Yet metaphors gradually give way to realistic expressions: "path of righteousness" or "straight path," depending whether one understands the phrase as symbolic or realistic; "valley of darkness" is still metaphorical in the first word, realistic in the second; "at my side" describes concretely Yahweh's continual presence. Ps. 23:5–6 describes a thanksgiving sacrifice and a sacred meal before returning home. Yahweh is no longer the shepherd but the host at home. The final phrase, "the path of one's days," recalls the way of obedience that leads to the promised land (Deut. 6) and interior rest (Ps. 95:11).

Psalm 24. One encounters in Psalm 24 an entrance liturgy far more elaborate than Psalm 15. Ps. 24:1–2 was sung during a solemn procession with the Ark through the city or countryside (Pss. 68; 132). Upon arrival at the “gates of justice” (Ps. 118:19), questions are asked to receive a repentant person and all Israel into full communion (Ps. 24:3; Num. 5:5–10). Finally, the Levites return the Ark to the Holy of Holies (Ps. 24:7–10). Questions and answers as well as solemn acclamations were sung by separate choirs.

Verses 1–2 recall the ancient cosmogony about the earth’s foundations upon underground “seas and . . . ocean currents” (Gen. 7:11; Exod. 20:4; Ps. 136:6; → Water).

In 24:3–6 the stable order of creation was not preserved by ritual but by a moral life. Prophetic influence may be detected here (Amos 4:4–5; 8:4–8; Hos. 4:1–3). “Who shall go up?” is a phrase that refers to Israel’s Exodus out of Egypt and to its pilgrimage to Jerusalem (Amos 3:1; Jer. 31:12; Ps. 122:4), which later rabbis ascribed to Moses’ ascent of Mount Sinai to receive the law (Exod. 19:3). With “clean hands and pure heart” one truly seeks the Lord, not some false god (Ps. 31:7). The Hebrew word “to seek” means to visit a sanctuary (Amos 5:5) and worship God (Amos 5:6) as well as to inquire into God’s ways (Ps. 9:11) and to repent (Ps. 78:34).

In 24:7–10 the language is militaristic, but in the sense of the “holy war” (Ps. 18:32–46) in which God alone wages war for Israel (Exod. 15:1–18), surrounded by the heavenly hosts (1 Sam. 4:4; Ps. 29:1).

Psalm 25. The alphabetical or acrostic arrangement of Psalm 25 is almost perfect. Each new line begins with the succeeding letter of the Hebrew alphabet, except that two letters are missing and two are doubled! Such an arrangement along with other didactic aspects suggests that this is a wisdom psalm. Yet, similar to Psalms 9–10, the overriding tone includes reference to sin and troubles, characteristic of the lament, thereby hinting that we have a blend of literary forms. Key words support this mixture: “Yahweh” is used ten times, to sustain the religious spirit; “shamed,” four times, for supplication; while the wisdom aspect is supported by the use of “way,” ten times, “to learn,” three times, and “the poor,” twice.

A clear development of thought is not evident, the absence of which is typical of a reflective piece where the purpose is wisdom, not logical achievement. An overarching chiasmic form (Ps. 19:2) is evident: 25:1, 22, calling upon Yahweh; vv. 2–3, 19–21, saved from the foes and not shamed; vv. 4–5, 16–18, following the path of Yahweh and the relief of heart’s tensions; vv. 6–7, 11–15, covenantal love; and at the center the covenantal love of Yahweh that leads in the right way, vv. 8–10.

The first major section (vv. 1–7) stresses the need to “wait” (Isa. 30:15–18); otherwise one will be shamed by sad results (Pss. 22:7–9; 44:10) and be in danger of breaking faith (Hab. 2:1–6). The directions for “the way” must be learned from God; they cannot be self-taught. People sinful from youth (Gen. 8:21; Job 13:26) make no claim except that based on God’s compassion (Jer. 31:1–6).

Ps. 25:8–10 is central because it repeats the key covenant formula of Yahweh’s “loving kindness and fidelity” (Exod. 34:6–7). The stereotypic phrase, Ps. 25:20, “I take refuge in you,” occurs frequently (Pss. 2:12; 7:2; 11:1). When in great anxiety, one can often do nothing more than repeat memorized formulas.

The conclusion (25:22) resides outside the alphabetical sequence, perhaps because it was to be sung antiphonally after each line.

Psalm 26. With continuous allusions to Temple ritual, Psalm 26 appears to be part of a ceremony for acceptance into the worshiping assembly (Pss. 15; 24). On the basis of 26:6–8, the author appears as a Levite, for a while under suspicion and banned from the altar (Pss. 42–43; 84).

Structurally, the psalm is carefully knit together: an inclusio and repetition of key words unites the entire psalm (26:1 and 11) and the lines of the introduction (vv. 1 and 3); the Hebrew text shows repeated chiasms (Ps. 19:2) especially in vv. 4–5; contrasts between the assembly of the righteous and of the wicked, between the person of the psalmist (first-person singular, twenty-nine times) and Yahweh; frequent verbs of walking and standing; the covenant virtues of love and fidelity (Exod. 34:6–7). After the introduction (Ps. 26:1–3), two stanzas juxtapose the assembly of the wicked with that of the just (vv. 4–7, 9–12).

“I walk in integrity” (v. 1) implies completion, sincerity, trustworthiness, all that is expected for calm and capable interaction within community and family (Pss. 18:26; 19:8a). Ps. 26:2 is close to Jeremiah’s protestation in the first of his confessions (Jer. 12:3) where the Lord responds (Jer. 12:5) with the expectation of still stronger trust. Like Psalm 16, the Lord is the only refuge for the psalmist. Ps. 26:3 repeats the covenantal virtues of “kindness and fidelity” (Exod. 34:6–7).

Ps. 26:4–5, 9–10 repeats the prophets’ demand for moral and social integrity if ritual is to be acceptable (Isa. 1; Mic. 3; cf. Matt. 12:6–13). Ps. 26:6–7 brings us fully into the Temple: ritual washing of hands (and feet) to symbolize cleanliness and trustworthiness (Exod. 30:17–21); processions around the altar (Pss. 68:25– 28; 118:27); and a thanksgiving sacrifice (Amos 4:5; Jon. 2:10).

Psalm 27. Two poems of confidence (vv. 1–6) and supplication (vv. 7–14) are so closely interwoven that it is difficult to know if they ever existed independently. Psalm 27 oscillates between longing for the Lord, awareness of a powerful enemy, and reaffirmation of one's trust in the Lord. While vv. 1–6 sound more strident in expressing confidence and in using military language, vv. 7–14 proceed more cautiously within community situations.

Each section moves toward and away from a center. Part One is as follows: v. 1, confession of trust in question form; vv. 2–3, answer; v. 4, the center of longing; v. 5, a new affirmation of trust; v. 6, reward for trust and Temple sacrifice. Part Two is as follows: v. 7, address to Yahweh; vv. 8–9, petition and longing; v. 10, the center of confessional trust; v. 11, petition for guidance; vv. 13–14, reward for trust and challenge to persevere.

In vv. 1–6 the presence of the Lord in Jerusalem's Temple does not depend upon the faith of the psalmist; rather, this faith depends upon the Lord's presence, initially understood as present in God's great deeds in Israel's history and then, symbolically, as these are celebrated anew in the Temple and in people's lives. "The Lord is my light" (v. 1). The phrase occurs only here in the OT (cf. John 8:12). Light has important roles: ceremonially (Exod. 25:31–40; 34:29–35; 40:34–38); prophetically (Isa. 10:17); and eschatologically (Zech. 14:7). Here it seems closer to the prophetic way of distinguishing integrity from deceit (on "evil people . . . devour my flesh," cf. Mic. 3:2–3). Language such as "dwell in the house of Yahweh each day of my life" and "to gaze," or, literally, "to behold a vision" through faith, indicates that with this faith the psalmist returns joyfully to the ritual of sacrifice and song (Ps. 27:6).

To seek the face of God (v. 8) was a stereotypical phrase that referred to visiting a sanctuary (Deut. 31:11; Ps. 42:3). The Canaanites thought it possible to behold the faces of the gods by looking at external images, but the Israelites did not. The psalmist was seeking, through faith, the interior and personal presence of the Lord (Pss. 24:6; 123:2). Forsaken by family (27:10; Jer. 12:6) and community (Ps. 27:12; Deut. 19:15–21), the psalmist prays in 27:12: "Do not give me over to the throat of my foes," that is, to the greed which dominates the life of the foes (Mic. 3:2–3). "Be strong-willed" repeats the encouragement of Josh. 1:6–18 for entering the promised land (cf. Hag. 2:4).

3) and was composed at least partially during a serious illness, which barred one from the sanctuary (Ps. 16; Lev. 21); it consists of lament (28:1–5) and thanksgiving for a cure (vv. 6–7). Verses 7–8, focusing upon the anointed king, may have been added after the cure of King Hezekiah (Isa. 38). The sequence from lament to thanksgiving or statement of confidence is normal.

In Ps. 28:1–5 God seems mute and deaf like the idols ridiculed in Ps. 115:5–6. The word "pit" or "grave" originally meant a quarry (Isa. 51:1), well, or cistern (Gen. 21:25, 30), which when empty became a place for detaining people (Jer. 38:6). The term also came to signify the abode of the dead, because of the dank, dark, and unhealthy conditions of these cisterns (Pss. 30:4; 88:7; Isa. 38:18). By contrast, "prayers . . . [like] hands are lifted up towards the Holy of Holies." "Prayers," the same word as in Ps. 22:2, conveys the shrill sound of urgency. Evil or rebellious people speak of peace mockingly (cf. Isa. 57:19b–21). Ps. 28:4–5 skillfully contrasts the deeds of the wicked and the kindly ones of the Lord; each has its own inevitable result of sorrow or blessing.

In vv. 6–7 it is not clear if the phrase "I give God thanks" refers to a thanksgiving sacrifice (Ps. 26:7) or to a song of praise. The former seems likely in view of the overall ritual setting. The Greek version of 28:7 enhances the notion of healing from sickness.

Psalm 29. Probably one of the earliest psalms, Psalm 29 appears as a significant link between several competing and at times hostile perceptions of God. Various similarities relate Psalm 29 with the Song of Moses (Exod. 15), the theophany of Mount Sinai (Exod. 19), and the enthronement of Yahweh in Psalms 46–48, 93, 96–99. In this psalm, Israel's theology seeks to surround Yahweh, the warrior God and Savior of the desert, with the glorious accoutrements of the creator God, who overcomes the chaotic forces of nature, prominent in Canaanite city temples. Exodus 15 and Psalm 29 do not have the theological and liturgical finesse of Psalms 46–48 or 96–99. Psalm 29 extends a bridge into the Canaanite world of Baal worship through several significant word parallels. Yet Psalm 29 actually parodies Baal worship since power and enthronement are granted exclusively to Yahweh (→ Baal).

A psalm of such majesty was headed for frequent use and adaptation. The LXX places it on the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:33–43) and relates it to the prayer for rain (Zech. 14:16–19). The Talmud linked it with the Feast of Weeks (Pentecost), which commemorated the giving of the law to Moses on Mount Sinai (Exod. 19). Psalm 29 may have made its own contribution to the story of Pentecost in Acts 2; it was sung by the early church for the ancient feasts of Pentecost, Epiphany, and Transfiguration.

Psalm 29 begins with a call to adore Yahweh (vv. 1–2); moves to the motivation for praise in a fearsome thunderstorm (vv. 3–4, 5–6, 8–9b; v. 7 is a later addition); and concludes with the enthronement of Yahweh (vv. 9c–11).

In vv. 1–2 “children of the gods,” a phrase drawn from Canaanite religion (Heb. bene ’elim), constitute the heavenly council of Yahweh (Gen. 6:2, 4; Job 1:6; Pss. 82:1; 89:6; 1 Kings 22:19), lesser gods subservient to Yahweh, an embarrassment when this line is quoted in Ps. 96:7 (where they become the “families of nations”). They are to ascribe “Glory!” to Yahweh, a word announcing the manifestation of Yahweh’s loving power in redeeming Israel, recognizable only through faith (Exod. 16:7; Ps. 81:17; → Glory).

One hears (29:3–9) the seven mighty claps of thunder (which the Hebrew word qol or “voice” can mean), splintering the cedars of Lebanon, sweeping the desert and its wadis or valleys into writhing swells of sand and roaring cataracts. The phrase in v. 8, midbar kadesh, occurs in Canaanite literature meaning “the awesome desert.” In Psalm 29, Israel changed kadesh from the adjective “awesome” to a proper name, designating the oasis of Kadesh-barnea far to its south, where the people encamped during the period of wandering the desert (→ Kadesh). The storm has thus been re-located south, making a half circle around the promised land, where the Israelites are at peace.

In vv. 9c–11 the Lord is enthroned “above the flood waters,” a word used elsewhere only in the Flood story (Gen. 6–9; Sir. 44:17) but here referring to the massive waters thought to reside above the earth (Ps. 148:4). From this heavenly temple, Yahweh imparts strength (an inclusio with v. 1) and shalom (Heb.), the wholeness of a happy, harmonious life. With the untamed storm, a glorious symphony fills the universe and echoes in the Jerusalem Temple.

Psalm 30. Once seriously sick, the psalmist offers thanksgiving for a return to health. At a much later period the title was expanded (something unusual in these early psalms) to refer to the dedication of the Second Temple in 515 B.C. Because the word “dedication” reads chanukah in Hebrew, some associate the title with 1 Macc. 4:52–59 and the rededication in 164 B.C., on a feast called Hanukkah. In both cases national mourning, like a serious sickness, ended. After thanksgiving by a solo voice (Ps. 30:2–4) and then the congregation (vv. 5–6), one hears in vv. 7–11 of sickness and prayer and in vv. 12–13 the conclusion.

Verses 16–30 show that this psalm followed the official theology that death was like slipping into silent oblivion (Pss. 6:6; 16:10), not the position of popular religion, which accepted some kind of personal existence after death (1 Sam. 28:8–25; 2 Kings 2:11). The Bible always associates healing with a message about Yahweh as savior, and therefore conversion from sin was a prerequisite, offered by a compassionate, faithful God (Hos. 7:1; 14:4–5). The Bible also looks upon sickness as a communal disease in which the sins of all the people affect one another (Hos. 6:1–3). Physical helps for healing were used (2 Kings 20:1–11). Ps. 30:5 may refer to a grateful memorial sacrifice.

In vv. 7–11 the first two verses seem textually corrupt, yet the general thought is that success is always a temptation to indifference toward God, especially for religious people. Arguing with God (v. 10) recalls the confessions of Jeremiah (Jer. 12:1–5). The Hebrew verbs in Ps. 30:12 permit a present-tense translation, so that sickness is completely out of the system: “you turn my lament into dancing” (Jer. 31:13).

Psalm 31. Psalm 31 is a complex psalm borrowing heavily from Jeremiah and other psalms; it shows that God does not always require artistic creativity as much as sincere fidelity, in this case of serious sickness and desertion by friends. The memory of sacred texts sustained this sick person: vv. 2–4a, identical with Ps. 71:1–3; v. 8b is similar to Ps. 10:14; v. 10a to Psalms 35; 38; 39; 71; v. 11b to Ps. 38:11; v. 13 to Jer. 22:8; v. 14 to Jer. 20:10; v. 18 to Jer. 17:18. This psalm is the first example of an anthological style with similarity to modern hymn writing.

The structure is unusual in that psalms generally begin with supplication and move into thanksgiving (Ps. 22). This one begins with confidence (vv. 2–9), drops into supplication, where the language is more graphic but also more derivative (vv. 10–19), follows with thanksgiving (vv. 20–23), and ends with a liturgical addition (vv. 24–25).

With extraordinary daring, possible only with the humble, the psalmist (vv. 9–11) challenges God to be faithful to the divine promises, which v. 4 identifies with the name or specific vocation of God towards Israel. The title, “my rock,” locates the psalmist at Jerusalem (Pss. 18:3; 95:1). Ps. 31:6 became Jesus’ final word from the cross (Luke 23:46), repeated again in the death scene of Stephen (Acts 7:59). Jesus too in severe agony could not be creative but found peace in sacred Scripture and the company of this psalmist. Ps. 31:8 completes the covenant formula about Yahweh, faithfulness (v. 2) and bonding love (Exod. 34:6–7). Though deserted by foes, neighbors, and friends, the psalmist thinks as a member of Israel.

As the psalm turns into supplication (vv. 10–19), the language shows more signs of borrowing. It begins with the classic call of lament (Ps. 51:3), "Have mercy on me," a word that recognizes distance and undeserved recognition; the appeal here is to God's concern for suffering people. Ps. 31:11b reads, "My strength drains away because of my sinfulness," which the Greek, Syriac, and most versions change to "because of my misery" by a slight variation of Hebrew letters. One should retain the Hebrew reading, not only because the more difficult reading is preferred as less likely to have been a correction, but also because of the connection of sickness with sin in the Bible (Ps. 30). Ps. 31:14 recalls the whispering crowd that threw back into Jeremiah's face as a nickname the threat that he had been calling down upon the nation: "Terror on every side" (Jer. 6:25; 20:3–4, 10).

The thanksgiving in Ps. 31:20–23 may have been a public sacrifice in the Temple, "the shelter of your presence." The psalmist hoped others would find their faith strengthened by his example. Verses 24–25 were added later from the repertoire of Temple thanksgiving services.

Psalm 32. The second of the seven penitential psalms (Ps. 6 was the first), recited by Ashkenazi Jews as night prayer on each Monday and by priests in the Greek church for personal purification before conferring baptism, Psalm 32 shows some of the repetitive qualities of Psalm 31; its didactic style removes some of the latter's intensity. Yet it rings with sincerity.

The psalm may have been an instruction at the Temple, composed by an individual whose spiritual and physical life changed as a result of a confession of sin. The development is as follows: vv. 1–2, introduction by Temple priest; vv. 3–7, edifying autobiography about the power of grace; vv. 8–10, instruction; and v. 11, liturgical addition.

The title announces this psalm as a "maskil," from a Hebrew word meaning "to be wise or skillful," ■ clue to the wisdom instruction to follow. "Happy is that one" recalls Psalm 1 and its wisdom characteristics. The vocabulary for sin and forgiveness in vv. 2–3 reminds one of Psalm 51. Divine forgiveness always presumes not only admission of faults, at times publicly if the offense was public, but also restitution (Num. 5:5–10). Paul quotes Ps. 32:1–2 about the futility of human works if one does not look to God for the grace to confess sin (Rom. 4:6–8).

From the autobiographical account in Ps. 32:3–7, one learns that the psalmist was physically ill (cf. Ps. 30 for the connection of sickness with sin). Once the psalmist stopped dissimulating and covering up, God extended a cover of forgiveness over the sins. Ps. 32:6–7 addresses a prayer of gratitude to God, equally a lesson for others. The final instruction in vv. 8–10 is spoken by the priest. On "senseless like the horse and mule," see Prov. 26:3; Sir. 30:8.

The final line of Ps. 32:9 is an awkward intrusion. Verse 10 expresses the orthodox position, especially prominent in the wisdom literature, that the wicked are punished and the virtuous are blessed. This statement does not harmonize well with Psalm 31.

Psalm 33. Because Psalms 1–2 were added later as a general introduction to the Psalter and Psalm 10 originally was a continuation of Psalm 9, Psalm 33, therefore, is the only orphan psalm without a title in the first book (Pss. 1–41). A late composition, it was attached here by a repetition of a key word, "exult," at the end of Psalm 32 and at the beginning of this psalm. Reasons for arguing postexilic authorship include "Sing a new song" in v. 3 (Isa. 42:10; Pss. 96:1; 98:1); a wisdom style, prominent in the postexilic age; and stereotypic phrases common with other late psalms (v. 1 and Ps. 97:12; v. 2b and Pss. 98:5; 147:7). Yet there are also touches of originality, which flow mostly from its oral composition: repetitions (33:1, 7, 9, 11) and the continual use of word pairs such as "spoke/commanded," "plan/design," and "nation/people." Most of all this psalm presents a theology of the divine word.

After the call to praise (vv. 1–3), an initial motivation is given from Yahweh's fidelity (vv. 4–5) and omnipotent word (vv. 6–7). This motivation extends to Yahweh's providential control: across the earth (vv. 8–12) and through human plans (vv. 13–19). The conclusion comes in vv. 20–22. The divine name Yahweh (thirteen times) and the covenant formula of mercy and fidelity keep the focus upon Israel, God's chosen people (v. 12).

The first stanza (vv. 1–7) opens with musical instruments echoing the symphony of heaven and earth (→Music). With this "new song," Yahweh is creating anew at the moment of worship; the final age is at hand. This psalm is not like most of wisdom literature, generally aloof toward Temple ceremony (Ps. 1; Prov. 10–31). Ps. 33:4–7 places the universe within the covenantal kindness and fidelity of the Lord (Exod. 34:6–7).

In Ps. 33:8–12 one observes an earth teeming with people, all within the embrace of Yahweh's loving concern and strong control. The people Israel (vv. 11–12) are chosen forever because they have a role in the eternal plan of Yahweh (cf. Rom. 9:1–5; 11:25–36). Implications for world salvation are not developed as they are in Isaiah 40–66 and Jonah.

Heaven is not a silent retreat where the deity resides at a remove from humanity; Yahweh is continually looking down (Ps. 33:13) on everyone (v. 14), even into each human heart (v. 15). Not even kings are exempt (v. 16). Like most OT literature, the psalm does not extend God's plans beyond any person's lifetime (v. 19; Pss. 6:6; 30).

The psalm closes in 33:20–22 with the classic vocabulary of confidence. It does not center upon musical instruments as in the introduction, or upon plans and interaction as in the body of the psalm, but upon the person of Lord. Verse 22 contributed the final words to the ancient classic Christian hymn, Te Deum.

Psalm 34. Psalm 34 is another acrostic poem like Psalms 9–10 and 25, but in it the alphabetic sequence is almost perfect, except that the letter waw is missing and 34:23 was added both to complete the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet and to ensure a happy ending. After a hymnic introduction (vv. 2–4), the first major section gratefully narrates the Lord's intervention to save (vv. 5–11) and the second provides typical wisdom instruction (vv. 12–23).

The title (v. 1), one of few lengthy ones in the first book of the Psalter, is curious with historical inaccuracy. The Philistine king's name was not Achimelech but Achish, an error due to the similarity of b and ch in Hebrew writing. Therefore, the title evolved during the written, not the oral stage. According to 1 Sam. 21:11–16, David pretended to be insane (lit., acted in bad taste) and showed himself a madman (enthusiastically beyond control). The first of these verbs shows up in Ps. 34:9 in the positive sense, "taste and see . . ."; the second verb in v. 4, again positively as "glorify the Lord." Because of these words the editors found a way to put a very late psalm under the patronage of David.

The opening phrase in vv. 2–11, "I will bless," recognizes God's gracious, strong presence in life, generally expressed liturgically, for instance, in a sacred meal (Exod. 18:10–12). Ps. 34:3 begins a series of references to a person oppressed, afflicted, and troubled but now thanking God for deliverance. The phrase "angel of the Lord" (v. 8) is generally a circumlocution for simply saying "the Lord" (so Gen. 31:11–13; Exod. 3). Angels appear in the Bible to unite earth with activity in the heavenly court (Zech. 3:1–10) and to surround God's servants with care (Josh. 5:14; 2 Kings 6:17). This reference to supernatural protection is unusual for wisdom literature and more in accord with Israel's popular piety, which believed the world was inhabited by good and evil spirits (Ps. 91; → Angel; Angel of the Lord).

The characteristics of wisdom literature come to the fore in 34:12–23, with an address to children or pupils common in all ancient wisdom literature (Prov. 1:8; 2:1). Ps. 34:12–16 constitutes one of the longer quotations of the OT in the NT in a context calling for a patient response to insult (1 Pet. 3:10–12). The necessity of patiently persevering through trials (Ps. 34:16–20) will be stressed ever more in the NT (Heb. 12:6, 12). "Not a bone shall be broken" in Ps. 34:21 may be the text cited in John's passion narrative (John 19:36).

Psalm 35. A long, somewhat monotonous and repetitive psalm, Psalm 35 stems from an individual who oscillates between sorrow, anger, curse, and thanksgiving, between narrative and intercession. Some of the lines are rapid and direct (vv. 21–24) with vigorous images (vv. 5–8) and strong emotions (vv. 13–16). The Hebrew text is not well preserved, overloaded perhaps with glosses and corrections, so that translations differ in their reconstruction. If God can speak through an ungifted though religiously inspired person (cf. Ps. 31), likewise God's normative word can come through canonical texts damaged in transmission. In either case one may be uncertain about the precise meaning and yet be spiritually moved by the overall attitude and general message. The simplest, unadorned answer, in broken accents, becomes heroic in the actual setting of life's tragedies.

Because of the circuitous, emotional response, some think of Jeremiah as a source for the psalmist (Jer. 18:18–23; 20:10–13). The psalmist enters no proof of innocence; it is enough that God knows. Unlike Psalms 6 and 31, there is no mention of sickness.

The psalm is divided according to the enemy and the type of image: 35:1–10, images of warfare and the hunt, against impostors; vv. 11–18, images of mourning, against ingrates; and vv. 19–28, images of legal procedure, against perfidious people.

In v. 1, the demand, "Take up my [legal] case, Lord," exhibits a person confident of innocence before human and divine tribunals. "I myself [no other] am your salvation" (v. 3) emphasizes the personal response of Yahweh. The word "salvation" ought to be taken in its original meaning, to liberate by removing barriers and providing space for the psalmist simply to live again. In vv. 7–8 the example of the lex talionis (Lat., "law of retribution"), "an eye for an eye . . ." (Exod. 21:23–25; Ps. 7:16), does not vindicate vendettas and revenge but states a law of reality: we become in our heart and facial features as well as in the events of life what we think and do. Violence breeds violence. Liars are caught in the web of their own lies.

The types of mourning cited in 35:11–18 were not sanctioned officially in Israel's manuals for ritual (Exod. 25–31; Lev. 1–9; 16; 23–24), until after the Exile. God was the God of the living, not of the dead. Sackcloth was donned for public mourning apart from worship at the Temple (Gen. 37:34; 2 Sam. 3:31). Fasting is not even explicitly mentioned for Yom Kippur in Leviticus 16, but fasting with sackcloth was undertaken privately by David at the death of his son (2 Sam. 12:16). When Moses fasted, it was rather in awesome trembling before the wonder of the divine presence (Exod. 34:27–28), not out of a sense of sinfulness. During and after the Exile, fasting was prescribed for all Israel on fixed days commemorating national calamities (Joel 1–2; Zech. 7:1–14; → Fasting). This psalm then, through prophetic influence, is to be associated with the people's popular religion rather than with official Judaism. "I prayed with bowed head" accurately communicates for us what the Hebrew declares more poignantly: "My prayer returns to my bosom or heart." Ps. 35:15–16 is severely damaged textually.

In vv. 17–26 the psalmist entreats God to move from inertia to activity, from silence to a verdict against the oppressors (Ps. 44:24–27). Too long have they been ridiculing God's justice by abusing the psalmist. Ps. 35:27–28 provides thanksgiving after a proper verdict from the Lord.

Psalm 36. Yahweh's mercy and fidelity, the core covenant intuitions (Exod. 34:6–7), are viewed either as repudiated by the wicked (Ps. 36:2–5 and 11–13) or as celebrated by the faithful (vv. 6–10). Yahweh as Lord of the covenant is the sole remedy to universal injustice.

In vv. 2–5 the opening phrase is most unusual: "The oracle of the wicked" (cf. the beginning of Ps. 110, where the phrase "oracle of Yahweh" occurs). The sinner, by opposing God, thinks to be godlike. Ps. 36:2b is quoted by Paul in a chain of OT passages (Rom. 3:10–18). Ps. 36:5 reminds one of Mic. 2:1–2, where wicked people, complacently lying on their couches at night, plot ways to satisfy their greed; then with the break of day they seize whatever they want. Words like "understand" (Ps. 36:4) and "way" (v. 5) are telltale signs of wisdom influence (cf. Ps. 1; Prov. 1:10–18; 10:5).

Ps. 36:6–10 offers a celebration of Yahweh's covenant presence. The Lord's kindness and fidelity (Exod. 34:6–7) reach into the heavens; the Lord knows no limits in arranging everything for the sake of the chosen people Israel. This idea returns almost verbatim in Ps. 57:11 and echoes in the preaching of Second Isaiah, Isaiah 40–55 (Isa. 40:12–14), and in Ps. 139:7–10. In all these cases, the writer appears to be in severe crisis. These are the occasion either for destroying faith or for extending it beyond the limits of previous theological statements. Ps. 36:8–10 is recited by Ashkenazi Jews as they put on the tallith or prayer shawl. For "shadow of your wings" in v. 8, see Ps. 17:8. "River of your delights" (v. 9) was later taken as a reference to paradise; the word for "delights" stems from the same root as does the word "Eden." The image of light is often linked with water as here, "In your light we see light." These images occur in Jeremiah (2:13; 17:13), where Yahweh is the "fountain of living water," and in the Gospel of John: "fountain . . . leaping up to provide eternal life" (4:14) and "I am the light of the world"

(9:5). Understandably, Ps. 36:9–10 came to be used for the blessing of a baptismal font.

Verses 11–14 are a fitting conclusion that alludes again to the covenantal qualities of kindness and fidelity and to the arrogance of the wicked and their downfall.

Psalm 37. This acrostic Psalm 37, like Psalms 9–10, 25, and 34, perfectly executes its sequence of letters. It shares many key themes with Deuteronomy, like the possession of the land (Ps. 37:3, 9, 11) as well as blessings and curses for the obedient and disobedient (vv. 22, 37–38), only here the focus has passed from the nation Israel to the individual Israelite. This fact favors a date in the postexilic period when the interests and possibilities of Israel shrank considerably from where they were in the pre-exilic days of royalty. This transfer of the question of retribution to the individual turned out to be a conspicuous aspect in wisdom literature. If one compares Psalm 37 with other wisdom pieces, one finds that unlike Proverbs it does not seek to form disciples and unlike Job it does not seek to solve problems. Rather it provides points for meditation and for preaching within the postexilic assembly. The author was an elder sage (v. 25).

On the question of retribution the author displays the good sense to avoid stereotyped simplicity. Despite a hewing of the traditional position (vv. 1–2, 25), other verses recognize that neither are the virtuous immediately blessed nor are the wicked quickly reduced to disgrace (vv. 7–9, 12, 35). Neither does the psalmist take the next step and seek a final solution after death (Pss. 1, 49, 139).

The development within the psalm is not clear. One may detect an introduction (vv. 1–9) and a conclusion (vv. 34–40) by the frequent use of the imperative mood. In the central part, one observes the ruin of the impious (vv. 10–15), prosperity as the gift of Yahweh (vv. 16–26), and a return to fidelity (vv. 27–33). Logically, one can begin almost anywhere and proceed in any direction. This poem is not so much instruction or proof as quiet meditation. Nor is it mysticism for saints—it centers on earthly problems, temptations, and occasional lapses.

"Do not fret," or stir with anger and frustration (v. 1)—such is not proper for the calm attitude expected of a sage! "Let your confidence be in the Lord and do what is good" (v. 3) gives a fine balance between interior trust and external action. "Delight in the Lord" (v. 4) puts a proper stress upon delicate sensitivity (Isa. 58:14). In Ps. 37:13, "the Lord laughs," as in Ps. 2:4, but nonetheless this is a rare attitude for God in the Bible. The foolish, egotistic pretensions of the wicked are too amusing to be taken seriously. This smile is like that of the elderly grandparent at the feverish activities of youth. (For the lex talionis in v. 15, see the commentary above on Ps. 35:8.) Jeremiah develops a similar theme. Sin always brings suffering; suffering can be disciplinary and redemptive, depending on one's attitude (Jer. 2:19; 5:25; 30:11; 31:18). Laws regulating debtors (Ps. 37:21) are frequently enough discussed in the OT: 2 Kings 4:1; Amos 2:6; and 8:6. Interest rates were staggering (see commentary above on Ps. 15:4-5). The phrase in 37:27, "to dwell forever," applies to one's offspring. In fact, the Hebrew word "to dwell" denotes a tent, not a permanent type of home (Ps. 15:1; 2 Sam. 7:5-7). In Ps. 37:28, "his faithful ones" derives from the covenant word in Hebrew for loving mercy, chesed. Wisdom literature, however, as in Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes generally, refers neither directly to the covenant nor to other aspects of Israel's history and worship. The ending (v. 40) is similar to other psalms in the first book (Pss. 2:12; 7:1; 11:1), perhaps a deliberate way of incorporating this poem into the collection.

Psalm 38. The third of the seven penitential psalms, recited as evening prayer on the third day of the week by the Ashkenazi Jews, is not exceptional in style; it is repetitive and stereotyped. Yet it looms powerfully before us because of its intense recital of physical pain and emotional isolation and because of its honest acceptance of responsibility (vv. 5, 19). Unlike Job, the psalmist does not argue his innocence but simply pleads for human recognition and compassion.

All indications point to leprosy, which breaks out with oozing sores (vv. 4, 6, 8), blinds the eyes (v. 11), and distorts the limbs (vv. 4, 7). Lepers were quarantined and prohibited from mingling in ancient society (v. 12; Lev. 13). They were "no-persons," no longer a spouse, parent, or child, with no national or religious identity (cf. Luke 17:11-19). Like the dead, they were isolated even from God (Ps. 6:6).

The author must have ruminated upon ancient prayers in leprous solitude: parts of 38:5, 6, 12, and all of 19-20 reflect Psalm 35; v. 2 from Ps. 6:2; vv. 21-22 from Ps. 22:2, 12, 20. From these biblical prayers the leper was encouraged to present a new plea before the Lord and before the society of Israel. The psalmist was convinced that God was concerned about a person's physical ugliness and moral guilt as well as about society's taboos and banishment.

This prayer of supplication can be divided as follows: 38:2-3, call for help; vv. 4-11, serious sickness; vv. 12-21, isolation and even persecution; and vv. 22-23, repeated call for help.

The title in v. 1, "for remembrance," indicates that this psalm was received into Temple liturgy, possibly for the readmission of cured lepers (Lev. 14). The phrase refers to a liturgical practice of remembering the name of the Lord at sacrifices (Ps. 70). The Aramaic Targum specifies a daily offering (Lev. 2:2), the Greek an offering for the Sabbath (Lev. 24:7).

The request in v. 2, "chastise me not angrily," implies suffering that disciplines and purifies (Jer. 2:19; Isa. 53:5). The psalmist begs that it be done with minimum wrath. "Arrows" indicate the piercing sharpness of the pain; they may also be associated with the sense of being under a curse from evil spirits (Ps. 91:5; or 1 Sam. 18:10, where the text speaks of a "divine evil spirit").

In Ps. 38:4-11 the sickness seems to correspond to leprosy. The severity is intensified by the pounding of the heart (vv. 9, 11) and a consuming fever (v. 8). Yet the psalmist is able to direct "all my desire" toward the Lord. In v. 6 the sufferer does not argue against personal guilt and foolishness (Ps. 107:17; Prov. 24:9). The word for "sores" is from a root that means to unite, here with hostile forces that strike blows and cast spells. The verb in v. 9, "I roar from anguished heart," is generally used of lions (Ps. 22:14).

Even "those [once] loving me . . . stand at a distance" (38:12) with devices to keep the psalmist far away (v. 13), so that the leper neither hears nor is able to converse (vv. 14-15). Verses 16-21 pursue the reasons why Yahweh should cross the barrier into unclean territory and intervene.

The conclusion (vv. 22-23) calls upon a key word of Psalm 22, "Be not distant" (vv. 2, 12, 20), and begs God not irreverently, only with urgency, to "hurry" (Ps. 22:20).

Psalm 39. The piety of Psalm 39 seems highly individual, even if the title, in attributing it to "Jeduthun," links it with one of the guilds of psalm writers for worship (2 Chron. 5:12; 35:15-19). To Jeduthun are attributed two other exquisite compositions (Pss. 62:1; 77:1). These, with Psalm 39, may have offered a more quiet or reflective type of worship.

Psalms speak often enough of the brevity of life, but only here do they ask God for peaceful insight into its meaning. Psalm 39 is not blindly accepting whatever happens; it struggles, even with the danger of rash questioning, though it prays to be spared such a fault. As with Psalm 16 and frequently with the confessions of Jeremiah (12:1-5; 15:10-21; 20:7-18) and dramatically with the songs of the suffering servant (Isa. 49:4), security is not obtained by answers from God, certainly not by gifts from God, but only in personal bonding with the Lord.

After an introductory apology for speaking (Ps. 39:2-4), the psalmist reflects on the inconsistency of life (vv. 5-7) and poignantly petitions God for assistance (vv. 8-12). The psalm concludes with supplication (vv. 13-14).

If the psalmist intends (vv. 2-4) to trust

God, then silence is appropriate. Verse 3b is variously translated; it probably had to be heard in its abruptness to be understood: "I kept silent without any good." The insolence of the wicked had blown the flames of dissatisfaction red-hot in the heart, and one hears the desperate cry to God: "To my weeping do not be deaf" (v. 13; Ps. 22:2-3).

After an initial prayer for insight (39:5), there follows, it seems, an acceptance of life's transitoriness (v. 6a). Yet the Hebrew word begins three lines with the very abrupt word 'ak, as though the previous statement is inadequate even if found frequently in the OT (Pss. 62:10; 90:3-6; Job 7:6-10; Eccles. 5:9-16). The psalmist follows the traditional position that after death no personal existence is assured (Ps. 6:6).

The psalmist (39:8-12) begs God for deliverance, simply by being with him. Strong, dissenting forces merge: peace from waiting upon the Lord, a sense of sin and of deserving the punishment, panicking at being dissolved into nothing, and confessing that punishment chastens and purifies.

Verses 13-14 allude to earlier lines in the psalm (vv. 5-8). The conclusion gets nowhere. The psalmist makes contradictory requests: "hear my prayer" and "turn away!" Yet such contradiction may be sustained in God's presence.

Psalm 40. In Psalm 40, an editor in the post-exilic age stitches together two earlier psalms (the second of these occurs identically in Psalm 70), drawing upon the experience of the Exile to state that the Temple and its sacrifices are not absolutely necessary, only very helpful, as Israel seeks to rebuild the Temple and reconstitute worship. In uniting a psalm of thanksgiving (40:2-12) with one of supplication (vv. 14-18)—actually an unusual sequence—and adding a transitional v. 13, the inspired editor has produced a new work, stressing dependency upon God for authentic Temple worship.

The opening song of thanksgiving in vv. 2-12 reads better stylistically if vv. 7-9 are deleted, yet their presence strengthens the need of interior attitudes for proper worship. Waiting upon the Lord (v. 2) implies that a dark period continues, as one waits patiently and expectantly (Isa. 25:9; 40:31). Second Isaiah (Isa. 42:10) and the time of the Exile (Ps. 33:3) provide the context for the "pit of destruction" and the time for a "new song." National resurgence corresponds with the individual's moment of being rescued, possibly from serious sickness (Ps. 30:3-4). Ps. 40:4 announces a community festival at which Psalm 40 is to be sung. Verse 5 warns against false worship, certainly a danger in postexilic Israel (Isa. 56:9-57:13; Ps. 16), a danger wherever ritual and ceremony have high priorities. The formula "happy that one" shows the touch of wisdom literature (Ps. 1:1; 32:1), which continues in v. 6, recognizing a divine mystery even in the most meticulous ordering of life (Prov. 8:22-31; Sir. 43:28-33). This verse may also allude to the "wondrous deeds" of Israel's history, reenacted in sanctuary worship (Deut. 5:1-5; 26:1-11).

Ps. 40:7-9 interrupts the sanctuary hymn of thanksgiving to introduce a strong prophetic warning against excessive ritual and formal religion (1 Sam. 15:22-23; Isa. 1:10-16; Mic. 6:6-8; Jer. 7). The major types of sacrifice are enumerated: "sacrifice," an all-purpose word; "oblation," generally of grain (Lev. 6:7-16); "holocaust," an act of adoration in which the entire offering is consumed by fire (Lev. 1); "sin offering," a ritual after the offense has been confessed and restitution has been made (Num. 5:5-10; → Worship).

The phrase "ears you have dug [or pierced or opened] for me" refers to a procedure by which a slave's ears were pierced at a sanctuary as a sign of perpetual servitude to the master (Exod. 21:5-6; Deut. 15:12-18) and that was understood metaphorically as obedience to the Lord (Prov. 28:9; Isa. 50:4-5). The passage was translated very differently in the Greek, "a body you have given to me," to be picked up in Heb. 10:5-7 for Christ's obedient offering of himself on the cross, which removed the necessity of all other sacrifices. In Ps. 40:9 the law within the heart alludes to a long sequence of texts, all insisting upon the interior attitude necessary for covenant and worship (Deut. 6:4-9; Jer. 31:31-34; Ezek. 36:26-27; Ps. 37:31).

Ps. 40:10-11 returns to the community assembly in the Temple commemorating its covenant with the Lord. Verse 12 ends the hymn of thanksgiving, referring to the covenant of "love and fidelity" (Exod. 34:6-7), whereas Ps. 40:13 functions as a transition to the prayer of supplication that follows.

Verses 14-18 (identical with Ps. 70) express the powerlessness of people left to themselves. Those who seek the Lord in community worship (40:17; 27:8) ought not to be shamed by the ridicule and success of wicked people. It is sufficient to be held within the strong gaze of the Lord.

Psalm 41. The prayer of a sick person, Psalm 41 is a psalm of supplication transformed into one of confidence by a new introduction and conclusion. The complicated structure exhibits a long history before its final editing. We are dealing as much with an inspired tradition as with a single inspired author. The psalm follows a chiasmic structure (see commentary above on Ps. 19:2): A didactic introduction and prayer of confidence, 41:2–4; B prayer of the psalmist, v. 5; C words of the enemy, vv. 6–8; C' words of the enemy, vv. 9–10; B' prayer of the psalmist, v. 11; A' didactic conclusion with Temple worship, vv. 12–13. Verse 14 functions as a conclusion to the first book of the Psalter (see Pss. 72:18–19; 89:53; 106:48; 150).

In Ps. 41:2 the exclamation “Happy that one,” occurs for the first time since the opening psalm. This person “is solicitous for the poor,” a word conspicuous in wisdom literature for careful regard and resultant insight. “Not hand him over to the life [or greed or curse] of his enemy”: the word for life (nepesh) can mean throat and hence greed, but because of vv. 7 and 8, it may carry a curse from the enemy. Biblical people lived dynamically in the world of spirits and demons; blessings and curses were taken seriously (→ Demon; Devil).

The prayer (v. 5) combines a sense of sin with sickness (Ps. 30). Ps. 41:6–8, 9–10 permits the enemies to speak for themselves; the sins that inflict sickness are those of the larger world. The biblical concept of sickness linked it at once with community responsibility and community offenses. In vv. 8–9, “whisper” can refer to casting a spell (Ps. 58:6), and “a deadly thing” reads, literally, “a word of Beliyyaal,” possibly hinting at a demonic curse. Sickness involved the evil world not only of people but also of devils (→ Magic and Divination). The betrayal of close associates (41:10) reminds one of Jer. 12:6; the line is quoted in the passion narrative in reference to Judas Iscariot (John 13:18).

After a prayer, wisdom style picks up again in Ps. 41:11–13 with its theory of retribution: the evil are punished and the good are rewarded by God. “Stand before you” refers to Temple worship. The psalm may have been an offering at the sanctuary from a sick person now restored to health who is now repaying a vow (Neh. 10:35–36; 13:31).

Book Two

In Books Two and Three we meet two new guilds of composers: Korah (Pss. 42–49; 84–85; 87–88) and Asaph (Pss. 50; 73–83). Both groups functioned prominently at the postexilic Temple (1 Chron. 16:5, 37; 2 Chron. 5:12; 20:19), although Asaph sustained a prominent position while Korah seems to have been demoted to gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:1, 19) and baker of sacred bread (1 Chron. 9:31–32). This loss may be reflected in the melancholic tone of the first psalm in the two collections of Korah. Korah psalms at times reflect a more pensive or sensitive author, nonreligious wisdom (Pss. 45; 49), as well as the exalted praise of Zion (Pss. 46–48). Asaph psalms appear more vigorous, self-confident, and historical (Pss. 50; 78).

The “Elohist Psalter” begins here with the psalms of Korah and extends to the end of the Asaph psalms (Ps. 83). The name for God is generally Elohim instead of Yahweh, which otherwise dominates the psalms.

Psalms 42–43. Two psalms in enumeration but one in structure, Psalms 42–43 share a refrain at the end of each of three stanzas. The pen of a master poet is exhibited here: in the intricate structure, the correspondence of imagery and mood, the play on words and sounds, and the momentum forward. Ps. 42:2–6 places us, timid and afraid, in desert terrain, thirsty, saddened in personal exile by the memories of Temple worship. Ps. 42:7–11 transports us, scorned by enemies, absorbed in suffering, strong and affirmed, to mountains that roar with mighty, even destructive waterfalls. Ps. 43:1–5 directs our gaze to future hopes, into a sanctuary flooded with light, pure and clean after the rains.

The language and images in the elegy (42:2–6) evoke memories of Temple worship. The psalmist is “athirst” not just for the Lord but also for the Temple, where the Lord’s bountiful presence was symbolized by water (Ps. 46:5; Ezek. 47). Ps. 42:3b originally read, “When will I go and see the face of God,” an expression for visiting a sanctuary (Deut. 31:11; Ps. 27:4) derived from the Canaanites who had material figures of their deities. Later a scribe corrected the reading, “When will I go and be seen before God,” for no one can see God and live (Exod. 33:20). Sacred meals are recalled, now only a memory of tears. “I pour out my soul” expresses sorrow drawn from the ritual of pouring water (1 Sam. 7:6; Isa. 57:6). The refrain (Ps. 42:6, 12; 43:5) shifts the meaning of Hebrew words: “the multitude” in 42:5 now describes “the tumultuous” soul; the word for worship modulates into being “downcast.”

In 42:6–12 the geography is that of upper Galilee at the base of Mount Hermon, snow-capped year round, with waterfalls and gushing springs. Water is now destructive, and the psalmist uses a Hebrew word, tehom, which summons images of the sea monster Tiamat and the angry depths of the sea (cf. Ps. 89:10–11). Yet Mount Hermon turns up small in comparison to the (religiously) exalted heights of Mount Zion (Ps. 68:16–17). The melodies of the Temple begin to return (42:9).

In 43:1–5, the psalmist experiences a public vindication from the Lord, who allows this member of the Korah guild to return to Jerusalem, "your holy hill" (Pss. 2:6; 3:5), to participate in the worship and to bask in the light of God's face (Pss. 31:17; 44:4). Light indeed bursts out as the dominant motif in this third stanza. "God, my God" originally read "Yahweh, my God" before the phrase was changed for the Elohist Psalter.

Psalm 44. A communal lament composed after a serious military defeat, Psalm 44 could fit into various occasions: when King Jehoshaphat (873–848 B.C.) was faced with an Edomite invasion from the south and ordered fasting and public prayer (2 Chron. 20); when the Assyrians finally left Judah with Jerusalem alone intact and the rest of the country in ruins during the reign of Hezekiah (727–698 B.C.; 2 Kings 18:13–19:37); or at the tragic death of King Josiah in 609 B.C. (2 Chron. 35:20–25). The psalm begins in hymnic style with a creed confessing God's great redemptive acts for Israel (Ps. 44: 2–9); a community lament challenges the faith (vv. 10–17); a reflective meditation follows (vv. 18–23); and finally there is a prayer for help (vv. 24–27).

Verses 2–9 provide a chant for a large choir, except for vv. 5 and 7 in the singular for solo voices and v. 9 a refrain to be sung repeatedly by the congregation. Other stylistic flourishes add strength, such as the repetition of the emphatic Hebrew word ki, "indeed," three times in v. 4. The language reflects the "holy war" fought on Israel's behalf by the Lord (cf. Ps. 18:32–46).

In 44:10–17 the creed is reversed; even the vocabulary used in v. 8 is introduced into v. 11 in reverse meaning. Evidently creeds and theology have their limits! Not that they are wrong, but the mystery of God extends beyond the bounds of human speech (cf. Rom. 11:33–36). "Sheep for the slaughter" is a very common phrase; Jer. 11:19; 12:3; Zech. 11:4, 7. In Ps. 44:16 a solo voice rings out over the words of the large choir.

Verses 19–23 are like Job in miniature, reflecting upon useless and undeserved suffering. The psalmist will speak to God (vv. 18–20, 23) and in between insert words about God (vv. 21–22). Verse 23 is cited by Paul, who then declares that one can overcome even death "because of him who loved" (Rom. 8:35–36). A similar answer occurs at the end of the psalm.

In Ps. 44:24–27 the psalmist dares to challenge God to "Arise! Why are you asleep!" For God to sleep, especially in times of Israel's serious need, contradicts Ps. 121:4 and 1 Kings 18:27. God hides (Pss. 10:11; 13:2) and forgets (Ps. 10:12)—a deaf and dumb deity (Ps. 22:2–3). The psalmist's final appeal is to God's loving and faithful kindness, the technical phrase for the covenant (Exod. 34:6–7). The solution lies not in victory but in a strong, even mystical union between God and Israel.

Psalm 45. As a nonreligious marriage song, Psalm 45 is the only such example in the Psalter and, as such, is capable of comparison with the Song of Songs. Composed for a royal marriage, the psalm leaves one undecided about time and locale. Some favor the Northern Kingdom with its ivory elegance at Samaria (v. 9; 1 Kings 22:39; Amos 3:15; 6:4) and its contact with Tyre and Sidon (Ps. 45:13; 1 Kings 16:31).

Ancient rabbinical and early church writers consistently recognized here an announcement of the messianic king. The Aramaic Targum addresses this ode to the "Messiah King." The psalm draws many of its images and words from Isaiah's remarks about the promised king and the future kingdom of God: beauty (Isa. 33:17); warrior (9:5); justice (11:5); humble (11:4); and oil of gladness (61:3). The symbolic interpretation, moreover, of perceiving the relation between God and Israel like that of spouses in marriage derives from the prophet Hosea and continues throughout the OT and NT (Hos. 2:21–22; Isa. 54; Matt. 9:15; John 3:29; Eph. 5:22–33; Rev. 21:1–2). The human situation, here of marriage, is not only found worthy of modeling the divine, but the human institution is also challenged anew to live up to a divine ideal.

Psalm 45 includes a rather elegant introduction (v. 2) and conclusion (vv. 17–18) and centers upon the bridegroom (vv. 3–10) and the bride (vv. 11–16). According to the title, the psalm is to be sung according to the melody of the song "Lilies." The introduction in v. 2 is every bit as solemn as that for Psalms 49 and 78. The poet sings excitedly, majestically.

The bridegroom in 45:3–10 is acclaimed principally as king. Surrounded with power and dignity, he is to protect the poor and secure justice against any opposing or deviant forces whether at home or abroad. "Your throne, O God" in v. 7 could be equally well translated "your most honorable throne"; the Hebrew word 'elohim can be considered an adjective of majestic grandeur or awesome power: Gen. 1:2, where the "spirit of God" is sometimes translated "a mighty wind," or 1 Sam. 18:10, which reads, literally, "a divine evil spirit," namely, "an overwhelming, preternatural evil force." Ivory luxury (Ps. 45:9) reminds us of the northern capital of Samaria (Amos 3:15; 6:4), though Solomon's throne was inlaid with ivory (1 Kings 10:18) and Tyre was known for trafficking in ivory (Ezek. 27:15). The queen mother (Ps. 45:10) stood at the king's right hand. While wives remained hidden in the royal harem, the queen mother enjoyed rather free access to the king (1 Kings 1:11–14). Ophir was a region in southern Arabia and a supplier of fine gold (1 Kings 9:28; 10:11).

Ps. 45:11–16 provides another impressive introduction. "Forget your people" inculcates more than loyalty to the husband; the foreign princess is not to import foreign religious beliefs and practices (1 Kings 11:1–10). Ps. 45:12 implies honor as given to divinity (see v. 7 above); kings represented all Israel in their role as children or firstborn of God (Pss. 2:7; 110:3; Isa. 9:5).

The concluding praise in Ps. 45:17–18 is reserved for the king and bridegroom. The last line imparts a religious blessing.

Psalm 46. Psalm 46 is the first in a trilogy praising God for Jerusalem and its Temple and also served as the inspiration for Martin Luther's hymn, "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God." The composition of the psalm may have sprung from the seemingly miraculous deliverance of Jerusalem from the cruel Assyrian army (701 B.C.; 2 Kings 18:13–19:36). This psalm, like Psalm 48, contains many mythological, Canaanite references honoring the creator, who struggled against chaotic forces to bring and keep peace (Isa. 51:9–10; Ps. 89:10–11). Mythology and history merge here. As historical details of Judah and Assyria drop away, the focus is on Yahweh's supreme, creative presence with Israel.

Psalm 46 divides neatly into vv. 2–4, praise of Yahweh-Creator in mythological language; vv. 5–8, praise of Jerusalem in historical terms; and vv. 9–12, praise of God with almost mystical awe. The Hebrew places the refrain only after the last two sections, allowing it to focus explicitly on Israel's religion.

Verses 2–4 reflect the land of Canaan as always open to invaders from desert and sea (cf. Ps. 29). Mythology, wrong in its false identification of deity, nonetheless rightly enabled Israel to appreciate the mysterious power of Yahweh's protection.

In 46:5–8 the monstrous force of water is tamed to become a stream, joyfully flowing with life from the Lord's presence in the Temple (Isa. 66:12; Ezek. 47; Zech. 14:8–9). The language is religious metaphor, for no springs actually flowed from the altar. This motif probably derives from a ritual of pouring water at the Temple (Ps. 42:5). The metaphor was expanded to visualize the garden of paradise at the Temple (Gen. 2:10; Isa. 33:17–24; Sir. 24). The reference to the break of morning (Ps. 46:6) may allude to the departure of the Assyrian army (2 Kings 19:35) and, symbolically, to the end of night's dangers (Ps. 91:5). The refrain (46:8) links the psalm with Isaiah through the titles "God of Jacob" (more than fifty times in Isaiah) and "God with us" (Heb. 'immanu'el; Isa. 7:14).

Ps. 46:9–12 perceives the Temple ritual as a vision, ceremonially reenacting and spiritually reliving Yahweh's great deeds for Israel (Ps. 44:2–9). The God of peace silences the strident sounds of war (→ Jerusalem; Temple, The).

Psalm 47. In Psalm 47, a battle hymn, Israel attributes its successes to Yahweh. Composed after a military victory, it sustained Israel's hope for the world domain of Yahweh (Isa. 44:6–8; Zech. 2:14–17). Only after Israel's ambitions for empire had collapsed did the psalm assume its final meaning for worshiping Yahweh.

There are two calls for praise (Ps. 47:2, 7), with the motivation after the first more patriotic (vv. 3–5) and after the second more religious (vv. 9–10a). Each stanza ends with a reference to the ritual enthronement of Yahweh (vv. 6, 10b). Various Temple ceremonies are reflected here (cf. Pss. 24; 68). The first part was sung during a procession with the Ark through the city (47:2–5) and its return to the Holy of Holies (v. 6), the second part during the obeisance of vassal nations before the princes of Israel. Jews recite this psalm seven times before sounding the trumpet to begin the new year. Christians associate the psalm with the Feast of the Ascension.

Clapping of hands and shouting (vv. 2–5) were ceremonial actions originally associated with military or political action (Josh. 6:16, 20; 1 Sam. 10:24; 1 Kings 1:39–40). The epithet "Lord, Most High" goes back to an early period (Gen. 14:18–20), and that of "Great King" was used of Assyrian and Babylonian monarchs (Isa. 36:4, 13; 2 Kings 18:19, 28). Ceremonial trumpets were prominent in political celebrations (Josh. 6:20; 2 Sam. 15:10; 1 Kings 1:39; Ps. 81:4).

In 47:8, the injunction to "sing skillfully" refers to an artistic quality in the service. Later Christian writers interpreted it to mean singing wisely, that is, with faith. Verse 10 provides one of the very few references in the Psalms to Abraham (cf. Isa. 51:2, where Sarah also is included), the source of blessing for all nations (Gen. 12:1–3).

Psalm 48. In the opening stanza of Psalm 48 one meets a litany honoring Yahweh and Jerusalem, with titles drawn from Canaanite mythology (vv. 2–4). This use of Canaanite language in Israel's religion is not surprising at Jerusalem, a cosmopolitan capital where cultures merged, including especially those of the sophisticated Canaanites. Yet the psalm remembers a startling victory for Israel. The mythological references are historicized within Israel's experience before becoming the language of faith (vv. 5–9; Chap. 46). Similar to Psalms 46–47, the third section focuses upon liturgical functions, here a procession through the city (48:10–15).

The occasion is difficult to pinpoint since details have been erased in the interest of allowing a symbolic expression of Yahweh's intervention in any age for people of strong faith. From a theological perspective, Jerusalem becomes the center or navel of the earth (Ezek.

5:5; 38:12) with directions explicitly to the north (Ps. 48:3) and the east (v. 8), implicitly to the south (v. 11, "right hand," directions were given facing east) and the west (v. 14, the word for "future" also serves for "west").

The psalm commences with reference to God's home. "Recesses of the north" (v. 3) in Canaanite literature referred to Mount Cassius, the major point of assembly for the gods (so Isa. 14:13). Yet Jerusalem is not the bulwark of Israel's faith, only God provides that support (Ps. 48:4).

Verses 5–9 attest to the memory of a near defeat and wondrous deliverance, perhaps like the invasion of Sennacherib in 701 B.C., is relived through Temple ceremonies; the faith of the people is intensified (vv. 5–9). "Ships of Tarshish" recall a battery of texts about fear and havoc: 1 Kings 22:49, a wreck of Israelite ships heading south in the Gulf of Elath; Jon. 1:3, a place in Spain, again with shipwreck in the story; Ezekiel 27, the collapse of Tyre under the image of shipwreck.

During the procession (vv. 10–15), the covenantal graces of Yahweh's loving-kindness and strong fidelity are celebrated. The final words in the Hebrew, 'al mut, "beyond death," not only enunciated the permanence of the holy city of Jerusalem, but they form a wordplay and inclusio with the title of Psalm 46, 'al 'alamot, "For the maidens." The latter word may refer to the 'almah, or "maiden," in Isa. 7:14 (note the other parallels with Isaiah in Ps. 46). This association may indicate that the 'almah to give birth to the messianic king (Isa. 7:14) is none other than Jerusalem.

Psalm 49. A difficult psalm, disturbed in the Hebrew text, especially v. 15, advances two positions about death, one that ultimately seems to make life and perhaps God meaningless and another that dares to reach beyond death. Developing within the wisdom tradition, always several steps distant from the Temple rituals and its priests, this psalm reached independently for a new solution (cf. Pss. 1; 16). The text represents a dialogue between a rigidly conservative position as found in the Torah (Lev. 21) and in Ecclesiastes and Job (life is not to be explained beyond human experience) and the views of popular religion (life with God extended beyond one's limited time on earth).

After the imposing introduction in Ps. 49:1–5, a chiasmic structure appears (see commentary above on Ps. 19:2), so that the conservative position at the center is surrounded with the more advanced one: A self-confidence, 49:6–7; B earthly possessions, vv. 8–9; C overcoming death, v. 10; D the center piece, repeating the conservative position, vv. 11–15; C' overcoming death, v. 16; B' earthly possessions, vv. 17–18; A' self-confidence, vv. 19–20. The refrain (v. 21) repeats the older position.

The first of the Korah psalms (Pss. 42–43) began in a melancholy way but ended with Temple worship flooded with light; this last one in the Korah collection also begins pessimistically with the theologically conservative position but comes around to life beyond the limits of earth.

The solemn introduction in 49:2–5, similar to that of Pss. 45:2 and 78:1–11 and accompanied by the "music of the harp" (Ps. 33:2), ends quietly and quickly so as to allow time for a new view of life and death. The touch of wisdom literature is very evident. Rich and poor, people of lowly or noble birth, are all invited; distinctions disappear in the face of death.

According to 49:6–10, wealth can never provide enough resources to ransom someone from the grip of death and prevent the person from descending into the silent abode of the pit (Ps. 6:6). Ps. 49:10 denies what it is hoping against hope to be true, yet in this hope it is intuiting what is theologically unacceptable in public worship. The hope must be contemplated along with the melody of the harp.

Verses 11–15 are the centerpiece of the psalm and the heart of the problem. Orthodox theology refused to look beyond life on earth for fear of contamination with sorcery and mediums (Deut. 18:9–14). In its fear it showed its limits in dealing with the pastoral question of dying and death (Ps. 44). Ps. 49:13, repeated again in v. 21, was an enigmatic proverb intended to stir discussion as much as to settle it.

Even though vv. 16–21 go the same route as vv. 6–10, they are nonetheless dominated by the statement in v. 16, "God will ransom my life from the pit. Indeed, God takes me." After this verse we find the Hebrew particle selah, requesting a pause for meditation. The Hebrew verb "to take" is a strong word, used of people like Enoch and Elijah taken alive from earth by divine intervention (Gen. 5:24; 2 Kings 2:11). The verse is not necessarily speaking of being saved from premature death. The psalmist separates out the wealthy but unjust person who will never see light but will vanish in oblivion. The enigmatic refrain, repeated again at the end, is all the more mysterious and open to question in view of Ps. 49:16.

Psalm 50. The first of the psalms of Asaph, the only one in Book Two of the Psalter, is a harbinger of those to follow in Book Three (Pss. 73–83). The author shows up as energetic and confident, from the sanctuary itself, tackling serious prophetic threats to sanctuary worship. If we are in the pre-exilic age, the time of splendid Temple worship, the strident voice of the prophets was still ringing in his ear (Amos 5:21–25; Isa. 1:11–20; Jer. 26). Asaph directly faces the challenge.

After a solemn prelude similar to the preceding psalm yet this time like a theophany

Verses 1–6 recall the spectacular theophany of Sinai and the high liturgical pieces of Exodus 19; Habakkuk 3; and Psalm 68. Yet this introduction also blends in prophetic material, summoning the heavens and the earth for a public legal hearing (Mic. 1:2–4; Isa. 1:2–3). If prophetic preaching was fiercely honest, God appears just as formidable “in a consuming fire and roaring storm.” The covenant material enables the author to take a firm position within Temple and tradition (Exod. 19; → Theophany).

A dead conscience lies behind the feverish ritual in Ps. 50:7–15, reeking with sacrificial smoke on one side and, on the other side, ignoring public morality (cf. Hos. 7:8). People think that ritual wraps its sacred mantle round them to hide the rotten morality of their lives. Ritual, however, is no alibi for sinning. “If I were hungry . . .” (v. 12) recalls other episodes of idolatry (Deut. 32:38; Bel and the Dragon). Ps. 50:14–15 uses ritual language ambiguously; we are not sure if the overtones are positive or negative. After all, the author comes from Temple personnel. (For the various types of sacrifice, see commentary above on Ps. 40:7.)

Ps. 50:16–21 does not suggest that the listeners recite the Torah and then commit robbery, adultery, lying, and slander against one’s family. Rather, and particularly if priests and Levites are being addressed, leaders are afraid to condemn what the people are doing lest they lose their stipends (Deut. 18:8). They even encourage sin to receive greater sin offerings and so “they feed off the sins of my people” (Hos. 4:8). Tolerating such deviousness, they give the impression that God also is deaf and blind to the situation (cf. 50:3).

In concluding the entire psalm, 50:22–23 echoes phrases from the minor conclusion (vv. 14–15) and realistically warns once more against the sin of religious externalism. The guild of Asaph remains faithful to covenant and Temple, recognizing a proper place for sacrifice.

Psalm 51. In writing this fourth of the seven penitential psalms (Ps. 6), a classic prayer for Lent and the forgiveness of sin, the writer meditated long upon prophetic literature, especially Jeremiah, Third Isaiah (Isa. 56–66), and Ezekiel, so that even if the psalm is composed in the first-person singular, it reflects social sins and their effect upon the community: for v. 3, see Isa. 63:7; for vv. 5–6, see Isa. 59:12–13; for v. 7, see Ezek. 16:2–4; Jer. 3:25; for v. 8, see Ezek. 36:25.

The style shows expert balancing and development. Guilt and sin dominate in Ps. 51:4, 11; heart and spirit in vv. 12, 19. Sin and sinner occur six times and God one time in vv.

3–11; sin and sinner only one time and God six times in vv. 12–19. The sequence of the verbs, wipe out, wash, and cleanse, in vv. 3b–4 is repeated in reverse order in vv. 9, 11b. Structuring like this is intended for effective communication in public assembly and worship, not for private prayer. While the psalm stresses the need for personal spirituality, this quality is achieved through the community, all Israel at the Temple.

Despite its intensity, the psalm flows easily: vv. 3–4, introduction; vv. 5–8, confession of sin; vv. 9–11, prayer for forgiveness; vv. 12–14, prayer for moral renewal; vv. 15–19, promise or vow of thanksgiving; and vv. 20–21, liturgical addition.

In vv. 1–2, David’s sin with Bathsheba is a reminder that serious sin is comparable to adultery because it violates God’s love. The dependence upon late prophecy rules out Davidic authorship.

Verses 3–4 are a storehouse of Hebrew vocabulary for sin and forgiveness: chanan, “graciousness shown to nonrelatives and outsiders”; chesed, “loving bonds within family and tribe”; rachamim, “compassion,” from the Hebrew for “womb”; machah, “wipe or blot out”; pesha, “rebelliousness”; kibbes, “thoroughly wash [i.e., in cold water, beating the clothes against rocks and bleaching them in the sun]”; awon, “twisted out of shape”; chatta, “like arrows missing the mark”; and taher, “clean as not to contaminate others.” With the clash of images behind these words, the text points out the disruption wrought by sin upon human nature as created by God and bonded in covenant with God and community. Only God can restore the lost harmony between the individual and society (→ Sin).

The confession of sinfulness (vv. 5–8) begins with a conscience sensitive to wrongdoing (v. 5), an admission of guilt (v. 6) and of powerlessness to remedy the situation (vv. 7–8). Verse 5, very similar to Isa. 59:12, stresses the first-person “I” with a verb that reaches beyond theoretical knowledge to an inner experience. Ps. 51:6a turns the focus just as pointedly upon God: “Against you, against you alone . . . and that which is evil in your eyes I did.” Whatever harm sin inflicted upon people touched not just the holiness but the kindness of God (cf. Luke 9:48; 15:18). Ps. 51:6b is perplexing at first, for if it is linked with v. 6a, it may imply that our confession of sin justifies God’s punishment. More correctly, if it is associated with God’s kindness in vv. 3–4, God is seen to be just by living up to the covenantal promises of forgiveness (Exod. 34:6–7). In this case fidelity is a better word than justice.

Ps. 51:7–8 reflects the two sides of sexuality: v. 7, the association of shame and even uncleanness with sexual activity and with the sexual organs, and v. 8, the sacredness of sexuality and of the transmission of life. While shame bestows a healthy safeguard around an area easily abused, it also manifests strange habits and practices in every culture, even in ancient Israel (Lev. 15). In Ps. 51:7 the wrongness does not consist in conception and birth but in the way that sexuality can become a selfish, even harmful activity. One can just as easily say, "In sin I eat or work," for one may easily overeat or become a workaholic. Verse 8, translated specifically in a context of v. 7 and sexuality, reads, "You [God] are pleased with fidelity amid [conjugal] intimacy; in such secret moments you impart the experience of true wisdom."

The prayer for forgiveness in vv. 9–11 draws upon the memory of Temple worship: happy songs of praise; hyssop, a small bushy plant used for sprinkling to signify cleanliness (Lev. 14; Num. 19) and divine protection (Exod. 12:22). One of the Hebrew words for sin (chatta) is used as a verb here to mean "cleanse," as though if one thoroughly realizes the ugliness of sin, one will purge and purify oneself completely.

In the prayer for moral renewal (Ps. 51:12–14), the psalmist admits that only God creates; the Hebrew word bara' has only God as its subject. The new creation will be total and integrated, as the phrase "sturdy spirit" implies.

In vv. 15–19 conversion fires one with zeal. From guilt (as blood signifies, Isa. 1:15; Hos. 4:2) to innocence, from death to life, the psalmist breaks into songs of praise and is restored to the Temple assembly (Pss. 15; 24). Yet Temple sacrifice did not achieve this transformation, only God did. Lest the previous verses be misinterpreted with anti-Temple bias, 51:20–21 were added.

Psalm 52. The title, "maskil of David," introduces four of the least prominent psalms (Pss. 52–55) and, in this case, one of the more damaged textually. "Maskil" is a favorite wisdom word (Ps. 47:8). A wisdom psalm similar to Psalms 1 and 37, Psalm 52 discusses the lot of the liar (vv. 3–7) and the honest person (vv. 8–11), specifically contrasting worthy and unworthy priests (Ps. 16).

The mention of Doeg in the title (vv. 1–2) alludes to his part in the massacre of the priests at Nob (1 Sam. 21:8; 22:11–19). In the psalm some priests are "killing" others by lies and intrigue.

The style of addressing the wicked in person (Ps. 52:3–7) is unusual in the Psalter, but normal with prophecy (Amos 4:6–11). With a slight change, Ps. 52:3b reads, "the devout one of God," possibly said in sarcasm to the wicked priests. The ancient versions have different renditions. God "will snatch and tear you away from the tent," i.e., from the Temple (v. 7; Ps. 15:1).

During the rapid demise of the wicked priests (52:8–11), the others will stand in silence, smiling in disbelief. "Green olive trees" is another reference to priesthood "in the house of the Lord" (cf. Zech. 4:1–3, 11–14). Ps. 52:11 sees the persecuted, righteous priests reinstated in the Temple assembly of "your devoted ones."

Psalm 53. This Psalm is identical with Psalm 14 but for three exceptions. The divine name Yahweh drops out, as is customary in the Elohist Psalter (Pss. 42–83; see commentary above introducing Book Two), in favor of the generic form for God, "Elohim." The title adds, "According to Mahalath. A maskil." (For the relation of the latter word to wisdom literature, see the commentary above on Ps. 52.) Mahalath derives from a Hebrew root signifying sickness or sorrow. It may be the name of a song for the sick, according to whose melody this psalm was to be sung, or it may join this psalm to such a group of prayers. Ps. 53:6 rings with a more strident tone than Ps. 14:5–6.

Psalm 54. All the customary sections, even the standard vocabulary of supplication, occur in this short poem, Psalm 54: vv. 3–4, call for help; v. 5, motivation; vv. 6–7, prayer of confidence; and v. 8, thanksgiving.

The title in vv. 1–2, like others for a "Psalm of David" in Book Two, is more extensive and more liturgical than those in Book One, as here with the reference to "stringed instruments." For the Ziphites' betrayal of David, see 1 Sam. 23:19 and 26:1.

Expressions in Ps. 54:3–5 are repeated in other psalms, a fact that indicates a repertoire of stock phrases for supplication: "save me" in Pss. 3:8; 6:5; 7:2; "hear my prayer" in Ps. 4:2; 17:1; "give ear" in Ps. 5:2; and "your name" in Ps. 20:2; 52:11. Ps. 54:5 is identical with Ps. 86:14. Blessing by the name flows over into the NT (so Acts 3:6; 4:12). The freewill offerings (vv. 8–9) are sacrifices not under obligation by ritual or personal vow.

Psalm 55. Psalm 55, poorly preserved, contains obscurities due as well to occasional Aramaic forms, a sign of late editing. As with Psalm 52, the author seems to have been a priest, disturbed by the decadent state of Temple worship in the postexilic period (cf. Ps. 16; Isa. 56:9–57:13). Jerusalem may be occupied by foreigners (Ps. 55:10–12).

The following outline directs us through the complicated form: vv. 2–3b, introduction with stereotyped phrases (Ps. 54:3–5); vv. 3c–16, lament; vv. 17–18, prayer for help; vv. 19–20, confidence; vv. 21–22, lament; and vv. 23–24, confidence. Sickness (vv. 5–6) and betrayal (vv. 14–15) leave little energy for good order and self-control. While the introduction is some-

Verses 3c–16 range over many human reactions to distress. Emotional distress and probably physical sickness are detected in vv. 5–6: heart tremor, terrors of death, fear, and shaking. Verses 7–9 evince gentle sensitivity (Song of Sg. 2:14), susceptible to disappointments at times tragic (Ps. 74:19). Jeremiah's longing to flee to a desert inn is recalled (Jer. 9:1). In Ps. 55:13–15 the psalmist faces treachery among closest friends, again with parallels in Jer. 12:6; 20:10; Job 19:19; and Psalm 16. The Aramaic Targum supplies the name of David's betrayer, Ahithophel, who later committed suicide (2 Sam. 16:15–17:23). Ps. 55:15 points to a priest as author. The language in v. 16 is reminiscent of the opening of the earth to swallow the jealous Levites of the Korah clan (Num. 16:31–34). (For the netherworld or Sheol, see the commentary above on Ps. 6:6.)

Ps. 55:17–18 reflects continuous prayer. Verse 18 influenced the practice among the rabbis of praying: in morning, honoring Abraham (Gen. 19:27); at midday, honoring Isaac (Gen. 24:63); and at evening, honoring Jacob (Gen. 28:11). The early church adapted these three hours to Christ's resurrection in the morning, ascension at noon, and rest in the tomb at night.

The psalm ends with a statement of confidence (Ps. 55:23–24). Many phrases become familiar in the NT: Matt. 6:25–34; 10:19; and Luke 12:22–31. The ultimate basis for trust is the person of "you," where the Greek adds Lord or Yahweh, the sacred name avoided in the Elohist Psalter (Pss. 42–83).

Psalm 56. A supplication (Psalm 56), possibly from a priest (v. 14), begins a series of miktam psalms (Pss. 56–60; 16). This word from the psalm's title possibly designates atonement. The texts of these psalms are poorly preserved. The sequence is somewhat complex because we do not know the accompanying Temple service. Part One includes 56:2a, call for help; vv. 2b–4, lament and confidence; and v. 5, refrain. Part Two includes vv. 6–10, lament, curse upon the enemy, and further lament; and vv. 11–12, refrain. Part Three includes vv. 13–14, thanksgiving offering in the Temple.

A phrase in the title, translated literally, reads, "dove of silent distant places." The Greek reads this phrase as "the people removed from the sanctuary" and the Aramaic Targum as "the community of Israel, composed of a silent dove in the time of the distant deportation from their cities." Dove, therefore, appears as a symbol of Israel (Ps. 68:14; Mark 1:10).

The first section (Ps. 56:2–5), like the closing one, imparts a typical liturgical cast to the psalm: "Have mercy, God" (Ps. 51:3) and "process before God in the light of the living" (Ps. 43:3–4). Confidence is restored not simply by Temple services but by encounter with the person of God. Life is not a divine plan with troubles and joys but an ever-intense search for God within the mystery of one's life. The Hebrew text of 56:5 moves with a solemn cadence; it contrasts God with "flesh," humanity in its weakness.

In vv. 6–12 jealous adversaries from the ranks of the priesthood employ intrigue and spying (Jer. 12:6) to draw religious people into open antagonism and displays of passion, reactions destructive to an image of piety. "My tears . . . in your flask" blend memories of sorrow with the custom of carrying water in a goatskin container for treks in the dry wilderness (Gen. 21:15). Suffering and tears strengthen the psalmist in resolve to seek the Lord (Ps. 42:4). The Hebrew word for "counting" or "determining my wandering" is from the same root as "book" at the end of 56:9, supporting the previous impression that divine providence principally involved confronting the mystery of God's personal presence. There is a long tradition for writing names in a book to ensure a permanent relationship with God (Pss. 69:29; 139:16; Exod. 32:32; Job 19:23; Mal. 3:16).

In Ps. 56:13–14 a vow is fulfilled through thanksgiving sacrifice (→Vow). The reference to light reflects the dazzling sunlight over the land of Israel and the important role of lamps in Temple services and, generally, in Israelite life (Ps. 43:3–4; cf. John 1:4; 8:12; →Lamp; Lampstand).

Psalm 57. Another song from the individual laments false accusations and harassment, probably from fellow priests as in Psalm 56. Verses 2–6 petition God for help, ending with a refrain. After a transitional v. 7, one hears a quiet, somewhat plaintive song of thanksgiving, again with refrain, in vv. 8–12. Verses 2 and 9 refer to night vigils in the Temple.

The phrase in the title, "Do not destroy," indicates a song according to whose melody this psalm is sung (Pss. 59; 75). The mention of David's flight from Saul into a cave (1 Sam. 22:1–2; 24:1–23) extends God's protection from a ritual in the Temple to everyday details of life.

In vv. 2–6 "wings" refer to the cherubim on either side of the Ark, where God was said to be invisibly enthroned (Pss. 17:8; 36:8; Exod. 25:17–22; Isa. 6:1–2); the psalmist takes refuge in this intimacy with God (Pss. 2:12; 7:2; 11:1; 16:1). "Love and fidelity" describe the principal attributes of the covenantal God (Exod. 34:6–7). Ps. 57:4–5 and the transitional v. 7 repeat the lex talionis (Pss. 7:16; 35:8) whereby God does not stand idly by when innocent people are persecuted. Unjust suffering can purify a person and unite one more fully with God. (For the presence of lions, see commentary above on Ps. 7:3; Amos 3:4.) The refrain (Ps. 57:6) rhetorically extends the domain of God, who is worshiped in the Temple across the cosmos. The language about heaven and earth, as in Isaiah 40–55, is highly poetical.

Ps. 57:8–12, repeated in Ps. 108:2–6, celebrates the conclusion of a night vigil in the Temple, symbolizing the end of dark oppression. Dawn represents God's dramatic end of oppression (Ps. 46:6; Isa. 37:36) and the extension of God's warm care in the light of a new day (Ps. 139:9). "Lyre and harp" spread the soft music of peace (Ps. 33:2). Ps. 57:11 has been drawn almost verbatim from Ps. 36:6. The liturgical refrain closes the psalm.

Psalm 58. Psalm 58 is a communal lament, with a Hebrew text poorly preserved and in which v. 10 almost defies translation. Some of the most violent images in the Psalter occur here, moving in a world of magic and a dreadful miscarriage of justice, yet all the while pulsing with extraordinary vigor. The time of composition reaches from pre-exilic days (cf. Deut. 18:9–14) into the early postexilic period (cf. Isa. 56:9–57:13). Ps. 58:2–3 introduces the conniving judges; vv. 4–6 their embodiment of evil; vv. 7–10, their punishment; and vv. 11–12, the vindication of the righteous.

Curiously, the title (v. 1) stipulates that a psalm of brute force follow the melody of a song entitled "Do not destroy" (Pss. 57; 75). Is this a way of controlling anger?

The opening phrase in 58:2–3 is generally amended to address the immoral judges as "gods," similar to the use of Hebrew 'elim or 'elohim for princes in Ps. 45:7 and for judges in Ps. 82:1, 6. Pompous, self-confident judges are sarcastically compared to lesser gods (Ps. 29:1; Deut. 4:19).

In Ps. 58:4–6 the phrase about being wicked "from the womb" does not refer to the Christian doctrine of original sin, unknown in these ancient times, but to a sense of total depravity. For their sly manipulation of justice, magistrates are compared not only to snake charmers, who procured oracles from the "whispering" of snakes, but also to the snakes themselves (Pss. 41:8; 140:4; Gen. 3:1).

The seven curses in Ps. 58:7–10 intensify their fury with each new statement; seven signifies completion. Though vv. 11–12 repeat a hyperbole common in the ancient Near East (Ps. 68:24; Isa. 63:1–6), the image nonetheless remains revulsive. It affirms the theological fact that God communicates in the Bible through human style and passion.

Psalm 59. A lament for an individual at a time of serious crisis within Israel is adapted to communal supplication (vv. 6, 14). Not only the refrains but also other words like "arise," "awake," and "visit" (Ps. 44:24–27), or "deliver me," "protect me," "God my stronghold" (Pss. 7:2; 9:10) carry a strong sense of communal worship. The discouraging situation may have resulted from traitorous Israelites conniving with foreign conquerors. As with other psalms in this particular collection from the guild of David, the text is poorly preserved.

Parallel movement is perceptible in 59:2–10 and 11–18: lament and petition, vv. 2–6, 12–14; refrain about despicable dogs, vv. 7, 15; confidence of divine help, vv. 8–9, 16–17; and final refrain about "God, my stronghold," vv. 10, 18.

In vv. 2–10 the psalmist protests innocence from any serious offenses (for the vocabulary of sin, see commentary above on Ps. 51:3–4). The contempt shown here for dogs is typical of the Bible. They prowl through garbage heaps (1 Kings 14:11; Mark 7:27–28), savagely run in packs (Ps. 22:17), even provide a title for male prostitutes (Deut. 23:19). Ps. 59:9, "You, Lord, indeed laugh at them," signals a victory celebration over a rival (Pss. 2:4; 37:13; Isa. 37:22). For reading a refrain in Ps. 59:10, it is necessary to correct the poorly transmitted text in accord with v. 18.

Verses 11–18 identify the offense as lies and intrigue. The psalmist prays that such sinners be caught in the web of their own deceit (Pss. 35:8; 57:7). With their collapse the psalmist sings "at dawn," always a time of transition to a new day of divine favor (Pss. 46:6; 90:14) and therefore a moment for prayer (Pss. 5:4; 57:9; 92:3). The Hebrew word chesed, generally translated "steadfast kindness" within family or treaty relationships and used repeatedly in acclaiming the God of the covenant (Exod. 34:6–7), here stresses the strength of blood and covenant bonding (Ps. 59:10 and 18; Jonah 2:9; Pss. 44:27; 94:18).

Psalm 60. Because of its many historical and geographical references, Psalm 60 is difficult for modern readers. It is fired by faith in God's mysterious presence within Israel's history. That the land was truly theirs by promise (Gen. 12:1–2; Deut. 34:1–4) and by right of settlement (Josh. 1:1–9) is presumed in the ancient oracle (Ps. 60:8–10). Colossal military defeats shake this faith to its foundations (vv. 3–6) and lead to prayer (vv. 11–14). Verse 7 functions as a transition from the communal lament to an ancient oracle. Verses 7–14 occur almost identically in Ps. 108:7–14.

In Ps. 60:1–2 the long title adds a panoramic scope of history and geography. It is to be sung "according to the [melody of] lily of testimony," also used for Pss. 45:1; 69:1; and 80:1, psalms of high emotional intensity. "Testimony" recalls the tables of the law and the origins of Israel (Exod. 31:18), a historical moment thrown into doubt by later military defeat. Aram-naharaim is an ancient name for Mesopotamia, the birthplace of Abraham and Sarah as well as the wives of Isaac and Jacob (Gen. 11:27–28; 24; 29–30). Aram-zobah, north of Damascus, and Edom, south of the Dead Sea, were conquered by David (2 Sam. 8:3–14).

The lament in Ps. 60:3–6 brings memories of Psalms 44 and 74, though more positively. The metaphor of earthquake (60:4) evokes the language of Amos (1:1; 4:11; 6:11; 8:8; 9:1). In Ps. 60:6 “banner” and “flee” are spelled almost alike in Hebrew. With painful irony the banner leading forward to victory becomes the instrument for fleeing backward. Verse 7 is a transitional verse. “Loved one,” the name for the vineyard in Isa. 5:1 and for Solomon in 2 Sam. 12:25, appeals to God’s tenderness (Hos. 11).

Ps. 60:8–10 speaks of the ancient promise to the patriarchs and its initial fulfillment under Joshua and David. Shechem, about forty miles north of Jerusalem, quickly made an alliance with the newly settled Israelites. Succoth was east of the river Jordan where Jacob thanked God for his safe return to the promised land (Gen. 33:17–18). Gilead is a large area also east of the Jordan; Manasseh and Ephraim represent the principal northern tribes. “Ephraim my helmet” alludes to the major military force, and “Judah my scepter” the place of royalty.

Ps. 60:11–14 ends with the faith that only God restores Israel’s hopes. The military might of David or of the northern tribes was no more lasting than human flesh. A reassuring though grim response is given in Isa. 63:1–6.

Psalm 61. Psalm 61 is a lament from a Levite as in Psalms 42–43, a sick person, an Israelite in exile, or a king in some distress—the subject is not clear. Typically, Israel’s prayers become ever more inclusive. Psalm 61 opens with calling upon God (vv. 2–3a), prays for relief (vv. 3b–5), and concludes with thanksgiving (vv. 6, 9). Verses 7–8 were added, in a different meter, as intercession for the king. Many phrases are reproduced elsewhere in the Psalter.

The “shrill cry” at the beginning imparts a note of urgency (Ps. 17:1). Ps. 61:3 remains ambiguous. “Earth’s end” may refer to exile (Isa. 41:5; 42:10) or possibly to the edge of the grave (Jon. 2:7–8). Ps. 61:5 provides prayer for a return to the Temple (Pss. 17:8; 27:5). Ps. 61:6 and 9 manifest a certitude of being heard, the appropriateness of a vow (Ps. 50:14), and thanksgiving sacrifice (Ps. 4:4–6). Thanksgiving gives to God only the joyful acknowledgement of God’s care. The prayer for the king (Ps. 61:7–8) links the covenantal qualities of Yahweh as merciful and faithful with the eternal promises granted to David (2 Sam. 7:22–29; Ps. 89:2–5).

Psalm 62. A scribe uses the setting of a psalm of confidence (vv. 2–8) to communicate a message from the wisdom tradition (vv. 9–13). Throughout, one perceives the composure of a book like Proverbs. Yet it is the God of wisdom, not wisdom itself, who brings rest and strength. The major theme, “only in God,” is stylistically evident in the Hebrew text, which begins six lines with the emphatic particle ’ak, “only,” and the final two lines with another such particle, ki, “indeed.” To have refrains at the beginning rather than at the end of strophes is unusual and attracts attention to the lovely way of singing one’s soul to rest “only in God.” The sequence flows easily: vv. 2–5, refrain and external threats; vv. 6–9, refrain and internal peace; and vv. 10–13, meditation upon social morality within the peace of God’s presence. “Jeduthun” (v. 1) belonged to one of the guilds of singers at the postexilic Temple (1 Chron. 16:41; Pss. 39; 77).

In Ps. 62:2–5 silence is more than a quality; literally, “only in God silence is my soul.” Customary titles for God provide a litany of praise: “my rock,” Ps. 18:3; “my salvation,” Ps. 27:1; and “my fortress,” Ps. 46:8, 12. Not to be disturbed means to share in the stability of Jerusalem (Ps. 46:6). While prosecuted, the psalmist calmly sees through the lies of hypocrites (Isa. 30:12–13; Ezek. 12:24).

The psalmist’s interior peace (Ps. 62:6–9) contrasts with the deceit of the persecutors (vv. 4–5). First a new litany in praise of God (v. 8), then wisdom addresses “my people.” “Pouring out one’s heart” reflects a Temple ritual for the pouring of water to express interior trust (Ps. 42:5).

Ps. 62:10–12 evinces the trademarks of prophetic discourses for social justice, only here less stridently (Amos 8:4–8; Mic. 2:1–2). Another litany in praise of God is embedded within the final advice, typical of wisdom literature with its numerical form (Prov. 6:16–17) and its insistence upon human cooperation. While admitting human weakness (Ps. 62:10), with God providing strength and bonding in love, the respondents are expected to give a proper accounting of their lives (Ezek. 18).

Psalm 63. Though a lament, Psalm 63 breathes such tranquility it almost modulates into a prayer of confidence. As it reaches out to speak in the name of the king, the individual merges into the community. The words are reminiscent of Psalms 27, 42–43, 84, and 91 and their desire for dwelling peacefully with God, yet here the tone never reaches the thirst and darkness of Psalms 42–43, nor the distance of Psalm 84, nor the demonic dangers of Psalm 91. Such peace befits a morning prayer, as Psalm 63 became for the early church. The Armenian church prays Psalm 63 at the Eucharist.

After the introductory lament (v. 2), the language moves in the direction of a narrative of thanksgiving with most of the verbs calling for continuous action (vv. 3–7). In vv. 8–9 the verbs imply completion and confidence in God. The final section focuses on the king (vv. 10–12).

The title associates this psalm with David's experience when he wandered in a wilderness (1 Sam. 24). Ps. 63:2 includes a cry from the depths, "God, my God!" and adds emphatically, "you!" as though God were already present. "I seek you" represents the word from Israel's wisdom literature for discovering God in everyday affairs. The same word stands for "dawn" and explains the use of this psalm for morning prayer. In vv. 3–7 "I looked" has the sense of seeking a vision of the mysterious God in sanctuary worship. "Strength and glory" are associated with the Lord of the sanctuary (Pss. 24:8; 29:1–2). "Better than life" implies a sense of life beyond earth (cf. Phil. 1:21; 3:11). "I bless you in my living" so that life itself, received totally from God, becomes the psalmist's return to God. The strophe ends with a night vigil in the Temple and a sacred meal, gratefully celebrating God's gift of life (cf. Exod. 18:9–12; 24:11).

Ps. 63:8–9 blends the thought into an expression of confidence, again within the sanctuary and beneath the wings of the Lord (Ps. 57:2) where "my soul clings toward you," Hebrew language for intimacy and longing. Ps. 63:10–12 concludes with a final prayer for the king.

Psalm 64. Psalm 64 comprises an individual's lament over intrigue. Because of ties with wisdom literature (v. 10) as well as the subject matter itself, the psalm reaches beyond the limits of Israel's land and history. The psalm imparts a personal touch to a common, disquieting problem. Hounded by deceit, the psalmist is not discouraged. The poor transmission of the text, especially the almost untranslatable v. 7, has not deprived the style of its vigor. After the call for help (vv. 2–3) because of evil schemes (vv. 4–7), God intervenes to restore trust (vv. 8–10), a cause for rejoicing (v. 11).

Opponents who scheme secretly are to be feared more than an enemy in open warfare, not only because it is difficult to second-guess them, but also because their religious appearance makes one doubt one's own faith (vv. 2–3). Although the images in vv. 4–7 are drawn from the hunting and stalking of animals, the secret manipulation of details hints as well at sorcery (Pss. 58; 91), always possible when religious people are laying the snares.

Ps. 64:8–10 presents God's response with words from the preceding section, like shooting arrows. God meets the schemers on their own ground (Ps. 18:26–27) and shatters their sham of religious righteousness. The lex talionis shows up again (Ps. 35:8); the results of sin turn out to punish the sinner. "All humanity," Israelite or not, understands this kind of language and peers to the depths of what is really happening. The psalm ends (Ps. 64:11) with the motif of seeking refuge in the Lord (Pss. 2:12; 7:2).

Psalm 65. Psalm 65 is a national hymn of thanksgiving to celebrate the end of a drought. It was possibly used for the Feast of Tabernacles, when prayers were offered for rainfall (Lev. 23:33–43; Zech. 14:16–21). In the spirit of pilgrimage, the Greek version extends the application to "exiled people as they begin their return."

A rather long introduction locates the psalmist within the sanctuary thanking God and offering appropriate sacrifice (Ps. 65:2–5). The next two stanzas allude to the struggle of God the creator with angry oceans (vv. 6–9) and the quiet presence of God the re-creator in rainfall (vv. 10–14).

In vv. 2–5 the opening line is generally translated according to the ancient versions, yet the Hebrew text may be correct: "for you, God, silence is praise," a possible reference to congregational reverence (Hab. 2:20) as the thanksgiving sacrifice was placed on the altar for burning. The service included burning a small part of the animal in adoration, followed by a sacred meal (Deut. 16:1–15; Exod. 18:9–12; Ps. 22:23–27). Ps. 65:5 refers to this sacred meal. The opening verse inspired the dialogue in the "preface" to eucharistic prayers: "Let us give thanks to the Lord our God; it is right and just." (For vows, see Pss. 22:26; 50:14; for a description of the ceremony, Ps. 118:19–20, 26–28.)

In Ps. 65:6–9 the psalmist's words sweep back to God's struggle in creation (Ps. 89:10–11; Isa. 51:9–10), which was also a battle for justice (Pss. 24; 97). The Temple was the place where God maintained harmonious order in creation and in history. The world's inhabitants marvel at such signs (1 Sam. 10:7; Isa. 7:10–14) and wonders (Isa. 40:5).

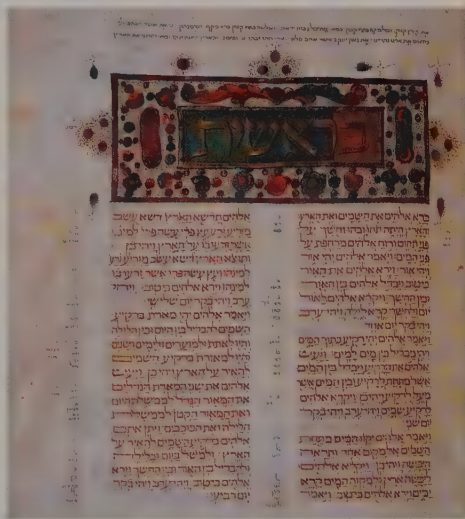

Ps. 65:10–14 rejoices in a bountiful rainfall, not just the heavy precipitation in late November through February, but also the special gift of the early rains in October and early November as well as the late rains in March and early April (Deut. 11:10–17; Joel 2:23). The literal translation of Ps. 65:12b, "The tracks of your chariot overflow with fat," blends ancient images: God rides upon a chariot through the sky (Ps. 18:11; 104:3); "fat" signifies abundance of life or its best part, reserved for the altar (Ps. 20:4), a sign of rejoicing (Ps. 23:5) and prosperity (Prov. 11:25); "tracks . . . overflow" recalls the overloaded cart dropping some of its produce along the way.

Psalm 66. Although structurally a complex psalm, the themes of deliverance from trials and of thanksgiving at a sanctuary appear clearly and repeatedly in Psalm 66. A close reading perceives that the three major sections are carefully integrated. Each includes special lines for praise and then for thanksgiving; vv. 1–4, 5–7, for past deliverance; vv. 8–9, 10–12, for a recent deliverance of Israel; and vv. 13–15, 16–19, for the deliverance of the psalmist.

The psalm is animated by an artistic mélange of individual and community, of formal and spontaneous prayer, of past and present deliverance. While Psalm 66 transports one back into the past with Moses in the Exodus and with Second Isaiah (Isa. 40–55) in the return from Exile, it challenges readers to relive these experiences of salvation in their own lives (cf. Deut. 5:1–5; 6:20–25). In Ps. 66:1a some Christian manuscripts, including the Vg., add, “A psalm of the resurrection,” in accord with the psalm’s spirit of new life after harsh trials.

Verses 1b–7 recall the Exodus out of Egypt and the return from the Babylonian exile. Points of contact show up with Psalms 96–100 and Isa. 40–55. The opening invitation is identical with those of Pss. 98:4a and 100:1. Although “the glory of his name” occurs in Ps. 29:2, here the psalmist does not invoke “the children of the gods.” (For a similar theological refinement, see the commentary below on Ps. 96:7.) In summoning “all the earth,” the psalmist confesses that what happens to Israel affects all other nations. “Come and see” (Ps. 66:5) refers to ceremonies symbolizing a great act of salvation, probably the Exodus through the Red Sea. Verse 6, “There let us rejoice” may indicate the sanctuary, some say at Gilgal near the river Jordan. Psalm 114, which combines crossing the Red Sea with the passage through the river Jordan, may also have originated at Gilgal. God “rules forever” by enabling Israel to relive the Exodus in other deliverances like the return from Exile.

Ps. 66:8–12 focuses upon a deliverance within the recent experience of the Israelite community. The references to being tested (Ps. 95:9; Jer. 12:3; Job 23:10), tried as silver (Ps. 12:7; Isa. 1:25), brought into a snare (Ps. 57:7; Ezek. 12:13), severely constrained (Deut. 28:53), and walked upon by others (Isa. 51:23) accumulate images for painful trials from throughout the OT, summarized in passing through fire and water (Isa. 43:2). God is mysteriously preparing a new Israel, as one sees has been the result in the biblical references just cited.

Ps. 66:13–20 first presents a liturgy of thanksgiving performed publicly by the psalmist and then refers to personal trials that the psalmist expressed by referring to biblical traditions about Israel’s sufferings and deliverance by God. Holocausts were completely burned on the altar out of adoration and total self-giving to God; other offerings were partially burned on the altar, thus providing food for a sacred meal of thanksgiving (Exod. 18:9–12; Deut. 26:1–11; 1 Kings 8:62–64). Ps. 66:16–19 recalls personal confessions of deliverance as in Ps. 22:23–27.

Psalm 67. The interpretation of the short, intense Psalm 67 depends upon the translation of the verbs in vv. 7–8 and upon the sequence of its lines. If the verbs are read in the past tense, which most authors prefer, then the psalm thanks God for bountiful crops (cf. Lev. 23). If the verbs are rendered as a prayer or exhortation, grammatically possible (“May the earth give its fruit . . . and may God bless us”), then the psalm turns into a community lament after a poor harvest! Within the psalm the enigmatic selah calls for a pause after vv. 2 and 5; v. 5 thus becomes the centerpiece with its announcement of God’s providential care over the nations of the world. Without the selah, the psalm divides into three sections with the emphasis upon the refrain after each (it is supplied after v. 8). In this case the nations stand in awe at what God is doing for Israel, as in Isa. 40:1–5. Each explanation is legitimate, depending upon the occasion for worship. The image of harvest announces the final salvation (Hos. 14:5–9; Isa. 45:8; 61:11).

The service opens with the priestly blessing from Num. 6:24–26. The “way” of God (Ps. 67:3) leads through the farmers’ fields; “salvation” consists in rain and a good harvest. The refrain thanks God, the source of all good gifts.

Psalm 68. Like a centuries-old cathedral, Psalm 68 manifests exceptional antiquity, major historical and theological developments, confessions of faith at times of crises, ravages of war, and neglect and further use—artistic accretions not always in good taste or in the name of the best theology. Within Psalm 68 several significant movements are detected. One is historical: from the period of Moses (vv. 2–4, 7–9) to settlement in the land (vv. 5–6, 10–11), from the time of Deborah and the judges (vv. 12–15) to the capital and Temple at Jerusalem (vv. 16–19), military adventures (vv. 20–24), victory celebrations (vv. 25–28), political and military problems (vv. 29–32), and prophetic hopes (vv. 33–36). This sweep through history theologically accepts dramatic changes, like that from the wilderness austerity with Moses to the cosmopolitan grandeur of David and Solomon, or that from the sacred object of an Ark carried by the people in their journeys to the sacred place of the Temple where people came to pray before the Ark, or that from charismatic rule by judges and prophets to the autocratic institution of kings, or the change from great deeds of salvation in early history to their ceremonial symbolism in Temple ritual, or the geographical transfer of places of worship from the meeting tent in the wilderness to the sanctuary of Mount Tabor and finally to the Jerusalem Temple. Psalm 68 can be read and celebrated on many different levels. Though a unified composition, it has aged over centuries of inspired composition and use.

Verses 2–4 and 5–7 each form a minihymn with its own call to praise and its own motivation. Verses 2–4, set in the Sinai wilderness, repeat the summons to break camp under God's guidance (Num. 10–35). Here, however, the passage moves from the second-person summons ("Arise, Lord") to the third-person statement ("God arises"). The statement becomes more generic or symbolic; each day in the land is like breaking camp and moving onward. Because this psalm is in the midst of the "Elohistic Psalter" (see commentary above introducing Book Two), the divine name changes from Yahweh to Elohim or God, the first of twenty-three times in the psalm, with Yahweh used only once in 68:18 and an abbreviated form, Yah, in v. 19. In vv. 5–7 God is acclaimed with Canaanite imagery as one "who rides upon the clouds" (Pss. 18:11; 104:3) but associated closely with the compassionate and faithful God of the covenant (Exod. 3:7–8; 34:6–7). This new cultural way of addressing God helped to win Canaanites to the worship of Yahweh. What they attributed falsely to their gods truly exists in Yahweh.

After the solemn introduction, Ps. 68:8–11 begins over again, echoing the theophany of Mount Sinai (Exod. 19) and the victory song of Deborah (Judg. 5). This latter may have been originally composed for a celebration at the sanctuary on Mount Tabor (Judg. 4:12–14). Already the biblical accounts do more than record events; they provide texts for sanctuary worship so that application can be made to the lives of later generations of Israelites. Ps. 68:12–15 continues to catch memories of the days of the judges, when women spread the news of victory and divided the spoils (Judg. 5:30). (For the comparison of Israel to a dove, see Hos. 7:11; 11:11.)

Ps. 68:16–19 records the installation of the Ark in the Jerusalem Temple, transferring to the Temple the theological significance of Sinai. God, accordingly, is no longer revealing the law but, through the Levites and priests, is interpreting and applying the law (Deut. 31:9–29). Ps. 68:19 reads, "You [God] have gone up the mountain . . . received human beings as gifts . . . the Lord God within the [holy] dwelling." At first this verse mirrored a ceremony in which the Ark was returned to the Holy of Holies after a triumphal procession through the city (Pss. 47; 132) and the booty of war, including slaves, was offered to the Temple (Josh. 9:23; Neh. 7:72). Later Israelite armies no longer marched to war, so weak and minuscule had the country become. The scribes were scandalized that God should need gifts, particularly slaves. A new reading, therefore, was provided in what is called the style of midrash or rabbinic interpretation. Moses, not Yahweh, ascends the mountain of Sinai and receives gifts from Yahweh, namely the Torah. Eph. 4:7–13 relies upon the midrash and reinterprets the passage about Christ who ascends on high and, by sending the Spirit, confers the gifts of leadership in the church (→ Midrash).

Ps. 68:20–24 continues to celebrate the military victory, v. 24 with violent but stereotypic language (Ps. 58:11; Isa. 63:1–6). Many biblical allusions occur here: the defeat of King Ahab near Bashan (1 Kings 22:29–40) and the end of the wicked queen Jezebel (2 Kings 9:30–37), all with the lesson that evil is not tolerated by God, whether among foreigners or Israelite royalty. Ps. 68:25–27 continues the ceremony with a new procession. The presence of northern tribes at Jerusalem points to the reign of David or, better, of Solomon (1 Kings 12). The procession of both women and men into the inner courts of the sanctuary also points to a pre-exilic period before this area was reserved to Levites and priests. The psalm continues with prayer (vv. 29–32), inferring military humiliation, therefore an addition from a later inspired composer. Another minihymn, with God again enthroned in the heavenly heights (v. 5), reaches like the earlier parts of the psalm across the nations of the earth to conclude this extraordinary song of national thanksgiving.

Psalm 69. One of the longer laments of an individual sufferer, Psalm 69 is also one of the most quoted psalms in the NT, especially in the passion narrative. Moreover, it contains an extensive curse of the enemy (vv. 23–29), thus providing an opportunity to deal theologically with both the early Christian use of this psalm as well as with the curse tradition itself.

The psalmist is a disciple of the prophet Jeremiah and like this prophet was hounded unjustly (v. 5), even by close friends and family members (v. 9). The delicate sensitivity of this writer shows up not only in the personal agony of forced isolation (v. 21) but also in the resultant outburst of anger and cursing (vv. 23–29). It is not surprising that the writer becomes physically sick (vv. 4, 15–16, 19). There are a number of contacts between the book of Jeremiah and this psalm: vv. 2–5, in the deep mire, Jeremiah 38; v. 4, crying out, Jer. 45:3; v. 8a, shame before God, Jer. 15:15; v. 9, betrayed by family and friends, Jer. 12:6; and v. 21, God knows the brokenhearted and their shame, Jer. 15:18; 18:23; and 23:9.

The sections are clearly identifiable: v. 2a, call for help; vv. 2b–5, lament; v. 6, confession of sin; v. 7, prayer; vv. 8–13, lament; vv. 14–19, prayer; vv. 20–22, lament; vv. 23–29, curse of the enemy; v. 30, final prayer; vv. 31–34, thanksgiving; and vv. 35–37, later addition (Ps. 51:20–21). The gloom turns out to be heavier, the words of thanksgiving shorter, the anger against the enemy fiercer than in Psalm 22.

The title suggests that the psalm be sung according to the melody of a song named "Lilies," like Psalms 45; 60; and 80, all highly emotional compositions. In calling for fasting and sackcloth in 69:11–12, the psalmist is following popular religion, manifested in the prophetic books (Josh. 7:6; 1 Sam. 7:6; 1 Sam. 12:16; Isa. 58). These acts were not a part of official worship as defined in the Torah, where all symbols expressed life in honor of the God of life (Lev. 17:11; 21). Only during and after the Exile did these acts enter officially into Israel's religious customs (Joel 1:13–14; Zech. 7). Like Ps. 35:13, Psalm 69 may have been a bridge between the earlier, nonofficial and the later official practice.

The slanderers sat openly and shamelessly "at the [city] gate," where everyone came and went, the obvious place for news and gossip (1 Sam. 4:13), for business even as important as lawsuits (Deut. 17:5; 21:19). Evil closes in upon the psalmist from all sides, like angry flood waters (Ps. 46:3–4), swirling one into the netherworld (Pss. 6:6; 16:10; 49:15).

There are frequent citations of Psalm 69 in the NT: v. 5 in John 15:25; v. 10 in John 2:17; Rom. 15:3; and Heb. 11:26; v. 22 in Matt. 27:34; vv. 23–24 in Rom. 11:9–10; v. 25 in Rev. 16:3; v. 26 in Acts 1:20; and v. 29 in Rev. 3:5. As seen already with Ps. 68:19 and Eph. 4:8, NT writers carefully chose not only an OT text but also the most appropriate version of it. In the latter case, the midrash was preferred over the normative Hebrew text. NT writers, moreover, read OT passages within the context of their own times and experiences.

Ps. 69:10a, "zeal for your house eats me [alive]," when quoted in John 2:17 and further explained in John 2:21, undergoes substantial change in meaning. For the psalmist, zeal was directed principally toward the house of Israel, secondarily toward the Temple; he was the one being eaten alive by hostile reactions to his zeal. For John, Jesus' own zeal for the holiness of the Temple consumed him emotionally as he drove out the money-changers. Later the image changes so that his body becomes the Temple, to be consumed on the cross by the jealous rage of persecutors. Events in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus influenced the way in which the OT passage was understood.

The other major theological matter raised by Psalm 69 revolves around the curse of the enemy. The explanation of such curses involves a number of issues. Semites were a particularly emotional and eloquent people; they blessed and cursed with intensity. Some of the rhetoric followed its own literary patterns, so that Ps. 137:9 does not mean to dash babes against the city walls but rather that the enemy city and its inhabitants be conquered at any cost.

The OT, like the sequence between the various books of the NT, exhibits stages in developing traditions, evident in comparing 2 Sam. 24:1 with the later explanation in 1 Chron. 21:1. A particularly gnawing problem was the relation of Israel to the foreign nations and to the enemies within its own ranks, never satisfactorily solved—but neither was the doctrine of life after death (Ps. 6:6). The pronouncement of a sacred curse upon the enemy as well as upon a person suspected of a crime was intended to go into effect only if the person or group was really guilty (Num. 5:18–28; Deut. 27:15–26). Israel did not have internal police forces or prisons; the judicial process was handled speedily. The curse was one way of hurrying the procedure and leaving the result completely in God's hands.

Biblical anthropology did not easily distinguish sin from sinner or the individual from the community. This outlook had its disadvantages, but it also kept people thinking in a communal and responsible way. Based upon the preaching of Jeremiah (2:5, 19; 31:18), as developed within the fourth song of the suffering servant in Isaiah (52:13–53:12), some Israelites believed that the sorrow inflicted upon the sinner or the servant could be turned into a purifying and transforming force for the larger community. One must be human to pray, and oppressors are known to dehumanize their victims. As a result, those who have not been dehumanized must pray in place of those who have been victimized, and on such rare occasions there is only one possible prayer, that God destroy the oppressor. The people who wrote the curse psalms had suffered radically for sin. Such suffering serves to explain the prominence of the curses as well as the bitter tone of these psalms.

Psalm 70. From the viewpoint of literary excellence and textual preservation, Psalm 70 is one of the finest. It is repeated in Ps. 40:14–18, though with some textual disturbance and with the reintroduction of the divine name Yahweh. Psalm 70 is within the "Elohistic Psalter" (see commentary above introducing Book Two). The title to Psalm 70 adds that it is to be employed with memorial offerings (Exod. 30:11–16; Lev. 2:2). The opening verse of Psalm 70 became the traditional way for beginning the divine office of psalms and readings in Christian monastic communities.

Psalm 71. An elderly (vv. 9, 18), sick (v. 20) person evokes the memory of other psalms for strength to withstand persecution or rejection in Psalm 71. Verses 1–3 are identical with Ps. 31:2–4a; vv. 5–6 similar to Ps. 22:10–13; v. 7a to Ps. 31:12, 13; v. 12a to Pss. 22:12; 35:22; v. 12b to Pss. 38:23; 40:14; v. 13 to Ps. 35:4, 26; v. 18 to Ps. 22:31, 32; and v. 19 to Ps. 36:6. While a patchwork without title, nonetheless, Psalm 71 offers its own quiet insight into old age. Other biographical details show up: the author was faithful from youth and once an instructor in the community (71:5, 17), possibly consecrated like Samuel as a Nazirite before birth (v. 6; 1 Sam. 1:22 according to 4QSam<sup>a</sup>), or at least a Levite or priest.

The sections of the psalm are not clearly differentiated. After the introductory statement of confidence in “you, Lord” (Ps. 71:1–3; an unusual invocation of Yahweh in the Elohistic Psalter), the psalm continues with petition and motivation for the lament (vv. 4–13), follows with hope (vv. 14–21), and concludes with anticipated thanksgiving (vv. 22–24).

Verse 6 associates the psalmist with a tradition, inaugurated by Jeremiah with calmness (Jer. 1:5) and later with agony (Jer. 20:16–17) and continued with outreach toward the community of Israel by the suffering servant of Isaiah (Isa. 49:1). Instinctively the psalmist realizes that suffering is not wasted if it unites one with righteous persons whose own failure and agony spoke to Israel. The psalmist appears as a sign or portent (Ps. 71:7), whose life of suffering becomes a more effective instrument of help to others than words had ever been. The psalmist is comforted by the prophetic ministry of signs and symbolic actions in Jeremiah and Ezekiel (Jer. 28; Ezek. 12:6, 11; 24:24, 26). There are moments of revolt and anger (Ps. 71:13) but this single verse of cursing is mild compared to the preceding Psalm 69.

Concern for the community shows up in a scribal correction with 71:20. While the “spoken” form, sustaining a mournful sound in its words, saw “me,” namely, the psalmist, surrounded with hostile adversaries, the written text was changed to “us,” the congregation, those who identify themselves and their faith with the psalmist.

Psalm 72. Book One of the Psalter began and now Book Two ends with attention to the royal family of David. Psalm 72, like others composed for royal festivals (Pss. 2, 45, 89, 110, 132) and similar to other biblical passages centering on the Davidic dynasty (2 Sam. 7; Isa. 7:14; 11; Jer. 23:1–6), exhibits signs of reinterpretation. Once David’s family had suffered eclipse, it survived only as a hope for the future. New texts were composed, either like Isa. 55:3–5 in which the Davidic promises were restored to the people or like Zech. 6:9–15 where they were confided to the high priest. These revisions were drastic in their theological implications.

Such is the case of Psalm 72, composed, as the title declares, “for Solomon,” since it reflects hopes of justice for the needy and of fertility for the country, with promises of eternal dynasty, qualities associated with royalty in the ancient Near East. With serious military reversals, yet seemingly miraculous survival, in the reign of Hezekiah (727–698 B.C.; 2 Kings 18–20), the influence of contemporary texts like Isa. 9:5–6 and 11:1–9 is apparent in this psalm. Other additions came during the post-exilic period, again from the Isaian tradition (Isa. 11:10). As in other cases, one encounters as much an inspired tradition as an inspired text. This tradition kept alive the expectations of social justice. The memory of a world kingdom from the days of David and Solomon ensured that the messianic hope would in some way involve the whole world. For everyone it means that initial hope must collapse for a fulfillment greater than the first dreams.

After the introduction (Ps. 72:1–4), four short stanzas acclaim the right exercise of justice and the prosperity of the country (vv. 5–7, 8–11, 12–14, 15–16). The psalm ends with v. 17. Verses 18–19 mark a formal conclusion to the second book of the Psalter, v. 20 to the major collections of psalms from the guild of David.

The opening words of vv. 1–4, “God, give your decrees to the king,” probably accompanied a ritual act of handing to the king the scroll of the laws; or, since Israel was an oral culture in which important political events were enacted publicly, the decrees may have been given by proclamation. “He shall judge your people” significantly points out that the people are God’s, not the king’s. “To judge” is repeated twenty-five times in the psalm, an indication of the seriousness of proper public order. The judgment extends first of all to the poor, who will loom large on the messianic canvas (Zeph. 2:3; 3:12; Isa. 41:17). If a good order embraces the poor and defenseless, then it will certainly be universal, and the mountains will resound with shalom (Heb., “peace”), the integral, all-embracing fulfillment.

Ps. 72:5–7 paints a panorama of peace and justice. To the extent that this vision reflects God’s hopes, it will be eternal. Rain is a major symbol of abundance (Hos. 6:3; Isa. 45:8; 55:10–11; Joel 2:23).

Ps. 72:8–11 revives the vast extent of the kingdom, reached only in the days of David (Gen. 15:18; Exod. 23:31; Josh. 1:4; Zech. 9:10), not the more limited boundaries of post-Solomonic days (Deut. 34:1–2; Judg. 20:1; 1 Kings 5:5). The reference to Tarshish (in western Spain) and Arabia comes from the postexilic work of Isa. 60:6–10. Episodes from the time of Solomon (1 Kings 10) were given a new symbolical meaning, so that the center of the world was no longer associated with the Davidic dynasty but in the Jerusalem Temple. Ps. 72:12–14 may have been sung as a sacred meal was placed before the people (2 Sam. 6:17–19; 1 Kings 8:62–66). The ritual blessing at the end (Ps. 72:17) is formulated from the promises to Abraham (Gen. 12:2–3; 22:17–18), bestowed also upon Isaac (Gen. 26:1–5).

Ps. 72:18–19 concludes the second book (Pss. 42–72) and ties in well with the blessing of the preceding verse. Ps. 72:20 states a determination to add no new collection of psalms from the guild of David, perhaps in order to close the Psalter.

Book Three

The “Psalms of David” have ended, except for the straggler Psalm 86, and the major collection of Asaph is given (Pss. 73–83) to complete the “Elohistic Psalter” (see commentary above introducing Book Two). A second group of psalms from the guild of Korah appears next (Pss. 84–88, except 86). The final, Psalm 89, comes from the repertoire of psalms for Davidic kings, though possibly composed by a non-Israelite close to the royal family. With the third book the three principal guilds of psalm writers have completed their contribution to the songs and prayers of Israel.

Psalm 73. Psalm 73, an Asaph psalm, treats the topic of retribution for good and wicked people more vigorously than Psalms 1 or 37, more confidently than Psalm 49 or Job, with less cynicism than Ecclesiastes. The writer, like the author of Psalm 16, appears at home in the sanctuary, something to be expected in the Asaph collection (1 Chron. 16:7, 37). The style of questioning and challenging God about human affairs appeared occasionally in early literature (Exod. 3:11; 5:22; 32:11) but became solidly placed in biblical tradition with Habakkuk (Hab. 1:5, 13b) and especially with the confessions of Jeremiah (Jer. 12:1–5; 15:10–21). The single earlier work of Asaph (Ps. 50) showed the ability to absorb and control prophetic elements otherwise antagonistic to Temple worship. The Hebrew text is not the best; 73:10 and 20 make little sense.

The psalm divides into a series of dialogues about the good and wicked: first, vv. 1–12, the unhappiness of the just (vv. 1–3) and the prosperity of the unjust (vv. 4–12); second, vv. 13–20, confiding to God the lot of the just (vv. 12– 17) and the unjust (vv. 18–20); and third, vv. 21–27, the crisis and its quick solution for the just (vv. 21–26) and for the unjust (v. 27). Verse 28 concludes within the Temple.

Verses 1–12 begin with absolute faith in the goodness of God. Whatever the problem, the biblical writer never doubts God's goodness, only how to reconcile it with human events. The first confession of Jeremiah begins pointedly: “You are faithful, Lord, but I must still argue against you” (Jer. 12:1); God's reply in v. 5 never answers the question but rather insists upon stronger faith (Jer. 12:5). In the Hebrew text of Ps. 73:1, “How good toward Israel is God!” “Israel” is generally changed to read “the just,” a variation quite simple in the Hebrew, so that the personal dialogue of the psalm explicitly embraces all the people. Verses 4–5 sweep rhetorically beyond the truth. If one were to inquire of wicked people, they would admit to their share of sickness and troubles. Yet prosperous people can hide their problems more easily than the poor. Privacy is seldom a poor person's luxury. What the wicked cannot mask are the effects of luxury on their puffy faces (v. 7); their dangling jewelry reinforces their cruel indifference toward others (v. 6).

Verses 13–20 begin as emphatically as v. 1, with an effective use of sound in the Hebrew text: “Indeed, a pure heart is empty and useless!” The image of washing hands comes from the Temple ritual (Ps. 26:6) and indicates ambiguous feelings toward the Temple that the psalmist will resolve in 73:28. Yet for the psalmist to walk in the attractive way of the wicked would end in treacherous action toward “the generation of your children,” to the covenant faith of one's offspring, who are really God's children (v. 15; Gen. 17:7). Ps. 73:17 may refer to night vigils in the Temple (Ps. 42:4), where in silent darkness the psalmist finds the strengthening light of God's word (Ps. 139:11–12).

Ps. 73:21–27 begins in desperation, always the moment of surrendering, either to despair or, heroically, to God. God grants a passing intuition of eternity, the memory of which sustains a person for years afterward. Eternity, however, is not time but the endless embrace of Yahweh. The language of vv. 23–26 recalls Ps. 16:5 and is exquisite with strong repetitions of “you” and “I” (73:23) or with the contrast between a heart like flesh wasting away and a heart with the endurance of a rock because of its experience of the Lord's delight (v. 25). Within the Temple, the psalmist adds a new story of salvation to affirm for all the people the traditional salvation history of Israel (v. 28).

destruction of the Temple and the Exile of Israel, all the while sustaining faith in the covenant upon which Yahweh seems to have reneged (v. 20). For these various reasons Psalm 74, along with Psalm 79, enables Jewish people to commemorate national tragedies, so that the absent God can be tracked down by intuitions of faith. Such catastrophes as the breaching of the city walls by the Babylonians (2 Kings 25:3-4), the burning of the Temple (2 Kings 25:8-10), and the murder of Gedaliah by fellow Israelites (2 Kings 25:25) were commemorated by days of mourning and fasting during the Exile and afterward (Zech. 7; 8:19), eventually subsumed in the one day of Yom Kippur (Lev. 16). Very different from prophecy, this psalm never puts any blame on the people's sins; it is too close to the agony to speculate about the cause of such a tragedy.

The grammar of verbs within the psalm leads to its explanation and divisions: imperatives addressed to God that Yahweh live up to promises (Ps. 74:1-3, 18-23); perfect or completed tense of verbs representing the total victory of the enemy (vv. 4-9, 12-17); and imperfect or incomplete tense of verbs for Yahweh's impotent distance from Israel's tragedy (vv. 10-11). If one recognizes chiasmic structure here, then God is at the center, dealing with divine anger by remaining indifferent and inactive. The psalm enables Israelites to bring the silence of broken hearts before the silent Yahweh. Implied in the presence of God is a faith, albeit plunged in dark agony, that God affirms what is happening and that this God remains faithful to the covenant.

Verses 1-3 begin with the challenging "Why?" frequent enough in Israel's laments (Pss. 10:1; 22:2; 44:24). Yahweh is not asked but told, with the imperative mood of the verb, to "remember" the Mosaic covenant (Exod. 34:6-7) and the promises to Jerusalem (Ps. 46). God is told to walk through the ruins of the desecrated holy place, as though God may have forgotten what has happened.

Ps. 74:4-9 allows one to walk through the stages of Jerusalem's destruction: v. 4, the enemy has broken through the walls and set up victory banners within the city; vv. 5-6, they plunder and destroy; and v. 7, the Temple is put to the torch. In Isa. 63:7-64:11 the agony of such moments turns into the question "Why do you remain silent, Lord?" the only kind of prayer possible. The denial of prophetic presence in Ps. 74:9 overlooks Jeremiah, who remained in Jerusalem throughout the final chaotic days. Evidently the author's problem is precisely with a Jeremiah who announced such an outcome as God's punishment against a sinful people (Jer. 26; 28). Religious people such as those in the guild of Asaph need time to suffer silently before discussing prophetic predictions. The psalmist refuses to accept the ruins of Jerusalem and Temple as a "sign" that God spoke through the prophets. In exile, the author of Second Isaiah argued repeatedly on Jeremiah's side against the position of this psalm (Isa. 44:24-45:7). Other writers, earlier (1 Sam. 3:1; Lam. 2:9) as well as later (1 Macc. 4:46; 9:27), have recognized the silent void of prophecy.

Ps. 74:12-17, again with the perfect tense of completed action, compares the destruction of Jerusalem with the chaos before the earth was created. If the psalmist confesses that God created good order and fruitful life out of such uncontrollable darkness, then the implication is whispered: God can do it again. This description of creation is one of the closest in the Bible to Canaanite descriptions. In the silence of God, the psalmist felt obliged to reach beyond the nonexistent orthodoxy, for how can creeds exist in the absence of the God whom they confess? Verses 18-23 conclude this strange statement of faith ordering God to "remember" and to "rise" and "defend," again to "remember" and not to "forget."

Psalm 75. The question of retribution in Psalm 75 recalls wisdom literature (Pss. 1; 37), yet the focusing upon God as judge leads in the direction either of prophetic psalms (Ps. 50) or even of eschatological psalms (Pss. 96-99). Deliverance from injustice points to thanksgiving. A vigorous style (75:5-6) and strong imagery (vv. 4, 9) point one to the Temple. In fact, Temple liturgy may be the clue to appreciating this work: v. 2, a communal expression of thanksgiving; vv. 3-6, an oracle from the Lord, delivered by a priest or Temple prophet; vv. 7-9, the verdict upon the wicked, recited by a choral group; and vv. 10-11, a conclusion of praise sung by an individual cantor.

The call for thanksgiving in v. 2 associates God's imminent judgment against the wicked with God's "wondrous deeds" in Israel's history, as these are acclaimed and symbolically reenacted at the Temple. The litany of God's saving acts explains the divine name (Exod. 3:13-15).

The oracle in Ps. 75:3-6 is placed at a fixed time, possibly on one of Israel's three major feast days (Lev. 23). Ps. 75:4, typical of other Temple services, introduces Canaanite images of the world's collapse until God brings stability (Pss. 46:2-4; 74:12-17). "Horns," a symbol of strength from animal life (Ps. 22:22; Dan. 8), came to be associated with the corners of the altar and divine strength (Lev. 4:7; Ps. 118:27). The latter use may have prompted the psalmist to think of the animal-like force and fury that the wicked directed against the Lord as though they were divine.

Ps. 75:7-9, reaching to the four corners of the universe, east, west, desert (to the south of Israel), and mountains (to the north), announces the presence of the judge, lifting up the lowly, humbling the proud (1 Sam. 2:3–8), pronouncing the sentence of punishment under the symbol of “cup,” sometimes a good omen (Pss. 16:5; 23:5) but here one of pain, even agony (Ps. 11:6; Isa. 51:17–22).

Psalm 76. The concern for divine judgment against the opponents of Israel, whether internally within the ranks of the chosen people (Ps. 75) or externally from foreign invaders as in Psalm 76, continues to dominate the Asaph psalms. Psalm 76 may well be one of the earliest in the Psalter, for it refers to Jerusalem as the capital of Judah and Israel, therefore it can be no later than Solomon. Ps. 76:11 may allude to David’s victory over the Edomites (2 Sam. 8:13–14) and over Hadadezer at the entry of Hamath in Lebanon (2 Sam. 8:3–12). Theologically, Psalm 76 lines up with Korah psalms (Pss. 46–48), though it is less doctrinal, more empirical, and consequently earlier.

Psalm 76 speaks about God gloriously enthroned at Jerusalem in vv. 2–4, addresses God about past victories in vv. 5–7 and about new victories in vv. 8–10, and again speaks mostly about God in vv. 11–13. Verses 2–4 provide an excellent setting by recalling the ancient and mysterious figure of “Melchizedek, priest and king of Salem,” who acclaimed Abraham’s victory over the four kings of the north by a ritual meal of bread and wine (Gen. 14:18–21). The Hebrew words for “peace,” “his name,” and “there” (i.e., at Jerusalem) sound much alike and tie these lines together. In Ps. 76:8–10 the battles are not fought by Israel but by the Lord, so that the heavenly and earthly temples merge together and an awesome silence stuns all human forces into immobility (Hab. 2:20). This is a theophany of justice, not of wonder, as God arises to save the poor and defenseless (Ps. 75:8). Ps. 76:11 may refer to Edom and Hamath, or these words can be translated for what they mean, “humanity” (the actual reading, “Edom,” requires a slight modification) and “anger,” so that the sense would be, “The anger of all humanity will be turned to your praise,” certainly the sense of the entire psalm.

Psalm 77. Although composed in the singular, Psalm 77 does not reflect an isolated person in the guild of Asaph but speaks for all Israel at a time of sorrow. The tragedy is not named, but the association with the preceding psalm implies a military defeat or some public calamity. Despite the intensity lurking beneath silent darkness (vv. 3, 6), the psalmist remains detached from God’s anger and Israel’s sins. If we take seriously the presence of selah or “pause” after vv. 4, 10, and 16, the psalm divides as follows: vv. 2–4, introductory call for help from God; vv. 5–10, lament; vv. 11–16, a confession of faith; vv. 17–20, an ancient hymn of praise; and v. 21, a conclusion of confidence. The reference to “Jeduthun” in the title, as in Pss. 39 and 62, brings together psalms of subtle gentleness.

In 77:2–4 the psalmist cries aloud to God, if only to break the pall of silence over the night vigil (Pss. 6:7; 22:3; 32:4). Ps. 77:4 recalls the refrain in Psalms 42–43.

The opportunity for meditating during the night leads, in 77:5–10, to inner perplexity. Beneath the silence there stirs serious anxiety, yet such human emotions lead to the remembrance of God’s compassion. It is only a question, but for the person of faith, a question of critical consequence: has God forgotten pity and compassion? If so, then God has reneged on the covenantal promise and revelation in Exod. 34:6–7. The confession of faith in Ps. 77:11–16 begins in a surprising way: has God changed? The remembrance (one of the key words in this psalm along with meditation) of God’s deeds in Israel’s history revives faith. The reference to foreign peoples suggests that this psalm addresses military defeat.

Verses 17–21 represent an ancient hymn, inserted here as a conclusion to the Temple service. The armed forces of foreign countries, massed against Jerusalem, evoke the remembrance of the ancient creation stories where God overcomes chaos and brings order and prosperity. The Temple symbolized this victory and assured its repetition (Pss. 46; 74:12–17; 93). Typical of other texts (Exod. 15:1–18; Isa. 51:9–11), this hymn associates the renewal of creation with the Exodus out of Egypt.

Psalm 78. The opening lines of Psalm 78 (vv. 1–11) bear the marks of wisdom literature (Prov. 3:1; 4:2). Individual verses are chiseled finely as in Proverbs where each two or four lines serve as independent units. In Psalm 78, however, these verses are like gems in an elegant setting, as each blends into the continuous epic style. The psalm also diverges from wisdom literature, at least as known in Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Job, by its concern for Israel’s history, its extended treatment of its subject (to become the second longest poem in the Psalter), and in its strong testimony for the Jerusalem Temple.

Psalm 78 shows its closest affinity to Deuteronomy 32 and appears, as a historical epic composed by Jerusalem priests to explain the destruction of Shiloh, where the Ark resided in the early days of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:1–7:2), and the orientation of all Israel around the new shrine at Jerusalem. Yet history is not recited simply to know the past but rather to be assured of God’s direction in later ages. Most of all, the psalm insists that catastrophes, which seem to break continuity and invalidate divine promises, fit into a larger pattern under God's direction. After God's mysterious control, the next most decisive factor in history is Israel's fidelity or infidelity.

The psalm presumes the Philistine destruction of Shiloh in 1050 B.C. (1 Sam. 4) and the transfer of the Ark to the Jerusalem Temple by Solomon (1 Kings 8). It also envisages a bonding of the northern and southern tribes in worship at Jerusalem, consequently suggesting a date of composition either during the reign of Solomon (970–924 B.C.) or, better, toward the end of the reign of King Hezekiah (727–698 B.C.). At this latter time, Jerusalem emerged from near destruction and extended its control again over the north (2 Chron. 30:1–22). Events of collapse and restoration had emphasized the mysterious ways of Israel's history under God's direction. Important for the theology of history in this psalm is God's plan, first, for a unified Israel and, second, its location in Judah and Jerusalem instead of in the northern tribes and Shiloh.

The psalm begins and ends in the land of Israel, its theological point of concern. It breaks chronological order, regarding the earlier events in Egypt, to indicate that history was not being recited for its own sake. After a lengthy, solemn introduction (Ps. 78:1–11; Deut. 32:1–6), the first recital extends from v. 1 to v. 41, the second from v. 42 to v. 72. Each of these, like Deuteronomy 32, is subdivided: first, God's gracious acts in vv. 12–16, 42–55, and Deut. 32:7–14; second, Israel's rebellion in vv. 17–20, 56–58, and Deut. 32:15–18; third, divine anger and punishment in vv. 21–32, 59–64, and Deut. 32:19–25; and fourth, judgment and new beginning in vv. 33–41, 65–72, and Deut. 32:26–43.

The introduction in Ps. 78:1–11 follows a well-known pattern (Deut. 32:1–6; Ps. 50:1–6). These opening verses combine, like the rest of the psalm, remembrance of God's mighty deeds for Israel with warning and rebuke, exhortation and promise. The speaker would be an authoritative person at Jerusalem with a thorough command of tradition, manifesting a profound faith in God's presence not only in glorious moments but also in disaster and punishment. That speaker affirms nothing breaks the continuity of Israel's history.

Ps. 78:2 refers to proverbs (comparisons) and obscure riddles (as in the Samson story, Judg. 14:12) or to words spoken by God to prophets (Num. 12:8; Ezek. 17:2). Such sayings require contemplation and a heart willing to be challenged by God. Matt. 13:35 states that Jesus too spoke in parables, so that as people pondered the comparison, unanticipated insights into the mystery of God came to light. Ps. 78:8–11 is addressed principally to the northern tribes, since eventually the psalmist appeals to them to seek unity with all Israel at the Jerusalem Temple. The ancestors (v. 8) are the patriarchs, parents of all twelve tribes.

The point of comparison in vv. 12–32 is always to be located in God's gracious deeds for Israel. These wondrous acts are principally those in the wilderness of Sinai, providing food, drink, and direction. Yet the Hebrew text in v. 12 centers not so much upon wonders as upon "you, that very God, working wonders." The participle keeps the action in the present tense, implying that now God is doing the same. Yet, in vv. 17–20 the people forget quickly and "test God," as in Exod. 16:3; 17:2, 7; and Ps. 95:9. In Num. 11:4–6 the problem was not food and drink, which they had, but rather the kind of food, "the cucumbers, melons, leeks, onion, and garlic," which they craved. Testing God turned into a demand for a different kind of God, one who catered to sensuality and selfishness.

God's anger flared against them in Ps. 78:21–32, verses that still concentrate upon God's goodness and strength in caring for Israel. Anger is the exasperation of goodness taken for granted and betrayed or, as in v. 21, goodness that is not accepted as a permanent quality in God but only as an occasional exercise that cannot be counted upon in the future. Faith here is not a body of doctrine but adherence to the person of God as gracious and faithful (cf. Exod. 34:6–7).

Despite the serious break in the continuity (the previous generation was not to enter the promised land, Num. 14:20–23), the next generation will participate in the same promises (Ps. 78:33–41). These verses repeat, only now more reflectively, what had already been said in the preceding section. Verse 38 is the pivotal verse for the entire Psalter, the halfway mark of its 5,896 verses; Ps. 80:14 contains the middle letter of the Psalter. Verse 38 emphasizes that at the center of biblical religion must be a confession of a merciful God who turns anger away from the people. This verse was recited with Ps. 78:38 and Deut. 28:58–59 and 29:8, when a person was scourged forty lashes less one (cf. 2 Cor. 11:24).

Within Ps. 78:42–72 the second major recital of Israel's history is given. It begins with the plagues in Egypt, chronologically out of place but theologically well placed. Because the preceding section ended with the new generation, which will enter the land and be brought into contact with the Canaanites, this new section emphasizes God's preferential care for Israel against the non-Israelites. In the plagues God was acting for his people against foreign oppression. The plagues are adapted to the produce of Israel, vines and sycamores instead of the flax and barley stricken in Egypt (Exod. 9:31). In Ps. 78:54 God not only brings the people into the Holy Land but also establishes a major sanctuary for the Ark of the covenant at Shiloh. After the account of God's gracious deeds for Israel (vv. 42–55), the people rebel (vv. 56–58), and God allows the holy city of Shiloh to be leveled and the Ark to be captured by the Philistines (vv. 59–64). Again this serious break in continuity did not end God's fidelity to the covenant. A new generation and a new Temple at Jerusalem become the pledge of the future.

The psalm ends, affirming that this sacred history teaches that God's skillful hand and dedicated heart are always guiding the people. No break nor collapse snaps the bond of God's presence. God continues to lead the people into their destined future. The end of the Northern Kingdom did mean the end of the northern people's participation in the covenant. Many new breaks will occur, like the destruction of Jerusalem, yet Israel's history proceeds with God's direction. The citations of this psalm, or allusions to it, in the NT point out the strength of this promise for the future: v. 2 in Matt. 13:35; v. 3 in 1 John 1:1–4; v. 18 in 1 Cor. 10:9; v. 24 in John 6:31; v. 37 in Acts 8:21; and v. 44 in Rev. 16:4.

Psalm 79. Asaph, the author of this present collection of psalms, tackles hard theological and pastoral problems. With the backing of Deuteronomy, Psalm 78 discussed at length such abrupt changes as the destruction of the holy city of Shiloh and of the Northern Kingdom and concluded that these do not break the continuity of God's plans for the chosen people. Their life and worship will continue at Jerusalem. Psalm 79 faces up to the tragedy of Jerusalem's destruction. The guild of Asaph is courageously addressing Israel's national destiny: in Psalm 78, past history; in Psalm 79, the disaster of Jerusalem's reduction to ashes; in Psalm 80, the restoration of the nation; and in Psalm 81, the national return to liturgical worship.

The reflective style of Psalm 78 is impossible with the memory still tortured with agony and guilt. Psalm 79 becomes one of the most plaintive pieces in the Psalter. Many religious attitudes convulsively relate with one another: the sins of Israel and those of the nations; defilement of the Temple and God's glory; and God's compassion and the groans of prisoners. The psalmist supports his faith by delaying over lines from many other biblical laments: v. 1 from Jer. 26:18; v. 4 from Ps. 44:14; v. 5 from Ps. 89:47; vv. 6–7 from Jer. 10:25; v. 8 from Ps. 142:7; v. 9 from Pss. 23:3; 25:11; 31:4; v. 10 from Ps. 115:2; v. 11 from Ps. 102:21; v. 12 from Ps. 89:51–52; and v. 13 from Ps. 100:3.

Ps. 79:1–4 gives a description of ruin; vv. 5–7, a prayer against the enemy; vv. 8–9, a request for pardon; vv. 10–12, a call for revenge; and v. 13, a promise of thanksgiving. Today Psalm 79 is recited by Jews on Friday evening at the western wall, the only section of the Second Temple in existence, and on the ninth day of Ab (the fifth month of the Jewish calendar), commemorating the various destructions of Jerusalem.

In vv. 1–4 the psalm opens onto a Temple defiled, a city strewn with corpses and bleeding with the blood of God's covenanted people. Neighboring nations are not horrified, not even moved to compassion; they scornfully joke about Jerusalem. The psalmist draws phrases from the prophets, especially from Jeremiah, who announced that if Jerusalem continued in sin, it was doomed (Jer. 7:30; 32:34). Once Jeremiah had been ridiculed (Jer. 28) and threatened with death (Jer. 26) for making this prediction.

Ps. 79:5–12 pours out reactions pell-mell, oblivious to some of the contradictions: revenge against the enemy and an appeal to God's compassion, the sacrilegious scene and the appeal to God's glory. It is more than an issue of Israel's distress, it involves God's honor. The psalmist will shame God into acting on Israel's behalf. In v. 12 the psalmist requests the sevenfold vengeance of Cain (Gen. 4:15). The final verse returns to the theology of Psalm 78. Future generations will look back upon this tragedy. It did not break the covenant or deny the fidelity of God. In God's subsequent compassion they will find a motive for their faith and thanksgiving.

Psalm 80. Typical of a psalm, as the title indicates, to be sung like Psalms 45, 60, and 69 "according to [the melody of] Lilies," Psalm 80 is characterized by great themes handled with restraint and nobility. A double national tragedy, the collapse of the Northern Kingdom and a severe setback for the Southern Kingdom, is being lamented. Yet the traumatic effects are moderated by epithets acclaiming God as savior, by confessions of faith and a refrain. The psalm combines hope with a memory of great sorrow, optimism about a restoration of northern tribes with realism about new blows against the Southern Kingdom. Psalm 80 reflects the preaching of Jeremiah in chaps. 30–31. A likely date for composition falls within the reign of Josiah (640–609 B.C.).

Though 80:15–18 is textually damaged, one may detect a sequence of prayer and ceremony: vv. 1–3, an opening confession of faith, almost in the style of a hymn, with a petition for help; vv. 5–7, a lament of quiet agony; vv. 8–12, a second confession of faith acknowledging the gift of the promised land; and vv. 13–20, another lament almost with a touch of panic and again a reflective petition for help.

In vv. 2–4 the opening title for God, "shepherd of Israel," shows the preference of the Asaph psalms for pastoral images (Pss. 74:2; 78:52; 79:13) and for the northern tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. God as gloriously "enthroned [over the mercy seat above the Ark] between the Cherubim" (Exod. 25:17–22; Ezek. 1) contrasts with the hidden, even pitiable presence of God within Israel's recent history. Such is the type of understatement in many Asaph psalms. The refrain alludes to the priestly blessing in Num. 6:24–26 (Ps. 67:2) and adds: "bring us back," a request for national restoration and for inward turning to God.

Ps. 80:5–7 echoes lines from Psalm 42, in which the memory of Temple worship and its sacred meals becomes a sad way to describe the silencing of these rituals. Ps. 80:6 in the Hebrew ends with a vague allusion to "triple tears," which Rabbi David Kimchi (ca. A.D. 1160–1235) accommodated to the three exiles: all the people in Egypt; the northern tribes in Assyria; the southern tribes in Babylon.

Verses 9–12 recall, like Ps. 44:2–9, the early redemptive acts of God, especially the settlement in the promised land. The psalmist generously draws the boundaries according to the widest limits (2 Sam. 8:3; 1 Kings 5:1, 5; Ps. 72:8). Whatever be the surface details of life, the psalmist will not compromise the promises received from long tradition. Israel's understanding of these promises had to collapse completely before they could be revived in a new, more spiritual kingdom of God.

Many of Israel's earthly sanctuaries, once the places of worship for the patriarchs upon entering the land of Canaan (Gen. 12:6, 8; 28:10–22) and later important centers of instruction and worship, are now silenced in their charred ruins (Ps. 80:13–20). God nonetheless remains enthroned in a heavenly sanctuary (v. 15; Ps. 11:4), able to fulfill ancient promises. Ps. 80:19, which treats the gift of "new life," literally asks for revival of the nation. Out of such resurgence Israel will develop a belief in personal immortality (Dan. 12:1–3).

Just as Ps. 78:38 is the middle verse of the entire Psalter, Ps. 80:14 contains the middle letter 'ayin in the Hebrew word "forest." In Hebrew manuscripts it is always elevated above the line. The name of this letter means "eye," with the spiritual sense that the eye of a compassionate God is always upon Israel.

Psalm 81. Psalms 81 and 95 have much in common but also differ significantly: compare Ps. 95:9 with Ps. 81:8. Psalm 95 reflects Jerusalem theology and ritual; Psalm 81, with explicit reference to Joseph, the religious thought and ceremony of the northern sanctuaries. Yet Psalm 81 survived at the Jerusalem Temple. Its points of contact with Deuteronomy indicate a time for final editing during the reform of King Josiah (640–609 B.C.; 2 Kings 22:1–23:30). "The day of our feast" (Ps. 81:4) is likely the Feast of Tabernacles or Succoth, the final harvest festival, announced with trumpets (Lev. 23:33–43), at times simply called "the feast" (1 Kings 8:2; Neh. 8:14).

After the solemn introduction (Ps. 81:2–6b) and a prophetic call for silence (v. 6c), two alternate rituals are provided: one that speaks about Israel in the third person (vv. 7 and 12–17) and another addressed to Israel in the second person (vv. 8–11). Each concludes with a sacred meal.

Verses 2–6 summon a full orchestra for the opening hymn. "New moon" refers to the New Year's celebration announced by trumpet blasts (Lev. 23:23–25); the "full moon" came on the fifteenth day when the Feast of Tabernacles began (Neh. 8:1–18). Temple prophets gave their instruction at times in parables and riddles (Ps. 78:2; Num. 24:4, 16) and spoke about hidden knowledge received in visions (Mic. 3:6–7).

Ps. 81:7, 12–17, a prophetic warning against hardness and sin, may have been preceded by a proclamation of Scripture (Deut. 26:1–15). God delivers the people over to the consequences of their hard, stubborn hearts (Deut. 29:18; Jer. 3:17), yet suffering can purify and renew the people (Jer. 2:19, 30; 31:18). "The finest wheat" and "honey from the rock" combine a memory of God's care for Israel in the wilderness (Exod. 17:1–7) and the abundance of the promised land flowing with milk and honey (Exod. 3:8, 17; Ezek. 47:1–12).

Ps. 81:8–11 begins with a reference to God's thunderous descent upon Mount Sinai, a secret place of revelation. After condemning the worship of Canaanite gods, Yahweh declares, "It is I, Yahweh, your God, bringing you up from the land of Egypt." The participial form of the Hebrew combines praise with contemporaneity: Sinai and the Exodus are now.

Psalm 82. The prophetic speech in Psalm 82 summons wicked judges before the divine tribunal (v. 1), marshals the evidence against them (vv. 2–4), pronounces the verdict and sentence (vv. 5–7), and ends with an acclamation of God's universal power (v. 8). Judges are called "gods" (Heb. 'elohim) in that they stand in the place of God (Exod. 4:16; Ps. 45:7). If they do not act as Yahweh would, then they are relegated to the status of false Canaanite gods, to be condemned and swept away (Isa. 14:12–15).

The trial is placed in the heavenly assembly (Ps. 89:6–9; 1 Kings 22:19–23) and based on impartial care for the needy (Lev. 19:15). The final judgment as announced by Jesus is to depend on the same criteria (Matt. 25:31–46). Ps. 82:5, in announcing the chaotic dissolution of the earth with its evil, declares the strong bonds between the moral and physical order.

Psalm 83. The last of the Asaph psalms, typically composed with strength and broad perspective, is also the final psalm in the Elohistic Psalter (see commentary above introducing Book Two). Psalm 83 may also be one of the earliest in the entire book of Psalms. Its geographical references reflect the hostile nations circling Israel in the period of the judges (1250–1050 B.C.; Judg. 4–5, 7–8), except that the reference to Assyria comes from the ninth century. It is possible, however, that a much later author drew these names from the ancient past to symbolize all angry forces through the ages (cf. Isa. 66:19). (To identify the nations listed in Ps. 83:7–12, → entries for the individual names.)

After the call for help (v. 2), a long lament voices the fear and anger of Israel as armies march against its land (vv. 3–9). Lines similar to the prophetic oracles against the nations follow, drawing down a divine curse upon them (vv. 10–19). These sections may have originated in sanctuary services before war (1 Sam. 4:4–9; 7:5–9), but the prophets turn them into a theological discussion of the role of the nations in the salvation of Israel (cf. Amos 1:3–2:16; Isa. 13–23). This final section transforms the military assault into an attack upon Yahweh as supreme God. Such an early text is not announcing the worship of Yahweh by other nations, only that Yahweh controls world events for the sake of the chosen people, Israel, and that survivors from these nations will join Israel, a phenomenon happening continuously from the time of the Exodus out of Egypt (Exod. 12:38).

Psalm 84. The second group of psalms from the guild of Korah (Pss. 84–85, 87–88) begins with the same melancholic tone as the first (Pss. 42–49). Psalm 84, along with Psalms 63 and 120–134, may have been sung on pilgrimage to the sanctuary. In 84:7 the reference to rain may locate the psalm at the festival of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:23–43; Zech. 14:16–19). The psalm is structured as follows: vv. 2–4, a meditative introduction; vv. 5–8, on the journey; vv. 9–12a, prayers and reflection at the Temple; and vv. 12b–13, preparations for the return journey. The Hebrew text is frequently difficult and variously translated.

Verses 2–4 begin with peaceful sadness. The desire for God touches every side of the psalmist's person: soul, the center of breathing and responding to life; heart, the center of reflection and understanding; and flesh, the site of deeply felt weakness. The mention of a bird adds a touch of delicate sensitivity (Gen. 8:6–12; Jer. 4:25).

Ps. 84:5–6 begins as v. 13 ends, with a formula about the happiness of dwelling in the house of the Lord and trusting always in the Lord (Ps. 1:1). The two moments coalesce in “ever singing the Lord’s praises.” In 84:7a the rare and difficult Hebrew word baka’ with a slight emendation can be read as “tears.” The ancient church hymn to Mary, “Salve Regina,” followed the Latin Vg. with a phrase common in ordinary speech: “in this [earthly] vale of tears.” Tears offer a parallel to the early rain in the second part of this verse. Yet that passage too is not absolutely safe textually and can be translated, “The choir intones blessings [for God].”

After a ceremonial prayer for the king (vv. 9–10), the psalmist’s personal reflection is recorded (vv. 11–12a) and, finally, the prayer for a safe journey home (vv. 12b–13).

Psalm 85. Psalm 85 is a national lament not nearly as intense as those of Asaph (Pss. 74; 80); it is moderated by ritual and the repetition of key words. Ritual, in fact, may explain the unusual structure. The ceremony begins with a hymn of confidence (85:2–4) and follows with lament and prayer (vv. 5–8). An oracle of peace from a Temple prophet marks the centerpiece of the service (vv. 9–10), and afterward there is a meditation upon the oracle (vv. 11–14). The Hebrew text exhibits an effective use of key words: shub, or “return,” in vv. 2b, 4b, 5a, 7a, 9b; ’eret, or “land,” in vv. 2a, 10b, 12a, 13b; shalom, or “peace,” in vv. 9b, 11b, 14b; and chesed, or the Lord’s “steadfast love,” in vv. 8a, 10b, 11a. For these and other reasons, the psalm may be a prayer for a return from Exile and for a new era of peace in the promised land.

Verses 2–4 focus at once on land, always the recipient of God’s blessings when the people are faithful (Amos 9:13–15), otherwise the victim of devastation (Jer. 14:1–22; Joel 1–2; Isa. 24). The new exodus cannot start without forgiveness of sin (Isa. 40:1–2; 43:25).

Ps. 85:5–8 borders on the outer edge of impatience. Must suffering for one’s sins continue indefinitely (Pss. 74:1; 77:8–10; Isa. 63:7–64:11)? As at the end of Psalm 44, the final appeal is to chesed, the steadfast love uniting Yahweh and Israel in covenant. Ps. 85:9–10 responds with an oracle pronouncing peace, yet peace with its own expectations (Isa. 57:19–21; Jer. 14:13). Therefore the warning is given in Ps. 85:9b, “Let them not return to foolishness.” In meditating upon the oracle in vv. 11–14, the psalmist links the gift of new peace with the covenantal promises of Yahweh (Exod. 34:6–7). This “truth” or “fidelity” springs from the earth in the righteous living of people.

Psalm 86. The sole psalm of David in Book Three and an individual’s lament, Psalm 86 remains an anomaly in a section otherwise dealing with national sorrows. Its contacts are with other "Psalms of David" in Book One or in Book Five (Pss. 138–145). The psalm, moreover, is more a filigree of phrases from elsewhere in the Psalter than an independent creation (e.g., v. 1b from Ps. 40:18a; v. 2 from Ps. 25:20; v. 3 from Ps. 57:2–3). Verse 14 is lifted out of Ps. 54:5 and breaks the spirit of gratitude here. This anthological method becomes even more common in Book Five (so Pss. 135; 143).

A style such as this presumes time to moderate one's initial shock over tragedy and to meditate. More verses deal with confidence and thanksgiving in the center of the psalm than with lament at the beginning and end. The transitional v. 11, asking Yahweh to "teach me your way," begs for still more time to enable more profound appreciation.

After the initial call for help (vv. 1–7), a hymn of confidence is voiced (vv. 8–10) and then one of gratitude (vv. 11–15). The psalm ends with renewed lament and prayer (vv. 16–17). The covenant theology of Exodus 34 returns at important moments: in v. 5, to induce God to respond and in v. 15, to sustain thanksgiving. Yahweh shows up differently from all other gods (v. 8) precisely because of his loving-kindness and fidelity and therefore a penchant to forgive (which Voltaire called God's metier or normal life-style). These qualities that make Yahweh to be truly God define what the Bible means by divinity and show the complete deficiency of all other pretenders at divinity. This monotheism leads to a rare biblical statement on universal salvation (v. 9). The same sequence from Yahweh's extraordinary kindness and forgiveness, to the nothingness of other gods, to universal salvation marks the writing of Second Isaiah. It may have been this prophet's interpretation of the Mosaic covenant that led to Psalm 86.

Psalm 87. Textually one of the most difficult in the Psalter, Psalm 87 leaves us guessing about its meaning. The phrase three times repeated, "this one [or everyone, in v. 5] was born there," in a context speaking of major foreign countries, leaves the first impression of new life for all nations by their worship of Yahweh. Their names will be recorded in the book of the living (v. 6; Pss. 56:9; 69:29; 139:16). Perhaps like other isolated statements about the salvation of the nations (Amos 9:7; Isa. 49:6), this one was too important to suppress and yet too difficult to integrate with other biblical positions—so Psalm 87 was neglected. It adds a special contribution to other psalms from the Korah guild honoring Jerusalem (Pss. 46–48).

The psalm may possibly have a more restricted meaning, referring not to foreign nations but to individual converts from their midst (Isa. 44:5) or simply to Israelites living among them and always tempted to apostasy.

This sequence is suggested: Ps. 87:1–3, Yahweh's choice of Zion; vv. 4–6, Zion, mother of all; and v. 7, conclusion.

Psalm 88. Completely isolated and close to death from serious illness, without the luxury of community liturgies or traditional prayers as in Psalm 86, the psalmist is hardly a human being, only a cadaver ready for the grave in Psalm 88. This is not a theological commentary on death but a prayerful diary of personal depression. For this psalmist, all answers to the absurdity of death smack of pious simplicity; prayer is the only refuge. "Dialogue" may best direct us through the psalm: 88:2–3, calling to God for a hearing; vv. 4–6, a lament oblivious of God; vv. 7–9, dialogue with a hostile God; vv. 10–13, another appeal to God; vv. 14–17, again the silent God; and vv. 18–19, conclusion.

The title attributes the psalm to the family of "Heman" within the guild of Korah, a group well known for liturgical songs and leadership (1 Chron. 6:17–18; 16:41–42). The psalmist, however, in sickness experiences a silent isolation from worship. "Ezrahite" indicates a native-born person, possibly from early Canaanite stock (Lev. 19:33–34). "Mahalath," from the word for sickness, suggests a sad melody (Ps. 53).

In 88:2–3 the appeal to "God, my salvation" extends through day and night. After setting up this contrast, the psalmist, in vv. 4–6, suddenly turns completely away from God and peers into the dark, inactive, formless experience of Sheol (Ps. 6:6). In 88:7–9 the psalmist paradoxically turns to God from this pit where God is said to remember no one. The sickness, like leprosy (Lev. 13), puts friends, who have once experienced one's deepest thoughts, at a distance. Again in Ps. 88:10–13 the psalmist appeals to God from Sheol, introducing aspects of Israel's creed and worship into the unclean abode of the dead; these lines bristle with contradictions. Verse 13 had led to this psalm's use as a traditional morning prayer, the normal time for interceding with God (Ps. 5:4; 30:6). The psalm concludes in 88:18–19, very similar to the end of the first half (vv. 8–9).

Psalm 89. Psalm 89 provides a commentary on 2 Samuel 7 and the perpetual promises to the Davidic family. By a skillful transfer of titles from God to David, this psalm places in the king's hands the power of God to bring peace out of chaos, to induce life out of sterility. Psalm 89 belongs to the repertoire of royal psalms (Pss. 2; 45; 72; 110). Located at the end of Book Three, it links this book (with only one psalm of David, Ps. 86) with the Davidic sponsorship of psalm writing. The psalm ends with a long lament, as though God had reneged upon divine promises by permitting a major military defeat.

Psalm 89 is frequently quoted or alluded to in the NT: vv. 4–5 in Peter's Pentecost discourse (Acts 2:30); v. 21 in Paul's speech at Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:22); v. 11 in Mary's canticle (Luke 1:51); and v. 53 in Zechariah's canticle (Luke 1:68).

The psalm divides into three major sections, stitched together by the key words of covenant, steadfast love, and fidelity (Exod. 34:6–7). Quite a few other parallels help achieve a compact unity within this long psalm. First is a hymn honoring Yahweh: vv. 2–3, invitation; vv. 4–5, oracle for the king; and vv. 6–19, Yahweh's supremacy over all gods (vv. 6–9), over the universe (vv. 10–15), and over the liturgy (vv. 16–19). Second is an oracle honoring the Davidic king: v. 20a, introduction; vv. 20b–28, the king as Yahweh's representative; and vv. 29–38, divine promises to the king. Third is a lament over the rejection of the king: vv. 39–53.

For a further explanation of the title's reference to an Ezrahite (v. 1), see the commentary above on Ps. 88:1. The opening lines (89:2–3), in announcing a hymn of praise for Yahweh, center upon the covenantal qualities of Yahweh as merciful and faithful (Exod. 34:6–7); these are linked with the stability of the heavens, for who can ever disturb the movement of the sun and stars (so Jer. 31:35–37). Ps. 89:4–5 transfers the same words and image to the dynasty of David. Royalty receives unconditional, divine promises, as in 2 Samuel 7, and so exhibits more stability than the Mosaic covenant, dependent upon the people's obedience. The king, as "my chosen one," represents all Israel, God's chosen people (Exod. 19:5–6; Deut. 7).

The cosmic hymn to Yahweh (Ps. 89:6–19) is sung in part by the heavenly hosts (vv. 6–9), another part by a combined choir of heaven and earth (vv. 10–15), and the final section by an earthly assembly (vv. 16–19). The hymn opens with Yahweh enthroned in the heavenly sanctuary (Ps. 11:4), surrounded by an assembly of holy ones, "children of the gods" (cf. Pss. 29:1; 82:6), the host of heaven (1 Kings 22:19)—various names drawn from Canaanite religion and represented by the statues of the cherubim on either side of the Ark (Exod. 25:17–22). Decisions about the Davidic dynasty are first ratified before the heavenly throne. In Ps. 89:10–15 the mythology about Baal's conquering the sea (Ps. 29) is transferred to the one supreme God, Yahweh, who overcomes the sea monsters of evil and chaos to create a new stable world, the home of the Lord's kindness and fidelity. The final lines of the hymn (89:16–19) bring us to the earthly sanctuary where the Davidic king is waiting.

Verses 20–38 present an oracle (cf. v. 20a with Pss. 2:7; 110:1) along prophetic lines (Isa. 2:1), promising the king many of the powers reserved to Yahweh. The strong arm of the Lord crushing sea monsters (Ps. 89:11) now strengthens the king (v. 22). The Lord who rules the sea and the ocean currents (vv. 10–11) places the hand of the king over these forces. "Kindness and fidelity," God's special qualities (vv. 2–3), rest with the king.

The final section consists of a lament (vv. 39–46) and a prayer (vv. 47–52), stitched closely with the preceding two parts: kindness and fidelity (vv. 2–3, 15, 25, 29–30, 34, 50); "right hand" of Yahweh (v. 14), of the king (v. 26), and now of the enemy (v. 43); and ancient eternal promises to David (vv. 4–5, 37–38, and 50–51). Military disaster poses a serious threat to Yahweh and the religion of Israel. The strong, stereotyped phrase, "How Long!" bursts out (cf. Ps. 6:4). Ps. 89:53 concludes Book Three (cf. other such concluding verses, Pss. 41:14; 72:18–20; 106:48).

Book Four

The psalms here are almost completely unsigned. After the major collections of David, Korah, and Asaph in the first three books, this collection appears like an appendix. Psalms 101 and 103 come like stragglers from the David guild. The name of Moses bonds these psalms together: 90:1; 99:6; 103:7; 105:26; and 106:16, 23, 32.

Psalm 90. Psalm 90, a communal lament, stems perhaps from a sick person too young for death and humbly conscious of sin. Because life is short and irreversible, the psalmist begs God for immediate forgiveness. Perhaps this divine action will bring a return to good health (v. 13). Little is granted to conscious survival after death (Ps. 6:6), nor does the psalm allude to God's great historical deeds in Israel's favor. The absence of these ideas brings the psalm into the realm of wisdom literature. Major sections may be spotted by stylistic changes: 90:1–2, hymnic introduction; vv. 3–12, wisdom stanza about the shortness of life; and vv. 13–17, prayer for assistance. The Hebrew text is poorly preserved and variously translated.

"Man of God" in the title (v. 1a) surrounds Moses with the authority of a charismatic figure like Samuel (1 Sam. 9:6) and Elijah (1 Kings 17:18, 24). The opening hymn (Ps. 90:1b–2) praises Yahweh for giving birth to the cosmos just as Yahweh later begets Israel as a favorite people. Comparing the earth to Israel declares that each has an origin, a character, and a purpose uniquely bestowed by Yahweh. Suffering disrupts this divine order and, therefore, poses a fundamental problem.

Verses 3–12 begin with reflection common to the sages: life for everyone is very short, so quickly the sentence is delivered, “return to dust” (v. 3), possibly a reference to Gen. 3:19. Because life is transitory, “a thousand years are like yesterday.” The psalmist refers to the suddenness of death and one’s descent into the dark grave of Sheol; from this passage, 2 Pet. 3:8 concludes that the Messiah will appear unexpectedly. Even children are not always guaranteed survival, as Ps. 90:5–6 (textually very corrupt) says: “Their offspring change as grass changes; in the morning it sprouts and flourishes and in the evening it fades and withers.” “Hidden sins” (v. 8) refers to violations of ceremonial taboos and other unknown infringements (Ps. 19:13; Lev. 5:14–19).

“Seventy” (Ps. 90:10) was not a normal life span, since the average life span of a person at this time was forty-four years. According to Jer. 25:11, “seventy” indicated the full number of years for the Exile. “Daybreak” (v. 14) refers to a revival of life, a special time for prayer (Pss. 30:6; 46:6; 143:8), to realize the wisdom of divine providence.

Psalm 91. This psalm of confidence, Psalm 91, was prepared for an entrance and departure liturgy at the Temple; other examples for solemn entry occur in Psalms 15 and 24, with a longer service in Psalm 95. At the beginning there is a blessing from a priest (Ps. 91:1–4) and a promise of protection from Yahweh (vv. 5–9); similarly at the end, a blessing for the return into daily life (vv. 10–13) and an oracle promising God’s protection (vv. 14–16). Although there is some contact with wisdom literature (Prov. 3:13–16; Job 5:17–26), closer bonds tie Psalm 91 with the Blessing of Moses in Deuteronomy 32 (see the title for Ps. 90). Because of allusions to pestilence and sickness, the psalm is adapted to a prayer service for good health that included exorcism of demons.

Ps. 91:1–2 invites the worshiper into the protection of the Temple, possibly for a night vigil (Pss. 1:2; 42:4). The wings of the cherubim on either side of the Ark (Exod. 25:17–22) symbolize Yahweh’s protective overshadowing (Pss. 17:8; 36:8). The darkness of the night contrasts with the blinding glory of the Lord’s presence (1 Kings 8:10–13; Ps. 139:11–12), which does not reflect blind superstition but a personal bonding with “my God in whom I trust.” Fearful demons (cf. Isa. 34:14; Tob. 3:8; 6:15; Eph. 2:2; 6:12) prowl the night, killing the firstborn of Egypt (Exod. 12:29) and the army of Sennacherib (Isa. 37:36). The exorcism of evil spirits leads to new promises from God (Ps.

91:5–8). The “noonday demon” (v. 5) may refer to sunstroke or else to voluptuous living with false security (→ Satan).

The second blessing from the priest before departure (vv. 10–13) asks the protection of the angels, so that each individual Israelite is led as all the people were conducted through the wilderness (Exod. 23:20; 32:34). God does not remove the dangers but provides strength for the struggle that purifies and strengthens. The promise of a long, peaceful life (Ps. 91:16) represents a supreme biblical gift (Ps. 23:6; 34:13; 54:9), a sign of the final age (Isa. 51:6; 65:20), possibly of eternal happiness (Ps. 1:3; 16:8).

Psalm 92. Psalm 92 is a hymn of thanksgiving with a strong wisdom influence, possibly by an elderly priest (v. 15) after some deliverance. The psalm bears the earmarks of worship. After opening with a fully orchestrated call to worship (vv. 2–4), vv. 5–6 offer motivation from Yahweh’s mighty deeds for Israel (Ps. 136). Next, one meets wisdom’s instruction about retribution (92:10–12) and a closing benediction upon righteous people (vv. 13–16).

The title (v. 1) assigns Psalm 92 to Sabbath services. The people are to rejoice (v. 3) as God did at the end of creation (Gen. 2:3). The psalm, like the Sabbath, combines joy over nature’s beauty with care for moral harmony between people. The divine name Yahweh occurs seven times in the psalm, perfect for “Sabbath” which means “seventh.”

In Ps. 92:2–6 music from many types of instruments becomes an intuitive, almost mystical way of providing dialogue with God and of reliving the Lord’s wondrous deeds toward Israel. The Hebrew word for melody comes from a root that signifies quiet, repetitive prayer. Daily Temple sacrifices at dawn and in the evening may have been one of the early settings for this psalm (Exod. 29:38–42).

Ps. 92:7–12 gives an instruction prompted by wisdom literature and its concern about proper retribution for the wicked and the just. Wisdom, close to nature, also shows a penchant to think about creation (Prov. 8:22–31). Because of the Sabbath (Ps. 92:1), the praise of “your works, Lord” (v. 6) may direct attention to the works of God’s hand across the heavens and the earth (Gen. 1:1–2:4; Ps. 8:4). The wicked will be buried in darkness. At this early age the text refers to oblivion, not to eternal damnation.

The comparison of the just to palm trees and the cedars of Lebanon (92:13) evokes memories of many biblical passages about strength and uprightness (Pss. 1:3; 29:5; 80:11), wealth and beauty (1 Kings 5:21–23), and future, messianic blessing (Hos. 14:5–6; Isa. 41:18–19). The everlasting Sabbath will have arrived.

Psalm 93. The Greek version as well as the Talmud assign Psalm 93 to the eve of the Sabbath (Ps. 92:1), when God had completed the created world for habitation. The thought and language echo the Canaanite myths of creation (Pss. 29; 89:10–14) and the divine enthronement (Pss. 96–99; Zech. 14:16–19). Each Sabbath marked a new victory of Yahweh as king, allowing the worshiper to begin life anew, in harmony with creation and covenant.

The style is rapid, condensed, and forceful, almost like thunder, effective with repetition, and controlled in its development. Ps. 93:1–2 lays out the setting; vv. 3–4 orchestrate the liturgical action; v. 5 concludes gloriously. Though in a different mood, Ps. 19:2–5 presents a similar scenario.

The opening words, “Yahweh rules as king,” echo the shouts in 2 Sam. 15:10 and 1 Kings 1:11, except that here the name of the king is first, emphasizing the person of Yahweh rather than the moment of enthronement. Yahweh’s normal throne is above the floodwaters in the heavens (Pss. 11:4; 29:3). In 93:5 the phrase “your precepts” may possibly read “your throne,” so that the psalm ends as it begins, in the heavenly sanctuary.

Psalm 94. A national lament, Psalm 94 utilizes many literary forms such as narrative, interrogation, mourning, and instruction, with a clear, vigorous style and a sincere, forthright attitude. The structure, after the introduction (vv. 1–2), follows the format of chiasm (see commentary above on Ps. 19:2): A pretensions of the lawless (vv. 3–7); B questions (vv. 8–10); C the center with Yahweh’s care for persecuted people (vv. 11–15); B’ questions (vv. 16–20); and A’ pretensions, with resolution in Yahweh (vv. 21–23). The Greek version and the rabbinical tradition add a title: “Of David, for the fourth day of the week.”

In vv. 1–2 the language is less violent than it seems, if one recalls that it uses stereotypic formulas (Pss. 18:48; 58:11; Isa. 34:8; 35:4). Vengeance is often the response of someone who loves dearly and witnesses abuse heaped upon a loved one. More than once Israel shouted to God: “Rise up!” (Pss. 7:7; 44:24). The word for “pride” (94:2) is from a root, “to rise up” arrogantly. When vv. 3–7 record the insolence of the wicked, prophetic language merges with the psalm (cf. Amos 8:4–6; Mic. 2:1–3). The center of the psalm (94:11–15) records the Lord’s reaction (Ps. 12:6). Ps. 94:11 and 15 contain a notion, frequent in Jeremiah, that punishment can be purifying and instructive (Jer. 2:19, 30; Prov. 3:12). Human plans are no more substantive than breath or hebel, a Hebrew word sometimes translated “vanity” (Eccles. 1:1–2). Such empty and dark silence was almost the lot of the psalmist (Ps. 94:17), a line that is dramatically reversed in v. 19. The questions in vv. 16–20 reflect agony but not doubt, as they lead to the finale (vv. 21–23).

Psalm 95. The Greek version assigns Psalm 95, like Psalms 90, 92, 93, to the Sabbath or its eve. Later rabbinical tradition associates it with the New Year’s festival, preparing for the Yahweh-as-king songs, Psalms 96–99. Significant similarities and differences show up in comparison with Psalm 81, with mention of Meribah and Massah, of the hardening of heart, of testing God in Psalm 95 or the people in Psalm 81. This present psalm belongs at Jerusalem, where Yahweh alone is invoked as “rock” (Ps. 18:3).

A procession makes its way toward the Jerusalem Temple, possibly beginning at the Gihon sanctuary (1 Kings 1:33), up the Kidron valley, and climbing to the Temple mount (Ps. 95:1–5). Before the Holy of Holies, there is a ceremony of adoration and prayer (vv. 6–7a) and then of biblical reading and sermon. The ceremony concludes with the prophetic oracle in vv. 7b–11. The hypothesis of biblical reading and sermon explains the abrupt transition in v. 7b. The literary style stands out clearly: vv. 1–7a, two hymns with a call to praise in vv. 1–2 and 6 to be sung by the entire congregation, and with motivation for praise in vv. 3–5 and 7a to be chanted by a special choir; and vv. 7b–11, an oracle by a Temple prophet (Ps. 50).

Ps. 95:1–2 encourages the people in their procession: “Come, let us draw near God’s face” (cf. Ps. 42:3); v. 6 calls upon the people at the Temple to fall prostrate before the Lord. Yahweh, “a great king over all the gods” (v. 3), stands in contrast with the various gods worshiped by Solomon’s wives on a neighboring hill. God, in searching out the peaks of the mountains and the depths of the valleys, appears as king over the universe as well as over the height and depths of the human heart (cf. Job 11:7). In creating sea and dry land, God is master of all creation, even in its hostile forms (Pss. 29; 89:10–11).

The transition to the prophetic oracle begins with “Today!” as in Deut. 4:40; 5:3; and 6:6. Meribah and Massah are the places where the people angered God and where Moses struck the rock for water (Exod. 17:1–7; Deut. 6:16; 8:15). If the present generation continues with the same stubbornness, then they will be exiled from the land of rest (cf. Deut. 12:8–12).

Psalm 96. Psalm 96 is the parent of hymnology, sacred compositions composed of phrases and lines from the Bible: compare v. 1a and Ps. 33:3a; Isa. 42:10a; v. 2b and Isa. 40:9; 52:7; v. 4b and Pss. 48:2; 95:3; vv. 7–9 and Ps. 29:1–2; v. 10b and Ps. 93:1c; v. 10c and Ps. 9:9b; v. 11a and Ps. 97:1; v. 11b and Ps. 98:7b; and v. 13 and Ps. 98:9. The psalm itself became part of a new hymn in 1 Chron. 16:8–36, which combines Pss. 105:1–15; 96; and 106:1, 47–48. Biblical writers continued to adapt older passages to new historical and religious settings.

Because Psalms 96–99 were intended for Temple worship (the Greek version indicates for the Feast of Tabernacles), these psalms are not so much addressing the final age of the world as its anticipation in liturgy (Zech. 14:16–19). The structure stands out clearly: two calls for praise, Ps. 96:1–3, 7–9; two motivations, vv. 4–6, 10–13 (→ Eschatology).

Verses 1–3 draw heavily from Isaiah 40–55 to relive within the liturgy the herald's announcement of a new song. For the sake of Israelites, not the nations, Ps. 96:3 proclaims, "the nations' gods [Heb. 'elohim] are worthless ['elim]."

In citing Ps. 29:1–2, the psalmist makes two theological corrections in 96:7–9: "children of the gods" becomes "families of nations" and, instead of Canaanite phrases about thunder, ritual gifts are presented in the Temple. (For the acclamation "Yahweh reigns as King," see the commentary above on Ps. 93:1.) Yahweh's world kingship is exercised for the sake of divine justice, fulfilling the covenantal promises to Israel (Exod. 34:6–7).

Psalm 97. Like Psalm 50, Psalm 97 too draws upon prophetic preaching to insist that true worship includes social justice. Psalm 97 is heavily dependent upon Isaiah 40–55, the great prophetic book of consolation from the Exile and weaves the key word "righteousness" (Heb. tsedeq) in and out of the psalm. Yahweh will always be true to divine promises and so exemplify "justice" and "righteousness." Concerned this much about liturgy, the psalm is not announcing the end, technically called "eschaton," but a momentary fulfillment in Israel's liturgy, especially at the Feast of Tabernacles (Pss. 29; 93; 96; Zech. 14:16–19). Other major sources for the author are Pss. 18:8–16; 77:17–20; and Habakkuk 3.

Ps. 97:1–6 describes a theophany like the awesome manifestation of Yahweh on Mount Sinai (Exod. 19) and traditional hymns dependent on that episode (Judg. 5; Hab. 3; Ps. 68). Altogether these brilliant songs announce a continuously glorious presence of Yahweh in Israel's history. The liturgy reenacts what the eyes of faith recognize in hidden depths. Liturgy brings such reality to the surface at least for the day. Twice righteousness enters the theophany: at the base of Yahweh's throne (97:2b) and in heavenly proclamation (v. 6a).

In vv. 7–12, motifs and imagery from literature about "the day of the Lord" bring a fiery judgment upon all who set up rival deities and abuse the rights of people (Zeph. 1:14–18). Life-giving light will envelop Yahweh's faithful ones, those with the Lord's concern for the poor and the hopes of Israel (Isa. 2:2–5; 60:1–4; → Justice).

Psalm 98. The spirit, literary form, and themes of the two preceding psalms continue in Psalm 98 with the same heavy dependence upon Isaiah 40–55. In fact, the final verse repeats the end of Psalm 96. While Second Isaiah was singing of the glorious new exodus to the homeland, Psalm 98 repeats the melodies back in the land of Israel. Even if the fulfillment of Second Isaiah's expectations hardly lived up to the excitement and grandeur of the announcement, nonetheless by faith one can relive such hopes and so anticipate their final realization through Temple liturgy (vv. 4–6). Again salvation and justice are joined carefully together (Isa. 46:13; 51:5, 6, 8) so that Israel is advised that the glorious fulfillment of divine promises requires the pursuit of social justice with the compassion of the covenant God (Ps. 98:3). Yahweh's future is mysteriously linked with Israel's obedience.

Psalm 99. Yahweh's royalty is not a myth like that of Canaanite gods; it is closely associated with Israel's history and institutions as well as with justice for the people. References to king and priesthood allude to the pre-exilic age and, especially, the time of First Isaiah (Isa. 1–39). Psalm 99 is divided into three stanzas: vv. 1–3, enthronement of Yahweh; vv. 4–5, Yahweh's concern for justice in the rule of kings; and vv. 6–9, Yahweh's reception of prayers from three mediators. The doxology of Isa. 6:3, "Holy, holy, holy," becomes a refrain, expanded with each stanza. The refrains keep the focus entirely upon the Lord as enthroned above the Ark (Exod. 25:17–22). In Ps. 99:5, however, the Temple and Ark are rightly presented as "the footstool" for Yahweh; the normal presence of God is in heaven (Ps. 11:4).

The great priest-intercessors are named: Moses (Exod. 17:11–15; 32:11–14); Aaron (Exod. 28:29–30; Num. 17:11–15); and Samuel (1 Sam. 7:7–12; 12:19). Because of God's holiness, human mediators are needed, trained in the traditions and in dialogue with Yahweh. God, who once led by the pillar of cloud (Exod. 14:24; 33:9–10; Num. 10:34), in Ps. 99:7 just as truly directs the people through priests at sanctuaries.

Psalm 100. If Psalms 91–99 constitute a booklet for worship on Sabbaths and important feasts, Psalm 100 is their final doxology. It consists of two minihymns: vv. 1–3 for the procession and vv. 4–5 for the thanksgiving service within the Temple, leading to a sacred meal (Ps.

81:11, 17). The call to praise in each case breaks with excitement. Yahweh made Israel by bringing it out of Egypt to be a chosen people (100:3; Exod. 3:7–10; 19:3–6). “Steadfast love” and “fidelity” conclude the psalm with the major attributes of God as Lord of the covenant (Ps. 100:5; Exod. 34:6–7).

Psalm 101. A discourse from the throne, possibly on the day of coronation (Pss. 2; 110) or on some other royal festival (Pss. 18; 72), Psalm 101 begins with a call to praise (101:1) and a promise to live and judge morally (vv. 2–3a). Specific pledges are mentioned, some negative (vv. 3b–5) and some positive (vv. 6–7). In the conclusion, the psalmist affirms that justice shall prevail (v. 7). A strong influence from wisdom literature is recognizable (Prov. 4:14; 6:12–19; 8:15–16).

The opening words, “steadfast love and justice,” accord to the Davidic royalty the major goals of the Mosaic covenant (Ps. 89:2–5; Exod. 34:6–7); they also bring the support of Moses to the throne. A series of “I” statements pledge the king’s word to the cause of moral integrity (Ps. 18:21–25). The hope within the final verse in Psalm 78 will be pursued (cf. Gen. 20:5–6; 1 Kings 9:4). The negative side of what is unacceptable (Ps. 101:3b–5) as well as the positive requirements (vv. 6–7) recall the conditions for entering the sanctuary (Pss. 15; 24). The king was the guardian of the Temple and of the Torah (1 Kings 8). These lines stress the king’s personal obligation by using the first person, “I hate . . . I do not know . . . I destroy.” The break of morning (Ps. 101:8) was not only the time for judicial procedures (Jer. 21:12), but it was also the moment of salvation (Ps. 46:6; Isa. 37:36).

Psalm 102. In the fifth of the seven penitential psalms, the lament of a sick person merges with lamentation over devastated Jerusalem. Yahweh’s everlasting presence provides the theological backdrop. Unlike Psalm 51, words for sin and guilt are conspicuously absent. As the prayer of an individual, the psalm is suffused with tender sensitivity; this attitude is directed in turn to the stones and dust of Jerusalem. National mourning over fallen Jerusalem keeps the individual’s lament from excessive introspection and adds the element of faith in Yahweh’s eternal presence and promises. Publicly expressed pain leads to personal strength and a vision beyond older limitations. The influence of prophecy and wisdom may have opened the door of the psalmist’s vision for Jerusalem and the world. Ps. 102:2–12, 24–25 record the individual’s lament, vv. 13–23, 26–29 a lament over Zion that leads to new confidence.

Jewish tradition in the Mishnah (m. Ta’an. 2.3) assigns this psalm to fasting days (Zech. 7:5; 8:19). The opening call for help (Ps. 102:2–3) speaks in the traditional language of prayer. There follow other accepted expressions for sorrow; “my bones burn with fire within” (v. 4) repeats the urgent pleading of Jer. 20:9. Groans from physical pain direct us to a very sick person, without appetite, sleepless, gaunt and emaciated, in danger of premature death, and, worst of all, quarantined and lonely. The sound of an unclean bird, the night owl (Ps. 102:7; Lev. 11:17), captures the whole scene.

Ps. 102:13–23 weaves in passages and themes from prophetic literature of the exilic and postexilic ages. The rebuilding of Zion will bring a new glorious presence of Yahweh to the wonderment of the nations (Isa. 40:5; 41:5; 59:19; 60:2). The psalmist is still speaking from loss (Ps. 42), for in quoting Lam. 5:19, Ps. 102:13 replaces the “throne” of Yahweh with “the memory of you.” In v. 19 the psalmist requests a writing tablet to record these words. Future generations will be supported in their faith by Yahweh’s restorative power and love (Ps. 22:31–32).

Ps. 102:24–29 returns first to personal lament and then, like the preceding section, to confidence. The Lord not only acts with loving concern but is forever present with the chosen people, as the promises to Zion and the stability of the earth testify. Heb. 1:10–12 calls upon these words so that Christians may find in Jesus an eternal sanctuary and stable earth.

Psalm 103. In many ways a transitional poem, in the first part Psalm 103 relates with Psalm 102, grateful for a return to health (103:1–18); in the second part, as a hymn of praise, it introduces Psalm 104. The psalmist expresses gratitude for both physical and spiritual healing. Sickness and sin (unlike Ps. 102 in this regard) are linked together (like Ps. 30); pardon is frequently begged of God because of its promise in the ancient covenant (103:7–8; Exod. 34:6–7). Like Psalm 102, personal questions are linked with communal problems and traditions and thereby receive a solid basis for an answer. The psalm comes from the postexilic age, quoting Isa. 57:16 in 103:9, Isa. 55:9 in v. 11; and Isa. 40:6–8 in vv. 15–16. It draws upon Israel’s traumatic experience of sin and suffering. It is sung on the Day of Atonement by Jews (Lev. 16) and each morning by Greek Christians.

After the opening hymn (vv. 1–2), the psalmist asks for pardon and healing (vv. 3–5), relying upon the promises of the covenant (vv. 6–18); vv. 19–22 conclude with joyful songs of praise for Yahweh in the heavenly sanctuary.

Verses 1–5 identify the major ingredients of a blessing, that is, publicly proclaiming God’s gifts through moral strength and physical health. “Soul,” which derives from a Hebrew word for "throat," provides the way not only for manifesting life or death by breathing but also for interacting personally with one's environment. Healing, consequently, involves the entire community and its sensitivity to social justice and the earth's ecological balance. Health presumes the end of selfish abuse of others and of the world. In v. 5, "your life" is a different type of Hebrew word, meaning "adornment." If one follows the translation in ancient versions, "desires" (Gk.) or "body" (Syriac), the reference then is to sexual vitality and the ability to share life in family (so Gen. 18:11-14; cf. Rom. 4:19-20).

In Ps. 103:6-18 justice certainly embraces "the rights of the oppressed" and punishment upon wrongdoers, yet justice is most of all a divine attribute: Yahweh's way of living up to divine assurances of forgiveness, rooted in the covenant (Exod. 34:6-7). The history of Israel becomes a "way," revelatory of a merciful God. Isa. 55:6-11 revels in the mystery of God's ways as high above earth as the heavens are, yet soaking the earth like rain and returning to God through earthly produce and human lives. Therefore in Ps. 103:17 Yahweh's "steadfast love" and "justice" parallel each other and merge together. These verses are a commentary on the first and last sections of Second Isaiah (Isa. 40 and 55). Ps. 103:19-22 introduces Israel's praise into the heavenly sanctuary where God is enthroned (Pss. 11:4; 29).

Psalm 104. Gen. 1:1-2:4a is turned into magnificent poetry. Psalm 104 shows many parallels with an Egyptian hymn to the sun god Aten, composed during the reign of the monotheist Akhenaton (ca. 1380-1362 B.C.). Psalm 104 does not acclaim creation but Yahweh the creator; Yahweh appears not primarily as all-powerful but as all-merciful. Yahweh creates a happy world where even the lion's roar becomes a prayer (v. 21). The psalm does not reason from creation to the existence of God, but vice versa. It proceeds from faith in the covenant God of kindness and fidelity (Exod. 34:6-7) to a new appreciation of creation. God's people Israel are at the center. Ps. 104:30 accounts for the Christian use on the Feast of Pentecost.

Verses 1-9 acclaim the royal creator, who in vv. 10-18 is dispenser of nourishment; in vv. 19-23, master of the seasons; in vv. 24-26, Lord of earth and sea; and in vv. 27-30, controller of life and death. Verses 31-35 provide a glorious finale. The psalm also divides according to the days of creation in Genesis 1: first day, creation of light, vv. 1-2a; second day, creation of the firmament or sky, vv. 2b-4; third day, separation of heaven and earth, vv. 5-9, and the adornment of earth, vv. 10-18; fourth day, creation of heavenly bodies, vv. 19-20; fifth day, creation of ocean creatures, vv. 25-26; and sixth day, creation of terrestrial creatures and humankind, vv. 21-23. Verse 24 is like the refrain in Genesis 1, "And God saw that it was good!"

Ps. 104:1-9 begins with, "Bless the Lord" (Ps. 103:1-2, 19-22), an important theological formula. Here the active form of the verb occurs, an indication of early origin. Later Hebrew tradition turned it into the passive, more dignified form, "Blessed be the Lord." The latter phrase is followed by an account of what God has done for the chosen people (Gen. 24:27; Exod. 18:10-12; 1 Kings 8:56-61). This account belongs to a liturgical reenactment of God's gracious deeds and to a hymn of praise. Praise, therefore, is much less Israel's gift to God than it is a recognition and ritual reliving of God's gifts to Israel.

The language of praise (Ps. 104:1-4) and of cosmogony (vv. 5-9) can be traced back into ancient mythology: the Lord's palace built above the heavenly waters (Pss. 11:4; 18:5-10; 29:10), surrounded by stars and moon and wind as attendants and servants (Pss. 29; 82; 103:20). Ps. 104:9, repeated almost verbatim in Jer. 5:22, refers to the taming of primeval chaos.

Ps. 104:10-18 reveals the abundant graciousness with which God creates. Very clearly God is at the source of whatever human beings need for physical nourishment and delight, even of "wine to make the heart joyful" (v. 15). Verses 19-23 show Yahweh to be master of the seasons of the year and of the passage from night to day. The heavenly bodies, which regulated the seasons, were worshiped as divine by many people (Deut. 4:19), but here (Ps. 104:1-4) they are God's heavenly retinue and servants. When vv. 24-26 extend God's control over the oceans, the imagery is unusually tranquil as compared with Ps. 89:10-11 and Isa. 51:9-10. The Lord even makes sport of the sea monster Leviathan, a feat declared impossible for human beings (Job 40:25-32).

In Ps. 104:27-30, Yahweh directs life and death through the gift or withdrawal of the spirit. The sequence life, death, new life through the spirit follows the common biblical pattern for Jerusalem or the people Israel. Those persons upon whom God bestows promises generally succeed at first, undergo serious difficulties to the seeming frustration of faith (Ps. 44), but rise to a fulfillment never anticipated earlier.

In the glorious finale (Ps. 104:31-35) Yahweh reaches down from the heavenly sanctuary touching the earth with smoke, a symbol of divine manifestations (Exod. 19; Judg. 5:4-5; Hab. 3:3-6). Such a world has no place for sinners. The psalm, therefore, sees a world of good people, innocent of any innate corruption, with God's gift of goodness.

Psalm 105. Writing at the time of the Exile, the author of Psalm 105 draws upon Israel's history as far back as the age of the patriarchs to establish the thesis that people frequently go through a cycle of promise, followed by setbacks, but climax in a new possession. No gift, especially the promised land, was Israel's by right, only by the grace of God. The poem communicates this major message by the repetition of three key words: "patriarch, servant, or chosen one" (vv. 6, 9–10, 17, 25, 26, 42–43); "land or territory" (vv. 7, 11, 16, 23, 27, 30, 31, 32, 33, 35, 36, 41); and "word or promise" (vv. 11, 14–15, 19, 27, 42). Land accordingly turns out to be God's most ancient and continuous promise, reaching back to the patriarchs. Israel had to go through many experiences of land possessed, lost, and regained, to realize that land is always and foremost a grace. The importance of Psalm 105 is affirmed in its choice to form, with Psalms 96 and 100, a trilogy for worship in 1 Chron. 16:7–36.

After an invitation to seek God's presence (Ps. 105:1–6), the basis of development (from loss to new possession) is provided in vv. 7–11 with the eternal promises to the patriarchs. Verses 12–45 dwell upon various ways God protected his people: vv. 12–15, the patriarchs amid hostile kings and vv. 16–22, imprisonment in Egypt, first of Joseph and then, in vv. 23–38, of all the people. Verses 39–41 recall the difficulties in the wilderness, whereupon vv. 42–45 close the psalm.

Verses 1–6 offer a new way for the exiles to view their situation. With liturgical language the psalmist calls upon the people to "inquire of the Lord . . . constantly seek God's face" (v. 4). This language implies turning to Yahweh in the Temple for an answer (1 Kings 14:5; 22:5) and, through the Temple services, to contemplate God's past redemptive actions. The psalm thus instills a longing for returning to the land and rebuilding the Temple. Like Abraham, Israel is about to receive a call to go forth to the promised land. The patriarchs are not prominently mentioned outside of Genesis, except in selections from the prophet of the Exile (Isa. 51: 2–3; 54:9). Ps. 105:7–11 reaches behind the Mosaic covenant to assure Israel that, despite its breaking of the covenant laws, the patriarchal promises remain intact. The land is affirmed as the allotted portion for all Israel in language reminiscent of Levites for whom the Lord was their allotted portion and cup (Ps. 16:5; Deut. 32:9). All Israel was a priestly people (Exod. 19:6) whose lives, especially in the promised land, were to make important contributions to worship (Deut. 26:1–11).

In Ps. 105:12–45 the plagues of Egypt are lined up differently than in Exod. 7:14–11:10 and Ps. 78:43–51. The purpose of the biblical accounts is a theological elaboration for the religious instruction and worship of later generations. Chronological accuracy was not to the point. Darkness is recorded first (105:28), though it was the ninth plague in Egypt (Exod. 10:21–23), to show that opposition to Yahweh wraps a person in obscurity and shame. By contrast (Ps. 105:39) Yahweh will provide light at once for Israel to depart and to be led through the wilderness. Verses 25–29 form a long, important chiasm (see commentary above on Ps. 19:2) in which the central line, v. 27, states that "words or signs" go together, so that the words of Moses and Aaron were seen in their inner strength by the wonders that accompanied them. Verses 42–45 bring together the three principal key words. The psalm ends with the people still in Exile, but ready to obey the Lord's precepts. Otherwise all is lost.

Psalm 106. A communal lament over the dismal conditions of the postexilic age (Ps. 16; Isa. 56:9–57:13; Zech. 7–8), Psalm 106 follows the pattern of Deuteronomy not only in the sequence of events in Egypt and during the wandering in the wilderness but also with prophetic warning, instruction, and comfort for contrite hearts. The psalm treats Israel's inexplicable guilt and God's inexhaustible mercy. A comparison with Psalm 105 exhibits surprising differences. While each psalm relives the Exodus and wilderness experiences, Psalm 105 molds it into a praise of God, Psalm 106 into a communal lament. Israel's religion is not subject to divine fate if such divergences occur from the same traditions and are due to Israel's reactions. The sins of early Israel are repeated again during and after the Exile.

The incorporation of Psalm 106 (along with Pss. 96, 105) into a Temple service (1 Chron. 16:7–36) testifies to the psalm's existence before 400 B.C. and its popularity for rebuilding hope. Lines or phrases are frequently woven into NT preaching: Ps. 106:10 in Luke 1:71; v. 20 in Rom. 1:23; v. 28 in 1 Cor. 12:2; v. 37 in 1 Cor. 10:20; v. 45 in Luke 1:72; and v. 48 in Luke 1:68; Rev. 19:4.

The preaching style of Deuteronomy, which dominates Psalm 106, makes it difficult to section it off into poetic stanzas, but the following outline may direct study and worship. After a short entry chant (vv. 1–3) and prayer (vv. 4–5), the psalm divides into two main parts: first, Israel's ingratitude in Egypt and in the wilderness (vv. 6–23) and Yahweh's just punishment (vv. 24–27); second, Israel's disobedience before and after entering the promised land (vv. 28–39) and the Lord's new punishment and grace (vv. 40–46). Verse 47 is a final prayer for the psalm and v. 48 a doxology for Book Four of the Psalter (Pss. 90–106).

Ps. 106:1–5 begins with the popular postexilic refrain, “Hallelujah,” used twenty-three times as an introduction or conclusion to psalms within Psalms 104–150. The Greek and Latin translations generally transliterated the word (without the initial h, hence the “Alleluia” spelling within the Roman and Orthodox churches) rather than translating it as “Praise the Lord.” Two other congregational responses occur, generally paired together: “Praise [or, Give thanks to] Yahweh, for God is good” and “God’s kindness lasts forever” (Pss. 107:1; 118:1, 2, 3, 4, 29; 136). The confession of sin that is to follow becomes a way for the community to praise God’s fidelity and goodness. In this setting of a family tradition of faith, the individual humbly and peacefully asks God, “Remember me.”

Ps. 106:6–27 recalls, with sorrow and hope, the Lord’s extraordinary interventions and Israel’s rebellious or indifferent response in Egypt and in the wilderness. The opening verse repeats traditional words for sin and repentance (Ps. 51:3–4). Israel’s faith rested squarely upon God’s willingness to forgive repeatedly (Exod. 34:6–7). Such was the way that God was to be remembered and named (Ps. 106:8). Goodness was no easy gift from God; the language of v. 9 recalls God’s battles against chaotic, evil forces, symbolized by water (Exod. 15; Pss. 29; 89:10–11; Isa. 51:9–10). In the wilderness, cowardice (Num. 14:1–4), sensuality (Exod. 32; Num. 11:4–6), and selfish ambition (Num. 12; 16) provoked Israel’s sinful responses. Similar to Hosea’s and Jeremiah’s intuition, sin is described in a touching way as a forgetfulness of God (Hos. 2:13; Jer. 3:21). Moses appears as the great intercessor before God (Num. 14:13–19; Ps. 99:6). The Exile is traced to sin similar to that of the Israelites in the wilderness, who died in perpetual exile (Num. 14:20–38). Ezek. 20:23 quotes Ps. 106:27 to announce the Exile.

Verses 28–47 move the thought to a hopeful setting, advancing beyond the point of sentence and punishment where the preceding section ended. Like the people in the wilderness, those in Exile were severely tempted to worship the Babylonian gods who seemed to have defeated Yahweh. Yet Israel’s defeat was planned by Yahweh to purify and strengthen morally the chosen people (Isa. 44:9–20; 44:25–26; 45:4–7). Even Moses, for some mysterious offense, must die with the people in the wilderness (Ps. 106:32; Num. 20:6–13; Deut. 1:37–40; 34). The story of sin continues, even with human sacrifice (Ps. 106:37; Gen. 22; 2 Kings 16:3; Jer. 7:31). Yahweh still remembers the covenant and its pledge of forgiveness (Exod. 34:6–7). Ps. 106:48 completes Book Four (Pss. 90–106) with a doxology similar to that at the end of Psalms 41, 72, 89.

Book Five

The final book reflects the full flowering of post-exilic Temple liturgy and Ezra’s religious reform in 428 B.C. (Ezra 10; Neh. 8–9). A first series of “Hallelujah Psalms” (Pss. 111–118) includes the “Egyptian Hallel” (Pss. 113–118), which was sung for the three great pilgrimage festivals of Passover, Weeks, and Tabernacles (Exod. 23:14–17). The “Psalms of Ascent” (Pss. 120–134) constitute a small booklet to accompany pilgrims to or from Jerusalem. Psalm 136 is the “Great Hallel” for Sabbath services. Psalms 146–150 conclude the Psalter with an exultant “Te Deum” or “Glory to God in the Highest” (→ Feasts, Festivals, and Fasts).

Psalms 107, 119 are, possibly, introductory psalms, Psalm 107 to the entire ensemble of Book Five and Psalm 119 to the “Psalms of Ascent.” Psalm 137 is untitled, typical of unclassified songs always finding their way into a hymnal. A final group of “Psalms of David” show up, generally in a very poor textual condition, due to long neglect (Pss. 108–110; 138–145).

Psalm 107. An intricate, yet carefully structured and free-flowing hymn of praise, Psalm 107 draws motivation from Israel’s history (vv. 1 and 4–32) and was later adapted to thanksgiving for the return from Exile (vv. 2–3) and augmented with another hymn colored by the concerns of the wisdom tradition (vv. 33–42). Each stanza within vv. 4–32 has four sections clearly marked off by refrains: first, a narrative about a distressing situation, traveling across land or desert (vv. 4–5), imprisonment (vv. 10–12), illness and sin (vv. 17–18), traveling by sea (vv. 23–27); second, a prayer refrain (vv. 6, 13, 19, 28); third, an account about deliverance (vv. 7, 14, 20, 29–30); and fourth, a thanksgiving refrain (vv. 8–9, 15–16, 21–22, 31–32). The theology of the psalm, God’s loving and effective answer to dire human needs, is summarized by key words: in the first refrain, “distress” or “trouble”; in the second refrain, “God’s wonderful works” and their recipients, “the children of men [or earth]” (Heb. bene-’adam).

The liturgical ceremony at the Temple can be reconstructed as follows: v. 1 at the gate of the Temple and vv. 4–32 comprising four sections, each of which consists of narratives recited by a special choral group and two refrains by the entire congregation. The second refrain, more confessional in style, may have been sung by the priests. Some verses or themes are reflected in the NT: v. 9 in Luke 1:53; v. 20 in Acts 10:36; 13:26; v. 26 in Rom. 10:1–7; and vv. 23–32 in Mark 4:25–31.

Ps. 107:1–3 begins with stereotypic expressions of praise (cf. Ps. 106:1). The phrase, "redeemed of the Lord," reflects the preaching, during the Exile, of Second Isaiah, who transformed a nonreligious word, "kinsperson," with its accompanying obligations (Lev. 25:23–55) into a technical, theological word, "redeemer" or "to redeem" (so Isa. 35:9; 51:10; 62:12). Ps. 107:3 deliberately adapts the psalm to Israelites scattered in foreign lands, a new phenomenon called the Diaspora, a Greek word for "scattered abroad."

Verses 4–9 lay out the consequences of being lost in a desert wilderness: hunger, thirst, and inevitable death. Yahweh responds according to the law of desert hospitality (Gen. 18:1–5). God cannot do otherwise, once having heard the cry of distress, for Yahweh is to be named by kindness and fidelity (Exod. 34:6–7). The deliverance of travelers, lost physically or morally, becomes part of Israel's repertoire of praise for Yahweh. Such language implies aimless wandering (Exod. 23:4; Isa. 53:6), a way that needs to become straight in its directions and just in its morals (Pss. 25:8; Isa. 40:3).

Ps. 107:10–16 blends words for imprisonment due either to physical coercion from others or to one's own moral condition. Rebellion against God's word leads to punishment (Josh. 1:18; Ps. 106:33). Israel spurned God's counsel (Num. 14:2; Isa. 5:24) and so was destined for execution. They were already as good as dead (Ezek. 37:1–14). God breaks the bars of oppression and reverses the death sentence (Isa. 45:2).

Ps. 107:17–22 considers simultaneously physical health, moral integrity, individual status, and community responsibility (Pss. 6; 30; 38; 69; 88). Just as the imprisonment in the preceding section links physical and moral chains in a condition near to death, likewise here the condition leads a person and (symbolically) a community close to the dark, silent grave (Pss. 6:6; 16:10). For these reasons, healing consisted of more than a physical cure. Only God, therefore, is the true, effective physician, converting the community in its attitudes, reaching tenderly to the sick person, securing moral transformation (Exod. 15:26; Hos. 5:13; 6:1; 11:3).

Ps. 107:23–32 corresponds with many other biblical passages. The sea was almost always portrayed as a hostile, dangerous place (Pss. 29; 46:2–4; 89:10–14; Mark 4:35–41). Only Yahweh can overcome this demonic force and deliver Israel (Exod. 15:1–18; Isa. 51:9–10).

Ps. 107:33–35 is drawn from Second Isaiah, prophet of the Exile (Isa. 42:15; 43:19) and leads into the final hymn with its strong wisdom coloration (Prov. 23:34; 30:18–19; 31:14; Job. 12:21, 24).

Psalm 108. A composite psalm, Psalm 108 is made up of vv. 2–6 from Ps. 57:8–12 and vv.

7–14 from Ps. 60:7–14. The change of the divine name from Yahweh to Elohim is preserved as in the Elohist Psalter (Pss. 42–83, see commentary above introducing Book Two). Joined together, Psalm 57, an individual's lament, modifies the fierceness of Psalm 60; Psalm 60, a community lament, provides a larger setting for the isolation in Psalm 57. All three psalms locate the solution to suffering and oppression somewhere in between the exclusively military and exclusively religious response.

Psalm 109. Psalm 109 is a lament from an individual who is slandered (vv. 4, 20, 29), falsely judged (vv. 7, 31), weak and probably sick (vv. 23–24), isolated and rejected (v. 25). The psalm consists of an opening lament (vv. 1–5), an extended curse of the enemy (vv. 6–20), a prayer for help and further lament (vv. 21–29), and finally a vow to offer public thanksgiving when exonerated (vv. 30–31). The strong influence of Jer. 18:19–23 is recognized, and therefore the composition is generally placed during the Exile or later. Repetition of words argues for unity of authorship. There are a number of reasons for thinking that the long imprecation in vv. 6–20 is mainly a quotation from the enemy: first, while the psalmist speaks generally in the plural about others, these verses use the singular; second, the curses of the adversary are mentioned in vv. 20, 28; third, the psalmist relates a separate set of curses against the enemy in v. 29. (For a further explanation of biblical curses, see commentary above on Psalm 69.)

Ps. 109:1–5 reveals a God functionally dead or nonexistent (Pss. 14:1; 22:2; 28:1), no more effective than the statues ridiculed by the prophet of the Exile (Isa. 44:9–20; Ps. 115). Such a weak God is put to shame by the psalmist's foes, who are efficient in hatching plots. The psalmist, like Jeremiah, feels betrayed by close friends (Jer. 11:18–19; 12:6). In Ps. 109:6 the word for accuser (Heb. satan) generally indicates strong opposition (2 Sam. 19:23; 1 Kings 5:18) and, in the postexilic age, a superhuman adversary (Job 1:6; Zech. 3:1). The curse may include demonic opposition. (For the lex talionis in Ps. 109:17, see commentary above on Ps. 35:8.) Ps. 109:25 shows contact with a phrase in Ps. 22:8, but the two psalms remain widely apart in attitude.

Psalm 110. Psalm 110 rose and fell with the Davidic dynasty; the text became obscure as the ritual of the dynasty ceased with the end of the monarchy. Psalm 110 becomes more intelligent as we associate it with other biblical passages involving royalty (2 Sam. 7; Isa. 9:6–7; Pss. 2; 89:2–38). Each verse indicated a long ceremony in the multiday ritual of a royal coronation.

Ps. 110:1a begins with the announcement of the Temple prophet: "The oracle of Yahweh for my lord [the crown prince]." In the Jerusalem Temple, the crown prince is being introduced to the assembly. "Sit [as supreme judge] at my right," that is, directly south of the Temple where the royal administrative buildings were situated. (Directions were always taken facing east, so Ps. 48.) At this point the assembly processed solemnly to the reception hall in one of these buildings. Ps. 110:1b refers to the ritual of vassals, no longer enemies, making their obeisance to the new king (Ps. 2:1–3, 8). Ps. 110:2, "Your strong scepter the Lord extends to you," is the signal for investing the crown prince with the symbols of royalty (Ps. 2:9). The scepter extends "from Zion," the center of the universe (Ezek. 5:5; 38:12) around which world history revolves.

With Ps. 110:3 the assembly is back again in the Temple for the most solemn moment of all, the consecratory words by which the crown prince becomes king. The form accepted by the Jerusalem scribes reads, "Your people offer themselves willingly on this, your day of strength; in holy splendor from the womb of dawn yours is the dew of your youth." The Greek depends upon a slightly different set of vowels within the same consonants: "Yours is regal power on [this] day of your birth; in the splendor of the holy ones, from the womb before the daystar, I beget you" (cf. Ps. 2:7). Both versions acclaim the mysterious origin of the king's position and power. Dew appears "miraculously" without rain (Hos. 14:6; Ps. 133:3; Job 38:28).

In Ps. 110:4 the king is declared "priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek," one of the titles of the Jebusite kings who ruled Jerusalem before its capture by David (Gen. 14). This title became highly controversial. It was taken over by the Hasmonean kings against the Zadokite family who controlled the high-priesthood up till then (1 Macc. 10:21; 14:41). Still later the Samaritans legitimated their priesthood as that of Melchizedek against that at Jerusalem. Qumran saw in Melchizedek the messianic figure (11QMelch); the NT recognized here a prototype for the priesthood of Jesus that was thereby eternal (Heb. 7:24, 28) and superior to that of Aaron (Heb. 5:10; 6:20; 7:11).

Ps. 110:5 continues at the Temple. The new king is enthroned "at the pillar" reserved for royalty (2 Kings 11:14; 23:3), directly north of the holy place. Therefore "The Lord[']s dwelling] is at your right hand." With rhetorical flourish, Ps. 110:5–6 announces the invincible power of the new king. Verse 7 locates the final ceremony in this week or more of pageantry at the spring of Gihon, the supplier of water for the city and also a sanctuary where Solomon was crowned (1 Kings 1:38–40). Here the king drinks from consecrated water, symbolic of receiving life from God, and with uplifted head leaves the sanctuary to begin his reign.

Psalm 110 is one of the most cited OT passages in the NT, principally v. 1 in connection with Christ's resurrection (Matt. 22:44; 26:64; Acts 2:34–35; 1 Cor. 15:25; Heb. 1:13; 10:13). In the NT, royalty is not normally claimed for Jesus during his earthly life, only after his resurrection when he rules by sending the Spirit to his disciples.

Psalm 111. Psalm 111 is an alphabetical or acrostic psalm (like Pss. 9–10; 25; 34), with each half-verse beginning with the next letter of the alphabet. This and other didactic features (111:10) suggest a postexilic composition when the wisdom tradition was strong. Psalm 111 relates well with Psalm 112 in rhythm, ideas, and vocabulary: righteousness in 111:3; 112:2; steadiness in 111:8; 112:8; and remembrance in 111:4; 112:6. Together they lead to the "Egyptian Hallel" (see commentary above introducing Book Five). Psalm 111 celebrates a righteous God, Psalm 112 a righteous person.

Ps. 111:1–3 introduces a didactic hymn; vv. 4–6 root all blessings in the covenant because Yahweh is faithful (vv. 7–9). Verse 10 concludes on a strong wisdom note.

"The assembly of the righteous" (v. 1b) is gathered in a public edifice, possibly a school. Yahweh's works are "studied for their delights." The word "studied," from the Hebrew word darash, lies at the root of a special type of rabbinical interpretation called "midrash." The works pondered by the group center around the Exodus, the Lord's care in the wilderness with the food of manna (Exod. 16; Ps. 81:11, 17), and the gift of the land. Ps. 111:10 states that "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom," meaning that the basis and support of a wise person are found in reverence towards God and neighbor (cf. Prov. 1:7; Job 28:28).

Psalm 112. Linked carefully with the end of Psalm 111, Psalm 112, again of the wisdom school, follows the same alphabetical method. The traditional position that the just are rewarded and the wicked are left poor and barren (Pss. 1; 37) imparts a steady peace here. Benefits redound both to the just person (vv. 112:1–3) and to the neighbor (vv. 4–6), with protection against adversity (vv. 7–8) to the confusion of the wicked (vv. 9–10). This solution was not always obvious (Ps. 49; Job) but seemed more than sufficient for the majority of cases in times of peace. In Ps. 112:3 "wealth and riches" are identified with "righteousness," a word, however, that in postbiblical Judaism also signified "generosity" (NAB; Sir. 3:30; 7:10). Words like "light" (Ps. 27:1) and "compassionate and just" (Exod. 34:6–7), normally attributed to Yahweh, are here bestowed on the righteous person. The psalm does not end in revenge but in the satisfaction that wickedness does not succeed.

Psalm 113. Psalm 113 is a song related to some of the most frequently cited and ancient canticles (Exod. 15; Deut. 32; Judg. 5; 1 Sam. 2) and to the songs of the poor (Zeph. 2:3; 3:12; Isa. 41:17–20). Psalm 113 begins the “Egyptian Hallel,” sung partly at the beginning (Pss. 113–114) and partly at the close (Pss. 115–118) in the context of the three pilgrimage festival dinners (Exod. 23:14–17). Psalm 113 indicates some kind of antiphonal singing: v. 1, a request to begin; vv. 2–4, choral response; v. 5, question by a solo voice; and vv. 7–9, choral response.

“Servants of the Lord” in v. 1 indicates anyone loyal to Yahweh, especially under trial (Deut. 34:5; Isa. 42:1; Ps. 79:2). The choral response in 113:2–4 reaches to people true to the covenant even at a distance from Jerusalem (Mal. 1:11; Ps. 107:3). Thrice “the name of the Lord,” Yahweh, is acclaimed, affirming the special relation of the people with their God. In reply to the question (113:5), the choir responds that Israel’s God is distinguished by “raising the poor” from disgrace. During the Exile, Israel realized its impotence, like many saintly persons (Gen. 16:2; 20:18; 1 Sam 1:5) who became typical of all Israel (Isa. 54:1–10; 66:7–16).

Psalm 114. The hymn in Psalm 114 possesses high literary and liturgical qualities involving parallelism, brevity, imagination, and surprise. All verses, except the final one, comprise a call to praise, so the Greek version united Psalm 115 with it. The psalm may have been composed for the sanctuary at Gilgal near the river Jordan (Josh. 5; 1 Sam. 10:8) and was later transferred to the Jerusalem Temple with its symbolism of water flowing from the rock of sacrifice (Ps. 46:5; Ezek. 47). One may suggest an early date since the two kingdoms, Israel and Judah, are united.

Ps. 114:1–7 quickly moves from the Red Sea to the river Jordan and overlooks the long, trying period of the wilderness (Ps. 95:7b–11). Israel celebrated and relived the crossing of the Red Sea at a more convenient geographical location, which, however, was unlike the Red Sea area and was surrounded with mountains. A similar ritual “actualization” occurs throughout Joshua 1–6. The final line, sung by a solo voice in contrast to the choral singing of Ps. 114:1–7, consists of participles, a verbal form that, in Hebrew, emphasizes the present. It is happening now as God supplies life in response to Israel’s prayer (Deut. 5:1–5).

Psalm 115. Originating in a service like Josh. 7:19; Mic. 7:7–20; Isaiah 12; and Amos 4:6–13, with confession of faults, forgiveness, and praise of Yahweh, Psalm 115 represents a religious service especially for Diaspora Jews living among foreigners and tempted to apostasy. The psalm was ideal for pilgrimage to Jerusalem (see commentary above introducing Book Five). The heart of the service was vv. 12–15, a priestly blessing (Num. 6:22–27), preceded by renewed consecration to the Lord of the covenant (vv. 1–2) and a prayer of confidence (vv. 3–11), followed by thanksgiving (vv. 16–18).

Verses 1–2 reflect the agonizing taunt of Ps. 79:10 and attribute strength and glory “not to us,” or as the Aramaic Targum reads, “not because of our justice” (Ps. 138:2). All confidence rests with the Lord of the covenant (Exod. 34:6–7). Ps. 115:3–11 ridicules the helpless gods of conquered people, something commonly done (2 Kings 18:33–35; Isa. 44:9–20). For Israel, the religion of other nations appeared like fetish idolatry. Israel is divided between priests, laity, and “God-fearers,” converts who were not completely following the full laws of circumcision and food (cf. Acts 10:2, 22). Ps. 115:17 reflects the ancient, traditional opinion about the afterlife (Pss. 6:6; 30:10).

Psalm 116. Intended for a Temple service of thanksgiving (vv. 9, 14, 18–19; Pss. 65:5; 100:4), Psalm 116 mirrors a person fulfilling vows if released from critical sickness (116:3, 8) or from bonds and execution (vv. 3, 16). The many Aramaic expressions represent a late composition from a Jew in the Diaspora. The psalm may be divided as follows: vv. 1–2, confession of faith in Yahweh’s regard for the needy; vv. 3–4, expression of distress; vv. 5–11, chant of praise and thanksgiving; and vv. 12–19, sacrifice of thanksgiving in the Temple. The Greek version, which unites Psalms 113–114, separates 116:10–19 as a distinct psalm. Sung as the “Egyptian Hallel” (Pss. 113–118; see commentary above introducing Book Five), this psalm belonged to the second segment toward the end of the sacred meal (Matt. 26:30).

In Ps. 116:1–2 the psalmist is able to love because the Lord has been loving and caring all along; this psalm does not begin with a silent, deaf God as do Psalms 22:2 and 28:1. Yet the phrase “my voice, my supplication” implies a loud, persistent supplication (Ps. 28:2). In 116:3–4 the understanding of the afterlife is traditional (Pss. 6:6; 115:17); still God’s presence with an unclean, sick person is not traditional, as the rules in Leviticus 21 point out. In Ps. 116:15 the psalmist slips into an attitude shared with Ps. 139:8, with its own Aramaic expressions.

Ps. 116:5–11 begins the chant of thanksgiving, based on the covenant’s intuition of a kind and faithful God (Exod. 34:6–7; Pss. 111:4; 112:4; Isa. 49:10; 54:10). The “simple” or “little ones” (Ps. 116:6) are vulnerable people, at times naive, who seem to trust too easily (cf. Pss. 9:11; 19:8; 119:130; Prov. 1:22). According to Ps. 116:10, faith remains as a sturdy support even when a person's emotions are crying out against faith (Pss. 22:44; Job 14:2).

Ps. 116:12–19 recognizes that God's goodness and gifts cannot be purchased. Temple sacrifice, therefore, gives nothing to God but recognizes ever more fully God's gifts by enabling one to surrender oneself symbolically with the holocaust of joyful adoration (Lev. 1). The "cup of salvation" is the wine shared at a sacred meal, a metaphor for the joy already received from the Lord and shared with others, intensified by the Lord's presence (Ps. 23:5). While, previously, death meant fearful silence, in 116:15 it becomes a precious moment of rest in the Lord. Liturgy has slipped beyond death to the ever-living God (Ps. 22:28–32; 49:16).

Psalm 117. The shortest of psalms, Psalm 117 is a hymn of praise. It raises the persistent question, are the nations being granted a place in the Mosaic covenant? Rom. 15:11 recognizes universal salvation here. Yet the motivation for praise (Ps. 117:2) reserves the gifts of "love and fidelity" (Exod. 34:6–7) "for us." Does that mean exclusively for Israel? There seems to be here, however, at least an indirect confession from the Gentiles of faith in God as revealed through the Mosaic covenant.

Psalm 118. The "Egyptian Hallel" (Pss. 113–118), sung for the three pilgrimage feasts, concludes in Psalm 118. It accompanied the fourth cup of wine at the Passover meal. It may also have been used for an entrance ritual (v. 19; Pss. 15; 24). Several details indicate that it was most of all at home with the Feast of Tabernacles, with reference to tents (118:15), day (v. 24; Ps. 81:4), light (118:27), plants used for the family tent (v. 27), and hosannah (v. 25). Long usage meant additions and shifts, so that the structure became complex. The psalm moves between community thanksgiving (vv. 1–4, 22–29) and individual thanksgiving (vv. 5–21). It allows for individual adaptation within its larger pattern. Some Hebrew manuscripts begin separate psalms at vv. 5 and 25.

Verses 1–4 begin with a traditional community expression of gratitude (Pss. 107:1; 136:1; Ezra 3:11) embracing all Israel, lay, priests, and God-fearing converts (Ps. 115:9–11).

Ps. 118:5–21 is adaptable to many forms of individual thanksgiving: people freed from severe restrictions (vv. 5–9), from harassment by outsiders (vv. 10–16), or from sickness (vv. 17–18). It probably permitted additions for other situations. Verses 5–9 refer to something like occupation by foreign troops (Lam. 1:3) or confinement in death (Ps. 116:3). Everyone, but especially people with nomadic background, possesses a basic necessity of being "set free" from burdensome restrictions (Gen. 26:22; Ps. 31:9). "The Lord is with me. . . . What can any human being do to me?"—a common refrain (Ps. 56:5, 12) repeated in Rom. 8:31. Taking refuge in the Lord is another familiar response (Ps. 2:12; 7:1; 11:1). In 118:10–16 the language is so strong that one suspects a king is speaking about a national disaster or an individual is identifying personal tragedy with the nation's or someone in the Diaspora is persecuted for the faith by surrounding Gentiles. "Cut off" refers to circumcision and, in 1 Sam. 18:22–27, to a great massacre. The language of gratitude in Ps. 118:14 is taken from the nation's song of deliverance in Exod. 15:6, 12. In Ps. 118:17–18 sickness is now seen as a chastisement that disciplined and purified one (Deut. 4:36; Jer. 10:24; Isa. 54:8). The gates of justice may be named from the ceremony of receiving a person into full membership after sin or uncleanness (Pss. 15; 24).

Ps. 118:22–25 allows the congregation to absorb all individuals again in communal thanksgiving as at the beginning. "The stone rejected by the builders [now] the cornerstone" refers to the enigmatic text of Isa. 28:16, in which the prophet refers to the testing of one's faith and one's faithful reliance upon the Lord (Isa. 7:9b; 30:15–18). The phrase probably became a proverb suitable for many situations. In Matt. 21:42–43, Jesus refers to sincere Israelites whose lives show the fruits of the kingdom of God; Mark 12:10–12 relates the passage to the death of Jesus, Luke 20:16–18 to the necessity of making a clear decision for or against Jesus. Acts 4:11 speaks of the stone "spurned," weaving in a passage from Isa. 53:3.

It is evident that "this is the day the Lord takes action" (Ps. 118:24a); the present tense here reflects the liturgical custom of actualizing the past moment of a great redemptive act. The Hebrew form of v. 25a preserves the origin of the refrain, "Hosannah," originally a call for help (Pss. 12:2; 28:9) or mercy (2 Sam. 14:4) but later a stereotypic word for praise (so Matt. 21:9). This verse was repeated seven times on the last day of Tabernacles as the congregation processed up to and around the altar (Ps. 118:27).

Verses 26–27 offer a blessing upon "the one who comes in the name of the Lord." Here the phrase refers to any devout Israelite; eventually in Judaism it became a messianic title (Matt. 11:3). Ps. 118:27a, with its reference to light, may provide the occasion at the end of the service for imparting the priestly blessing from Num. 6:22–27.

Psalm 119. On first reading, Psalm 119 seems exceptional for nothing except its length. It is the longest of all psalms but does not display exceptional poetry, or vivid images, or original insights, or excitement about anything; it just exhibits a quiet, meditative tone about "law" with no internal development. One can start at the end and read the verses backward, and it makes equally good sense. Yet Psalm 119 was not composed for the epic moments of life but for the 90 percent of time in which life is uneventful, even monotonous. Psalm 119 becomes the moment of prolonged contemplation in God's presence.

Each stanza of eight verses begins with the succeeding letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and all eight verses start with the same letter. Each verse has one of eight synonyms for law, except that v. 90 has a ninth synonym and v. 122 none at all. The author of Ps. 119 must have been a persistent type of person, yet did not want to be stereotyped as rigid.

The psalmist meditated intently, especially upon Deuteronomy but also upon Proverbs, Job, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, and to a lesser extent upon Isaiah 40–66, writing in what is called an anthological style. Little derives from the historical or former prophetic books of Joshua through 2 Kings. Despite its legal appearance, there seems to be no contact with the priestly tradition of the Pentateuch. Some examples of borrowing are: v. 2 and Deut. 4:29; Jer. 29:13–14a; v. 25 and Job 40:13; vv. 33–40 and Prov. 4:13; v. 31 and Deut. 10:20; v. 70 and Isa. 6:10; v. 76 and Isa. 51:3; v. 85 and Jer. 18:20a; and v. 89 and Isa. 40:8. The sources lean toward a style of lament, with a strong secondary impulse of instruction and exhortation. Psalm 119, therefore, is difficult to categorize, yet its overall appearance tilts towards a wisdom psalm. It stems from a contemplative type of person within the Deuteronomistic school. The author may have intended this work for new converts (vv. 19, 67, 176).

"Law," as inferred already, is not to be interpreted as a legal code, or as the Torah or five books of Moses, or as the tradition of the scribes. It is the Lord who teaches the law (vv. 12, 19, 26, 64, 68); and so in keeping the law, one seeks the Lord (vv. 2, 10, 19, 48). Law is not kept simply by human determination but through prayer and the Lord's assistance (vv. 10, 18, 25, 26, 36). Obedience to this law becomes a source of unfailing joy (vv. 24, 35, 77, 92). Law thus becomes an important part of conversion and reformation (vv. 19, 67, 176). Law is identified with the inner force of conscience in a person persistently in touch with the Scriptures and prayerfully in God's presence. Such a law is the most binding and most liberating of all, for it represents one's best self formed by God along the way of the Scriptures.

The psalmist seems to be peering into the mystery of a personal, loving, caring God. Prayer at night is taken for granted (vv. 55, 62, 147); prayer is requested seven times a day (v. 164), giving rise to the seven "hours" of the monastic office in Christianity.

The alphabetical style adds its own mystic tone. Each letter is seen as a gift from God, enabling a person to refine ever more carefully the least dictate of God's will. This style endows a person with inner strength and consistency.

Psalm 119 shows no interest in Israelite history and institutions. Temple and feast days seem far from the mind. This psalmist may have been among the first of the pietists, the forerunners of individualistic religion. Yet the anthological style meant that the author was not a stranger to sanctuary worship, only not the most active participant.

Some scholars look upon Psalm 119 and especially its later stanzas as an introduction to or a part of the "Psalms of Ascent" for pilgrimage (Pss. 120–134). Pilgrims often passed through hostile territory (119:81–88) and were grateful at the end (vv. 89–96), with prayers during the stay at Jerusalem (vv. 97–128) and before departure (vv. 129–136), with further reflections for the return journey (vv. 137–160) and upon arrival home (vv. 161–176).

Psalm 119 adapts itself to private retreat. One can substitute for "law" any aspect of life that is from God, important yet difficult to appreciate, understand, or even accept: for example, sickness or death in a family; crucial turns in life, church, or politics beyond one's control; or an inspiration to be of service to others.

The Psalms of Ascent

Psalms 120–134 are each entitled "A Song of Ascent" or, in some older Bibles, "A Gradual Psalm." Various reasons are offered: there is the steeple or progressive rhythm of repeating words from the previous verse (Ps. 121:3–5; 123:1–2; 127:1–2; 130:5–6); fifteen psalms were to be sung on the fifteen steps from the Court of the Women to the Court of Israel in the Temple (Ezek. 40:22, 37; m. Mid. 2.5–6); they allude to return from Babylonian exile (Ezra 2:1; 7:9); and, most probable of all reasons, they were chanted by pilgrims to and from Jerusalem, especially at the time of the harvest festivals, as the "Egyptian Hallel" (Pss. 113–118) was sung at Jerusalem during these feasts.

This sequence of psalms may reflect a pilgrimage to Jerusalem: the announcement (Ps. 120), beginning (Ps. 121), and joyful arrival at Jerusalem (Ps. 122) where prayers (Ps. 123) and thanksgiving (Ps. 124) are offered, and after a pause (Ps. 125), processions with sheaves (Ps. 126), invocation (Ps. 127), with blessing and curse (Pss. 128–129), expiatory sacrifice (Ps. 130), a renewal of covenant obligations (Ps. 131), and another procession honoring Jerusalem (Ps. 132), a communion sacrifice or sacred meal (Ps. 133), and a farewell to the Levites at the Temple (Ps. 134).

The psalms share many literary qualities: brevity, formal blessings, hymnic sentences, repetitions, allusions to Jerusalem, and Aramaic expressions. Their imagery generally reflects farm life and agricultural vistas, family and homelife. The tone is mild, well adapted to people tired from a tedious journey.

Psalm 120. Psalm 120 is a prayer for help combining sorrow and confidence. Verse 1 calls for help because of the distressful circumstances of the Diaspora and the difficulties of the journey to Jerusalem. Verses 2–4 respond in the only way possible in a culture without internal police forces, by a curse that places the evil situation squarely in God's hands (Ps. 69). In vv. 5–7 the foreign lands stretch as far north as Meshech near the Black Sea (Gen. 10:2) to Kedar in southern Arabia (Isa. 21:13–17). Despite its dangers the psalmist confesses the need (Ps. 120:7) to go on the pilgrimage to pray for peace.

Psalm 121. Psalm 121 is a quiet dialogue between parent and child or between priest and lay person. Verse 1 is the question, vv. 2–8 the reply. Or even more intricately, vv. 1 and 3 are by the lay person; vv. 2 and 4 by the priest, who pronounces the blessing in vv. 5–8.

Lifting one's eyes to the mountains implies a yearning look toward Jerusalem (Ps. 42:2) and a fearful glance at hostile mountains along the way. The blessing in 121:2 is founded on Isa. 41:10, 13–14; 42:5 and was repeated frequently (Pss. 115:15; 124:8; 134:3; 146:6), as it is in Christian prayers. That God does not slumber or sleep (121:4) reassures anyone doubtful, as in Pss. 7:7; 44:24. Ps. 121:5 reads in 11QPs<sup>a</sup>, "By night the Lord is your keeper, by day your shade at your right hand," like a promise given to Abraham (Gen. 28:15). God will protect the pilgrim not only from sunstroke (2 Kings 4:18–20) and the evil influence of the moon but also from demonic attack (Ps. 91:5–13).

Psalm 122. Joyfully arriving at Jerusalem (vv. 1–2), the pilgrim praises the holy city (vv. 3–5) and prays for its peace (vv. 6–9). The walls of Jerusalem offer security after the dangerous journey for those obeying the law of pilgrimage (Deut. 16:16–17). The reference to "the house of David" reflects postexilic hopes for a Davidic Messiah (cf. Zech. 9:9). Christians think of Jesus' pilgrimages to Jerusalem (Luke 2:49; 9:51; 19:41) and their own invitation to an assembly of worship (Heb. 12:22–24).

Psalm 123. Although beginning almost the same way as Psalm 121, Psalm 123 has a tone of lament over the memory of personal and national sorrows. A quiet, wholesome trust sustains the pilgrim, despite an arrogant smirch from oppressors. The psalm was composed at a difficult time (cf. Neh. 2:19–20; Isa. 63:7–64:11; Zech. 1:15).

Psalm 124. Psalm 124, a hymn of community thanksgiving composed for an occasion such as the completion of the city walls after a period of internal indifference and outside harassment (Neh. 12:27–47), was easily adaptable for pilgrims. "Were it not for the Lord," the psalmist, like Israel, would never have survived (Ps. 94:17; Gen. 31:42). People are summoned to witness publicly to their faith in the holy city as well as their own deliverance by the Lord (Pss. 107; 118). A series of precise images sweeps us forward: fire, torrential rain, wild animals, a helpless bird; people were in danger of being swallowed up in death (cf. Num. 16:30). The psalm recalls the mythological accounts of chaotic waters associated with Jerusalem (Pss. 29; 46). Ps. 124:8 repeats a standard prayer of confidence (Ps. 121:2).

Psalm 125. This psalm of confidence, Psalm 125, was composed during foreign occupation or subversion from evil leadership within (Isa. 56:9–57:13; Ps. 16). It was ideal for pilgrims reflecting upon the perils of their own hostile environment at home and on the journey. In the opening expression of assurance (125:1–3), righteous Israelites merge into city, mountains, and Temple and these into God, a God who surrounds the chosen people with complete protection (Zech. 2:9[5]; 2 Kings 6:17). Ps. 125:4–5 asks a blessing upon the upright, those who are "straight and true with God," but upon the wicked, "those who bend and twist their ways," an expulsion from the community (Pss. 18:26–27; 35:8). The psalm ends with a liturgical blessing (Ps. 128:6).

Psalm 126. Psalm 126, another psalm of confidence, may have been composed for the festival of Tabernacles, when the people celebrated the autumn harvest and prayed for rain (Lev. 23:33–43; Zech. 14:16–19), but which was at times a feast of disappointment (Hag. 1:6; 2:16; Neh. 8:9–18). Ps. 126:1–3 dreams about a happy future under God's direction (Gen. 37:5–11; 20:3–7; 1 Kings 3:5–15). Ps. 126:4–5 prays for the speedy fulfillment of dreams, like sudden rainfall in the wilderness, or for a sure fulfillment, like sowing seed in the dark earth with hopes for a good harvest (cf. John 4:36–38; Gal. 6:9). The sequence of joy into sorrow with new hope may also be observed in Jeremiah 31.

Psalm 127. Psalm 127, a wisdom psalm, examines the special blessings of a large family for the virtuous person. It may have been composed to greet the birth of a child, yet it was ideal for pilgrimage since the child represented the continuity of Israel within the family home of the Temple. The association of wisdom, blessings, and Temple attracted the name of Solomon in the title (cf. Ps. 72). Id. 127:1–2, and throughout the Bible, to build a house meant to have a family (Deut. 25:9; Ruth 4:11). If the Lord does not give children, then every effort at building a physical home is useless. Ps. 127:3–5 witnesses to the blessing of children and the protection that they provide against false witnesses at the city gate (Deut. 25:7; Ruth 4:1–2, 11).

Psalm 128. The preceding psalm ends and Psalm 128 begins with the formula “Happy that one . . .” (cf. Ps. 1). Each, a wisdom psalm, emphasizes the happiness of children for the married couple, here compared to olive plants (Ps. 52:10; Hos. 14:7). At Jerusalem the pilgrim received this formal blessing upon the family. The wife is portrayed living within the private interior of the home with little visibility. The psalm retains the notion of earthly retribution for a virtuous or wicked life (Lev. 26).

Psalm 129. Psalm 129 blends lament, thanksgiving, and most of all, confidence so as to overcome deep disappointments. The tone and images are calm and peaceful, plowing fields and cleaning the housetop, yet the significance is traumatic in that the live flesh of the back is being turned over in the plowing (cf. Isa. 1:4–9) and the withered lives of people are being burnt up like grass. The psalm reflects the sad disillusionment upon returning from exile (Hag. 1:6; Ezra 3:12; Neh. 1). The psalm is a pilgrimage through Israelite history from oppression in Egypt (Ps. 129:1–2; Hos. 11) to the difficulties through the centuries from foreign invaders (Ps. 129:3–4; Jer. 31:15–20) and the destruction of Jerusalem (Ps. 129:5; Lamentations). A liturgical blessing, which may have become a popular greeting (Ruth 2:4), closes the psalm.

Psalm 130. More personal than Psalms 15 and 24, Psalm 130 also prepared a worshiper for full entry into the Temple through “the gate of justice” (Ps. 118:19). It includes a word or oracle from the priest (130:5) in preparation for sacrifice. The Aramaic Targum interpreted “sentinels” (vv. 6–7) as Levites who signal the morning sacrifice (Lev. 6:5–6). The strong attitude of compunction makes it one of the most popular of the seven penitential psalms.

After a plaintive cry for pardon (Ps. 130:1–2) and an admission of guilt (vv. 3–4), the tone moves to confidence (vv. 5–7a) and the assurance of forgiveness (vv. 7b–8). The sincerity of the psalmist shows in a skillful choice of words and style. “Depths” reveal an abyss of torment (Pss. 18:16; 69:3, 15) and opaque darkness (Ps. 18:29) beneath the psalm’s calm rhythm. Ps.

130:5 positions one humbly before the Lord but three times declares, “I wait!”

Psalm 131. Forgiveness, with memories of failures and guilt, induces a humble attitude toward God (v. 1) and toward one’s neighbor (v. 2), so that a community exhortation is appropriate (v. 3). Biblical humility is not so much a state of soul but a healthy, honest relationship with others. The psalmist does not venture recklessly into God’s domain (cf. Gen. 3:1–7; Exod. 3:6; Isa. 40:12–14).

Psalm 132. While other “Psalms of Ascent” tend to be subdued and date to the postexilic era (see the Short Essay “The Psalms of Ascent”), Psalm 132 sings enthusiastically and reaches back into early history when David conquered Jerusalem and solemnly brought the Ark from Kiriath-jearim to the holy city (1 Sam. 7:1; 2 Sam. 6–7). 2 Chron. 6:41–42 associates Psalm 132 with Solomon’s dedication of the Temple. The first half inaugurates a procession at Kiriath-jearim, repeating David’s oath to bring the Ark to Jerusalem (vv. 1–5) and concluding at Jerusalem with the installation of the Ark in the Holy of Holies and prayer for the king (vv. 6–10). In the second half, God (through the priests) declares an oath in favor of David’s dynasty (vv. 11–12), associating it with the divine presence at the Temple (vv. 13–16) and ending with a prayer for the king (vv. 17–18). With the disappearance of the dynasty after the destruction of Judah, the pilgrimage to Jerusalem reaffirmed Israel’s hope in a Messiah to appear in the Temple. A psalm that originated with a strong political statement connecting the dynasty with the Mosaic covenant and the Ark at Jerusalem ends with nonpolitical aspirations.

A wordplay in vv. 1–5 associates “afflictions,” “my eyes,” and “sleep,” so that David’s total concern, indeed his willingness to suffer, is directed towards the Ark. Verses 6–10 locate the beginning of the procession at “Ephra-thah,” referring to David’s clan within the tribe of Judah (Gen. 35:19; Ruth 4:11; Mic. 5:1[2]) and at the “fields of Jaar,” “Kiriath-jearim,” a village directly west of Jerusalem. “Arise” (Ps. 132:8) announces the beginning of the procession (cf. Num. 10:35; Ps. 68:2). Yahweh’s “resting place” is a name for the Temple (Isa. 66:1; 1 Chron. 28:2) with important religious consequences (Ps. 95:11). The clothing (132:9) would be priestly and royal vestments (cf. Zech. 3:3–5). In Ps. 132:17–18 “horn” symbolizes strength (Ps. 18:3; Ezek. 29:21); “lamp,” one’s presence before God (Exod. 27:20–21; 1 Kings 11:36).

Psalm 133. Psalm 133 is ideally suited to express the joyful companionship of pilgrims at Jerusalem. Closely associated with wisdom (Prov. 15:23; 16:16), it declares that harmony anoints a family and neighborhood as though they were a high priest directing worship at the Temple. Scented oil symbolized peace, health, and joy (Pss. 23:5; 45:8; Exod. 30:22–33). Mount Hermon, reaching over nine thousand feet into the sky and continually capped with snow, became a source of abundant water and dew. Dew is symbolic of blessings (Hos. 14:5; Ps. 110:3), especially “life forever” in family descendants.

Psalm 134. The last of the “Psalms of Ascent,” Psalm 134 presents a final evening service at the Temple (Ps. 8:4; Josh. 1:8; 1 Chron. 9:33) with a blessing upon the Levites (Ps. 134:1–2) and a priestly blessing upon the people (v. 3; Num. 6:22–27; Pss. 121:2; 124:8). Psalm 134 may provide the rubrics for a much longer farewell service.

Psalm 135. Like Psalms 96–97 and 119, Psalm 135 presents a mosaic of biblical passages: compare v. 1 and Ps. 113:1; vv. 1–2 and Ps. 134:1; v. 3a and Ps. 136:3a; v. 4 and Exod. 18:11; 19:5; and vv. 15–20 and Ps. 115:4–11. In the postexilic age, a repertoire of sacred literature and formulas was available. The difficulty of detecting a poetical sequence may be due to the psalm’s purpose of indicating various liturgical actions. Three minihymns are present: 135:1–4, 13–14, 19–21. Verses 4–21 were sometimes joined with Psalm 136 as part of the “Great Hallel,” so that Psalm 135 was sung every Sabbath except the one before New Years; on the eighth day of Passover, it was attached to the “Egyptian Hallel” (Pss. 113–118).

For the call to praise in 135:1–4, cf. Pss. 8:2; 134:1; Exod. 19:5; and Mal. 3:17. All depends upon God’s initial election of Israel as a special possession. Ps. 135:5–18 provides motivation for the hymn, first from creation (vv. 5–7), beginning with “I know,” a solo voice from the choir. The sea was always a mysterious, fearful place (Pss. 42:7–12; 107:23–32). The scanning of Israel’s history (135:8–12) covers the plagues in Egypt and the early settlement in the land. The first Canaanite kings defeated by Israel were Sihon and Og (Num. 21:21–24, 31–34). Ps. 135:13–14 recapitulates creation and history in the remembrance of the divine name Yahweh; all flows from the self-revelation of God’s person within the Mosaic covenant, a remembrance acted out liturgically in Temple ceremonies and prayers. (For vv. 15–21, cf. Ps. 115:4–11.)

Psalm 136. To be chanted antiphonally between a solo voice or special choir and the entire assembly, Psalm 136, a most solemn hymn, is fittingly called the “Great Hallel” or “Great Praise” (see commentaries above introducing Book Five and on Ps. 135). After the introduction (135:1–3), Yahweh is acclaimed for great deeds: in creating the universe (vv. 4–9), in redeeming Israel from Egypt (vv. 10–16), and in conquering the promised land (vv. 17–22; Deut. 34:1–4). Ps. 136:23–26 either summarizes everything as Yahweh’s love or else extends that love to the return from Exile. In any case, each moment of God’s intervention from the beginning of creation was directed towards Israel’s joy and peace.

The opening exclamation can be translated either as “Give thanks!” or “Praise!” The latter meaning is even more germane to this Hebrew word: to lift or cast (Lam. 3:53), praise (Ps. 49:19), or confess sin (Ps. 32:5b)—the context determines the lifting of oneself to God. The refrain begins with the Hebrew particle ki, best translated in its original meaning, “Yes!” or “Indeed!” Nature and history do not give the reason for praise as they direct one’s joyful faith already stimulated by what Yahweh has been doing. The word for “loving-kindness” or “mercy” is also pregnant with many connotations: at times “strength” (Isa. 40:26; Ps. 59:10) or “pledge” (Gen. 20:13; Isa. 55:3). Therefore, it connotes love that is enduring and dependable. The refrain became extremely popular in postexilic Israel (Pss. 106:1; 107:1; 118:1; Jer. 33:11; Ezra 3:11).

“God of gods” (Ps. 136:2) originally referred to elevating Yahweh above all other gods (Deut. 10:17), but here it means “God is certainly God.” “Lord of lords,” similarly. Creation according to the designs of wisdom (Ps. 136:5) directs God’s activity across heaven and earth for the sake of Israel (Prov. 8:22–36; Sir. 24). Ps. 136:13 reflects Yahweh’s struggle against monstrous, even superhuman hostile forces to free Israel from oppression (Exod. 15:3–8; Isa. 51:9–10). (On Ps. 136:17–20, see Ps. 135:10–11.)

Psalm 137. Psalm 137, a communal lament, closest of all to a funeral dirge, may be divided between vv. 1–4, lamenting the impossibility of chanting songs honoring Jerusalem in enemy lands and vv. 5–9, first lamenting the holy city destroyed before one’s eyes and then cursing the two great enemies, Babylon, which burned Jerusalem to the ground (2 Kings 25) and Edom, which looted the countryside afterward (Obad. 8–15; Isa. 63:1–6). The psalm was written with the same agony as present in Isa. 63:7–64:11, between 537 and 520 B.C., perhaps by a repatriated singer from the guild of Asaph (Ezra 2:41; Ps. 79).

Ps. 137:1–4 begins with a contrast of “rivers of Babylon” and the stream of one’s tears (Ps. 42:4), between remembering and forgetting (137:1, 5, 6, 7). The tormentors who ask, “Where is your God?” (Pss. 79:10; 115:2) hardly want a song to this God. “Songs of Zion” may dictate the placement of this psalm here, after the Zion songs in Psalms 120–134, 135–136. (For curse psalms, see the commentary above on Ps. 69; and for atrocities of war, expressed in the metaphor of dashing children against city walls, Hos. 14:1; Nah. 3:10.) The metaphor expressed the capture of an enemy city, at which time defenders, born within the city, were frequently overwhelmed and killed by the assaulting troops.

Psalm 138. The last series of “Psalms of David” commences with Psalm 138, generally in poor textual condition (Ps. 141:5–7). The author, writing from a foreign land, is quite conscious of the community and its covenant (138:2b, 8; Exod. 34:6–7). Two hymns of thanksgiving (Ps. 137:1–3, 4–6) are completed by a song of confidence (vv. 7–8).

Verses 1–3 begin in a fashion similar to the canticles of the redeemed in Isa. 12:1; 25:1. The phrase, “in the presence of the gods [Heb. ’elohim],” became embarrassing to the scribes. The Greek and Latin versions read “angels” (NAB); the Syriac, “kings”; the Aramaic Targum, “judges.” Originally ’elohim could have a generic meaning of exalted authority (Ps. 45:7) or Yahweh’s heavenly court (Pss. 29:1, 9; 89:6–9) or discredited foreign gods (Ps. 82; Deut. 4:19).

In Ps. 138:4–6 the recognition of Yahweh’s gracious deeds by the nations depends upon Israel’s faith and its manifestation to outsiders (Isa. 40:9). Psalm 138:8 confesses that the Lord of the covenant outlasts every difficulty.

Psalm 139. Typically one of the most beautiful of psalms, textually Psalm 139 is one of the most difficult. Once the unity is established by an inclusio, bonding vv. 1–3 and 23–24, then the lament in vv. 19–22 controls the meaning of vv. 4–18. Darkness comes from the encirclement of disloyal, hostile people, possibly apostate Jews in foreign lands. As at night, this darkness enables the psalmist to peer deeply into the heavens and into the depths of human existence, perceiving the presence of Yahweh, otherwise hidden by the glare of daylight. With no mention of Israel’s history or Temple, the psalmist is related to wisdom literature like Job, yet even stronger ties show up with prophecy (Jer. 11:20–21; 12:3; 17:10; Isa. 40; 49).

Persecution (Ps. 139:19–22) plunges the psalmist into a dark mystery where God is pursued in the paths of knowledge (vv. 4–6), into the farthest reaches of the universe (vv. 7–12), into the silent moments of conception and birth (vv. 13–18). The introductory hymn (vv. 1–3) is paralleled by a confession of innocence (vv. 23–24). The psalmist is not so much seeking wisdom as reaching for peace with God.

When the verb “know” in v. 1 is left without an object, the implication is that Yahweh knows everything. The juxtaposition of sitting and standing (cf. Deut. 6:7; Ps. 127:2), journeying and resting in Ps. 139:2–3 intends to include every moment in between.

Verses 4–6 leave the psalmist in fear and awe at the mystery of God within oneself. To be hemmed in is expressed using language of siege and adversity (Judg. 2:15; Jer. 10:18). The psalm, therefore, is not written from a peaceful setting. When Ps. 139:7–12 reaches to the limits of sky and earth, the psalmist is defiantly saying to persecutors, you cannot hound me away from God. In fact, to locate God in the highest heavens or in Sheol speaks defiantly to the narrow limits of Israel’s theology. Deut. 30:12 forbade seeking God in the skies; Pss. 6:6; 88:10–13 denied God’s presence in Sheol. This search for God through impenetrable, even forbidden darkness is not to be dismissed as black magic (139:11–12).

Verses 13–18 move from the dangerous darkness of public life to the warm, life-sustaining darkness of the mother’s womb. The psalmist senses the kindly protection and wise planning of Yahweh. “My inward being,” (lit., “my kidneys,”) refers to the seat of conscience (Ps. 16:7) and personal integrity (Jer. 12:2), where one learns true wisdom (Ps. 51:8). This and other classic texts on pregnancy confess God’s presence already forming the entire future of the person (Pss. 22:10–11; 71:5–6; Jer. 1:5; Isa. 49:1; Job 10:8–12). God sees “my embryo,” an Aramaic expression for something unfinished, and inscribes the entire future “in your book.” From Ps. 69:29; Exod. 32:32–33; Dan. 7:10; 12:1, and many other texts, this expression assures a person of faith that a happy, peaceful outcome will ensue. Ps. 139:18b, “when I awake, behold you are still with me,” may originally have indicated light at the end of an earthly trial, but the Aramaic Targum saw here an allusion to the resurrection.

Verses 19–22 pray for the destruction of the wicked, a prayer that would have eliminated the need of a psalm like this. Verses 23–24 end with a door opening into the unknown future, later understood as “the way of eternity.”

Psalm 140. Laborious with words rare or unusual, Psalm 140 represents the prayer of an Israelite innocently accused, possibly the victim of a curse. The opening section contains a double prayer for deliverance (vv. 2 and 5), each time followed by lamentation (vv. 3–4 and 6); there follows an expression of faith in Yahweh (vv. 7–9), a curse upon the slanderers (vv. 10–13), and a final prayer of confidence (vv. 14–15). The dismal, deceitful situation reflects the early postexilic age as described in Isa. 56:9–57:13 and 59:1–15.

The opening appeal is against people with venomous tongues who may have put a curse upon the psalmist (Ps. 140:4; Pss. 41:8; 58:6); the image of a snare trapping the unsuspecting victim is equally frequent (Pss. 140:6; 91:3; 124:7). Ps. 140:3b is included in a series of passages quoted in Rom. 3:10–18 (see the commentary above on Ps. 14:3). The confession of faith (140:7–9) uses familiar expressions from the repertoire of Israel's prayer (Ps. 16:2; 22:11b; 31:15; 35:3; 60:9). The curse against the enemy (140:10–13; see the commentary above on Ps. 69) incorporates the lex talionis (Ps. 35:8). Reminiscences of the fiery destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19; Ps. 11:6) and the opening of the earth to swallow Dathan and Abiram (Num. 16:32–33) explode upon readers. The concluding prayer of confidence presumes eventual vindication.

Psalm 141. Psalm 141 is even more textually disturbed than Psalm 140. In fact, vv. 5–7 are unintelligible in the Hebrew with a wide variety of restructuring in modern translations. Yet Psalms 117, 138, 141, and 142 were chanted each evening for the lighting of lamps within the Temple evening service; today Psalm 141 is frequently sung with the burning of incense at Christian vesper services. The psalm opens with an appeal to God for assistance (vv. 1–2) against temptation (vv. 3–4). After the perplexing vv. 5–7, another prayer for help is directed against deceitful adversaries (vv. 8–10).

Verse 1 voices a classic appeal to Yahweh (Pss. 17:6; 22:20; 38:23). The evening sacrifice consisted of prayers, incense consumed in adoration, cereal and lamb offerings partly burned and partly given to the priests for livelihood (Exod. 30:8; Lev. 2:1; 6:1; Num. 28:3–8). This custom was faithfully followed in the postexilic age (Ezra 9:5; Dan. 9:21; Jth. 9:1). Through prayer one seeks wisdom and circumspection (Ps. 141:3; Prov. 13:3; Eccles. 5:1, 4–6). God “inclines the heart to evil” (Ps. 141:4) in that only God's grace, freely offered and freely received, opens the heart to goodness. When rejected, God leaves a person.

Psalm 142. Psalm 142, a lament, stems from an individual falsely accused and under dark confinement; prisons as known today did not exist (Lev. 24:12; Num. 15:34; Jer. 38:6). The composer borrowed freely from other laments (Pss. 16; 22; 27; 30). The structure is typical: a call for God's attention (142:2–3a), a lament (vv. 3b–5), and a prayer for help (vv. 6–8). The title associates the psalm with David's hiding from Saul in a cave (1 Sam. 22:1), certainly an encouragement for anyone under persecution who, like David, is assured Yahweh's special care.

For Ps. 142:2, see Pss. 30:9 and 77:2. Consolation is found in memorized prayers. Ps. 142:3 literally speaks of pouring out “my meditations,” my continuous mumbling of prayers. The psalmist in v. 5 challenges the Lord: “Look carefully to the right [where a friend ought to be] and see; there is no one willing to acknowledge me.” Verse 6 accumulates familiar phrases, especially drawn from the Levites (Ps. 16:5; Num. 18:20), but here applied to all Israel, which recognizes a personal consecration to the Lord (Ps. 73:26).

Psalm 143. The last of the seven penitential psalms, Psalm 143 confesses that only through Yahweh can anyone arrive at goodness and persevere in it. The popularity of this psalm is exemplified by the Greek church's recitation of it every morning. One meets an initial appeal to Yahweh (vv. 1–2), a lament (vv. 3–6), a new call for God's attention (v. 7), and petitions (vv. 8–12). The psalm is a potpourri of prayers across the Psalter; almost every line can be documented elsewhere. Verse 2 acknowledges the powerlessness of anyone to be a righteous person left to themselves (Job 15:14; 25:4) and is quoted by Paul (Rom. 3:9, 20; Gal. 2:16). Ps. 143:5 indicates the value of memorized prayers (Pss. 77:4; 119:52). Ps. 143:7 follows the traditional position of no remembrance of Yahweh in Sheol, the place of the dead (Ps. 6:6). The psalm ends in the company of the suffering, obedient servant (Deut. 34:1–5; Isa. 42:1; 50:4–9a; 52:13–53:12).

Psalm 144. Just as Psalm 18 was considered a most typical psalm of David and inserted as chap. 22 in the appendix to the Davidic narrative (2 Sam. 21–24), Psalm 144, almost at the end of the “Psalms of David” in the Psalter, draws upon Psalm 18 to thank God for the glorious Davidic tradition and to beg God for its renewal in dreary postexilic Israel (Isa. 56:9–57:13; Ps. 16). In fact, this redaction in the postexilic age may have dictated the predominance of laments in the “Psalms of David” and the reduction of David's image in the titles to small, even sinful human proportions. Part One (vv. 1–11) represents the royal Davidic tradition, drawing upon Ps. 18:3, 5, 10, 15, 17; Part Two (144:12–15), a fragment of a psalm, adapts wisdom traditions to the later age. The text has been damaged by neglect or scribal incompetence.

After the opening hymn (vv. 1–2), an admission of human frailty (vv. 3–4) leads to a theophany and a prayerful refrain requesting God's intervention (vv. 5–8), to an expression of gratitude with a repetition of the refrain. Verses 12–15 ask for peaceful prosperity in the family (v. 12), farmlands (vv. 13–14a), and cities (v. 14bc). The psalm concludes joyfully (v. 15).

After a hymnic introduction from Psalm 18, human weakness is confessed with the images and expressions of Pss. 8:5; 39:6–7, 12; Job 7:17–18; 14:2; Eccles. 6:12 and leads to a cry of desperation that God break through the postexilic desolation with a marvelous theophany. This is not a prayer for the messianic age but for urgent help now. The language is drawn from Pss. 18:10, 15; 104:32; Isa. 64:1–4. The reference to foreigners who swear falsely (Ps. 144:7–8) may point to apostate Jews or to those who intermarried in postexilic Israel (Isa. 56:6–57:13; Neh. 9:2). The new song (Ps. 144:9; Isa. 42:10; Pss. 33:3; 96:1) prepares for the addition of a new prayer in 144:12–15.

Psalm 145. An alphabetic psalm (Pss. 9–10) with the line beginning with the Hebrew letter nun supplied at 145:13b in the Greek, Syriac, and 11QPs<sup>a</sup>. Psalm 145 is typically restrained in its creativity. An anthological method appears throughout: compare v. 1 and Ps. 30:2; v. 2b and Ps. 34:3; v. 3a and Ps. 48:2. Structure is often obscured by the alphabetic approach, but it may be helpful to recognize: the call to praise in vv. 1–2, 4–7, 10–12; motivation in vv. 3, 8–9, 13–20; and conclusion in v. 21.

With this poem, the “Psalms of David” are concluded, even though the major collections ended at Ps. 72:20. Rabbi Eleazar ben Abina (fourth century A.D.) assured anyone who recited Psalm 145 three times daily a place in the world to come (b. Ber. 4b). It is recited daily in the synagogue for morning, noonday, and evening prayer. Verse 2 was incorporated into the traditional Christian hymn of praise, “Te Deum,” and vv. 10, 15–16 into grace before meals. Yahweh’s domain according to this psalm will be universal (vv. 15, 16, 21), but especially over Israel (vv. 10b, 18–20), and eternal (vv. 1, 2, 13, 21). These qualities are reinforced by the inclusive and enduring nature of an alphabetic psalm.

Verses 4–9 draw praise from the roots of the covenant (Exod. 34) and may refer to the remembrance (Ps. 145:7) of Yahweh’s great deeds for Israel as reenacted in liturgy (Pss. 102:13–18; 111; 135:13). Ps. 145:15–16 is drawn from Ps. 104:27–28. Because the Lord is close, manifest, and just “to all who call with sincerity” (145:17–18), the only requirement is a turning to God with faith in God’s graciousness and fidelity, excluding whatever smacks of deceit, frivolousness, or superstition. The final phrase, “for ever and ever,” is placed after each “letter” or verse in 11QPs<sup>a</sup> and may represent a community refrain.

Psalm 146. The last five psalms may constitute the final doxology of praise (Pss. 41:14; 72:18–19; 89:53; 106:48). Psalm 146 exhibits a strong anthological style and draws especially from Psalms 103–104. After the call to praise (146:1–2) and an exhortation from the priests (vv. 3–4), the motivation comes principally from Yahweh’s care for the defenseless (vv. 5–9), Yahweh’s role as king (v. 10).

Verses 1–2 transform one’s entire life into praise through the reception of Yahweh’s gift of life. The second half of v. 2 hints at a translation such as, “let my entire life be music to my God.” Verses 3–4 contrast the eternal God with every human resource that ends in death (Gen. 3:19; Ps. 104:29–30). The text may connote, at least vaguely, the psalmist’s aspiration for eternal life (Ps. 49:16–20).

Ps. 146:5–9 begins in the style of wisdom (Ps. 1:1) but proceeds with participles in hymnic style: making heaven and earth . . . guarding fidelity, securing justice . . . giving food . . . opening [the eyes of] the blind. Worship acknowledges creation as happening now and links it closely with social justice (Pss. 96–98). Ps. 146:6 is recited in a prayer of thanksgiving in Acts 4:24. The anthological style is enhanced in 11QPs<sup>a</sup> with the insertion after Ps. 146:9 of Pss. 33:8 and 145:10–12.

Psalm 147. Like Psalm 146 in its strongly anthological style, Psalm 147 also draws from Psalms 33 and 104 as well as from Isaiah 40; 55; 56; and 61. Three hymns, with frequent use of participles, are stitched together: Ps. 146:1–6, Yahweh, Lord of history; vv. 7–11, Lord of nature; and vv. 12–20, God of Zion, where the creative word is announced. The Greek and Latin versions separate vv. 12–20 as a separate psalm, enabling them to catch up numerically with the Hebrew text. The references to Jerusalem in the first and third stanzas create literary unity. Because of the mention of the city walls in v. 2 and of rain in the second and third stanzas, the psalm may have close links with the dedication of the walls (Neh. 12:27–43) and with the Feast of Tabernacles (Zech. 14:16–19).

Ps. 147:1–6 joins creation with Yahweh’s care for the poor and outcasts. The creator God who reaches into the stars (Isa. 40:26) appears as a healer for personal sorrows (Hos. 11:3; Jer. 30:17); both acts proclaim a message of salvation about a compassionate God. The second hymn (Ps. 147:7–11) contrasts the strength of a merciful God with the weakness of the instruments of war. The fear of the Lord is identified with hope in the Lord’s steadfast love, bonding everyone with the God of the covenant.

Verses 12–20 begin within the Temple at Jerusalem, and from the word of proclamation and prayer there goes forth a creative word (Ps. 33:6; Isa. 55:10–11) to bring important snow in winter, especially on the mountains north of Galilee. The melting of this snow and the later rains assure abundant crops in the new agricultural year (Deut. 11:10–17). This stanza of the hymn leads up to Israel’s faith as a chosen people (Deut. 7:5–15; Isa. 44:1–5). In Ps. 147:19–20 the creative word, giving ever-new life, is identified with the Torah (Deut. 4:7–8; Sir. 24).

Psalm 148. Psalm 148 is a hymn of praise that allows many comparisons: with scribal lists from ancient Egypt; with Psalms 33; 103–104; Genesis 1; Job 38; Song of Three Youths 28–68; and with St. Francis’s “Canticle to the Sun.” Psalm 148 consists of an invitation to the heavens and their inhabitants (vv. 1–6) and to the earth and its inhabitants (vv. 7–13a) to praise Yahweh. Each section consists of imperatives completed by the exhortative clause, “Let them praise the name of the Lord” (vv. 5, 13a), each with its own finale (vv. 6, 13b). Verse 14 centers this universal phrase in Israel. While the first stanza descends from the angels, to sun, moon, and stars, down to the body of rain clouds above the earth, the second stanza ascends from sea monsters, to earth’s surface, to animals and humankind. A lovely symmetry directs the liturgical action.

Verses 1–6 place the liturgical action in the universe beginning before God’s throne in the heavens (1 Kings 8:27; Pss. 11:4; 18:5–20), surrounded by the heavenly court (1 Kings 22:19–23; Job 38:7; Pss. 29; 82). Later tradition speaks of a series of heavenly spheres (2 Cor. 12:2; T. Levi. 3:1–8), drawing one ever more closely to the divine presence. All of these heavenly creatures are completely subject to Yahweh’s will.

Ps. 148:7–13 brings together sometimes hostile sea monsters (Ps. 89:11; Isa. 51:9–10) and wild beasts (Isa. 11:6–8), mountains that quake and spit fire (Ps. 46:2–4), kings at times belligerent (Isa. 10:5–6; Jer. 6), together with young men and maidens, old and young (Ps. 68:25–28; Jer. 31:4, 13) into the liturgical choir. In Ps. 148:14 the “horn” or strength (Ps. 18:3) of Israel appears supreme in this sacred assembly. Israel is God’s chosen and beloved, joined to them by steadfast love (Exod. 34:6–7).

Psalm 149. Psalm 149 struggles to sustain the universal praise of Psalm 148 in the postexilic age, possibly when Nehemiah overcame opposition to rebuilding the city walls (Neh. 2:17–20; 12:27–43). The opening words, “sing a new song,” allude to the final or eschatological achievement (Isa. 42:10; Pss. 96:1; 144:9) with the extravagant language of Israel’s “holy war” tradition (Ps. 18:32–46).

The opening stanza calls for praise (149:1–3) based on the motive of Yahweh’s care of the poor (v. 4); the second stanza is a call to battle (vv. 5–6) to achieve victory and peace (vv. 7–9a); and v. 9b, like the close of Psalm 147, centers the action in Israel.

Ps. 149:1–4 blends the titles “chosen people” (Exod. 6:6–7; Deut. 7:6–7; Ps. 95:7), “Maker” (Isa. 44:2; Ps. 100:3), and “King” (Isa. 44:6; Pss. 96–100). In Psalms 148–149 Yahweh creates and rules the universe for the sake of chosen Israel, even for their lowly ones (cf. Isa. 60:14).

Ps. 149:5–9a, with slight emendation, calls upon all “the clans” (instead of “couches” in v. 5). The “two-edged sword,” literally “sword of double mouths” (v. 6; Isa. 41:15), devours with double fury, a phrase for the clear, swift justice of God’s word (cf. Heb. 4:12; Rev. 1:16; 2:12). So certain is the victory that it is already written in the heavenly records (Pss. 69:29; 139:16).

Psalm 150. If Psalms 146–150 are not the final doxology (cf. Ps. 146), certainly the last psalm fills that position magnificently. While the Psalter opens with a series of “Psalms of David,” characterized mostly by lament, it concludes with exuberant praise.

Psalm 150 rings with either hallelujahs or halleluhu (Heb., “Praise him”) or hallelu-’el (“Praise God”), ten within the body of the psalm, vv. 1b–5, or thirteen if one counts the conclusion in v. 6 along with the opening and closing hallelujah, typical of Psalms 146–150. The rabbis recognized the symbolism of ten in the ten words of the commandments (Exod. 34:28) or thirteen in the thirteen times that God the Creator speaks in Genesis 1 or in the thirteen divine attributes in Exod. 34:6–7.

Yahweh is praised in the heavenly sanctuary (Ps. 11:4), in the firmament that upholds the heavenly waters, and for mighty deeds in Israel’s history (Deut. 3:24), ceremonially reenacted (Ps. 106:2). The musical instruments include even the pipe, only here in a formal liturgy (Gen. 4:21; Job 21:12). Music catches the pulse and breath of the universe, the inutterable longings of the spirit (cf. Rom 8:22–23; 2 Cor. 5:2).

The Hebrew text adds, “The book is complete; there are 2,527 verses.” The Greek, Latin, and Syriac versions as well as lIQPs<sup>a</sup> have a Psalm 151 (see Psalm 151).

Date and Background

The Proverbs, the oldest of the "wisdom" books of the Hebrew Bible, has a complex history and literary form. The book bears the title "The Proverbs of Solomon, Son of David, King of Israel" and hence follows the traditional ascription of authorship of this work, as well as Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs, to Solomon. This would suggest a date in the tenth century B.C., but, in fact, the book is not a unified composition. Rather, it comprises collections dating from various periods in the history of ancient Israel. The book of Proverbs probably received its final editing in early postexilic times (latter part of the sixth century B.C.) and hence reflects the needs of the later community as well as the "practical ethics" of the earlier monarchical period.

More than other biblical traditions, "wisdom literature" exudes something of a cosmopolitan air, which reflects its origin in a wisdom tradition common to the ancient Near East. The literary genres found in Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes and the content they convey have parallels in Mesopotamian and Egyptian literature. Moreover, it is clear that, in a number of instances, such extrabiblical literature has had a direct impact on the Israelite traditions. For example, Prov. 22:17–24:22 reflects a classic Egyptian wisdom text, The Instruction of Amenemope and the "problem literature" of Mesopotamia bears a striking resemblance to the tone and form of Job. Nevertheless, the Israelite sages subsumed the teachings of their neighbors into a fully Israelite perspective, one integrated with the teachings of the Torah and Prophets. Although wisdom literature speaks of God more as "Creator" than as "Redeemer" or "Covenant Lord" and understands persons as individuals rather than as members of the covenant community of Israel, in the final analysis the same worldview undergirds both the teachings of Proverbs and the teachings of the rest of the Hebrew canon. (For example, compare wisdom's concept of retribution to the laws of Deuteronomy or the oracles in Amos 3:3–8.)

In biblical wisdom literature, this common Yahwistic perspective (a perspective based on the unique characteristics of Israel's God) is expressed as "Fear of the LORD." This catch-phrase refers to the religion of ancient Israel in its entirety and involves both the beginning of wisdom and knowledge (Prov. 1:7; 9:10) and the implicit end of wisdom's search (Job 28:28). Without a right relationship to the Holy One of Israel, no intellectual efforts can hope to succeed nor can life be preserved (Prov. 3:5–8). "Foolishness," then, as the antithesis of wisdom, must be understood not so much as ignorance or inability of intellect but as a moral position that denies the necessity of this prior orientation of heart and mind toward the Deity.

Literary Description

Major Sections. Proverbs may be divided into a series of major collections, many of which bear superscriptions and may be distinguished by use of like form or content. These are the following:

- 1:1–9:18, wisdom poems and instructions
- 10:1–22:16, "The Proverbs of Solomon"
- 22:17–24:22, "The Words of the Wise" (superscription restored from 22:17a, see below)
- 24:23–34, further "Words of the Wise" (lit., "also these [belong] to the wise ones")
- 25:1–29:27, "Further 'Proverbs of Solomon,' Copied by the Men of Hezekiah, King of Judah"
- 30:1–14, "The Words of Agur, Son of Jakeh"
- 30:15–33, mostly numerical sayings (no superscription)
- 31:1–9, "The Words of Lemuel, King of Massa, Which His Mother Taught Him"
- 31:10–31, acrostic poem on the woman of worth (no superscription)

Many of these collections may be subdivided further, based on criteria of form and content. For example, the first Solomonic saying collection, 10:1–22:16, easily divides into two sections, 10:1–15:33 and 16:1–22:16, based on the preference in the first for antithetic parallelism and in the second for synonymous parallelism (→ Parallelism; Poetry). It should also be noted that the Greek text (Septuagint, LXX) of Proverbs differs considerably from the Hebrew text (Masoretic Text, MT) in both content and arrangement.

Literary Forms: The Proverb. The basic generic unit of the book is the mashal, or "saying"/"proverb" (→ Proverb). This Hebrew word has two basic meanings: "to be similar to" and "to rule over," and we find both of these aspects embodied in the biblical saying and proverb. First, these forms encapsulate or make visible the relationships inherent in the events they have observed. In Prov. 16:18, we read:

Before destruction, pride;

This proverb expresses a connection between a psychological attitude and the subsequent effects of that orientation. Once this "similitude" is understood, the proverb then allows people to "rule over" such situations wherever they are encountered, fulfilling the second meaning of marshal. Quoting this proverb to someone possessed of a prideful and haughty disposition acts as a warning against the "comeuppance" so often observed to be the outcome of such attitudes. Proverbs are not simply "observational" but, rather, persuasive sayings that exert social control. The citation of a proverb or saying to analyze a situation (whether social or literary) may be termed a "proverb performance" (see Fontaine).

Although the term marshal may refer to other "sentence" forms such as the taunt (Jer. 24:9) or parable (Ezek. 17:2), in wisdom literature it is most often used to refer to a two-lined proverb that exhibits parallelism between its members. The second line in some way restates the thought of the first, either through agreement (synonymous parallelism), disagreement (antithetic parallelism), or expansion of the basic idea (formal or synthetic parallelism). The simplest way to establish parallel structure is through the use of a standard "word pair," namely, two words traditionally used in conjunction to convey a contrasting or coordinate meaning. "Father/mother," "righteous/wicked," "wise/foolish" are typical examples of wisdom word pairs.

Ancient Israel also knew of one-lined "traditional" sayings that circulated among the people (see, e.g., Judg. 8:2, 21; 1 Sam. 24:13; 1 Kings 20:11). However, the presence of the second line, which produces parallelism, indicates an artistic attempt at literary shaping and, hence, usually signals the saying's origin among the educated class of "sages" rather than the "folk." For purposes of definition, the term "saying" is here used to refer to the single-line form, while "proverb" designates its artistic cousin, which displays parallelism. (Other scholars have distinguished the saying from the proverb on the basis of content; the former is merely an observational statement drawn from experience while the latter incorporates a value judgment on the experience.) Despite the differences between the style and origin of the literary proverb and those of the traditional or "folk" saying, the experiential content, outlook expressed, and use of the two forms are strikingly similar.

The short or "pithy" nature of the proverb and saying helps characterize the style of these forms. The marshal, whether folk or literary, incorporates observations of the world in a witty, imaginative, and striking way that enhances memorization. These observations work as "portable" categories that, when applied to new and ambiguous events, help people organize their experiences in familiar and socially approved ways. An African proverb of the Yoruba tribe expresses this function of proverbs quite nicely: "A proverb is like a horse: when the truth is missing, we use a proverb to find it." By mounting a horse (as opposed to a pig or hedgehog), one obtains an "overview" of what is happening on the ground and hence is no longer bound by a limited perspective. In the same way, applying a known and accepted proverb to an immediate context allows a group to integrate the new events into its earlier experience, thereby gaining greater perspective. The use of a proverb, then, suggests the existence of a situation that necessitates comment to restore the group's social stability. Although proverbs are typically used in ways that support a group's worldview, they may also be used to challenge such perspectives. Indeed, this is precisely the way great religious figures such as Ezekiel, Qohele (Ecclesiastes), and Jesus often use proverbs.

Specialized proverbs include the "better than" form and its negative counterpart, the "not good" proverb. In both, a value judgment is typically being made, as the proverb moves from a simple comparison to an explicit statement that "x is better than y" or "x is not good." Examples of the former occur in Prov. 3:14; 12:9; 15:16–17; 16:8, 19; 17:1; 19:1; and 27:5, 10b. "Not good" proverbs are found in 17:26a; 18:5a; 20:23b; 24:23b; 25:27a; 28:21a; a variation on the form is found in 17:7; 19:10; and 26:1 (see Murphy, pp. 66–67).

Another variation on the simple proverb/saying form is the riddle (Heb. chidah). Here the language conceals the relationship between the topic of the sentence and the comment made concerning it. Such concealment stands in direct opposition to the way a proverb or saying works to explicate the connection between topic and related comment. Although the riddle in its pure form is found only in Judg. 14:10–18, the term occurs in parallelism with marshal in Prov. 1:6. This text indicates that the sages considered mastery of the riddle to be within their purview. Disintegrated riddle forms underlie Prov. 5:1–6, 15–23; 6:16–19, 23–24; 16:15; 20:27; 23:27, 29–35; 25:2–3; 27:20; and 30:15–33 (see Crenshaw, p. 242).

Numerical Saying. Closely related in form to the proverb and riddle is the numerical saying, which provides a list of items with an explanatory "title line" that indicates common features of the list. Title lines may occur at the beginning ("Four things on earth are small, but they are wisely expert," Prov. 30:24) or at the end of the list (Exod. 21:10–11). The number of items in such lists follows numerical conventions: two, three, and seven are the favorite numbers. In "graded" numerical sayings, the title line gives two numbers,  $x$  and  $x + 1$ , which are then explicated in the following list ("Under three things the earth trembles; under four it is not able to bear up," Prov. 30:21). Like other wisdom forms, this graded pattern has been observed in the literary traditions of Israel's neighbors. The numerical saying may be related both to the riddle and the list, the latter of which orders items by categories in ways allowing for easy memorization.

Commands: Admonitions and Prohibitions. Unlike the proverb, which is generally expressed as a third-person observation, admonitions and prohibitions are expressed as commands using second-person ("you") or third-person ("he/she") language. The admonition is the positive and the prohibition is the negative realization of the command. Although the proverb seeks to persuade by couching its insight as "impersonal" truth to which one ought to assent on grounds of reason, the command makes its appeal to hearers far more directly, as if hoping to order compliance. "Motivational clauses" are often appended to the command, usually beginning with "for," "because," or "lest" (e.g., Prov. 4:21–22; 5:7–10), suggesting that the sages still hoped to convince students rather than to rely on simple coercion. Commands are found mainly in Proverbs 1–9 and in the longer, unified compositions in the later collections influenced by the "instruction" form (e.g., 22:17–24:22).

The Instruction. From the Egyptian court, the (Egyptian) sebayit, or "instruction" genre, which is longer than the proverb or command, finds its way into Prov. 1:1–9:18; 22:17–24:22; and elsewhere. Usually beginning with the phrase "the instruction that X made for Y," Pharaoh or one of his court officials or sages writes a testament filled with good advice for his successor. The instruction usually addresses the hearer as "my son," builds up its arguments by making use of proverbs, admonitions, and prohibitions, and includes a liberal sprinkling of motive clauses. The instruction covers a wide range of topics necessary for a young man's success in diplomatic circles: how to handle arguments, proper table manners and conduct before a monarch, guides to handling the various threats posed by familiarity with women, and so on. The instructions in Proverbs have many of the same features as their Egyptian cousins, but they tend to have a more "theological tone," perhaps a reflection that they are less closely associated with the royal household and more related to the didactic goals of sages teaching in Jerusalem. If these compositions in Proverbs 1–9 do come from the postexilic period, a time when the monarchy no longer existed, then this move beyond royal circles is quite understandable as a response to the wisdom community's changing needs. Instructions are found in Prov. 1:1–19; 2:1–22; 3:1–12; 3:21–35; 4:1–9; 4:10–19; 4:20–27; 5:1–23; 6:20–35; 7:1–27; 22:17–24:22; and 31:1–9.

Wisdom Poems. Like the instruction, the wisdom poem is a long, unified composition. It may include proverbial sayings, admonitions, prohibitions, rhetorical questions, and hymnic elements as well as other forms. Found in Prov. 1:20–33; 8:1–36; 9:1–6, these poems are marked by a most unusual feature, the personification of wisdom as a woman. Speaking directly to prospective students, Woman Wisdom sounds like prophet, lover, counselor, and goddess as she expounds the goals of the sages and entices her hearers with the promise of rich reward—life itself. Such an exalted female figure, speaking with divinely sanctioned authority, must be considered rare in Israel's patriarchal monotheism. Consequently, some scholars have seen in these compositions a borrowing of goddess traditions from Israel's neighbors. Others view wisdom poems as a culmination of Israel's own traditions about the constitutive role of real women in society, developing at a time when a new authority figure was needed to replace the king as mediator between human and divine spheres of life (see Camp). Prov. 3:13–18, 19–20 may also be considered wisdom poems, although Woman Wisdom is there spoken of in the third person, rather than speaking directly.

Acrostic and Alphabetizing Poems. These forms take their organizing principles from the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet and, hence, consist of twenty-two or twenty-three lines. In Prov. 31:10–31, we find a complete acrostic poem, one in which each line begins with successive letters of the alphabet. In 2:1–22, aleph and lamed, the letters that begin the first and second halves of the alphabet, respectively, play a significant role in the structure of this instruction, hence, allow one to speak of an alphabetizing poem. Attempts to locate other alphabetizing poems of twenty-two lines each in Proverbs 2–7 are less convincing since

The Role of Proverbs in Ancient Israel and the Canon

Questions concerning the place of the book of Proverbs in Israel's life are closely related to concerns over its origin and date of composition. There is firm evidence for the existence of court and temple schools in Mesopotamia and Egypt. Such schools preserved vigorous literary traditions, including wisdom literature with all its characteristic forms and typical themes. Since Israel consistently links kings and court counselors with the wisdom tradition (so the ascription of proverbs to Solomon in 1 Kings 4:32, to Hezekiah's men in Prov. 25:1, to Lemuel in Prov. 31:1–9, and to Ahithophel in 2 Sam. 15–16), it is reasonable to posit similar schools in Israel, which trained court officials and scribes in the pre-exilic era and potential leaders as well as scribes in the postexilic period. Direct evidence for such institutions is, admittedly, slim.

However, the court does not provide the only possible setting for the origin and use of the book of Proverbs. Scholars have demonstrated that wisdom literature functioned in tribal settings to settle disputes, a goal not unrelated to the courtly, diplomatic use of wisdom. Some biblical sayings and proverbs may have had such "folk" origins. Similarly, the emphasis on the "torah of your mother" (Prov. 1:8b), the role of Lemuel's mother in the transmission of his royal instruction (31:1), as well as the figure of Woman Wisdom herself remind us that education of children in the ancient world began in the home. Hence, the family must also be considered a probable setting for the origin and use of some of the materials found in Proverbs.

Within the context of the Hebrew Bible, the book of Proverbs is often considered by scholars to represent the tradition of "old wisdom" against which the later wisdom books of Job and Qohelet (Ecclesiastes) revolt. The measured confidence in human reason and the ability to respond appropriately to the world, the trust in Israel's god, Yahweh, and the notion that Woman Wisdom is accessible to humanity are transmuted in subsequent wisdom literature.

These later authors respond to an increasingly ambivalent world, one affected by the continuing social and political trauma of the changes wrought by the Exile and the new philosophical claims of Hellenism. "Following the rules" laid down by "old wisdom" no longer provides a guarantee of success. Wisdom is hidden with God (Job), and in the face of the great leveler—death—sage and fool come to the same unsatisfactory end (Qohelet).

Despite such seeming disenchantment with the "rules" for the good life laid down in the "old wisdom" of Proverbs, the wisdom tradition embodied there enters the intertestamental and Christian eras with renewed vigor. The Jewish communities of the Diaspora produced the apocryphal books the Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus, written around 180 B.C.) and the Wisdom of Solomon (first century B.C. to first century A.D.) as well as the Mishnaic tractate 'Abot ("Fathers"). These "proverbial" works attest to the use of wisdom by their communities to meet the ethical and philosophical challenges of Greco-Roman culture (→ Ecclesiasticus; Wisdom of Solomon, The; Mishnah; Diaspora).

For early Christians, the methods of wisdom argument and the figure of Woman Wisdom become especially important for explicating the meaning of the person and ministry of Jesus of Nazareth. Not only does Jesus teach using the maschal forms of the sages (→ Parables), thereby challenging the religious and ethical assumptions of his time, but the theology embodied in Woman Wisdom undergirds the application of logos theology, theology of the "Word" to Jesus in John 1. In 1 Cor. 1:24, Paul explicitly identifies Jesus as the "wisdom [Gk. sophia] of God." Despite the change of gender, literary threads bind the two human-divine mediators together into a single figure who can not only promise life, but deliver it as well. Moreover, the figure of Sophia, the Greek version of Woman Wisdom, takes on a life of her own in the Gnostic tractates from Nag Hammadi. Indeed, the female "self-revealer," who speaks so paradoxically in the Nag Hammadi Thunder, Perfect Mind, sounds like nothing so much as Woman Wisdom in her speeches in Proverbs 1–9. For Gnostic Christians, with their fondness for gospel in proverb rather than narrative form (The Gospel of Thomas), the metaphors of Woman Wisdom and the literary forms exemplified in the book of Proverbs lent vitality and a Hebraic accent to their understanding of Jesus Christ. The rediscovery of these Gnostic materials in modern times has enhanced our appreciation of the role of wisdom and the book of Proverbs in the religious and literary heritage of Christians and Jews (→ Logos; Wisdom; Nag Hammadi; Gospel of Thomas).

Theological Introduction: Wisdom

Superscription and Introduction

1:1, Superscription. The superscription, which introduces the book, labels its contents as meshalim, or proverbs, even though much of the ensuing literature consists of longer poetic compositions that depart from the strict two-line proverb form. Ascription of authorship to Solomon is based on tradition, namely, the wisdom vignettes found in the first book of Kings as well as the statement in 1 Kings 4:32 that Solomon authored three thousand proverbs, probably of the "nature wisdom" type (cf. 1 Kings 4:33). Yahweh's gift of wisdom to Solomon (1 Kings 3:3-15) and this king's subsequent display of that royal and judicial wisdom in 1 Kings 3:16-28 (judgment of the two prostitutes) and 1 Kings 10:1-10 (riddle contests; the "hard questions" of v. 1; with the Queen of Sheba) all work to create a picture of an astute, judicious, and creative monarch—a fitting figure to preside over teachings of the "good life." Attribution of important literary traditions to famous kings was common practice in the ancient Near East.

1:2-6, The Sage's Program. Similar to a teacher passing out a syllabus on the first day of class in modern educational settings, the sage makes clear the purpose of the material that follows. The piling up of infinitives in vv. 2-4 (it is worth noting that the translations of the NEB and RSV insert the word "men"), along with the multiple use of specialized wisdom vocabulary, suggest that the acquisition of wisdom is an all-encompassing process that must be approached with the same care with which it is described in these verses. However arduous the enterprise might be, the ignorant and the young will be richly rewarded for their work, and even the wise will acquire greater expertise by reflecting on the matters that follow, many of which are explicitly related to the ability to understand and use wisdom's literary forms. The mention of righteousness, justice, and fair dealing in v. 3b, classic virtues extolled by the Torah and the Prophets, adds a special Israelite flavor to this wisdom curriculum. On the whole, the opening is reminiscent of that of the Egyptian Instruction of Amenemope (see Simpson, p. 242):

The beginning of the instruction about life,
The guide for well-being,
All the principles of official procedure,

The duties of the courtiers;
To know how to refute the accusation of one who made it,
And to send back a reply to the one who wrote,
To set one straight on the paths of life,
And make him prosper on earth;
To let his heart settle down in its chapel,
As one who steers him clear of evil;
To save him from the talk of others,
As one who is respected in the speech of men.

The nautical metaphors in Amenemope are hinted at in v. 5b, "and the discerning may acquire the art of steering" (RSV, NEB: "acquire skill"; JB: "the art of guidance"). The Hebrew term tachbulot is related both to the word for a woman writhing back and forth with labor pains and the twisting of ropes to change the course of a sailing craft. In both cases, extreme physical effort produces the desired end, a successful birth or change of course. The knowledge of when to push or pull, expending just the right amount of effort at just the right moment, is the type of practical mastery that is one of the goals of wisdom instruction.

1:7. The introductory section ends with a contrastive proverb about "fear of Yahweh," the Hebrew Bible's terminology for its religion. This phrase should be understood not as simple fright but as involving awe, reverence, and obedience to the Lord. Without this proper prior commitment (which the foolish implicitly spurn by rejecting wisdom and discipline), no intellectual enterprise is sound. Hence, the acquisition of wisdom is not simply an "academic" pursuit but, fundamentally, a theological and spiritual activity.

The Sage's First Introduction

1:8-9. Most appropriately, this instruction opens with the imperative "Listen, my child" (literally "my son," but this term is often translated inclusively elsewhere, as in "children of Israel" for the literal "sons of Israel"). Egyptian wisdom stresses the importance of listening carefully to one's elders, and a similar notion is found here as the parental authority of mother and father is stressed. The prohibition in v. 8b ("do not forget") balances the admonition "listen . . ." thus emphasizing harmony within the teachings of both parents. Similarly, v. 8 suggests that true understanding consists of taking in information and remembering it. A motivation in v. 9 tempts the young listener with a metaphor that suggests Egyptian body ornaments often worn by successful officials. Here such ornaments allude to the beauty of wisdom teachings. The garlanded head and shoulders of the wise youth stand in implicit contrast with the feet of wicked companions that "run to" (v. 16, perhaps a gloss from Isa. 59:7).

1:10–16. This section, which pictures the sinners taking counsel to tempt the unsuspecting youth, twice (vv. 10, 15) repeats the sage's "my son/child" of v. 8. Such repetition emphasizes the instruction as heartfelt advice "for one's own good," rather than as an expression of casual disapproval of certain companions. The sinners of v. 10 lie in wait for the innocent "without cause." (Note the importance of this term in the prologue to the book of Job: the Adversary wonders if Job worships God "without cause" [Job 1:9b]; in Job 2:3b, God is incited to afflict Job "without cause.") The description of the intended victims as harmless has the effect of defusing the very real danger of such behavior: reprisal will not come from the victims, but from the ultimate outcome of a life of criminal acts (see commentary below on 1:17–19). As the description continues, we discover that the sinners are motivated by greed (vv. 13–14) and share a surprising degree of cooperation and camaraderie ("one purse for us all!" 14b), which might be expected to deceive the unwary into a desire to be part of this closely knit group. The sage meets this threat directly with a forceful one-two punch, another balanced set of negative ("My child, don't go! . . .") and positive ("withhold your foot! . . .") commands (v. 15). The teacher understands well youth's desire to "fit in."

1:17–19. An example of "proverb performance" occurs in v. 17 with the citation of an out-of-context proverb (the sage was not discussing birds previously, but warning against the temptations of wicked companions) to categorize a social situation and suggest its proper resolution. Here, our informed youth, like the wary and observant bird, will not be tempted to join in, for he sees the net spread before him, a tactic "without cause" or "in vain" since he is forewarned. Verses 18–19 conclude the instruction with a typical appeal to wisdom's understanding of retribution: those who seek to dig pits for others fall into the very same pit themselves (Prov. 26:27). Even when that pit is "Sheol," the underground cavern in which Israelites believed the dead led a shadowy, unconscious existence, the result is the same (→ Retribution).

The Personification of Wisdom

The figure of personified wisdom is something of an anomaly in Israelite theology. What are the origins of this figure, and what role does it play in the literary and theological structure of the book of Proverbs? Scholars have recently offered a series of reflections on this female personification ranging from simple acknowledgement that abstract nouns in Hebrew are feminine in gender (e.g., "Torah," "Understanding") to complex formulations that provide Woman Wisdom with a divine genealogy. Given the literary function of female imagery as a "frame" (Woman Wisdom and Woman Stranger in Prov. 1–9; Lemuel's mother and the Woman of Worth in Prov. 31) for some collections of proverbs as well as the importance of this figure for later Christian reflections on Jesus and Jewish reflections on the Shekinah (Heb., "the female indwelling presence of God"), Woman Wisdom and her more clearly human sisters, the "strange," "foreign," and upright women, deserve full consideration. Attempts to understand this personification have proceeded in several directions: consideration of the figure as hypostasis, as a goddess, as a human female, or the trivialization of the significance of the female personification. We will consider each option in turn.

Woman Wisdom as Hypostasis. This view sees Woman Wisdom as an extension of the attribute(s) of the "High God," Yahweh, in this case the wisdom of God, which then takes on a differentiated life of its own. Wisdom, which is essentially an aspect of God's omniscience and capacity to act effectively, becomes Woman Wisdom. Although she appears as an independent actor on the stage of creation, nuances concerning her origin in and dependency on Yahweh convince those who endorse this interpretation that she is an authentically Israelite, Yahwistic figure. Nonetheless, the relationship between Yahweh and Woman Wisdom may be more easily accounted for by attention to the literary roles played by these two figures in wisdom texts rather than by the appeal to hypostasis (see "Woman Wisdom as an Israelite Woman" below; see also Prov. 8:1–36).

Woman Wisdom as Goddess. In acknowledging the international, especially Egyptian, influence on the first nine chapters of Proverbs, this view sees Woman Wisdom as an adaptation of the goddess traditions of Israel's neighbors. In Egypt, the goddess Maat stood for justice, probity, and social and cosmic order; she was literally the undergirding of the throne of the pharaoh and provided the measure according to which the hearts of the dead were judged in the underworld. She is the first creation of the creator god in one Egyptian myth, and in various texts she is conceived as both his daughter and the master plan by which he creates. Though never appearing as either a "personal" goddess or a particularly active character in the texts that survive from ancient Egypt, she is, nonetheless, an important figure in Egyptian wisdom instructions. Her protective amulets were worn by sages as well as placed around the necks of the dead in hope of a good judgment. She is often depicted holding an ankh, the symbol of life, in one hand and a scepter, a symbol of power, in the other. Such symbols remind one of the image of Woman Wisdom in 3:16, with long life in her right hand and honor and wealth in her left. Of the more active, personal Egyptian goddesses, Hathor, "Lady of the Tree," and Isis, the salvific mother-goddess, are also regarded as part of the iconographic heritage of Israel's Woman Wisdom. Scholars subscribing to this hypothesis often date Proverbs 1-9 to the Solomonic period, a judgment based on connections between Solomon's court and related Egyptian practices.

Nor is the pantheon of goddesses in Woman Wisdom's family tree exhausted by reference to Egyptian parallels. Scholars also appeal to connections between Woman Wisdom and Canaanite and Mesopotamian goddesses. Noting the striking similarities in the way Woman Wisdom and Woman Stranger/Foreign Woman are described by the sages, some have considered the Babylonian Ishtar and her fertility cult to be the figure behind Woman Wisdom's "evil twin," Woman Stranger. Likewise, a Canaanite vine-goddess or (still yet to be discovered) goddess of wisdom have also been postulated as figures from whom the sages adapted Israel's version of the divine "totemic female" who confers the abundance of life's blessings on her followers.

Based on our increasing knowledge of Sumerian texts, we might also note the special relationship between the Sumerian goddess of love and war, Inanna (later fused with the Semitic Ishtar), and Enki, the god of wisdom and sweet waters. As a result of her crafty behavior, Inanna receives the me, divine ordinances by which human society is organized, from the drunken Enki and successfully bears them away to her city, thereby assuring its place among the competing city-states of Sumer. Inanna's dangerous journey to the "Great Below," the underworld of the Sumerians, seems related to the Woman Stranger, whose house leads down to death (Prov. 2:18). Upon her return, she consigns Dumuzi, the royal mate whose rule is legitimated by his alliance with the goddess, to the demons of the Great Below in her place. This punishment occurs because of his refusal to mourn properly the loss of the divine wife. This motif reminds us of Woman Wisdom in Proverbs 1, scoffing at those who ignored her and who are now beset by calamity. Dumuzi's life is eventually restored for six months of every year when his sister Geshtinanna, the vine-goddess (and perhaps another fructifying aspect of Inanna), offers to take his place in the underworld, thus presenting us with another divine female figure who, like Woman Wisdom, brings life.

The unanswered question of this scholarly reconstruction is the manner in which Israelite sages would have borrowed material from traditions so roundly condemned elsewhere in the canon, even though such borrowing and free adaptation is in keeping with wisdom's international spirit and origins. Still, it may be that by "co-option" of surrounding goddesses to create the Yahwistically subordinated figure of Woman Wisdom, Israel met its own psychological need for female imagery of the divine without serious compromise of patriarchal monotheism.

Woman Wisdom as an Israelite Woman. Camp's recent seminal work, Wisdom and the Feminine in the Book of Proverbs, which questions the potentially misogynist argument for a divine precursor of Woman Wisdom and ignores the real, human role models that might have given rise to personified wisdom in Israel, provides a much needed balance to the "goddess" hypothesis. After examining the literary roles played by women in the Hebrew Bible and relating them to the social roles of real women, Camp was able to isolate a number of features present in Woman Wisdom and Woman Stranger that result from literary traditions about women in society. These include: wife and mother; lover; harlot and adulteress; the wise woman; female user of indirect means; and female authenticator of written traditions. Camp suggests that the social crises of the postexilic period provided the impetus for drawing on family-centered imagery to authenticate the wisdom tradition embodied in Proverbs. She further argues that Woman Wisdom replaces the king as mediator for those who seek to understand God's new ways of interacting with the human community (see Camp, pp. 79-149). Moreover, since the feminine is always viewed as ancillary and contingent with androcentric thought, it serves logically as a natural mediator between a male god and the male students who are the sages' audience.

In examining further the literary roles played by Israelite women as these affect the interpretation of Woman Wisdom, we might note that many of these characterizations fall within the sphere of "the sought-for person" ("princess/bride") so often found in folk literature. The bride who is also a counselor and helper to her prospective mate, the wife who confers material blessings on the hero through their marriage, and the (royal) father who bestows the sought-for person on the hero after his completion of a long search or set of arduous tasks seem to be represented in the relationship between Yahweh, Woman Wisdom, and the person (usually male) who is enjoined to seek her. Yahweh bestows wisdom upon Solomon in 1 Kings 3, thus legitimating the reign of one who was not first in line for the throne. Similarly, in Prov. 4:8, students are told to "embrace" Woman Wisdom and to "grasp" her and her instructions (Prov. 3:18 and 4:13). Using this reconstruction, we can readily understand the figure of Woman Stranger as folk literature's "false bride," whose claims sound so much like her legitimate rival's (cf. Prov. 9). The language of love and desire applied to the sought-for one, Woman Wisdom, continues into the Greco-Roman period (so Wisdom of Sol. 6:12-16; 8:2, 16; Sir. 14; 15; 51). It is likely that the fullest understanding of the origin and function of the figure of Woman Wisdom will combine aspects of these first three hypotheses.

Trivialization of Woman Wisdom. By ignoring the human and divine antecedents of Woman Wisdom and Woman Stranger, some commentators on the text have preferred to deal minimally with the significance of this female imagery. In such treatments, Woman Wisdom and Woman Stranger become "mere" literary devices whose symbolic meaning becomes relatively insignificant, despite its anomalous appearance in androcentric literature. Woman Wisdom is seen as the embodiment of the sages' teachings (but why as woman?) or the voice of the world-order addressing men or as a sort of Teacher Temptress, urging male students to greater learning by use of sexually nuanced speech. Some note the way Woman Wisdom often incorporates prophetic modes of speech into her poems and, as a result, view her as prophet and preacher. However, it is unlikely that any ancient Israelite would have viewed a female figure lifting her voice in the streets in quite such positive terms.

Given the importance of the ring or "envelope" structure in the canonical wisdom books (i.e., the blasphemous poetic speeches of Job are framed or ringed by the highly moral prose folktale; the scathing questions of Qohelet are sandwiched inside royal ascriptions and comments of a pious editor), one cannot ignore the canonical function of Woman Wisdom and the Woman of Worth in Proverbs 31 as an important guide to the interpretation of the book. For this reason, failure to explore seriously the significance of Woman Wisdom imagery is no longer an option.

Direct Address Wisdom Poem

1:20-21. The introduction of Woman Wisdom's speech places her clearly in the public eye, like a prophet, prostitute, or a woman coming to the city gates for judgment (Gen. 38:14; Ruth 3:11; cf. Camp, p. 129). Her appeal is made in the most open way (no esoteric, hidden wisdom here!), on many levels.

1:22-28. Opening with the poignant phrase "How long? . . ." (cf. Jer. 4:14, 21; 12:4), this rhetorical question prepares the audience for the ensuing series of reproaches, threats, and announcement of doom. The text's form and content evoke a notion of someone judging on behalf of God, even though reference to the Deity does not occur until v. 29b, and there obliquely as "fear of Yahweh." This notion strengthens Woman Wisdom's claim to be heard and, by extension, the sage's authority as one who discloses wisdom to his students.

The speech stresses Woman Wisdom's availability to the simple (those untutored, but capable of learning). Are these the same persons addressed in 1:4? Use of the word "knowledge," also found in 1:4, seems to confirm this identity. Similarly, there is an implicit link between Prov. 1:22-23 and the opening commands in the sage's first instruction (1:8). Verses 10-19 gave an example of "your father's instruction"; now the female figure of wisdom explicates "the Torah of your mother." The inclusion of Woman Wisdom, thus, provides for total instruction.

Despite Woman Wisdom's willingness to pour out her spirit and make known her thoughts, her offer will not remain valid in perpetuity for those who persist in rejecting her (vv. 24-28). Moreover, her reproaches echo the pathos of Yahweh's questions to the people in Micah 6:3.

1:29-33. The calamity that overtakes the mockers and fools is once again viewed as their "just deserts" in the reproach of vv. 29-30 and the announcement of doom in vv. 31-32. In ancient Israel, no act could be separated from the consequences it produced; rather the effects were implicit within the deed just as a seed contains the future plant. The positive side of this "act-consequence" relationship is rehearsed in a proverb (v. 33) that offers security to those who follow Woman Wisdom's counsel.

The Second Instruction

2:1-11. Making use of a twenty-two-line alphabetizing structure (see Murphy, p. 56, for discussion) and numerous repetitions of vocabulary items from chap. 1, this instruction builds up its argument through a series of "if/then" sequences ("if": vv. 1, 2, 4; "then": vv. 5, 9). Motivations ("for," "because") in vv. 9, 10, 18, 21 intensify the argument. In v. 3, the student is to echo back the cry of Woman Wisdom heard in 1:20-21 and search for her, the "sought-for one," more diligently than for treasure (v. 4). In v. 6, we see once more that it is Yahweh who bestows wisdom on those who search. Moreover, the impact of this statement is amplified by the recognition, in v. 5, that the search for wisdom is equivalent to the search for God. There are many paths to spiritual growth, but only one destination.

2:12-22. The topic again is the excellence of wisdom teaching as a guard against evil companions, here represented as both male (as in the first instruction) and female. Who is the "Woman Stranger" and "Foreign Woman" of v. 16, against whom the youth must be on guard? Some have postulated the fertility goddess Ishtar (Canaanite Astarte) as the one who tempts young men into apostasy; v. 17 suggests an Israelite adulteress may also function as the Woman Stranger. The goddess Inanna/Ishtar (see the Short Essay "The Personification of Wisdom") descended to the "Great Below" or underworld "Land of No Return" in a famous ancient myth; this may be alluded to in v. 18. However, Lev. 20:10 mandates the death sentence for simple adultery, thus supplying another possible meaning for this warning. Similar warnings against relationships with women are found in the Egyptian Instruction of Ani and the Instruction of Ptahhotep. Contrasting proverbs on the fates of the upright and the wicked in vv. 21 and 22 confirm and round out the argument of the instruction (→ Foreigner; Asherah).

The Third Instruction

3:1-4. A series of positive and negative commands with motivations organized into six couplets (vv. 1-2, 3-4, 5-6, 7-8, 9-10, 11-12) moves from general advice in vv. 1-4 to specific commands in vv. 5-12. Similar thoughts are found in sections three and four of the Instruction of Amenemope. Just as the sins of the wicked bring death, so adherence to wisdom's teaching lengthens life and brings healing and prosperity (vv. 2, 8, 10). Like the commandments of the Torah in Deut. 6:8, wisdom teaching is to be bound to one's body (Prov. 3:3) where it acts as a constant reminder of right conduct.

3:5-12. Excellent as wisdom may be, no one who possesses it can hope to be truly wise when compared to Yahweh. The limitations of human wisdom are clearly stated (vv. 5, 7). Verses 11-12 anticipate some of the reflections of the book of Job on the relationship between wisdom, adversity, and the God-fearing person.

3:13-20

Two Descriptive Wisdom Poems

3:13-18. Strong Egyptian influence marks this section, which deviates from the normal instruction form in that it consists of two hymns to wisdom or wisdom poems (vv. 13-18, 19-20). Making use of the "blessing" formula ("How happy/blessed is the person who finds wisdom!") in v. 13, this section concludes with a wordplay on the same Hebrew root in v. 18b ("those who take hold of her are blessed"). Is the wisdom alluded to here personified Woman Wisdom? Imagery in v. 16 describing wisdom in terms associated with the Egyptian goddess Maat suggests an affirmative answer. The "tree of life" motif in v. 18, perhaps to be associated with Hathor as goddess of the sycamore tree, is also popular in the Instruction of Amenemope (→ Tree of Life, The).

3:19-20. A hymnic interlude on the relationship between Yahweh, Woman Wisdom, and creation also draws heavily on Egyptian themes, where Maat constitutes the plan by which the creator god creates the world. Association of wisdom with water ("deeps," "dew") virtually equates wisdom with life in the minds of those who exist in arid climates (v. 20).

3:21-35

The Fourth Instruction

3:21-26. The typical instruction style resumes as the sage draws conclusions from the previous sections. As in the first instruction (1:8-19), we find the teachings of wisdom gracing the neck and safeguarding the ways of the feet. From top to toe, wisdom bestows protection and the untroubled sleep of a clear conscience on those who adhere to the ways of discernment and sound judgment. The confidence that wisdom brings is once again closely related to the protection God bestows: both function to guard the steps and paths of their followers (vv. 25-26).

3:27-35. A series of prohibitions on various matters demonstrates that failure to do good, when it is in one's power to do so (vv. 27-28), is strongly condemned as wrongdoing (vv. 29-30). The temptation to envy (and hence emulate) the seeming security of the wicked is first discouraged by a prohibition in v. 31 and then countered with four proverbs assuring the hearer that, while the wicked are detestable to Yahweh (cf., e.g., Deut. 7:25; 12:31; 18:12) and the mockers soon to be mocked, the righteous, wise, and humble find favor in God's sight (Prov. 3:32-35).

The Fifth Instruction

4:1-4a. Family tradition, a motif familiar from Egypt, is evoked here to authorize the sage's advice, which follows in vv. 4b-9. Despite the prominence of this literary tradition of instructions, oral teachings are also important in vv. 3-4a. (A number of textual irregularities in the Hebrew text are customarily solved by reference to the LXX [see esp. the NEB].)

4:4b-9. After the introduction invoking traditional authority in the previous section, we find the father's advice couched in language appropriate to admonitions concerning the choice of a mate. As in Dumuzi's union with Inanna, Woman Wisdom will exalt those who embrace her (v. 8), crowning the searcher who is rewarded after finding this sought-for female (v. 9; cf. 1:9; 3:22), protecting the faithful and watching over them (v. 6). The use of positive and negative imperatives throughout this section, along with key words such as "commands," "live!" "grace" (though this term is not used in the NT sense of the word), and "honor," forms a summons that is not easily ignored. Verse 7a may legitimately be translated in a variety of ways. However, on the basis of previous discussion of the divine female, the translation "wisdom is first" is preferred. Woman Wisdom will bring all good things in her train once acquired as a mate. Hence, she is the first thing that must be sought by inquisitive students.

4:10-27

The Sixth Instruction

4:10-23. The catchword "life" begins and ends this section of traditional teachings with an insightful, if perhaps overdrawn, description of "the wicked" sandwiched between in vv. 14-17. The now familiar theme of the "path," with its associated terms ("step," "run," "stumble") is developed further and provides a link, along with the verbal root "life/live" (4:4b), to the previous instruction that ended with Woman Wisdom placing a garland of grace on her lover's neck. These motifs occur clustered together earlier in Proverbs 3. In Prov. 3:2, the sage's teaching prolonged life; in v. 3 those same wisdom teachings bound around the neck led to straight paths in v. 6 and health to the body in v. 8. In 3:22, discernment and sound judgment lengthened life and provided grace for the neck, leading to feet that do not stumble (v. 23) and sweet sleep (v. 24). Now, all these aspects of the right path appear conjoined once more, but the sleep described is that of the wicked, who cannot retire fulfilled unless evil has been done (4:16).

4:23-27. The instruction ends with more imperatives concerning control of the body. In ancient Hebrew thought, the heart (v. 23) was comparable to the modern term "mind" as the locus of thought, will, emotion, and memory (→ Heart), making it the focus of the strongest warnings. As in other instructions, the potential perversity of language is a special subject for wisdom admonitions (v. 24; cf., e.g., 6:2, 12; 8:13; 10:6, 11), even as the special and positive attributes of "mouth," "word," "command," "speech," and "lips" are celebrated elsewhere (cf. 2:6; 4:5; 5:7; 8:8; 10:11). One might expect both such concerns to be shared by those whose main work is literary. These authors are shrewd observers of the inevitable deception and trickery present in human communication, problems that may be attributed as much to the inherently ambiguous nature of language as to the dastardly intent of some language users.

The Seventh Instruction

5:1-6. This instruction begins with language nearly identical to that found in 4:20, with "my wisdom/my insight" in v. 1 substituted for the word pair "my words/my advice" found earlier. That these "loaded" terms may be freely interpreted in light of each other should occasion no surprise, given the sages' view of the preeminence of language as a tool for complex communication. The Woman Stranger, who is the subject of these admonitions, is dangerous precisely because she too knows the use of smooth speech (v. 4). The use of "honey" imagery carries erotic overtones familiar from the Song of Songs and the lovesongs of Inanna for her mate, whom she names "the honey-man" (see Pritchard, p. 645). Possible allusions to Inanna's descent or Israelite punishment for adultery are again developed as in 2:18. The sweet/bitter contrast found in vv. 3-4 is present in the Aramaic wisdom text "The Words of Ahiqar" ("Be not [too] sweet, lest they [swallow] thee: be not [too] bitter [lest they spit thee out]"; see Pritchard, p. 429). It probably represents a standard proverbial contrast. Her death-dealing "way of life" (Heb. 'orach-chayyim, v. 6 [cf. 2:19]) presents a wordplay on the "length of days" ('orek-yamim) in Woman Wisdom's right hand (3:16).

5:7-14. After a reprise consisting of the standard introductory formula, this section of positive and negative commands further develops the sage's warnings against Woman Stranger. The "door of her house" (v. 8) carries both sexual allusions and, perhaps, oblique reference to the gateposts of Inanna, which served as a divine emblem of her religion. The remainder of this passage reminds one of the fate of Samson in the hands of Women Strangers in Judges 14-16.

5:15-20. The language of love and fertility abounds in this section, which recommends the joys of marital love as an antidote to the slippery allure of the Woman Stranger. Thus, it is clear that the sages do not condemn sexuality per se—far from it!—but rather forbid sexual behavior that they consider inappropriate. In their judgment, part of the excellence of a loving wife is her exclusive availability to her husband. That the prostitute or Woman Stranger, on the other hand, owes her loyalty to no one because she is available to many is precisely one of the reasons why she is to be avoided. This theme is also clearly developed in Akkadian wisdom counsels (see Pritchard, p. 427), texts that report that “reverence and submissiveness are not with her.”

5:21-23. Three instances of proverb performance round out the sage’s discourse on sexuality. Though the topic of much of the seventh instruction has been the evil, life-killing behavior of the Woman Stranger in contrast to the safety of the beloved wife, these proverbs (vv. 21-23) are addressed to men, presumably those who have disregarded such teachings. Although, once again, the intended audience of the instructions is male, such difficulties in “matching” the referents of proverbs to the context situations are typical of proverb performance (cf. Eccles. 4:9-12 where the imagery of a “threefold cord” is applied to the situation of two partners).

Miscellaneous Counsels

A number of short units appear together here: advice on standing surety on loans that may be defaulted (vv. 1-5), an expanded marshal on the diligence of the ant (vv. 6-11), a section describing the ways of the troublemaker (vv. 12-15), and a numerical saying on things hateful to God (vv. 16-19). Though the content of these passages is unrelated, they are linked together by bodily imagery.

6:1-5. Only the first section, which finds a parallel in the Words of Ahiqar, uses the typical instruction form as it advises the person standing pledge for a loan to rectify this situation while there is still time. The motif of word and mouth as a potential snare, which is repeated elsewhere in the instructions, appears again in v. 2. The “palm of the hand” is struck in v. 1, symbolizing the making of a bargain, and occurs again in v. 3 as the hand of the neighbor. The more common term for hand (Heb. yad) appears in the proverbial images of the bird and gazelle escaping from hunters’ hands (v. 5).

6:6-11. The marshal of the ant represents typical “nature wisdom” and develops the theme of detrimental sleep, an activity of the body, in vv. 9-10. Folded hands, familiar as an image of sloth in Eccles. 4:5, appear in Prov. 6:10b.

6:12-15. The behavior of the villainous, worthless man is painted in terms of body language (cf. 10:10; 16:30) that expresses his evil intent (by magic or by colleagues lying in wait for his signal?). Typically, he is fully and suddenly repaid according to the laws of the act-consequence relationship (cf. 24:22; 29:1).

6:16-19. Telling body language is again the topic of the customary “x, x + 1” numerical saying. Verses 16-17 follow the descriptive pattern familiar from the lament Psalms and Song of Songs, moving from the top of the body to the bottom (eye, tongue, heart, feet). Study of traditional societies has shown that “troublemaking” activities such as gossip and slander are strategies typically used by those of lower status to cope with social problems. Hence, this text may provide an index of problems in postexilic Israel (disputes over inheritance and land claims?) rather than simply representing the behavior of a few “bad apples.”

The Eighth Instruction

6:20-26. The instruction style resumes in vv. 20-21 with imagery familiar from 1:8 and 3:3. The author supplies motivations evoking the clarity and protective qualities of parents’ teachings in vv. 22-23 (some scholars place v. 22 after 5:19, a judgment based on the presence of the feminine gender in both verses). Bodily imagery (tongue [v. 24], beauty and eyes [v. 25]) link this instruction to other units in chap. 6. Concrete reference to prostitution occurs for the first time in Proverbs in v. 26. Previously, there had been reference to foreign or strange women. Verse 26 suggests that the prostitute, like the thief (v. 30), is also hungry.

6:27-35. Two rhetorical questions, which may be interpreted as proverb performance, open this section that compares adultery to theft and, in so doing, reminds readers that adultery with married women was condemned as much for its violation of men’s property rights as for its inherent dishonesty or immorality (cf. Exod. 20:14-15 and Deut. 5:18-19 where the two are clustered together). While thieves are allowed to make sevenfold restitution (contrary to Exod. 22:1-9), no amount will compensate the jealous husband (cf. 5:9-11).

The Ninth Instruction

A story exemplifying the temptations of the Woman Stranger (vv. 6-23) stands between a standard introduction (vv. 1-5) and typical admonitory conclusion (vv. 24-27). Egyptian and Mesopotamian influence may be discerned in vv. 6, 16, 19, 26-27. Moreover, imagery familiar from previous instructions is used freely (cf., e.g., 1:20; 3:3; 6:21). To call Woman Wisdom "sister," that is, "bride," is to gain salvation from the perils of Woman Stranger (v. 4), even though the recommended figure could hardly be described as "stay-at-home" (cf. 7:11b; 1:20).

Wisdom's Second Speech

The pinnacle of wisdom thought appears here in the self-proclamation of Woman Wisdom, a form of literature familiar from texts listing the miraculous deeds of Isis, an Egyptian goddess, and dating to the Hellenistic period. This "wisdom speech" presents a view of Woman Wisdom as more than a teacher, desirable human mate, or attribute of Yahweh. The translation and interpretation of no passage in Proverbs is more hotly contested than this one, no doubt because Woman Wisdom's claims are so difficult to assimilate within later Judaism and Christianity. Significant parallels to this passage are found in the "Hymn to Wisdom" of Job 28, some of the material in the "Yahweh speeches" of Job 38-42, Sir. 1:1-10; 4:11-19; 14:20-15:10; 24:1-19; and Wisd. of Sol. 7:22-8:1. The view of wisdom found here becomes important for the logos theology in the prologue of the Gospel of John and elsewhere in the NT (Matt. 11:19; Luke 11:49; Matt. 23:34-36; 1 Cor. 10:4; Col. 1:15-16).

8:1-3. Once again, Woman Wisdom stands in this introduction in full view of the people, in the places where power is exercised and choices are made (vv. 2-3; cf. 1:20-21).

8:4-11. Woman Wisdom's speech is deliberately described here in terms that refute and undercut the seductive language of Woman Stranger in Proverbs 7, as though the sage has become aware that his fascination with Woman Wisdom's "evil twin" might prove dangerous. Motifs familiar from 3:14-15, where Egyptian influence was noted, occur here, and the "simple ones" or untutored (1:4, 22) are again addressed.

8:12-21. Despite problems in the Hebrew text, the meaning of this section of Woman Wisdom's self-praise is reasonably clear. Woman Wisdom's relation to kingship is explicated in vv. 15-16 and allows at least three possible interpretations: first, the goddess Maat's special function of undergirding the throne (and hence, justifying the reign) of pharaoh; second, the Mesopotamian fertility goddesses' (Inanna/Ishtar) role in certifying human males as fit for kingship through the sacramental sacred marriage rite; and third, the special link between rulers and wisdom in Israel and the ancient Near East (cf. 1 Kings 3; 2 Sam. 14:17; Isa. 11:2). The last option rests on a pragmatic observation: kings who routinely display poor judgment in governing their subjects have trouble in maintaining their grasp on power. The pattern of "x loves those who love x" in v. 17a is familiar from Egyptian theological language. Moreover, 17b finds echoes in Wisd. of Sol. 1:1 and 6:12.

8:22-31. This most disputed section of Woman Wisdom's speech involves her exact relationship to Yahweh and to creation. Verse 22 is the crux. Should the Hebrew verb and its object qanani (v. 22a) be translated as "begot me," following the Targum, Greek, and Syriac versions? Those who adopt this option usually render the phrase "created me" to avoid sexual connotations (cf. Eve's statement in Gen. 4:1 and the epithet of the Canaanite mother-goddess [see Pritchard, pp. 131-32]). Or, should one read "acquired/possessed me" with the more literalistic ancient authorities: Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, and Jerome? Modern commentators are divided on the issue (cf. Vawter, pp. 207-14).

The translator's view of Woman Wisdom's nature helps determine the selection of an appropriate translation. Since we have earlier noted Woman Wisdom's literary appearance as the "sought-for person" who bestows needed abilities and goods upon her human seekers (1:9; 3:22; see commentary above on 4:4b-9), it is not unreasonable to find this motif applied to Woman Wisdom's relationship to the Creator. Though the translation "Yahweh possessed me, at the beginning of his acts" is preferred here, Camp's translation of vv. 22-25 (see Camp, p. 84) deserves a hearing, since it seeks to incorporate the "fleshly" overtones of verbs in the text:

Yahweh conceived me at the beginning of his way,
the first of his acts of old.
Ages ago I was woven in the womb, at the first, before the beginning of the earth.
When there were no depths, I was brought forth, when there were no springs abounding with water.
Before the mountains had been shaped,
before the hills, I was brought forth.

It should be noted that the Hebrew verb cholaleti, here translated "brought forth" (vv. 24-25), derives from the root chyl, which is generally associated with the physical activity of the female in giving birth. Hence, one must ask if Yahweh, in the manner of a female, gives birth (metaphorically?) to Woman Wisdom? Though Woman Wisdom appears to exist prior to the rest of creation, is used as a model or principle in Yahweh's subsequent creative activity, and does not serve as an attribute of Yahweh (so with Vawter and others), nevertheless, she must have come from somewhere.

Disputes over vv. 22–31 continue in v. 30 since the translation of 'amon remains problematic. Does it mean "master craftswoman," an analogy with the "artisans" of Jer. 52:15 (so, apparently, with the LXX), or "nursling, darling child," an analogy with Lam. 4:5 and Esther 2:7, or was it revised to yield a different form altogether? Egyptian parallels may be adduced to support either reading, for Maat is both playful child and master plan for creation. But on the whole, the purport of the passage, with its allusions to delight and play, suggests that "darling child" is preferable.

8:32–36. Woman Wisdom's remarkable speech concludes with a surprising invitation: those who find her find life itself (v. 35). This is the kind of language that is normally used only of Yahweh, but here Woman Wisdom is fully endowed with divine attributes since she appears as guarantor of earthly salvation. Students who reject her invite death (v. 36).

The Tenth Instruction

Reference to two banquets (9:1–6; 13–18), the first given by Woman Wisdom and the second by another manifestation of her "evil twin," Woman Foolishness, is divided by assorted counsels (vv. 7–12) in the final instruction, which serves as a literary, theological introduction to the proverb collections.

9:1–6. Woman Wisdom's house is described as a mansion. Some scholars have found deeper significance in the phrase "seven pillars" (v. 1). The term may allude to wisdom's architectural role in creation (cf. 8:30), since the ancients believed the world to be supported by seven great pillars, or it may refer to the literary structure of Proverbs 2–7 (see Murphy, p. 52; → Pillars). Woman Wisdom is connected with women other than the "mother" of the sages' traditional word pair ("father/mother" in 1:8; 6:20; 10:1; and elsewhere), since she is served by maids who do her bidding (v. 3), in much the same way that devotees of a fertility goddess solicit worshippers for their deity. Woman Wisdom's banquet (vv. 5–6) is one of the few in the Hebrew Bible that does not lead to disastrous consequences for those who attend.

9:7–12. Counsel on the correct handling of the scoffer or mocker (vv. 7–8, 12) forms a ring around the centerpiece of wisdom teaching in v. 10: "fear of Yahweh" is the beginning of wisdom

(cf. 1:7); knowledge of the Holy One, understanding. While a sage or righteous person profits from correction (vv. 8b, 9), the scoffer turns on the one who attempts a reproof (vv. 7–8a). As with all acts, the consequences will be borne by the actor (vv. 11–12). Verse 11 suggests this section is to be interpreted as Woman Wisdom's "table talk" at her banquet.

9:13–18. Oddly, the last portion of the instructional introduction to Proverbs is not a speech by Woman Wisdom, but another brush with her opposite counterpart. Sitting like a prostitute where she may oversee potential customers (v. 14), her call to passersby (v. 16) is a parody of Woman Wisdom's summons (v. 4), complete with an example of proverb performance (v. 17) to spice her proposition, even as Woman Wisdom spiced her wine (vv. 2, 5). Her connection with the underworld, familiar from 5:23 and 7:26–27, ends the section, replacing the sweet taste of stolen water and secret food with the odor of death.

"The Proverbs of Solomon"

Beginning with 10:1, one moves from lengthy, unified compositions of wisdom poems and instructions to the collections of proverbs. The first collection, associated with Solomon explicitly through its superscription in 10:1a, contains 375 proverbs. This is the same numerical value given to the name "Solomon" in Hebrew, which appears in the superscription. The compiler of this section seems to be working at joining together two collections of approximately the same size, that is, chaps. 10–15 and 16–22, since a number of peculiarities (repetitions of sayings, vocabulary peculiar to one section and not the other, patterns linking a series of proverbs, preferred type of parallelism) occur at the "seam" in 14–16 (see Murphy, p. 64). In addition, a cluster of "Yahweh sayings" (15:33–16:9) located near the center of the book (16:17) seems to provide a theological core for the collection.

Commentators customarily consider morally neutral or observational proverbs as belonging to an earlier "old wisdom" stage of the collection, with any theological proverbs representing a later, pietistic attempt to incorporate these insights into a Yahwistic framework. However, such a thesis need not be necessary, especially if Proverbs 1–9 dates to the Solomonic period. Rather, it would not be surprising to find "theological knowledge" present at all stages of Israelite wisdom reflection, since wisdom in the ancient Near East was habitually viewed as a gift from the gods. In general, content alone is not an infallible guide to the date of a text's composition. Rather, content ought to be considered along with structural features in the literature before any final determination is made.

Attempts to provide a social or even a literary context for this collection of proverbs have proved highly speculative, since "sentence literature" resists the type of analysis that has proved so fruitful in determining contexts for longer compositions. Proverbs such as one finds here might have originated and been employed in a variety of contexts: family or tribal settings, court or scribal schools, or simply in society at large (see "Introduction" above). Search for a literary structure in these proverb collections has proved as elusive as the quest for social context. However, it is generally recognized that proverbs were grouped together by a variety of methods: content ("royal" proverbs in 16:10–15); wordplay and "catchwords" ("hear" in 15:29–32); preferred form of parallelism (antithetic parallelism in chaps. 10–15); or other mnemonic devices.

The Antithetic Collection

10:1–32. After the superscription (10:1a), the first proverb ties what follows to the preceding instructions in an explicit way. The use of "son" as the topic of 10:1, along with the "father/mother" word pair (cf. 1:8; 6:20) suggests that what follows provides "midrash" or commentary on the earlier teachings. That such is indeed the case is confirmed by the way the proverbs of chap. 10 restate the vocabulary and themes present in 1–9: righteous/wicked contrasts (vv. 2–3, 24–25, 27–32), the theme of language (vv. 18–21, 31–32), and the catchwords "life" (vv. 16–17) and "wisdom" and "wise men" (vv. 13–14). Crop gathering in the summer (v. 5) recalls the wise ant of 6:8; the winking troublemaker (v. 10) reminds one of the same gesture made by a plotter (6:13). The stirring up of dissensions (10:12a) suggests the gossip (6:19b) who is hated by Yahweh; the positive path to life (v. 17a) stands in contrast with the paths to life not attained by those who consort with Woman Stranger (2:19b). The fool, who takes pleasure in doing evil (v. 23), alludes to the imagery of 2:14 and 4:16. Only one clearly observational, neutral saying is found: the poor are ruined by lack of goods, but wealth is the fortified city of the rich (10:15). However, this comment is immediately contextualized by v. 16 and later by v. 22. The sages would prefer to believe that wealth is a gift of Yahweh that confirms its possessor's righteousness. Otherwise, the standard act-consequence relationship is displayed throughout the chapter.

11:1–31. Various catchwords link the proverbs of this chapter together: "righteousness" (vv. 4–6), "upright" (vv. 5–6), "justice" (vv. 18–19), and "blessing" (25–26). "Delight" or "fitting" ties 11:1 to 10:32 (see Murphy, pp. 68–69), and that which is detestable to Yahweh (11:1, 20) recalls the numerical saying of 6:16. The theme of the requisites for survival is developed in vv. 3–11, where the sages recommend, not unexpectedly, righteousness, knowledge, and integrity rather than confidence in wealth. The proverb warning against standing surety for a pledge (v. 15) distills the instruction of 6:1–5. The mysteries of generosity are attested (vv. 25–26); moreover, tree of life imagery appears in vv. 28 and 30. Women appear as topics in both positive and negative form (vv. 16, 22). The proper use of language, a favorite subject, recurs (vv. 9, 12–14).

12:1–28. The contrast between wicked/evil and righteous/upright is developed in vv. 3, 5–7, 10, 12–13, 17, 20–21, 26, 28, with the wise/foolish motif a second major interest (vv. 15–16, 23, 27). The benefits and pitfalls of language are treated (vv. 6, 8, 13–14a, 17–19, 22, 25) with a keen observation on the stressful effects of anxiety (v. 25a). A "better than" saying on the follies of pretense and a synonymous proverb on righteousness as the way to life break the regular antithetic pattern in the rest of the proverbs. Verse 22 includes a parallel with chapter ten of the Instruction of Amenemope. Catchwords include "wickedness" (vv. 1–3), "righteous/wicked" (vv. 5–7), "righteous" (vv. 10, 12–13), "fool" (vv. 15–16), "tongue" (vv. 18–19), "evil/trouble" (vv. 20–21), and, in vv. 26 and 28, both "way" and "righteous/ness" are used.

13:1–25. Antithetic relationships between the behavior of the wise/diligent and the proud with sluggards/mockers, as a variant for the former comparison (vv. 1, 4, 10, 13, 15–16, 18, 19b–20), continue as the main topics. The righteous and wicked are compared (vv. 5, 6, 9, 17, 21–22, 25) and the wealthy/poor contrast appears in v. 8 (also implicitly in vv. 11, 23). The effects of hope and longing on the human spirit are observed in vv. 12, 19a, and a cynical proverb on the deceptive appearances of wealth occurs in v. 7. Synthetic parallelism marks the praise of wisdom teaching in v. 14, a proverb perhaps evoked by the tree of life imagery in v. 12 and the term "command" in v. 13. Catchwords continue to bind short units together: "desire/soul/life" (vv. 2–4); "righteous/wicked" (vv. 5–6); "righteous" (vv. 21–22); and "poor/rich" (vv. 7–8). In addition, wordplays occur in vv. 15–19, 20.

which continues the juxtaposition of wise and foolish behavior (vv. 1, 3, 6, 8, 15-16, 18, 24, 29, 33). Wicked/foolish images stand in contrast with those involving the righteous/upright (vv. 9, 11, 22, 32, 34), whereas the poor/rich form another pair of contrasts (vv. 20-21, 31). Psychological insights undergird vv. 10, 12-13, 30, and two royal sayings arise for the first time (vv. 28, 35). "Fear of Yahweh" proverbs appear three times (vv. 2, 26-27), with the latter two occurrences breaking the antithetic pattern in favor of synonymous parallelism. Various verbal roots act as catchwords, along with other typical vocabulary: "to know" (vv. 6-8); "fool" (vv. 7-8); "to be great" (vv. 28-29).

15:1-33. The same antithetic pairs apparent in chaps. 10-14 round out this collection: wise/prudent versus fool/mockers (vv. 5, 12, 14, 18, 20 [cf. 10:1], 21, 24, 31-32); righteous/wicked (vv. 6-9, 19, 26, 28-29). Language provides an important topic (vv. 1-2, 4, 7, 23, 28), and "popular psychology" appears in vv. 1, 4, 13, 14, 30. Two "better than" sayings (vv. 16-17) point out that abundance is not everything, if accompanied with strife (cf. Amenemope VI, 9:5-8 in Pritchard, p. 422, as noted by Murphy, p. 70). Imagery of death and the underworld marks vv. 10-11, 24, 27. Verbal roots for "to be good" in vv. 2-3, and "to be glad" in vv. 20-21, 23 act as catchwords, along with other typical language: "heart/mind" (vv. 13-15), "righteous" (vv. 28-29), "hear" (vv. 29, 31-32), etc.

"Yahweh proverbs" abound in this transitional chapter (vv. 3, 11, 16, 25, 29, 33), with "detested by Yahweh" forms occurring in vv. 8-9, 26. The awesome sovereignty of God is conveyed not simply by content—the good and the wicked, even the underworld lie open to Yahweh's sight—but also by repetition of this theme. The collection ends appropriately with the equation of "fear of Yahweh" to the teachings of wisdom (15:33).

The "Royal" Collection

Breaking away from the pattern of antithetic parallelism, this collection displays more varied forms, more attempts at thematic arrangement, and high valuation of the monarchy and, perhaps, reflects a city rather than rural background.

16:1-33. A cluster of "Yahweh proverbs" (vv. 1-7) begins this chapter, with these forms continuing to punctuate the rest of the proverbs in vv. 9, 11, 20, and 33. People may fret, plan, and wonder, but in the end it is Yahweh who prevails. Verse 2 recalls the Egyptian scribal god Thoth who weighs the heart of the dead against the measure of Maat. The diverse ways of the king are discussed in vv. 10, 12 (cf. 8:15), 13-15, where the monarch is seen as the upholder of Yahweh's just order, an idea created as much by the placement of these verses after the Yahweh proverbs as by their actual content. The topic of language occurs in vv. 21, 23-24, 27-28. "Better than" sayings appear in vv. 8, 16, 19, 32, and psychological observations in vv. 25-26. An admonition to acquire wisdom, a precious commodity in v. 16, recalls 4:5 and 3:14. Variants for some of these proverbs exist: cf. v. 2 with 21:2, v. 5b with 11:21, and v. 25 with 14:12. Catchwords continue to unite short groups of proverbs (vv. 10-11, 12-13, 18-19, 21-24, 27-29), but thematic development is the more important organizing technique in this chapter.

17:1-28. A great variety of topics is treated here, with unusual stylistic features and few catchwords ("companion" in vv. 17-18, "joy/cheerful" in vv. 21-22). References to the caprice of human language occur in vv. 4, 7, 20, 27-28, and reflections on proper conflict resolution are discussed in vv. 9, 13-14, 26. The wise are the subjects of vv. 2, 10, 24, with fools appearing in vv. 12, 16, 21, 25. The image of Yahweh testing the heart (v. 3) reflects the Egyptian influence already noted in 16:2. Other subjects appear briefly: bribes in vv. 8, 23; friendship in v. 17; parent-child relationships in v. 6; standing pledge in v. 18; treatment of the poor in v. 5; and role reversal in v. 2. The sage continues to record insights on psychological stress: a "better than" saying in v. 1 celebrates peace and quiet, with a cheerful disposition found to be the best medicine in v. 22.

18:1-24. The main topic is the power of speech, developed in vv. 4, 6-8, 13, 20-21, though the benefits of wealth receive some attention (vv. 11, 16, 23), along with conflict resolution and justice in court (vv. 17-19). The negative and positive side of friendship frame the chapter in v. 1 and v. 24, respectively. Yahweh appears as a strong tower to the righteous in v. 10 and the "Donor" of wives in v. 22, much as God was seen to be the provider of Woman Wisdom in the instructions of chaps. 1-9. A person's spirit can sustain or be crushed, according to the "psychology" of v. 14. Perhaps the strongest programmatic statement occurs in v. 21: death and life are both in the "power of the tongue," that is, language. Catchwords are used in vv. 10-11, 18-19, 20-21. Verse 12b shows how a phrase may be reused in a new context; it appeared earlier in 15:33.

19:1-29. Emphasis on family relationships (vv. 13-14, 18, 26), wisdom (vv. 11, 16, 20, 25, 27), and folly in its various modes (vv. 1, 10, 22b, "mockers" in vv. 25, 28-29, sluggards in vv. 15, 24) accompany the resurgence of the instruction style in vv. 18, 20, 23, 27, as the sage urges the "son" to take instruction. Insights on the life of the poor and their relationship to Yahweh occur in vv. 7-8 (note the shift from sentence style), 10, 17. Discussion of the false witness (vv. 5, 9, 28) involves the reuse of phrases; vv. 5a and 9a are identical. Various catchwords, associated with the topics above, appear in vv. 1-2, 6-7, 13-15, 18-19, 20-21, 26-27, 28-29. As in 18:22, Yahweh is the provider of a good wife in v. 14, even as parents provide an inheritance.

20:1-30. A wide range of topics and styles (cf. vv. 6-7, 18) characterize this chapter, which opens with "mockery" in v. 1, a reference that provides a tie to 19:28-29. Royal sayings appear in vv. 2 (cf. 19:12a), 8, 26, 28, with reuse of the image of "winnowing" evil in vv. 8, 26. An allusion to Yahweh's maintenance of just weights, a motif familiar from 11:1 and 16:11, occurs in vv. 10, 23, with other Yahweh proverbs occurring in vv. 12, 22, 24, 27. The proverb on gossips (v. 19) provides a variation on 11:13, and the typical advice about standing surety on a pledge (v. 16) is repeated exactly in 27:13. The gray hair of the old (v. 29), a white badge of wisdom, recalls 16:31. Violence is recommended as an efficacious corrective in v. 30 (for similar statements, see 13:24; 19:18, 25). Numerous catchwords are used throughout this chapter.

21:1-31. These verses provide readers with the sages' cast of typical characters: the wicked (vv. 4, 7, 10, 12, 18, 27, 29); the mocker (vv. 11, 24); the craving sluggard with idle hands (vv. 25-26, cf. 19:24; 20:4); the false witness (v. 28, cf. 14:5; 19:5, 9, 28); and the quarrelsome wife (vv. 9 [= 25:24], 19). On the positive side, Yahweh appears in vv. 1, 2 (cf. v. 2a with 16:25a, v. 2b with 17:3), 3, 30-31; the wise in vv. 11, 20, 22; the righteous and diligent in vv. 5, 21; and the king in v. 1. Beyond the familiar themes and catchwords with which these characters are associated, the idea of "plan" and "way" unites thoughts present in vv. 2, 5, 8, 16, 29. Additionally, remarks regarding proper attitude toward sacrifice occur toward the beginning and end of the chapter: in v. 3, Yahweh prefers justice and righteousness to sacrifice; in v. 27, the sacrifice of the wicked, brought with evil intent, is "detestable." Both proverbs echo the programmatic statements of Psalm 50. Yahweh figures as absolute sovereign over human events in Prov. 21:30-31: can no counsel prevail against God, no human plan, by itself, bring salvation.

22:1-16. As this large collection ends, treatment is given to the themes of generosity to the poor (vv. 9, 16); the training of children (vv. 6, 15); the value of a good name (v. 1); and, of course, the wicked (vv. 5, 8); the mocker (v. 10); the sluggard, now feigning fright of lions to avoid work (v. 13); the prudent (v. 3); and the king (v. 11). Even as Yahweh was the source of a good wife (18:22; 19:14), those feeling God's wrath will fall into the "Pit"-like mouth of Women Strangers (22:14). Thus, the major Solomonic collection of 10:1-22:14 ends as did the instructions in 9:13-18, with the image of woman as the way to death.

"The Words of the Wise"

This section of Proverbs, a free adaptation of the highly moral Egyptian Instruction of Amemope, returns to the longer, more developed instructional style. However, instead of the unified poems of Proverbs 1-9, we find here a series of positive and negative commands, expanded by the addition of motivation clauses and sayings to enhance their authority. The antithetic parallelism of the previous Solomonic collection is found only in 24:16 (Murphy, 74).

Only a third of the material in these chapters is actually based on the Egyptian text. It appears in 22:17-23:11 and in different order than it does in Amenemope. Parallels to the Aramaic Words of Ahiqar are also evident in 23:13-14 (see Whybray, pp. 132, 136). Direct address, to "my son," appears in 23:15, 19, 26; 24:13, 21. The topics treated range from table manners among the powerful (23:1-3, 6-8) to the dangers of alcoholism (23:20-21, 29-35), suggesting that this instruction may date from the monarchical period as training material for those entering court service (cf. 22:21 and commentary above on 1:2-7). Other typical wisdom themes also appear: treatment of the poor, the oppressed and their relationship to Yahweh (22:22-23; 24:11-12); the excellence of wisdom (23:23; 24:3-7, 13-14); family relationships and discipline of the young (23:13-16, 24-25); envy of sinners (23:17-18; 24:1-2, 15-20); the dangers of harlots (23:27-28); and advice against guaranteeing debts (22:26-27). The rest of wisdom literature's cast of characters are also to be found in this instruction: the fool (23:9; 24:7, 9); the angry man (22:24-25); the king (22:29; 24:21); and Yahweh (22:19, 23; 23:17; 24:18, 21-22; implicitly in 23:11 [cf. Num. 35:19] and 24:12).

The Egyptian Prologue

22:17-21. The title of this instruction has been mistakenly embedded within the first sentence in Hebrew in v. 17. The Hebrew text may be translated, following the LXX, "The Words of the Wise. / Give ear and hear my words, / and apply your mind to my teaching." In addition, the Hebrew shlshwm of v. 20 must be understood to mean "thirty" in view of the Egyptian Amenemope, which is divided into "thirty houses" (that is, chapters). Efforts of commentators to divide this instruction into thirty distinct units have not been particularly successful, however. Verse 21 reflects the typical concern of officials in traditional societies to entrust messages only to those capable of delivering them accurately.

22:22–23:11. Reference to boundary markers (22:28; 23:10–11) also occurs in Amenemope, as well as in Prov. 25:25 and elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible (Deut. 19:14; 27:17; Isa. 5:8–10). A common method of oppressing the poor, especially widows vulnerable by having no male protector but the Lord, is dispossessing them of their land. Since a boundary marker sets the limits of a field and provides "legal" evidence of ownership, their movement or removal is forbidden and will be avenged by Yahweh (Prov. 23:11).

The Sage's Instruction

Issues such as the exemplary benefits of wisdom, the plight of the drunkard, the temptation to envy the wicked or fall prey to the harlot are developed in this section. As in previous verses, the sage invokes Yahweh to lend authority to his teachings. Prov. 23:29–30, which focuses on the drunkard, may be a remnant of an earlier "riddle" (see "Introduction" above). Prov. 24:5–7 has implicit parallels in Prov. 11:14; 20:18. Elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible, too many counselors lead to the downfall of Absalom in 2 Samuel 17. (On the significance of the "weighing the heart" motif in 24:12, see 16:2 [cf. 21:2].) The Greek text for this instruction has five additional verses occurring after 24:22.

24:23–34

Further "Words of the Wise"

This short collection is usually understood to be an appendix of the previous instruction.

24:23a. The first half of v. 23 may be interpreted as a heading for this collection. It might, however, have a more specialized function, namely, a title linking 24:23–34 to 22:17–22, since this half-verse could also be rendered

"These also belong to the [collection of 'Sayings of] wise men'" (Skehan, quoted in Murphy, p. 76).

24:23b–25. Concern about impartiality in judgment is common in the Hebrew Bible (cf., e.g., Prov. 18:5; 28:21; 31:5; Lev. 19:15; Deut. 1:17; 16:19; Amos 2:6; 5:7–10; Isa. 10:2, 11:3–5; Mic. 3:9, 11).

24:26–29. This miscellany of saying, admonition, and prohibitions begins (v. 26) and ends (vv. 28–29) with a focus on proper speech. Verse 28 reflects the experience of the law court. The admonition (v. 27) comments on the prudential road to success. The final prohibition (v. 29), one directed against revenge however well-justified, finds a striking parallel in Matt. 6:12, 14–15.

24:30–34. This "example story" concerning the self-generated plight of the sluggard provides insight into what the sages mean by the word "instruction" (v. 32), used so often in Proverbs 1–9. Reflection on life's events or on humanity's foibles may engender a paradigmatic insight, which can be used to help someone avert disaster or achieve success. Verses 33–34 are identical to Prov. 6:10–11. For other comments on the sluggard, cf. Prov. 6:6; 26:13–16.

"Further 'Proverbs of Solomon,' Copied by the Men of Hezekiah, King of Judah"

Another collection of proverbs is here attributed to Solomon. Although this attribution is probably another example of traditional ascription of, rather than actual, authorship, the information, "copied by the men of Hezekiah" (25:1), is generally considered historically accurate and gives an insight into wisdom activity at the royal court. The number of proverbs in this section (approximately 130) is equivalent to the numerical value of the Hebrew name Hezekiah as it was traditionally calculated. Like the previous Solomonic collection, this one may also be divided into two minor groupings, Proverbs 25–27 and 28–29, each internally structured by the typical devices observed earlier (i.e., catchwords, word-play, onomatopoeia, topic). Proverbs 25–27 prefers comparisons, prohibitions, the topics of natural world and trade, and uses antithetic parallelism far less than is usual. Proverbs 28–29 returns to antithetic parallelism as it treats the themes of the poor, the king, and justice.

25:1-28. The topics of the king (vv. 2-7, 15), language (vv. 11, 15, 23), treatment of one's neighbor (vv. 8-9, 17-18), and psychological insights (vv. 20, 25) highlight this chapter of extended comparisons (more than one verse) and commands. Other typical wisdom motifs are also present: false witness (v. 18); behavior at court (vv. 8-10); the boaster (v. 14); the quarrelsome wife (v. 24 = Prov. 21:9); the righteous (v. 26); and the wise (v. 12). Missing are the typical antithetic contrasts between wicked and righteous, wise and fool. Particularly noticeable are comparisons using lush, evocative imagery drawn from nature. Golden apples (v. 11), the refreshing coolness of snow or cold water (vv. 13, 25), wind and rain (vv. 14, 23), all work to cast their content into especially memorable form with the crafted beauty of their similes and metaphors. The gentle tongue, which patiently breaks the bones of the powerful (v. 15), must be a special insight of the sages who habitually counsel against hot-tempered, ill-mannered, and loud-mouthed assaults on convention. Here it is clear they do not think their students should simply endorse the status quo but should rather choose available and effective means to change it. Such recommendations also highlight the sages' lack of ultimate power in Israelite social structure: where kings are concerned, they may counsel, but they cannot command.

26:1-28. The fool (vv. 1 [cf. 19:10a], 3-12 [cf. 10:13b; 19:29b for v. 3b]), the sluggard (vv. 13-16), and the malicious users of language for quarrels, gossip, and deceit (vv. 20-26, 28; v. 22 = 18:8) are the main topics of this chapter. Imagery drawn from the natural world again serves as a vehicle for the sages' observations in vv. 1-5, 9, 11, 13, 17, 20-21, 27. Weapons technology gone out of control due to "human error" forms an appropriate counterpoint in vv. 8, 10, 18-19. Unlike fools of earlier chapters, whose behavior carried moral overtones, those pictured here are simply foolish, thoughtless persons whom those in authority would do well to recognize and avoid entrusting with serious matters (vv. 1, 6, 8, 10). Verses 4-5 present a striking contrast in counsel on how to handle reprimanding a fool. These two verses demonstrate that the insights couched in proverbial form are not eternal "truth" carved in stone but, rather, depend on context for their application. (This is no doubt why the fool will never understand how to use a proverb correctly [vv. 7, 9; cf. Sir. 20:20].) The character portrait of the sluggard is painted with wicked clarity: idlers use any excuse, however ludicrous, to avoid work (v. 13; cf. 22:13; 24:30) and are too lazy even to feed themselves (26:15 = 19:24). Both sides of the act-consequence relationship are affirmed here: no curse "without cause" will find an innocent victim (26:2) and those who dig pits for others will not escape falling in themselves (v. 27; cf. 28:10; Ps. 7:15; Eccles. 10:8; Sir. 27:25-27).

27:1-27. Explorations of the relations between friends and neighbors (vv. 9-11, 14, 17, 19); strange paradoxes (vv. 5-7); uncertainty (v. 1); and human psychology (vv. 4, 17, 19, 20 [cf. 30:15-16]) are nestled among typical wisdom concerns: the fool (vv. 3, 22); prudent behavior (v. 12; cf. 22:3); pledges for loans (27:13 = 20:16); language and boasting (vv. 2, 21); nagging wives (vv. 15-16); and success in one's work (vv. 18, 23-27). Imagery from nature is important in vv. 3, 7-8, 15-16, 18-19, and in vv. 23-27, which provide a small "instruction" on farming (cf. Isa. 28:23-29). Again, context is everything: honey is sweet, but not to the satisfied; to the hungry person, even something bitter is counted as sweet (Prov. 27:7). A friend may be better than kin under the right circumstances (v. 10, cf. 18:24; Sir. 37:6); a rousing blessing given too early becomes a curse (Prov. 27:14); and too much affection can mask more sinister motives (v. 6).

28:1-29:27*The Ruler's Collection

Returning to the antithetic parallelism that characterized the earlier Solomonic collections, this section favors the two-lined proverb rather than commands and extended comparisons. The topics are those important to rulers: justice, treatment of the poor, the nature of power, along with typical wisdom concerns (righteous/wicked, wise/fool, father/mother).

28:1-28. Explicit and implicit contrasts between the righteous and wicked (vv. 1, 4, 10, 12, 13, 16, 18, 28), the rich and poor (vv. 3, 6, 8, 11, 19 [cf. 12:11]), 20, 22, 25, 27), and the nature of rulership (vv. 2, 3, 15-16, 28) provide the main topics in this chapter. Yahweh appears as protector and instructor of those who are "godfearing" (vv. 5, 25) and is the implicit referent of the verb "fear" in v. 14 (cf. Sir. 37:12). "Torah" is mentioned specifically in Prov. 28:4, 7, 9. Although "Torah" has been used in the general sense of "teaching" throughout Proverbs, the highly juridical, moral tone of this chapter suggests that the Torah, Israel's legal tradition, is also implied here. Family relationships are the subject of vv. 7, 24, and wisdom themes of flattery/rebuke (v. 23), wise/fool (v. 26), guilt (v. 17), and justice (vv. 5, 8, 21 [cf. 24:23]) round out the selection of proverbs. The Hebrew text of vv.

2-3 is difficult and usually restored from the LXX, a situation that gives rise to varying modern translations.

29:1-27. In the same way that Proverbs 10, the first chapter of the proverb collections, was composed of proverbs that took up themes developed in Proverbs 1-9, so the last chapter of the proverb collections is marked by its use of items that had previously appeared in slightly different form (29:1b = 6:15b; cf., e.g., 29:2 with 11:10; 28:12, 28; 29:5 with 11:9; 29:11 with 12:16; 29:13 with 22:2; 29:20b = 26:12b). The main topics are again the contrast between wicked and righteous (29:2, 6-7, 10, 16, 27), and proverbs about rulers (vv. 2, 4, 12, 14, 26). The contrast between the man who loves (Woman?) Wisdom and the one who goes to prostitutes (v. 3) builds on the imagery present in Proverbs 1-9, while mockers and fools are contrasted with the wise in 29:8-9, 11. Once more, the sages who generally condemn violence in others recommend it (vv. 15, 17, 19, 21; cf. 13:24; 19:18) to control their own families and domestic slaves. Apparently the patient, gentle tongue of 25:15 is to be used only when the one being corrected is of higher status and capable of self-defense.

"The Words of Agur, Son of Jakeh"

Commentators disagree on the precise length of this section, with vv. 4, 6, or 14 serving as possible ending points for the passage. Topical groupings seem to organize these verses (see Murphy, p. 80).

30:1-4

Agur's Oracle

30:1. Although the heading of this collection is understandable, the rest of the Hebrew verse makes little sense. The names Agur and Jakeh do not occur in the rest of the Hebrew Bible and should perhaps be translated literally (Agur = "I am a sojourner"; Jakeh = an abbreviation of "Yahweh, blessed is he") as a symbolic answer to the riddle in v. 4. Agur, then, would stand for Israel, the perpetual sojourner people (cf. Gen. 47:9), and for the "son" of Yahweh, who is the referent of the questions of Prov. 30:4 (see Murphy, p. 80). The word "Massa" (v. 1a) is usually interpreted as a name (so too in 31:1) of a tribe or of an area in north Arabia associated with one of Ishmael's sons in Gen. 25:14 and 1 Chron. 1:30 (see Whybray, p. 172). Such a reference here is not out of the question, since the Hebrew Bible contains many traditions about the fabled wisdom of "the sons of the East" (1 Kings 5:10;

Jer. 49:7). However, "Massa" may also be translated "oracle," even though the following verses are not oracular in form. Prov. 30:1b ("Ithiel," "Ucal") is corrupt and usually emended to read "there is no god"; "I am not god"; "I am weary, O God, I am weary, I am worn out."

30:2-4. Agur's opinion of his own intelligence when compared to the wisdom of the Holy Ones (cf. 9:10) is in keeping with the concept of wisdom's limits as developed in Proverbs 1-9 and throughout the proverb collections. The cosmological questions in Prov. 30:4 draw on the same tradition of God's actions found in Job 38, Isa. 40:12, and Sir. 1:2-3.

Answers, Admonitions, and Observations

The remainder of the passage may be divided into four units: vv. 5-6, an instruction on God's word; vv. 7-9, a prayer framed in numerical saying style; v. 10, a prohibition against defaming slaves; and vv. 11-14, four proverbs on the "breed" or "generation" of the wicked. The instruction in vv. 5-6 seems related to Ps. 18:30 (= Prov. 30:5), Deut. 4:2 (cf. Prov. 30:6a), and Job 13:10; 24:25b (cf. Prov. 30:6b). Whybray finds the notion of "not adding to the word" characteristic of late wisdom's insistence on the reliability of sacred Scriptures, a judgment that provides a postexilic date for this unit as well as the entire Agur passage (see Whybray, p. 173). The prayer of vv. 7-9 steers the traditional middle way of "nothing too much" recommended throughout the book of Proverbs. The typical "father/mother" word pair occurs in the extended description of the wicked (vv. 11-14), where each line begins with the word "generation."

Mostly Numerical Sayings

Some commentators take the conclusion of chap. 30 to be an extension of the discourse of Agur, in which case these numerical sayings may have been taken over from Israel's neighbors to the south (where the names Agur and Jakeh have been attested in south Arabian inscriptions) and east. The collection consists of five numerical sayings (vv. 15b-16, 18-19, 21-23, 24-28, 29-31), of which all but vv. 24-28 are sayings built on the same pattern, referring first to three things, then to four things. Interspersed with these are sayings (vv. 15a, 17), interpretations (v. 20), and commands (vv. 32-33).

30:15-16. The saying about the leech and her daughters (a reference to a leech's two suckers?

see Whybray, p. 176) is difficult to understand. Are the words "Give! Give!" to be understood as the names of the leech's children, the cry of the leech and her daughters, or are they in some way related to 15b, whose referents (Sheol and the barren womb) could also be understood as uttering the same exclamation? Some commentators have suggested that the word for leech refers to a bloodsucking demon (cf. the [Akkadian] lilitu [= Lilitu] nightdemon of Babylon and Israel). The saying may have been placed here because of its symbolic connection to the four insatiable items in 15b-16: the underworld that is greedy for lives; the barren womb desperate for children; parched land; and fire that exists only so long as it has fuel to consume.

30:17-20. The ravens and vultures who pluck out the mocking eye connect the saying in v. 17, reminiscent of 30:11-14, to the numerical saying in vv. 18-19, whose catchword is "way." Punishment for reviling one's parents is death in Exod. 21:17, a judgment echoed here by reference to the ancient horror of lack of proper burial. The saying about the mysterious "ways" (Prov. 30:18-19) may refer to lack of visible means of propulsion or movement that leaves no trace, with "the way of a man with a fertile woman" as a reference to either procreation or sexual attraction generally. The saying about the adulteress (v. 20) makes use of the euphemism of eating for illicit sexual behavior (cf. 9:13-18) and probably appears here because of its topical relationship to v. 19b, as well as the occurrence of the catchword "way."

30:21-33. Inappropriate or undesirable human behavior (vv. 21-23, 32-33) provides a frame for the noble, amazing, and stately aspects of the natural world, a favorite source of knowledge for traditional wisdom teaching. The unbearable human types of vv. 21-23 seem to display a progression of sorts: the slave-turned-king in v. 22a could easily be the gorged fool of v. 22b; the unloved (and for that reason perhaps barren) wife of v. 23a might easily be displaced by a slave girl providing sexual services for her master in v. 23b (cf. Hagar and Sarah in Gen. 16:1-6). Ants (Prov. 6:6-8), rock-badgers, locusts, and lizards are all praised (30:24-28) for their cooperative efforts or abilities to prevail in seemingly impossible situations, thereby demonstrating that wisdom is not to be measured by size. The stately stride and bearing of certain animals (vv. 29-31) is probably to be associated with power. (Two of the terms of this 3/4 saying must be restored from ancient versions: the Greek reads "the cock that proudly struts among the hens" for the Hebrew "one girded about the loins"; various translations are advanced for the "king with his [Heb.] 'alqum with him" in v. 31b, where the meaning of

'alqum is not known. It may be that the text is corrupt here, and some other stately animal was the original referent.) The effects of pressure are the topic of vv. 32-33, although the relationship between the two verses is obscure, since v. 32 uses the instructional style while v. 33 appears to return to the itemization of examples seen in the numerical saying. Since the words "nose/blood" in v. 33a can also mean "anger/bloodshed" in Hebrew, v. 33b may in fact be a variant of the preceding line (see Whybray, p. 179), though another translation for v. 33b, such as "so the stirring up of dissension produces lawsuits," could also provide a suitable climax for the saying while leaving the text intact.

"The Words of Lemuel, King of Massa, Which His Mother Taught Him"

Instructions in the ancient Near East were often made for kings and princes of Egypt and Babylon, but this is the only surviving example of an instruction made by a woman, though royal wives could, in certain circumstances, wield considerable power (1 Kings 1:11-13; 15:13; 2 Kings 9:22; 11:1). Here we are provided with a concrete instance of the "torah of your mother" mentioned previously by the sages (Prov. 1:8b, 6:20).

31:1-3. The Greek text does not read "Lemuel" as a proper name but translates v. 1 with "my words have been spoken by God—the oracular answer of a king, whom his mother instructed." (On the meaning of "Massa," see commentary above on 30:1.) Foreign influence appears in 31:2-3, as is evident in the use of the Aramaic words for "son" and "kings." Verse 2 reads, literally, "What, my son?! . . . with a three-fold repetition of the interrogative "what," which functions either as an interjection to highlight the intensity of the mother's comments or to refer to that which follows. The ascription to mothers of advice against involvement with women is common in traditional literature. Verse 2a may reflect a folk belief that sexual excesses quite literally shorten a man's life. Verse 2b is usually interpreted with reference to the LXX or other versions; the Hebrew text reads "your ways" for the conjectured "your loins."

31:4-9. The mother's instruction continues with advice on the appropriate and inappropriate uses of intoxicants (vv. 4-7) and duties of the king (vv. 5b, 8-9). The sentiment in vv. 4-5, that drunkenness may impair judgment and the righteous exercise of power, echoes earlier concerns about partiality in judgment (24:24) and abuse of strong drinks (20:1). On the other hand, when all hope is gone, strong drink may act as a palliative (31:6-7). The Talmud records that compassionate women in Jerusalem used to offer drugged wine to condemned prisoners to minimize their sufferings (so the note to Luke 23:27 in JB). The wine that Jesus refuses in Matt. 27:34 (cf. Luke 23:27; Mark 15:23; John 19:28-30) was probably meant for this purpose. Prov. 30:8-9 explicate the legal role of the king; the ruler is the upholder of the rights of the oppressed, a human mediator who acts on God's behalf to enact justice (cf. the portrait of the ideal king found in Isa. 11:1-5).

Acrostic Poem on the Woman of Worth

The "woman of worth" (others translate: "a capable wife" or "a perfect wife"), who balances and explicates the imagery of Woman Wisdom found in Proverbs 1-9, provides a fitting ending to the book of Proverbs. This wisdom poem is an acrostic (see "Introduction" above), that is, each line begins with a succeeding letter of the Hebrew alphabet (cf. Pss. 9-10; 25; 119; Lam. 1-4). This stylistic device changes the typical word order in Hebrew sentences and causes some problems in the creation of a logical development of thought. Placed after the teaching of Lemuel's mother, this passage could easily be taken as a further development of her instruction, but its internal structure makes clear that it was originally an independent composition.

Though the family pictured here is prosperous and of high status, the wife who maintains it is praised by the sages for symbolic reasons. The poem about her expresses the great value placed on the family as the important social and religious unit within Israelite society, both in the premonarchical period and in postexilic Judaism from which this composition probably comes. It is not surprising to see her depicted as wholly "male-identified," that is, from the perspective of her fulfillment of roles that enable the lives of the men who depend on her. Nevertheless, the picture presented here acts as a corrective to the view that women are dangerous beings who sap away men's lives and fortunes. Though a human female, the imagery used paints a portrait of the benefits of Woman Wisdom inside the household rather than outside in the streets and markets, as in Proverbs 1-9.

31:10-12. The opening question suggests how unlikely sages consider the prospect of finding a woman of worth, which is not surprising given their general view of women (cf. 11:22; 21:9, 19; 22:14). Said to be more precious than jewels in 31:10 (NEB: "coral"; JB: "pearls"), this language directly recalls Woman Wisdom in 3:15 and 8:11. The one who succeeds in finding her (31:10) does not lack material goods (v. 11), reminding us of those who find Woman Wisdom and are materially rewarded by their association with this sought-for person in 3:13-14 and 8:17, 21 (see Camp, p. 188). Her gift of "good" to her husband (31:12) recalls the proverb of 18:22 where "he who finds a wife finds good, and he receives favor from Yahweh."

31:13-19. No sluggard, the woman of worth works diligently even though her household is equipped with servants (vv. 14-15, 17-18). She engages in the typical tasks of spinning, weaving, and sewing, "woman's work" of paramount importance in the ancient world (vv. 13, 19). Verse 16 seems to indicate that she engages in at least some activities that are usually reserved for men, such as the purchase of real estate. Historical evidence suggests, however, that women of extremely high (and extremely low) status have always had more freedom than "average" status women to move about in the public domain, so that the range of activities attributed here to the wealthy wife need not surprise us.

31:20-27. The "provider" motif (vv. 21-22, 24-25) continues, interspersed with description of her wise, righteous, and compassionate actions (vv. 20, 26). Her generosity to the poor, along with her wise speech, loyal instructions (Heb. torat-chesed or "teaching of steadfast/covenant love"; →Loving-kindness) give a living example of the "mother's torah" (1:8; 6:20; and 31:1). All these attributes contribute to her husband's good name (31:23) and allow him to earn the respect of his peers when he appears in places of power, especially the legal assembly.

31:28-31. Her single-minded devotion to the needs of others earns her, in vv. 28-30, the praise of those for whom she lives. Verse 29 reads, literally, "many daughters" rather than the "many women" usually rendered. The selection of this language is in keeping with the "male-identified" tone of the poem, although it is also possible that this term, rather than "women," was selected because it provides a superior rhyme in Hebrew. "A woman who fears Yahweh" (v. 30) may originally have read "a woman of understanding," as it appears in the LXX. The change may have been made by the final redactor of Proverbs to distinguish the woman of worth from Woman Wisdom, who appears as Understanding in 8:14 (see Camp, pp. 96-97). Within the context of this poem, the effect of such a statement is to suggest that women in the community for whom this text is "Scripture" most properly worship God through fulfillment of their domestic roles, rather than through forms of observance (such as public religious leadership) that men assign to themselves. The command to provide for the woman of worth suggests that, although she is the source of all good things, she may not automatically have shared in the profits of her own labor (31:31a). Verse 31b concludes the poem and the book with a return to the imagery of Woman Wisdom: the works of the woman of worth will praise her in the same city gates where Woman Wisdom issued her call (1:21; 8:3).

Mystery of the Name

The author of Ecclesiastes gives his name as Qohelet, which occurs seven times (1:1, 2, 12; 7:27; 12:8, 9, 10). In two instances in the Hebrew text (7:27; 12:8), the name has a definite article ("the Qohelet"). Although feminine in form, Qohelet is construed as masculine since it occurs with verbs of the latter gender. The Hebrew verb qahal, from which the name Qohelet is derived, means "to gather, to assemble," always with reference to people. So, in 1 Kings 8-12, an author uses this verb to refer to Solomon's assembling of the people to dedicate the Temple. The book of Ecclesiastes connects its author with King Solomon (Eccles. 1:1, 12; indirectly in 1:12-2:26), but this royal fiction vanishes at 2:26, perhaps reappearing in the epilogue (12:11, "one shepherd").

What does the word Qohelet connote? Scholars understand it in various ways: as a personal name, pen name, acronym, or function. Its use as a reference to Solomon is unlikely, since the article, which may preface the word Qohelet, and the identification of the author as a professional wise man (12:9) point to a functionary other than a king. To be sure, Egyptian precedent for royal authorship of wisdom literature exists, but the author's perspective outside Eccles. 1:12-2:26 is that of a subject. One interpreter has proposed that the word Qohelet conceals the author's name, just as Yaqeh (RSV: Jakeh), Agur's father in Prov. 30:1-2, is said to be an abbreviation for "Yahweh is the Holy One." However, no one has discovered a suitable explanation for the putative acronym Qohelet.

The usual explanation is based on Ezra 2:55, 57 and Neh. 7:59, where the offices of scribe and binder of gazelles, untranslated in RSV as "Hassophereth" and "Pochoereth-hazzebaim," are designated by words formed as feminine participles. Understood on the basis of this analogy, the word Qohelet describes an office that relates in some way to assembling people (or proverbs?). The Septuagint Greek translation renders the word in this way, associating the noun for assembly with the word for a public gathering (Gk. ecclesia). Jerome followed this lead in the Latin Version, the Vulgate, but emphasized the role of speaking before an assembly. Protestant Reformers adopted Jerome's notion of a preacher, and modern translations have generally followed suit, despite its inappropriateness. Awareness of this difficulty has led one scholar to understand the verb qahal in the sense of harangue (cf. Neh. 5:7) and to think of Qohelet as an "arguer," as in a diatribe. Still another interpreter suggests that the term refers to a living assembly of wise sayings in the same way that wisdom may be personified as a woman.

One problem with assuming that Qohelet assembled students in a school is that he sets his view over against traditional wisdom. Indeed, his teachings undercut the established wisdom of the time, rejecting its fundamental premise and major conclusions. Moreover, he seems to have democratized education, offering his insights to the populace at large, if the first epilogist has preserved authentic memory (Eccles. 12:9). Perhaps this disciple has also remembered correctly that Qohelet's primary function as teacher was to assemble proverbs (12:9-11). There may be a subtle hint in 7:27 that the name Qohelet refers to this process of assembling proverbial data in the search for comprehensive wisdom. Such a departure from the typical use of qahal as referring to people would not be the only instance in which Qohelet forged a distinctive language. After all, in his view people were no better off than animals.

Unity of the Book

The first-person pronoun punctuates the book of Ecclesiastes, leaving the impression that a single author is responsible for its content. However, the book concludes with a section that refers to the author in the third person (12:9-14). These comments resemble an epigraph (12:9-11) and a polemical corrective (12:12-14). Furthermore, since 1:12 seems to be the author's introduction to the book, 1:1 may be viewed as a secondary superscription based on 1:12. In addition, a thematic statement, which may derive from Qohelet, forms an envelope around the book (1:2; 12:8). In any event, there is sufficient evidence to question the literary integrity of Ecclesiastes. This suspicion is heightened by the presence of contradictions, particularly with regard to the ultimate fate of the wicked. Does Qohelet think God will judge them or not? Because the book answers this question both positively and negatively, critics usually attribute these opposing views to different authors.

Scholars have developed four theories to account for the book's formation: first, the author wrote most of the book, but editorial comments were added at a later time; second, the author quotes traditional wisdom and contradicts it; third, the author enters into dialogue with an interlocutor, real or imagined; and fourth, the book reflects a single author's changing views over the years, as it also realistically describes life's ambiguities.

Beyond the superscription and epilogues, additions to the book seem to occur in contexts dealing with reward and retribution (2:26a; 3:17a; 8:12–13; 11:9b; perhaps 5:18 and 7:26b). These additions may derive from the same hand that was responsible for 12:12–24, which reaffirms traditional views and brings Qohelet's teachings in line with Torah piety. Earlier theories about multiple editors (a Sadducean, a sage, a pious one, and another editor) have lost their attraction, but few contemporary interpreters are willing to abandon the theory of an editor altogether. After all, such editorial activity altered many biblical books, and Qohelet's radical views would have invited editorial revision. In at least one instance, material was very poorly integrated into the book (10:1–4, 8–20).

Contrasting opinions appear throughout the book. Qohelet openly opposes any teacher who claims to possess absolute truth (8:17). Indeed, an adversarial stance pervades the material, leading some scholars to suggest that Qohelet quotes his opponents without the usual indications for a change in speaker. One scholar has isolated the citations 2:14a; 4:5; 4:6; 7:5–6a; 9:17; 10:2; 10:12, and several interpreters assume that Qohelet used an approach that is best described as "Yes, but . . ." Although conceding the general reliability of a particular view, Qohelet proceeds by appealing to a fact of life that contradicts and, thereby, refutes it.

Early Christian interpreters recognized such competing views, attributed them to different speakers, and thus pointed to the dialogical character of the book. As a result Qohelet's unorthodox sentiments were neutralized. Thesis stood over against antithesis in such a way that all teachings were relativized. Modern interpreters have continued this line of reasoning by isolating a "good" and a "bad" in Qohelet's views on a given subject or by emphasizing polarities within the book. In one instance, the juxtaposition of opposites is undeniable (3:1–8).

If Qohelet assembled his reflections about life over a long period of time, it may be amiss to expect logical consistency. Furthermore, life's ambiguities themselves may have struck Qohelet as noteworthy. Indeed, the very confrontation between Hebraism and Hellenism produced compromises, and Hebraism alone included its share of contradictions.

Structure

Qohelet's reflections begin with a thematic statement (1:2) and a poem (1:4–11); they conclude with a poem and the same thematic statement (11:7–12:7; 12:8). Together with the superscription (1:1), and an elaboration of the thematic statement (1:3), the epilogues (12:9–14) enclose the book in a kind of envelope. The rest of the book includes a few easily recognizable units, for example, the royal experiment in 1:12–2:26 or the praise of companionship in 4:9–12. Nevertheless, the precise structure of the book defies description.

Several interpreters have sought the clue to the book's structure in refrains that seem to introduce or conclude various segments. However, the sevenfold exhortation to eat, drink, and enjoy life (2:24–26; 3:12–13; 3:22; 5:17–19; 8:15; 9:7–10; 11:7–10) illustrates the difficulty of this approach; the first text concludes a unit and the last one introduces a new unit.

Others have sought to discern the structure of the book in polar opposites and Greek rhetoric, according to which there is a complete balancing of the material in the two halves of the book. But none of these theories is adequate, for some collections of sentences have not been fully integrated into the book. In the book's unity of tone, theme, and topic, one receives the impression that a single teacher has observed life's ambiguities and reflected on their meaning, using favorite words: do, work, good, wise, time, know, toil, see, under the sun, fool, profit, portion.

Historical Setting

The effort to establish the historical setting of the book has also been unsuccessful. The hypothesis that the original language was Aramaic has virtually disappeared because of the discovery at Qumran of Hebrew fragments of the book. Nevertheless, the language is an Aramaizing Hebrew, closest to other late canonical texts. Two Persian loan words occur (pardes, "park"; medinah, "province"). Phoenician and Egyptian origins have been posited, but the evidence, although inconclusive, favors Palestine (references to reservoirs, leaky roofs, wells, farmers' attention to the wind, and the Temple). The so-called historical allusions do not enable a precise dating (4:13–16; 8:2–4; 9:13–15; 10:16–17). The meager political data point to a period before the Maccabean revolt in 167 B.C., and the attitude toward foreign rulers fits best in the Ptolemaic period (→ Ptolemy). The Zenon business archives from about 250 B.C. reflect a political situation of economic prosperity in the upper echelons of Jewish society. Qohelet may have belonged to the privileged class shortly after this time.

Literary Expression

The fundamental genre of the book is reflection arising from personal observation. Qohelet's language calls attention to both aspects, the observing and the subsequent reflection ("I said in my heart, I saw, I know, there is"). The issue of literary genre is not entirely clear, however, and other critics propose that the book be understood as royal testament, diatribe, or mashal (Heb., a "comparison"). Nonetheless, the Egyptian royal testament is limited to 1:12–2:26, and monologue may be more apt than diatribe, for Qohelet emphasizes the debate in his own mind. The term mashal is too broad to be useful.

Of course, the book includes many other literary types such as autobiographical narrative, example story, anecdote, parable (often called an allegorical poem), antithesis, and proverb. The proverb itself occurs in many forms: truth statements, better sayings, numerical sayings, instructions, traditional sayings, maledictions, and benedictions. Qohelet was fond of better sayings (4:3, 6, 9, 13; 5:5; 6:3, 9; 7:1, 2, 3, 5, 8; 9:4, 16, 18) and the emphatic "nothing is better than" (2:24; 3:12, 22).

What was the essence of Qohelet's reflection about life? His primary word denies earlier optimistic claims about wisdom's power to secure one's existence. Moreover, he observes no discernible principle of order governing the universe, rewarding virtue and punishing evil. The creator is distant and uninvolved, except perhaps in cases of flagrant affront like reneging on religious vows. Death cancels all imagined gains, rendering life on earth absurd. Therefore the best advice is to enjoy one's wife, together with good food and drink, during youth, for old age and death will soon put an end to this relative good. In short, Qohelet examined all of life and discovered no absolute good that would survive death. Profit is thus the measure of life for him. He then proceeded to report this discovery—that there was no profit—and to counsel young men in the light of this stark reality. In sum, Qohelet bears witness to an intellectual crisis in ancient Israel, at least in the circles he taught in.

The Larger Environment

An intellectual crisis struck other cultures as well, though not all at the same time. One expects, therefore, to find some common themes throughout the ancient Near East. This universality of ideas has led to claims of Hellenistic influence on Qohelet, specifically the concepts of chance, vanity, profit, portion, and the phrase "under the sun." Similar arguments about Egyptian influence have been advanced, especially the royal testament, the phrase "eternal home," the idiom of casting bread upon waters, and the idea of carpe diem (Lat., "enjoy the day"). Papyrus Insinger, and the "Instruction of 'Onkysheshonky,'" roughly contemporary with Qohelet, are especially significant in this regard. Moreover, scholars have pointed to parallels between Mesopotamian literature and Qohelet. Siduri's advice to Gilgamesh is strikingly similar to Qohelet's advice to young men. The Gilgamesh Epic also probes the themes of death and the ephemerality of life. Other texts such as "I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom" stress the hiddenness of God; "The Babylonian Theodicy" espouses pessimism at its very core, blaming the gods for evil, a view from which Qohelet shrinks (7:29); and "The Dialogue Between a Master and His Slave" mentions a threat posed by women and sets up polarities in a way that commends neither alternative. Such parallels do not necessarily require the notion of literary dependence, and Qohelet forges his distinctive worldview out of personal experience. His eyes and ears were open to insights regardless of their origin, and those themes that are not the result of polygenesis were probably "in the air."

Canonization and Text

Qohelet's radical views have branded his teachings an alien body within the Hebrew Bible. How, then, was the book accepted into the canon? The usual answer is that the attribution to Solomon paved the way for its approval as Scripture, although that alone did not work in the case of Wisdom of Solomon and the Odes of Solomon. A better answer is that the book's epilogue removed the sting from Qohelet's skepticism and advocated traditional views concerning observance of Torah.

The Hebrew text of Ecclesiastes is in good condition. Fragments dating from the middle of the second century B.C. include part of 5:13–17, substantial portions of 6:3–8, and five words from 7:7–9.

1:1, The Superscription. Verse 1 resembles the introduction not only to the sayings of Agur (Prov. 30:1a) and Lemuel's mother (Prov. 31:1a), but also to some prophetic collections (Amos 1:1a; Jer. 1:1a). The allusion to Solomonic authorship is more specific than that in Eccles. 1:12, which could refer to any Davidic ruler in Jerusalem.

1:2-3, A Thematic Statement and Its Elaboration. The repetition of the word for brevity and futility provides an idiom for the ultimate absurdity. Qohelet assesses everything as ephemeral and devoid of substance. Hence, human toil under the sun yields no lasting profit. This brief unit sets the tone of the entire book.

1:4-11, An Absence of Novelty. An eternal sameness characterizes movements in nature and society. The impressive poem in 1:4-11 describes the endless rounds of an exhausted sun, the circling of the wind, and the never-ending flow of streams to a sea that is not filled by all the water that enters it. The poet moves on to describe the tedious monotony in society: the wearisome words that no one can ever fully declare, the acquisitive eye, the eager ear, and the frustrated search for something new. The illusion of novelty derives from human forgetfulness, which he declares to be universal and permanent. The poet allows the ambiguous word "generations" to describe heavenly bodies and human beings, uses the euphemism "goes" for death, achieves emphasis by withholding the subject "wind" until the latest possible moment, gives the impression of monotony by repeating several words, and signifies comprehensiveness by alluding to the four points of the compass.

1:12-2:26, A Royal Experiment. In 1:12-2:26 Qohelet states his findings and reinforces them with two proverbs (1:12-18), describes the examination of pleasure (2:1-11) and of wisdom and folly (2:12-23), and draws a conclusion that the best thing to do is to enjoy life (2:24-26). Qohelet introduces himself in 1:12 and reports on his resolve to search for and spy on everything that happens, which he takes to be God's gift, an unpleasant, sorry business. Everything is futile, herding of the wind (chasing it? feeding it?). The proverb (1:15) about the impossibility of straightening the crooked (back?) or counting what is lacking points to human impotence in the face of divine determinism. Solomon's reputation for exceptional wisdom prompts Qohelet's boast to have surpassed all others in this regard, but this notable achievement brought only more sorrow. In short, the noble aim of the sages is here dismissed as chasing the wind.

When Qohelet describes his experiment, he turns to the exploration of what pleasure has to offer. This too is futile, he asserts. His acquisitions are typical of ancient kings: houses, vineyards, gardens, reservoirs, servants, riches, and concubines. His indulgence knew no limit, for he had the means to satisfy every desire, and, as king, he could do so without fear of being challenged. But the flirtation with sensual gratification issued in a feeling of utter futility

(2:11, which combines the three negative assessments thus far: futility, chasing the wind, and devoid of profit).

Qohelet turns to assess the life of the intellect, examining wisdom and its opposite. He grants the essential correctness of the proverbial saying that the wise person can see but fools walk in darkness. Therefore, wisdom is relatively superior to folly. However, in the long run, there is no advantage to the wise, who suffer the same fate that fools experience. Because both wise and fool die and remembrance is quickly erased, Qohelet draws a shocking conclusion: "So I hated life," 2:17. Inheritance exacerbates the feeling of repugnance, for some people toil endlessly and achieve wealth only to leave it to someone who may lack intelligence.

This test of sensual pleasure and wisdom convinces Qohelet that everything is absurd and empty. Therefore, he observes that the best course is to enjoy life, if God makes such possible. The words "good in God's presence" and "sinner" are entirely amoral; they refer to people who are fortunate and unfortunate respectively. Even one's capacity to enjoy life lies in divine hands, and the individual can do nothing about this reality.

3:1-15, Reflections on Time. The remarkable poem in vv. 1-9 takes the form of fourteen opposites, each introduced by the word "time." Qohelet then draws some conclusions about the relationship between deity and time (vv. 10-15). The poem on time begins with personal events, birth and death, and concludes with public events, war and peace. The chiasmic form permits the poem to end on a favorable note (vv. 1, 8: birth, death, war, peace; v. 8: love, hate, war, peace). (In a chiasm the elements occur in an inverted order, e.g., good bad, bad good.) In many cases the first and third verb are closely related, as are the second and fourth (for example, weeping and laughing, mourning and being happy). If this tendency is consistent, the reference to throwing and gathering stones may be erotic, as rabbinic interpreters insisted, for the parallel verbs connote passion and its absence. The images in v. 5 may, however, derive from commerce, agriculture, or mythology. Although everything has its proper time, human beings (even astrologers?) cannot discover that moment. Qohelet declares that God created everything beautiful in its time and planted mystery (hiddenness? a sense of eternity?) in the human mind; however, that dubious gift opened doors for no one. This situation, which is judged to be permanent, results from God's desire to instill fear in humans. Meanwhile, the Deity is busily engaged in chasing after the past.

3:16-4:3, The Tears of the Oppressed. Because God fails to keep times of judgment, the oppressed shed bitter tears. Moreover, despite Qohelet's conviction that God has set a time for judgment, the facts speak for themselves: virtuous people are crushed by vicious and powerful persons. The cherished belief in reward and retribution does not accord with experience. Qohelet attributes a strange motive to God for delaying proper reward and punishment: God is testing human beings to demonstrate that they have no advantage over animals. Both people and beasts share a common fate, and no one knows whether human breath ascends or animal breath descends at death. After all, every creature came from dust and will return to it (cf. the divine curse in Gen. 3:19 and Job 10:9, 34:15). The sorry human lot, which evokes a pathetic refrain in Qohelet ("and there was no comforter for them," 4:1), goads him into praising those who have never been born over those for whom light has exposed human misery.

4:4-6, Proverbial Wisdom. Insights from the past are valuable, but how does one know which road to follow when there is a choice? Qohelet attributes human toil to envy, and he sees advantages both in work and in its opposite. To be sure, fools sit idly and live off their fat (or the aphorism may mean that God rewards laziness with plenty of meat to eat), but a morsel is better than working for more food without success.

4:7-12, The Advantages of Companionship. A traditional saying, which is also attested in Mesopotamia: "A threefold cord is not quickly broken," acknowledges the need for companions. Qohelet comes close to questioning the sage's egocentricity in this section, but he never really gives it up. It is good to have a friend to lift one out of a pit into which one has fallen, to provide warmth on a cold night, and to fight against a robber. In each instance, the argument rests on the advantages that accrue to one who has a companion. The ego is still paramount here as in the royal experiment, where the phrase "for myself" occurs often. Qohelet thinks it strange that a person who has no relative or friend works without pausing to ask why he is depriving himself of the good life.

4:13-16, The Fickle Crowd. There is no lasting allegiance, for the people quickly forget a ruler whose achievements were truly amazing. Qohelet observes that a poor but intelligent ruler is superior to an old foolish king who does not fully appreciate the insights of people in the royal court. This is true, Qohelet insists, even if the young person emerged from prison—or even from birth in poverty—to the throne. But this anecdote, which echoes the story about Joseph, becomes somewhat confusing with the introduction of a second youth. Either this is an example of imprecise syntax or it illustrates the fickleness of subjects who always welcome a new ruler as one who will deliver them from an unpleasant situation.

5:1-9, On Religious Obligations. Because of the great distance separating human beings from God, they should speak sparingly, in Qohelet's view. Furthermore, their words must be truthful, for it does not pay to call attention to one's lack of integrity. Here Qohelet's language echoes Deut. 23:21, fulfilling a vow when one has made it, but he stresses the advisability of avoiding oaths in the first place. The word for a "mistake" is a technical term for unwitting offenses listed in Hebrew Bible laws. The messenger is an angel (of death, as in Egyptian literature?) or a priestly emissary. Qohelet thinks that verbosity opens the door to affront, just as dreams generate anxiety and emptiness. The primary obligation is to fear God, and that includes an acknowledgment that the Deity has no special fondness for fools. Qohelet even advises against the prophetic voice of protest over oppression, noting that a hierarchy of responsibility rises to the supreme earthly ruler, or perhaps one step higher to God.

5:10-6:9, Disappointments in Owning Wealth. Various factors over which one has no control lead to disenchantment with wealth: bad investments, sickness, increasing overhead costs, worry, and the inability to "take wealth with one." Qohelet exposes human jealousy, the grasping to have more than a neighbor possesses and the desire to satisfy an insatiable lust for possessions, to public scrutiny. The person who loves money will merely see it slip through the fingers like quicksilver. Whereas a laborer sleeps soundly from exhaustion, a rich person lies awake from overeating and from anxiety. Qohelet thinks of a particular example, a person who acquired a fortune and lost it, although he had a son who would have inherited the largess. Reference to emerging from and returning to the womb naked echoes a similar remark in Job 1:21. Perhaps Qohelet here implies a miserly existence, one in which a person is too stingy to light a lamp during the evening meal. It grieves Qohelet that some people have wealth but lack the capacity to enjoy it, since God's gift should enable such enjoyment. The meaning of God's keeping someone occupied with (or afflicting?) the joys of the heart is unclear (5:20). Is the sentiment comforting or distressing? In any event, Qohelet does not consider longevity the answer, for a long life is hollow unless it is marked by pleasure and a proper burial. That is why an abortive birth is better; the dead infant never experienced the full range of human suffering.

6:10–12, A Transitional Unit. Qohelet returns to the idea that there is nothing new, ironically alluding to the name of the first earth creature (Heb. 'adam), who cannot compete with God (perhaps an allusion also to Job). Reference to the multiplication of words reinforces the suspicion that Job is the target of this comment. The fundamental orientation of ancient wisdom—the ascertainment of what is good for human beings—is here dismissed as beyond discovery.

7:1–14, A Collection of Proverbs. This unit calls attention to the relative worth of many things. The key word is “better,” sometimes used in the sense of good. The author uses alliteration, especially in the play on similarities between the Hebrew words for oil and name, as well as brambles, pot, and laughter. Qohelet insists that God’s works are inalterable, whether good or evil, and advises persons to visit the house of mourning rather than a place of festivity, for the end is preferable to the beginning.

7:15–22, On Moderation. Qohelet warns against extreme virtue or vice because qualities call special attention to oneself. It has been argued that Qohelet warns against self-righteousness rather than excessive goodness.

7:23–29, Seeking and Finding. The mysteries of wisdom and woman occupy Qohelet’s attention, prompting him to acknowledge that wisdom is too deep, hence impenetrable, and that the seductress is more bitter than death. In his view, the fortunate individual escapes her trap.

8:1–9, Rulers and Subjects. Qohelet warns against tarrying when a king becomes angry, for no one can call him to account. But the king is unable to master “the day of death.”

8:10–17, The Mystery of Divine Activity. The delay in punishing the wicked encourages villainy. An editorial gloss reaffirms divine justice in the face of such brutal facts (8:11–13). However, Qohelet reiterates the injustice of society, the reversal of reward and punishment, and repeats his advice to enjoy oneself.

9:1–10, The Shadow of Death. Death’s lengthening shadow extends throughout the book; it is particularly dark in this unit. Qohelet thinks that God’s disposition toward humans is unfathomable, resulting in a common fate for everyone regardless of their religious activities. Qohelet uses irony in conceding that the living have an advantage, since the traditional saying about a living dog and a dead lion is negated by what follows.

9:11–12, Time and Chance. According to Qohelet, chance governs human lives. As a result, it does no good to strive for excellence in the belief that such effort will produce pleasant results. There is no way to plan for the unexpected or to compensate for randomness.

9:13–18, On Wasted Wisdom. Qohelet offers an example, perhaps hypothetical, of skill that did not bring the expected success. A poor but wise man could have saved a village when a great king attacked, but everybody forgot him (or he did save it and everyone promptly forgot him). Qohelet praises wisdom more than weapons, but admits that the former can easily be overlooked and thwarted.

10:1–20, A Collection of Proverbs on Wisdom and Folly. This section is not fully integrated into the book. Connections with other material are not obvious, but word associations with other sections do occur. The fool proclaims his own stupidity, or thinks all others are stupid. Qohelet complains about reversals in society (fools riding horses), warns about dangers lurking in domestic chores, expresses dismay over rulers who drink too much, mentions the function of bribes, and alludes to a proverbial saying about a bird carrying slander to its object.

11:1–6, The Element of Risk. Some risk always resides in commercial enterprises and agriculture, but intelligent persons venture nonetheless. The image of casting bread on waters is also found in the Egyptian “Instruction of Onksheshonky.” The mystery of pregnancy does not preclude union between lovers, and ignorance of the wind ought not prevent the sowing of seed.

11:7–12:7, Youth, Old Age, and Death. An exquisite poem depicts a collapsing house and wasting human body and achieves thematic unity by the use of verbs (“remember,” “rejoice”) and nouns (“darkness,” “light”). In addition, a repeated formula (“before . . .”) occurs three times. The images for death are complex: the breaking of a cord that held a lamp and the shattering of a pitcher as a result of a faulty pulley at the well. The ensuing puff of dust and release of God’s breath signal the end, thus evoking Qohelet’s solemn refrain about emptiness and futility. In this poem the reference to a creator seems out of place; the word may allude to one’s wife (well) and/or grave (pit).

12:8, A Thematic Statement. Verse 12:8 forms an envelope structure with 1:8, and in so doing emphasizes Qohelet’s view that life is futile.

12:9-14, Two Epilogues. Two editors praise Qohelet for his integrity, reliability, and elegance, although conceding that his sayings provide painful education, and warning against any additional works such as this. One epilogist states what he thinks Qohelet should have but did not say: fear God, keep his commandments, for God will judge every secret deed.

INTRODUCTION

One of the most celebrated collections of ancient love poetry, the Song of Songs—also known in English as the Song of Solomon—is the only book of love poems in the Bible, and as such it has been the subject of much speculation and controversy. For centuries, both Jewish and Christian traditions justified the place of the Song of Songs in the canon by viewing it as a spiritual allegory that recounts the love of God and the people of Israel (the Jewish interpretation), or of Christ and the church or the individual soul (the Christian reading). But these modes of interpretation, imaginative and moving as they may be, do not explicate the primary level of the text, which is explicitly about human love and nowhere mentions God.

Another centuries-old interpretation presents the Song of Songs as a drama with fixed characters, such as King Solomon and his country bride, or two country lovers (shepherd and shepherdess) and the king. But it is difficult to find evidence of dramatic structure in the Song: acts, scenarios, and dramatis personae are not indicated, and there is hardly a trace of coherent plot. Rather, the Song has a variety of contexts that shift frequently in no apparent dramatic sequence and within which many different voices seem to speak. There is no reason to assume only a few fixed speakers in the Song and even less justification for viewing King Solomon as a central character. Although Solomon's name is mentioned in the Hebrew title, this title was bestowed not by the Song's original author or authors but by later compilers, who may also have been responsible for giving the Song its semblance of structural unity.

About the Song's authorship and origins very little is known. Tradition ascribes the work to King Solomon, but this view is discounted by modern scholars, who generally agree that the Song's authorship cannot be specified. Nor is its date of composition determined: scholarly speculation ranges from 950 to 200 B.C. In the past two centuries, scholars have hypothesized about the original context and function of the Song, proposing, for example, that it was a cycle of wedding songs or the liturgy of an ancient fertility cult. These theories, however, are not only unprovable but unconvincing, because they attempt to force the varied material of the text into confining molds. It is finally simpler and more illuminating to view the Song as a collection of different types of love poems that did not necessarily all derive from the same author or serve the same function in their original society. The stylistic similarities and repetitions among the poems may best be explained as literary conventions of ancient Hebrew verse, particularly if one accepts the view that the Song was, in its earliest stages, popular oral literature.

Well beyond the time of its original composition, the Song continued to be orally transmitted. Through the present day, Ashkenazic Jews ritually chant it on the Sabbath of the Passover holiday, and in many Sephardic Jewish communities it is chanted on the eve of every Sabbath. With good justification it is called the Song of Songs, meaning the most supreme song: its many musical phrases have inspired hundreds of melodies, of many genres and styles, in both the religious and nonreligious Jewish communities. It has also been a popular source of imagery for Hebrew poets over the ages.

COMMENTARY

Though theories concerning the origin of this text can never be proved, it seems likely that the Song was orally composed and transmitted over an extended period of time before being transcribed, compiled, and finally canonized. Many scholars conclude that the Song was, in its earliest form, several distinct shorter poems, although there is disagreement about the number of poems comprising the whole. One postulation is to divide the Song into thirty-one poems, corresponding to the biblical chapters and verses, after 1:1 (title), as follows: 1:2–4; 1:5–6; 1:7–8; 1:9–11; 1:12–14; 1:15–17; 2:1–3; 2:4–7; 2:8–13; 2:14; 2:15; 2:16–17; 3:1–5; 3:6–11; 4:1–7; 4:8; 4:9–11; 4:12–5:1; 5:2–6:3; 6:4–10; 6:11 (6:12 is an indecipherable fragment); 6:13–7:5; 7:6–9; 7:10–13; 8:1–4; 8:5a; 8:5b; 8:6–7; 8:8–10; 8:11–12; and 8:13–14.

Because it is my view that the Song is an anthology of lyric poems rather than a structural unity implying sequence, this commentary is organized in a different way from others in the volume. Rather than proceeding sequentially by chapter and verse, it offers an overview of the different types of poems in the Song and of the poetic material that recurs among the poems, including specific kinds of metaphoric passages and the most frequently appearing contexts, themes, and motifs.

Types of Lyric Poems in the Song. The thirty-one poems that comprise the Song may be categorized into several types, all of which may properly be considered "lyrics" in several senses of the term; that is, they are all brief, sensual, musical poems in which intensely subjective experience is recorded.

Over half the poems in the Song may be categorized as "love monologues"—poems in which a single speaker, female or male, speaks to or about a beloved with words of praise, invitations to lovemaking, or descriptions of fantasies. Examples of this type of poem are 1:2–4; 1:9–11; 1:12–14; 2:4–7; 2:14; 2:16–17; 3:1–5; 4:1–7; 4:8; 4:9–11; 6:4–10; 7:6–9; 7:10–13; 8:1–4; 8:5b; and 8:6–7. Another six of the thirty-one poems might be termed "love dialogues," or conversations—again, entailing praises and invitations, and sometimes employing coyness or games of hide-and-seek—between two lovers; these are 1:7–8; 1:15–17; 2:1–3; 2:8–13; 4:12–5:1; and 8:13–14.

Other types of poems in the Song are less obviously "love poems" and sometimes less apparently lyrics; they may not be to or even directly about a beloved, and some of them are spoken by plural voices or unidentifiable speakers. There are five monologue poems that fall into these types—1:5–6; 2:15; 3:6–11; 8:5a; and 8:11–12—and two dialogues—6:13–7:5 and 8:8–10. In addition, there is one poem that is somewhat longer than the others and that takes a composite form—5:2–6:3. Set in a variety of contexts and spoken by several speakers, this poem seems least to resemble the lyric archetype. However, it is framed in its entirety as the monologue of a woman who declares herself to be in a state of dreaming ("I sleep and my heart is awake"). Everything that happens in the poem may thus be viewed as taking place in her dream or in the recounting of it. In this sense the poem is really the speech of a single speaker, about—if not directly to—her beloved, and it may be regarded as a complex lyric form. It should also be noted that all the poems in the Song, even those having unidentifiable speakers or enigmatic subject matter, have some erotic reference, albeit at times indirect. In several poems, erotic experience is suggested by means of symbols (such as the vineyard, representing female sexuality), which establish their meaning by their recurrent appearances in the Song. Thus, when viewed as part of the larger collection, the individual poems of the Song all finally emerge as types of love lyrics.

The Wasf. The wasf, a specific kind of passage describing the human body, appears several times in the Song within different types of lyrics. Although not found anywhere in the Bible outside the Song, the wasf is common in Arabic literature and takes its name from an Arabic word meaning "description." Wasfs, or fragments of wasfs, appear in the following places in the Song: 4:1–7; 5:9–16; 6:4–7; and 6:13–7:5. Fairly rigid in form, the wasf is essentially a catalogue that proceeds in sequence—from top to bottom or bottom to top—to depict parts of the male or female physique in metaphors drawn from the realms of nature and artifice. While these metaphors are often based on visual perceptions, they sometimes appeal to other senses, as in the tactile "breasts like fawns" (4:5; 7:3) or the fragrant and sweet-tasting "lips like lilies" (5:13b).

Often surprising on first encounter, the metaphors of the wasfs have been both the bane and delight of scholars and readers, who have been variously baffled, bemused, and entertained by them. The repeated comparisons of a woman's hair to a flock of goats (4:1b; 6:5b), for example, or of her forehead to a slice of pomegranate (4:3b; 6:7) have caused some biblical scholars alarm. In truth, however, these images need be no more puzzling than those of European and English Renaissance verse, which sometimes derive from them. The trick to appreciating them is proper visualizing—seeing them in their full context—and then taking the metaphoric leap. Often the text itself provides the clues to its own mysteries, if we only read it carefully; sometimes we may need to fill in a bit of geographical or cultural background to appreciate an image fully.

For example, in 4:1b and 6:5b, the woman's hair is compared to a flock of goats that winds down Mount Gilead. The text directs us to view the image from afar, picturing a flock of goats wending its way on the mountainside. If we are familiar with Israel's landscape, we will visualize black goats against a paler background. Thus, viewed from a distance, the graceful pattern of the goats of Gilead may suggest dark waves of hair falling down a woman's back.

So too we are told in 4:3b and 6:7 that the woman's forehead seen through her veil is like a slice of pomegranate. When a pomegranate is sliced open, one sees a gleam of red seeds through a white membrane—may this not call to mind the appearance of rosy skin when glimpsed through the mesh of a white veil?

If some of these images seem a bit far-fetched, we should at least appreciate their inventiveness. And although to us they may seem unusual, we should keep in mind that, in their own time, they may have been quite conventional—the standard literary stock of the oral poet.

Just as wasfs occur more than once in the Song, so other kinds of material also recur from poem to poem. Three layers of such material that we may isolate and analyze are those of context, theme, and motif.

Contexts. Physical context, or a sense of place, is not equally crucial to all the poems in the Song. While the mood or argument of some poems depends greatly on physical setting, other poems seem not to “take place” anywhere in particular but to focus more on interior (emotional) space. Nonetheless, each poem has an ambiance created or suggested by either an explicit or an implied setting. Context shifts frequently in the Song, from poem to poem and sometimes within poems, and this kaleidoscopic movement creates an exciting richness of texture. Four identifiable contexts, either separately or in combination, provide backdrops for the various different poems. These are: the cultivated or habitable countryside; the wild or remote natural landscape and its elements; interior environments such as homes, halls, and bedrooms; and city streets.

All the love dialogues and many of the love monologues in the Song take place, at least in part, in the habitable countryside. Pastures, groves, hills, ravines, gardens, and blossoming spring landscapes—so numerous it seems pointless to cite examples—all provide tempting and conducive sites for lovemaking and for invitations to love. Either of the lovers may take the initiative in these lush, idyllic settings, which, for the most part, set the stage for young, romantic love: the pleasure of anticipation finds more expression here than the satisfaction of consummation. Although the lovers are often separated in the countryside (he tending flocks while she looks for him; she hidden in the rocks like a dove while he seeks to see her and hear her voice), reunions are invited and expected. Thus the poems set in these habitats are often playful in tone and suffused with feelings of happy arousal.

While the natural world is essentially benign, in several poems nature appears as an awesome presence. The miragelike wilderness (3:6; 8:5), the mountain lairs of wild animals (4:8), powerful seas, torrents, and rivers (8:7), and the staring eye of the sun (1:6, 6:10) can provoke anxiety, suggest mystery, or set a bold dramatic backdrop. In poems having these contexts, the intimacy of the lovers may be threatened and the mood may be reverent, even awestruck.

Interior environments such as the winehall, the bedroom, the king's chambers, and the mother's home, on the other hand, are all very supportive of intimacy, even more so than the habitable countryside. It is in these places that fantasy is given its freest reign; the female speaker wishes she could bring her lover here (3:4; 8:2); in the seclusion provided by four walls, she imagines and anticipates his embrace (2:4–6; 8:2–3). The interior environment is by far the most private place in the Song, and thus it is most protective of the microcosmic world-of-two.

In sharp contrast stands the public urban realm, where the lovers are most vulnerable to attack. The watchmen who roam the city streets are of no use to the woman in her frantic search for her lover (3:1–4); on another of these searches they find and beat her (5:7). The daughters of Jerusalem—city women—are less aggressive than the watchmen, but they are hardly sympathetic. In 1:5–6, they are seen by the country woman to scorn her dark beauty; in 5:8–9, they seem unconcerned to help the distressed speaker in search of her lover until they have been tempted—and thus engaged, more out of self-interest than altruism—by a description of his beauty and charm. In 8:1, the speaker exclaims that if only her lover were her brother, she would not be afraid to kiss him “outside,” implying that because he is not her relative, she does not dare kiss him in the streets, lest she become the object of scorn.

Themes and Motifs. Implied in our analysis of contexts in the Song are some of the themes that intertwine in the poems. For example, because the private world-of-two is often pitted against the public domain, we may expect to find secret romances; and, indeed, banishment of the beloved during the daytime—when, presumably, the lovers cannot be safely alone—is a recurring theme (2:17; 4:6; 8:14). Related to it are other themes having to do with separation, such as search for the lost beloved (1:7–8; 3:1–5; 5:2–6:3) and beckoning the beloved closer (2:10–13; 2:14; 4:8; 7:11–12; 8:13). In addition, several poems address what seem to be negative relationships between individuals and others in the outside world, another expression of tension between microcosm and macrocosm (the country woman and the daughters of Jerusalem in 1:5–6; the little sister and her siblings in 8:8–10; the male speaker and King Solomon in 8:11–12). Finally, underlying many of the poems and explicit in a few (see esp. 8:6–7 and the opening verse of 7:6–9) is the theme of the power and beauty of love itself.

Interwoven among these dominant themes are lighter strands of meaning that may be regarded as motifs. For example, as mentioned above, the use of vineyards as a symbol for female sexuality is a motif that appears in several different poems in the Song. Other motifs are: the garden as both place and metaphor; regality and wealth as metaphors, figures, and foils; flora and fauna, and artifice, as complementary sources of imagery; and eating and drinking as erotic metaphors. Reading the Song with these motifs in mind, one notices oft-recurring links among the individual poems. After several readings—as contexts, themes, and motifs reveal themselves more clearly—the individual poems accrue resonance, and the collection as a whole gains in richness and depth.

Mutuality and Interrelationship. Finally viewed in its totality, as a richly variegated collection of distinct but interrelated poems, the Song of Songs emerges as a stirring sensual text, appealing at various moments to each of the senses and not infrequently to several at once. Beyond this, the Song is especially striking for its expression of mutuality in relationships between women and men, and between human beings and the natural world. Indeed, in this regard the Song is special not only as a book of the Bible but as a classic of Western civilization. In the Song of Songs, women speak as assertively as men, initiating action at least as often; men are free to be as gentle, as vulnerable, even as coy as women. Men and women similarly praise each other for their sensuality and beauty, and identical phrases are sometimes used to describe lovers of both genders. Domination and subordination between the sexes, or, for that matter, sexual stereotyping of any kind, have no place in the Song. Remarkably, the Song seems to describe a nonsexist world, and thus it can act for us as an antidote to some of the themes of biblical patriarchy.

Consonant with this mutuality between the sexes, in the world of the Song no domination exists between human beings and the rest of nature; rather, interrelationship prevails. The presentation of natural phenomena as both contexts and metaphors in the Song reveals a nonalienated and nonnaive stance. Nature is neither idealized as good nor subjugated because wild; it is, simply, a part of the world in which we live—and in which, the Song emphasizes, we love. Thus although it is primarily a book about romantic love, the Song of Songs says a great deal, by implication, about a wide range of human relationships and about how to live in the world.

THE LATTER PROPHETS

Together with the historical books (Joshua through Kings, known in the Hebrew Bible as the "Former Prophets"), the fifteen prophetic books form the central section of the Hebrew Bible. In the Septuagint (the Greek version of the Hebrew Scriptures, designated with the Roman numeral LXX) the order is different, with the prophetic books coming at the end. The indications are that this collection of prophetic material was in place, more or less as we have it today, by the beginning of the second century B.C. Writing about 180 B.C., Jesus ben Sirach lists Isaiah (Sir. 48:22–25), Jeremiah (49:6–7), Ezekiel (49:8–9) and the twelve Minor Prophets (49:10) in that order. Later in the same century we begin to hear allusions to "the law and the prophets" (Prol. to Sir.; 2 Macc. 15:9), a phrase familiar from the NT. The complete scroll of Isaiah from Qumran (1QIsa<sup>a</sup>), dated on epigraphical grounds (that is, on a study of the script) to the second century B.C., suggests further that by then the text of prophetic books was well on the way to being firmly established. From the Qumran community we also have the earliest commentaries on prophetic books (Isaiah, Hosea, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk) known in Hebrew as pesharim; these too point in the same direction, since the capacity to generate commentary is one of the clearer indications of canonical status.

The inclusion of the histories within the category of prophecy, explained in Jewish tradition by prophetic authorship (Josephus Against Apion 1:37–41; b. B. Bat. 14b–15a), points to a broad expansion of the semantic range covered by the term "prophecy" in the later period. We can detect this tendency as early as Chronicles (probably about the middle of the fourth century B.C.), the author of which lists several prophets and seers among his sources and also speaks of the composition and rendition of liturgical music as a form of prophecy (1 Chron. 25). The writers of apocalypses also thought of themselves, and were thought of by others, as fulfilling a prophetic role (2 Esd. 15:1; Rev. 1:3).

All of this, however, leaves open the question what meanings should be assigned to the term when used of those to whom canonical books are attributed. It would be well to bear in mind that those whom we think of as the prophets formed only a small and in some respects anomalous minority among Israelite prophets at any given time. It may also be disconcerting to discover that when they themselves speak of contemporary prophecy, they more often than not condemn it as inauthentic (e.g., Jer. 23; Ezek. 13). It therefore remains to be determined in what relation they stand to the phenomenon of prophecy in general and in what sense the term may be appropriately used of them (→ Prophet).

WHAT IS A PROPHETIC BOOK?

To speak of these fifteen units of varying size—from Obadiah with 21 verses to Jeremiah with 1,364—as “books” may be somewhat misleading for modern readers. A book is generally understood to be a self-contained production of one author, less commonly several, published on a specific date and protected by copyright law from the intrusion, well meaning or otherwise, of later hands. In all of these respects prophetic books are quite different. Critical study has established that the sayings of the original “author” have in many cases been edited and amplified over a period of several centuries. Isaiah, for example, was active during the second half of the eighth century B.C., but it is acknowledged that the second and third parts of the book (Isa. 40–55 and 56–66) cannot be earlier than the sixth century B.C., and even in the first part (Isa. 1–39) there are sayings and entire sections (e.g., much of Isa. 13–27) that are post-Isaian. In some instances we can see this process of adaptation and expansion at work. Isa. 15:1–16:11 contains a long oracle in verse directed against Moab. (There is another version in Jer. 48 that complicates the issue of authorship.) It is followed by what is clearly the comment of a later seer: “This is the word which Yahweh spoke concerning Moab in the past; but now Yahweh says . . .”—and a new oracle follows (Isa. 16:13–14). We conclude, then, that in most cases prophetic books reached their present form as the result of a cumulative process of editing, adapting, and expanding. This redactional history continued until the individual books and the collection as a whole achieved such an authoritative status that no further adaptation or commentary was deemed permissible.

THE FORMATION OF PROPHETIC BOOKS

Attempts to reconstruct the formation of prophetic books have to be based almost entirely on internal evidence. That the prophets delivered their messages orally is amply attested. Since they functioned for the most part in the public and political domain, it is not surprising that their sayings were often widely disseminated. Amaziah, priest-in-charge at Bethel, could quote verbatim a particularly ominous oracle of Amos (Amos 7:11). At his trial for sedition in 609 B.C. Jeremiah was saved from death by the timely quoting of a saying of

In the OT the prophetic books appear at the end and include among them Lamentations and Daniel.

Micah from more than a century earlier (Jer. 26:17–19; Mic. 3:12). In many cases individual sayings and collections of sayings would have been written down shortly after they were delivered, a practice for which we have Assyrian parallels from the seventh century B.C. In 605 B.C. Jeremiah dictated from memory sayings delivered by him over a period of more than two decades. When this collection was read to King Jehoiakim by Jehudi his secretary, he tore it up and threw it on the fire, after which Jeremiah produced a second and amplified edition now part of the biblical book (Jer. 36). In some cases writing may have been an emergency measure, undertaken when the prophet was unable to deliver the message orally. Amos may have had recourse to writing after being expelled from the kingdom of Samaria (Amos 7:12) and we recall that Jeremiah, in the case just cited, was debarred from speaking in the Temple precincts (Jer. 36:4–6). Writing could also have had the purpose of authenticating predictive prophecy (e.g., Isa. 30:8; Jer. 30:1–3). The need to preserve prophecies when political or military disaster threatened must also have been a factor and may help to explain why written prophecy dates from the Assyrian crisis in the eighth century B.C.

While we have little information on prophetic disciples during the high period of Israelite prophecy, it is difficult to see how the sayings of prophets outside of the royal establishment and the temple could have been preserved and transmitted without some kind of support group. In several cases the first stage toward the formation of a prophetic book would have been the memorizing, collecting, and writing down of smaller collections of sayings. Some would have been held together by formal or stylistic features, e.g., a recurring refrain (Amos 4:6–12; Isa. 5:24–25; 9:8–10:4), or an initial formula (e.g., the woe sayings in Amos 5:18–20 and Isa. 5:8–23). Others had in common a particular theme (e.g., Jer. 23:9–40) or bore on a particular historical occurrence (e.g., Isa. 7:1–8:15). In the course of time these collections would have been put together, usually in some meaningful arrangement, and amplified with a biographical or autobiographical memoir where available. It is also possible that some sayings of unknown origin were simply attached to one, or in some cases more than one, named collection (e.g., Isa. 2:1–5 = Mic. 4:1–5).

In Israel as elsewhere prophetic activity tended to intensify during periods of political, military, or cultural crisis. The Mari oracles come from the last decades of that kingdom's existence before its conquest by Hammurabi (ca. 1765 B.C.); in Israel the most intense period of prophetic activity occurred more than a millennium later during the final decades of Judah's existence (640–586 B.C.) before its conquest by another Babylonian king. It is reasonable to conclude that the collecting and editing of the sayings of Amos and Hosea were one aspect of the Judean response to the fall of Samaria in 722 B.C. After the fall of Jerusalem one hundred and thirty-five years later a major effort was made, for the same reasons, to collect prophetic texts, adapting them to the needs of communities in the Diaspora and the homeland. While prophetic activity continued during the postexilic period, the dominant tendency was retrospective (e.g., the allusion to "former prophets" in Zech. 1:4; 7:7), moving in the direction of the interpretation of earlier prophecy as the basis for claims in the religious sphere (e.g., Dan. 9:1-2).

In its present form, therefore, the Latter Prophets is the end product of a cumulative process extending over several centuries. Those involved in this process did not share our critical perspective on prophecy and were less interested in historical authenticity than in serving the needs of the communities to which they belonged. Hence the pattern of judgment followed by salvation (often expressed in terms of final fulfillment) that is a prominent structural feature of many of the books. The finale of Amos, for example, imposes a new interpretation on the book by making it into a prophecy of salvation through judgment (Amos 9:11-15). This too is part of the total meaning for modern readers.

Since the only way to understand the prophetic authors is through the texts, we must, so to speak, make our way upstream from the book in its present form to the smaller collections and eventually to the individual sayings. These sayings can often be identified by formal characteristics and a more or less regular internal structure. This is, of course, true of all forms of oral or written communication that purport to be understood by a specific audience in a given culture. The determination of form or genre is therefore not just an exercise in literary criticism but an essential precondition for grasping intention and meaning. Since the culture of modern readers is different from that of the biblical author, this task will not always be easy. The difficulties are not, however, insuperable.

The basic prophetic unit is, undoubtedly, the proclamation of judgment or salvation, the former much more in evidence than the latter in the pre-exilic prophets. Since it is presented as a verbatim communication from the Deity who has commissioned the prophet as his spokesman, it is couched in the divine first person and is generally introduced by such formulaic expressions as "thus says Yahweh," "the word of Yahweh came to me," and the like. The judgment saying is often preceded or followed by an indictment that explains the verdict in the words of the prophet. Understandably, the form and wording of this indictment-verdict unit often reflect the sphere of law (e.g., Isa. 3:13-15), which has influenced other forms of prophetic discourse, e.g., the trial speech (Isa. 1:2-6; 41:1-4) and the case history (e.g., Ezek. 18:5-18).

Though especially prominent, the forensic sphere is only one aspect of social life on which prophetic speech draws for its characteristic forms. From the sphere of worship and the ritual of daily life are drawn hymns (Isa. 42:10-13; Jer. 33:11), laments (Jer. 14:17-18), funeral dirges (Amos 5:2; Isa. 14:12-20), the description of the righteous based on qualifications for worship (Isa. 33:14-16; cf. Pss. 15 and 24). More familiar to modern readers would be songs (Isa. 5:1-2), parables (Isa. 28:23-29), allegories (Ezek. 16), reproaches (Amos 4:6-11), and woe sayings (Mic. 2:1–2; 7:1–7; Hab. 2:6–17; these examples can be verified and supplemented by consulting the individual commentaries in this volume).

But it is not enough to identify these units: they must be understood in the context in which they occur, which is not necessarily or even generally identical with the social context to which they refer. Amos, for example, uses ironically and subversively forms of speech otherwise familiar to his audience. The book opens with oracles against foreign nations—one of the oldest and best attested of prophetic genres—but by including Israel in the list, the normal expectations aroused by the genre are subverted and the entire book is given the character of indictment (Amos 1–2). In like manner he makes use of the familiar call to worship only to condemn the worship of his contemporaries (Amos 4:4–5) and of the funeral dirge as an advance announcement of death and disaster (Amos 5:1–2).

With the passing of time we note the gradual breakdown of these relatively simple forms and the prevalence of longer discourses. Something of this is already apparent in Hosea, but it emerges most clearly in Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Second Isaiah (Isa. 40–55). This transformation at the literary level may signify a shift in the understanding of the prophetic role and in the social context in which the role was played out. Jeremiah's Temple sermon (Jer. 7:1–8:3) illustrates the prophetic function of preaching, which was not then, as it is now, the responsibility of priests. After the destruction of the Temple, the exilic communities may have evolved something akin to the synagogue in which the longer discourses of Second Isaiah and the sermons attributed to Moses in Deuteronomy were first heard. At the same time, we note that prophecy is becoming more of a literary activity. One of the clearer indications is the figurative and allegorical narratives of which Ezekiel makes generous use (e.g., Ezek. 12–24) and that earned him a reputation among his contemporaries as a skillful user of words (Ezek. 20:49; 33:30–33). There is also an increasing tendency, noted earlier, to comment on earlier prophecy. Ezekiel 7 appears to be a prophetic sermon based on the fourth vision of Amos (Amos 8:1–3), and a good part of Third Isaiah (Isa. 56–66) relates to Second Isaiah as commentary on prophetic text.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL NARRATIVE

In addition to collections of sayings, fragments of prophetic biographical and autobiographical narrative have also come down to us. The author of the so-called Deuteronomistic History (Joshua through Kings) has woven into the fabric of his story popular "legends" about seers and ecstasies, especially in recounting the history of the Northern Kingdom. The most extensive of these deal with Elijah (1 Kings 17–19; 21; 2 Kings 1–2) and his disciple Elisha (2 Kings 2–9; 13:14–21), and it is clear that they have been excerpted from a much larger cycle of hagiographical narrative.

Beginning in the eighth century B.C., and no doubt because of the mortal danger posed by the Assyrians, there is a notable shift in emphasis from the person to the message of the prophet and, correspondingly, from stories about prophets that quote their sayings to collections of oracles in which the biographical element, when present, is minor and incidental. Amos contains only one short biographical passage recounting his confrontation with the priest of the state sanctuary at Bethel (Amos 7:10–17). Here, too, we have the impression of an excerpt from a longer narrative, perhaps from an alternative version of the reign of Jeroboam II, one less sympathetic to that king than the version incorporated into the history (2 Kings 14:23–29, with perhaps a covert allusion to Amos in v. 27). A similar situation confronts us with the third-person account of Isaiah's intervention in the crisis of 734 B.C. when Syria and Israel attempted to force Judah into an anti-Assyrian alliance (Isa. 7:1–17; cf. 2 Kings 16:5). The Isaiah sayings collection has also been supplemented by a much more extensive narrative cycle taken, with modifications and additions, from the history (Isa. 36–39; cf. 2 Kings 18–20). Here we encounter a rather different figure from the Isaiah of the sayings: a miracle worker and holy man not unlike Elisha and one who plays a supportive rather than critical and disruptive role in affairs of state. In other instances narrative serves to introduce and contextualize specific sayings (e.g., Hos. 1:2–9; cf. 3:1–3 in the first person).

Beginning in the last decades of the independent existence of Judah, there seems to be a renewed interest in the personal history of the prophet. Unlike Amos and Hosea, Jeremiah was clearly the object of considerable biographical interest. Starting with the superscription to the book (Jer. 1:1–3), a greater effort is made to place sayings and discourses in a chronological and topographical framework (e.g., Jer. 3:6; 21:1; 22:11; 24:1; 34:1, 8–11). What, however, sets the book apart from its predecessors is the inclusion of longer biographical passages (Jer. 26–29; 32), especially the sustained account of his role in events immediately preceding and following the fall of Jerusalem (Jer. 37–44). Whoever authored this long biographical memoir—perhaps his faithful attendant Baruch—it is agreed that the book as a whole, including these continuous narrative sections, has been edited and expanded by a Deuteronomistic hand during the exilic period. A careful study of the editorial procedures involved in this rewriting reveals an intent to present Jeremiah as a prophet after the manner of Moses (Deut. 18:15–19) and as the last in a prophetic series beginning with Moses. This intent is already apparent in the call narrative (Jer. 1:4–10; cf. Exod. 3:1–4:17), less obviously in assigning to Jeremiah a forty-year ministry (Jer. 1:2–3, corresponding to the years 627–587 B.C.). It is to the Deuteronomistic school that we owe the portrait of Moses as prophetic figure whose mission meets with opposition but is ultimately vindicated by God. Not surprisingly, therefore, the book is rounded off with the last chapter of the Deuteronomic History that begins with Moses and ends with the Exile (Jer. 52 = 2 Kings 24:18–25:30).

The same profile of the prophet destined to a mission from the earliest years, or even from conception, who is opposed and persecuted but ultimately vindicated by God appears in the passages in Second Isaiah known rather inappropriately as the “servant songs”

(Isa. 42:1–4; 49:1–6; 50:4–11; 52:13–53:12). While not all of these passages may refer to the same individual, we hear of an intermediary who is set aside for a special mission from conception (Isa. 49:1), who experiences failure, rejection, and persecution (Isa. 49:4; 50:6–9; 52:13–53:9), and who is finally vindicated, perhaps posthumously (Isa. 53:10–12). That this anonymous figure is designated “servant of Yahweh” may also suggest a connection with Deuteronomistic usage following which the designation “servant” is used of prophetic intermediaries in general (e.g., 2 Kings 9:7; 17:13, 23; 21:10) and preeminently of Moses himself (e.g., Num. 12:7–8; Deut. 34:5).

The greater attention given to biographical narrative, detectable in Jeremiah, the Deuteronomistic portrait of Moses, and the Isaian Servant, corresponds to a development in understanding the prophetic function. Prophecy could still consist in a simple mandate to speak on behalf of the Deity, but there is now in addition the idea that the call can involve the entire life of the individual. This pattern of prophetic biography was further developed in the Greco-Roman period (e.g., The Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah, Bel and the Dragon, The Lives of the Prophets) and left its mark on early Christian presentations of Jesus, especially in Luke.

CALL NARRATIVES AND VISION NARRATIVES

In the prophetic books themselves, biographical interest has concentrated primarily, and in some cases exclusively, on the critical moment of the commissioning of the prophetic intermediary. In both the ancient and modern worlds extraordinary circumstances accompany this event, whether a dream (often repeated on successive nights), a vision, or significant psychic and behavioral changes. Since the intermediary always acts on behalf of a particular constituency, the commission must always be validated in some way by the society or a particular group within it. One way in which this could happen is illustrated by the call of Samuel at the ancient tribal sanctuary of Shiloh (1 Sam. 3). In the course of an incubation ritual (sleeping in the sanctuary to receive a revelation from the Deity worshiped there), Samuel heard a voice calling him that was deemed to be an authentic revelation after the third occurrence. After receiving a message that he was to transmit to those concerned, his prophetic role was publicly acknowledged (1 Sam. 3:20). It may also be noted that though his experience was auditory, it is called a vision (1 Sam. 3:15, 21).

The call of Elisha (1 Kings 19:19–21) illustrates a rather different kind of commissioning, since what is involved here is prophetic succession and endowment with authority vis-à-vis the guilds of dervishlike ecstasies known as “sons of the prophets.” Elijah performed the symbolic act of placing his mantle, the distinguishing mark of the master prophet, over the disciple-elect. At a later point (2 Kings 2:9–12), the transmission of the spirit had to be validated by acts of spiritual power including extrasensory perception (cf. 2 Kings 6:17), precognition (2 Kings 8:7–15), and various miracles, the first of which involved the prophetic mantle of the master (2 Kings 2:13–14). Here too the acknowledgment of the commissioning is explicitly noted (2 Kings 2:15).

Both of these accounts have been incorporated into the Deuteronomistic History, no doubt undergoing some editing in the process. In the prophetic books themselves, most of the call narratives are written in the first person and are, with the possible and problematic exception of Hosea (3:1–5), accompanied by visions. Isaiah's vision of the heavenly court (Isa. 6:1–13), closely paralleled by that of Micaiah (1 Kings 22:19–22), may represent a special Judean variant since it appears to have taken place in the Temple and represents the prophetic intermediary as royal messenger or herald. After a purification ritual, Yahweh as king calls for a volunteer, the prophet offers his services, and the commissioning follows. The same scenario has been assumed for the exilic Isaiah (40:1–11) though in this instance the situation is less clear and the command in vv. 1–5 is addressed to a plurality. That Judean prophetic books are either introduced under the title "vision" (Isaiah, Obadiah, Nahum) or as words received in vision (Amos, Micah, Habakkuk) may indicate a special regional characteristic, though one that was not, of course, unique.

Habakkuk, the only pre-exilic prophet to be named such (Heb. nabi') in the title, provides a brief glimpse of the preparation for receiving a visionary revelation, probably in the Temple (Hab. 2:1–2), and an equally brief description of the behavioral changes that tended to occur during this period of waiting (Hab. 3:16); cf. the similar situation of an anonymous exilic seer announcing the fall of Babylon (Isa. 21:6–10).

Amos describes his commissioning only indirectly, in the course of defending himself before the priest Amaziah. While the interpretation of this passage (Amos 7:14–15) has long been in dispute, Amos appears to be saying that his commission came to him directly in a private capacity, not after apprenticeship in a prophetic guild. Various attempts have been made to establish a connection between the vision series (Amos 7:1–9; 8:1–3; 9:1–4) and the prophetic commissioning. In the first two visions, which threaten locusts and drought respectively, Amos successfully discharges the prophetic task of intercession. The third vision, presaging earthquake and military disaster, might be thought to mark the point at which Amos received his charge to preach against the kingdom of Samaria and its ruler, especially since it is followed immediately by the defense of his prophetic calling. This, however, is only one of several possibilities.

The description of Jeremiah's call to be prophet to the nations is also accompanied by visions of the same type as the third and fourth of Amos (Jer. 1:11–19; cf. Amos 7:7–9; 8:1–3). They are in the first person, the prophet is shown an object, the significance of the exhibit is explained, and the explanation depends on either a symbolic explanation of the object or an ambiguity of pronunciation. The actual commissioning that precedes (Jer. 1:4–10) follows a different and distinctive pattern found also in the earlier of the two versions of the call of Moses (Exod. 3:1–4:17): divine address, expostulation of the intermediary-designate, confirmation and encouragement designed to overcome his hesitation, the giving of a sign (absent in Jeremiah), an act of installation accompanied by a form of words ("behold, I have put my words in your mouth"), and finally the specifics of the mission. While the similarities may be explained in part by the Deuteronomistic intent to portray Jeremiah as a "Mosaic" prophet, the pattern itself is older than either of these examples, as may be seen in the nonprophetic commissioning of Gideon in what is certainly a pre-Deuteronomistic narrative (Judg. 6:11–18).

The account of Ezekiel's call also conflates two quite different narratives: the vision of the chariot-throne (Ezek. 1:4–28) and the commission to speak unwelcome words, signified by having the prophet-elect eat a papyrus scroll containing lamentations (Ezek. 2:1–3:3). The latter is the original commissioning (with later expansions in Ezek. 3:4–9; 3:10–15) to which the "school" of Ezekiel has prefaced the chariot-throne vision, so that the call emanates from the one enthroned thereon (Ezek. 1:28). This detailed description of the merkabah (Heb., "chariot"), which was to become a major source of Jewish mystical speculation, marks a transition from the earlier, relatively simple prophetic vision narrative to the complex scenarios produced by the writers of apocalyptic tracts (e.g., Daniel and the Enoch cycle).

The visions of Zechariah, dated to 519 B.C., are also of a different kind and symptomatic of the changing perception of the prophetic function in the early postexilic period (Zech. 1:7–6:8). One of the most interesting innovations is the presence of a supernatural agent, the angelic interpreter, in the vision. His function is to explain what is going on, and in many cases he does this with reference to motifs in earlier prophetic books: the seventy years of exile (Jer. 25:11; 29:10), the smiths (Isa. 54:16–17), the measuring line (Ezek. 42:20), the north country (Jer. 1:13–16), the wall of fire around Jerusalem (Isa. 4:5), and others. Here too we see the shift from the classical prophetic mode of direct communication to the indirect mode of interpretation, including the interpretation of prophetic texts.

THE PLACE OF PROPHECY IN THE BIBLE AS A WHOLE

One way of viewing the Latter Prophets in the context of the Hebrew Bible canon is as a supplement to the history (Former Prophets). Chronologically, the correspondence is not exact, since we know that five of the Latter Prophets (Joel, Jonah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi) are postexilic, and of these the last three were always known to be postexilic. The three longer books (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel) were apparently grouped together in chronological order for practical reasons as early as the second century B.C., and the twelve Minor Prophets also appear to have been arranged in what was thought to be chronological order (in LXX the series also begins with Hosea but the next five are arranged somewhat differently).

A strong argument can be made in favor of the supplement theory in that the Deuteronomistic historian does not so much as mention any of the Latter Prophets with the exception of Jonah (2 Kings 14:25), not originally part of the collection, and Isaiah (2 Kings 19:1–7, 20–37; 20:1–19), but a very different Isaiah from the author of the sayings. The role of the prophets who are mentioned in the history also corresponds closely enough to that of Latter Prophets to justify this conclusion. One of the chief aims of the exilic historian was to explain the massive disasters that had occurred within living memory. Many of his contemporaries were raising serious questions about the justice and ethical character of the God of traditional religion who, it seemed, had abandoned them to their fate. The historian's reply is that, throughout the history beginning with Moses himself, Yahweh had sent "his servants the prophets" to warn the people of the consequences of their infidelity. The reading of the prophecies, therefore, served as a reminder of the justice of God's ways and as a guide to the moral requirements flowing from the covenant relationship (see, e.g., Zech. 1:1-6). At the same time, these texts were edited and expanded to testify to the assurance of salvation beyond judgment (e.g., Isa. 40-55; Amos 9:11-15; Mic. 4:1-5; Zeph. 3:14-20), an assurance that could also be extended to the gentile world (e.g., Isa. 45:22-23; 66:18-21; 19:24-25; Zeph. 3:9-10; Jon.).

The relation of prophecy to law is one of the most important and difficult issues in biblical theology. It can be shown that much of the ethical teaching of the pre-exilic prophets was based on stipulations of law the antiquity of which cannot be doubted (e.g., Amos 2:8; cf. Exod. 22:26-27). At the same time, this teaching also contributed to the mature formulation of Israel's legal traditions. The Deuteronomic law (Deut. 12-26) betrays the pervasive influence of prophetic preaching that may also have contributed to the final form of the Decalogue (see esp. Hos. 4:2; Jer. 7:9-10). The tendency to subordinate prophecy to law and to the figure of Moses, the fountainhead of both, is already apparent in Deuteronomy which carefully circumscribes the scope of prophetic activity (Deut. 13:1-5; 18:15-22) and insists that prophecy represents a lower order of mediation than that of Moses (34:10). The Deuteronomic history also assigns to prophets the task of preaching the law and warning against the consequences of nonobservance (e.g., 2 Kings 17:13-20). We may find here the source of the view, which was to become normative in Judaism, that the primary role of the prophet was to serve as a vital link in the transmission of the law from Moses down to the present (m. 'Abot 1:1).

A quite different line of development was followed by those who read prophetic texts as predicting the future and heralding the consummation of history. As suggested earlier, the first stage of this eschatological reinterpretation of prophecy has to be recovered from the texts themselves. The sects that begin to emerge clearly in the latter part of the Second Temple period (the second century B.C.) found this mode of interpretation especially congenial. The author of the visions in Daniel, for example, thought of the prophetic books as containing a coded message about the future, with special reference to the destiny of the group to which he belonged (e.g., Dan. 9:1-2). In the biblical commentaries of the Qumran sect we even find the idea that the prophetic author did not himself know the meaning of his prophecy that was only now revealed to the initiates within the sect (1QpHab 7:1-2). Something of the same approach is apparent in early Christian interpretations of prophecy with reference to the events of the life of Jesus (e.g., Matt. 1–3) and the founding and development of the Christian movement (e.g., Acts 2:24–32; 15:15–18). In spite of challenges from different quarters, this interpretive scheme of prophecy and fulfillment has remained to the present an essential aspect of the Christian appropriation and use of the Hebrew Scriptures.

These views of prophecy traditional in Judaism and Christianity have to be balanced against the results of the historical-critical investigation of the texts that began in earnest about the middle of the nineteenth century and is still in progress. The principal aim of historical-critical analysis was to arrive at the authentic sayings through a critical reading of the texts and thus be in a position to determine the identity and agenda of the prophetic author. Stated in general terms, the conclusion was that the biblical prophets were concerned primarily with contemporary social and political realities rather than with prediction. In mediating the tradition through an intense personal experience of the divine, they brought about a new religious consciousness, at once ethical and spiritual, over against the popular religion of the day centered on the sacrificial cult. With the benefit of hindsight, we can now see the extent to which this critical work was colored by the cultural prejudices of the nineteenth and early twentieth century—for example, dogmatic evolutionary ideas of religious development and a devaluation of ritual. The critical rediscovery of prophecy has, nevertheless, been enormously influential, bearing, for example, on the religious interpretation of history and the social responsibilities of synagogue and church. It has also enabled us to get into clearer focus one of the most fundamental contributions of prophetic religion, namely, the idea of people called to be instruments of service.

ISAIAH 1-39

GERALD T. SHEPPARD

INTRODUCTION

Few books of the OT have supplied more fuel to the fire of Jewish and Christian interpretation than the book of Isaiah. Ben Sira's eulogy in the early second century B.C. illustrates the positive perception of the prophet (Sir. 48:22b-25):

... a great man trustworthy in his vision.
In his days the sun went backward;
he lengthened the life of the king.
By the power of the spirit he saw the last things.
he comforted the mourners in Zion, he revealed what was to occur to the end of time, and hidden things long before they happened.

The Dead Sea Scrolls and the NT show equal enthusiasm for Isaiah's "vision" (Isa. 1:1) of the future, while later rabbinic Judaism viewed Isaiah as a superlative expositor of the Torah. The book offered an unparalleled chiaroscuro of God's judgment and comfort to Israel. For Jews the words of comfort spoke accurately of Israel's restoration after the judgment of exile. For Christians these same prophetic words of promise found such perfect fulfillment in the birth, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ that the book was occasionally called "the Gospel within the Old Testament."

Up to the modern period, interpreters viewed the book of Isaiah as a unified literary composition. The book as a whole expressed the words of the eighth-century Isaiah. Historical criticism in the modern period threatened this view by demonstrating that the prophet could not have written many parts of the book. This evidence has often led commentators in the modern period to focus only on certain prescriptural traditions that underlie the formation of the later biblical book: either on the reconstructed "genuine" oracles of Isaiah or on major editorial levels in the history of the book's composition. Conversely, some recent literary approaches have tried to defend the unity of parts or of the whole book based on evidence of aesthetic or structural features analogous to those found in other literary classics. The effect of these two approaches has been either to atomize the book into fragments that might yield access to the "intent" of some historical author/redactor or to defend the coherence of the book in a literary-aesthetic manner at the expense of its historical claims as a book of Scripture.

This commentary on Isaiah 1-39 seeks to benefit from the insights gained from both of these approaches but will concentrate specifically on the question of how older prophetic traditions were put together as elements in the later composition of a book of Scripture. The designation Scripture carries the assumption that the book of Isaiah belongs to a larger context of scriptural books and that its primary import depends on this function within the religions of Judaism and Christianity. From the perspective of the history of the composition of this book, Isaiah 1-39 cannot be treated as an isolated literary unit. It derives in its present form from editors, who are responsible for the book of Isaiah as a whole, and belongs, as well, to two quite different Jewish and Christian scriptures.

The Relation of 1-39 to 40-66

The book of Isaiah easily divides, as Martin Luther observed, into "two books." The first, Isaiah 1-39, is organized around a complex scenario of narratives—roughly in chronological order according to the presumed activity of the prophet Isaiah—together with collections of the prophet's oracles of judgment and promise. The second part, Isaiah 40-66, consists entirely of prophetic poetry, without any historical narratives, and predominately explicates God's comfort and promise to Israel.

Premodern interpreters had long observed the absence of any direct reference to the name of the prophet in Isaiah 40-66. Obvious differences in literary style, vocabulary, and content between Isaiah 1-39 and Isaiah 40-66 had already been noticed, though the clear resonances throughout the entire book seemed to assuage any anxiety over historical dissimilarities between the two parts of the book. Even the recognition, made occasionally by the sixteenth-century Protestant reformer John Calvin and his predecessors, that the audience of Isaiah 40-66 was a group of Babylonian exiles in the sixth century B.C. instead of Judeans under Assyrian threat in the eighth century B.C. could be explained by appeal to the extraordinary character of prophecy. Only in the modern period did acceptance of different historical origins for parts of the book challenge the traditional Christian assumption that "the literal" sense of the entire book of Isaiah could be identical with the original "intent" of the eighth-century prophet.

To bring historical and literary evidence against the traditional assumption that Isaiah wrote the entire book was not, intentionally, an impious attack on Scripture. It reflected, instead, a modern interest in grasping a more accurate sense of "history," which was encouraged by archaeological discoveries and a new facility in ancient languages. Often the goal was to honor the traditional priority given to a biblical author's intention by finding precisely what the "genuine" words of that historical figure were. For the book of Isaiah, these investigations proved, first, that Isaiah 40-66 must have derived from a much later period than did most of 1-39 and, second, that many traditions, even in Isaiah 1-39, were written by someone after the time of Isaiah. These two historical conclusions deserve careful consideration before any contemporary interpretation of the book of Isaiah can be set forward critically and clearly.

Scholars have, for many years, observed that the latter half of the book addresses the conditions of people in the Babylonian exile; in the time of Isaiah, Assyria alone was a threat and Babylon was viewed as a friendly, historically minor nation (see Isa. 39). Furthermore, on its own terms, the prophet's message in Isaiah 40-55 describes social circumstances in which the audience is positioned in a time after "former things" have been fulfilled. This fulfillment could have occurred only during the time of the Babylonian exile (see Isa. 40:21; 41:4, 27; 42:9), a fulfillment that provides the basis for the prophet's argument that trustworthy "new things" can be announced. Among these "new things," the prophet states that Cyrus will expedite the restoration of the nation of Israel and its return to the promised land. The logic of the prophet's argument turns on a recognition that the historical setting is the Babylonian exile and that previous oracles have been fulfilled in that time. For that reason, the prophet can mock other prophets who pretend to promise things without similar proof, namely, that they actually have come to pass (see Isa. 41:21-24). This prophet to the Babylonian exiles could not be identified with the historical Isaiah without either violating the logic of the argument or introducing a strange understanding of prophecy, one at odds with even a traditional view of how prophets performed and what they foresaw. Still, a modern admission of underlying similarities in theme and subject matter between the two parts of the books inspired critics to call this later unknown prophet Second Isaiah. One could speculate, without explicit biblical support, that this later prophet must have been a gifted disciple of the eighth-century "First Isaiah."

A second set of critical observations concentrated on Isaiah 1-39 and built upon the foundation of the preceding observations. For example, Isaiah 1 appears to be composed of fragments of older oracles, but certainly the last verses of the chapter echo the language of Isaiah 40-66. When this chapter came to serve as an introduction to the larger book of Isaiah, the editors of Isaiah 40-66 apparently added a note at the end of it. The fact that Isaiah 36-39 has been taken, with few changes, from 2 Kings 18:13-20:19 provides another sign that some editor of Isaiah 1-39 borrowed non-Isaian material from other biblical books. Also, recognition of the Babylonian provenance of much of Isaiah 40-66 led naturally to suspicion regarding the eighth-century origins of prophecies against Babylon in Isa. 13:1-14:23 and in 21:1-10. The content and style of these chapters clearly reflect the same milieu as the oracles in the latter half of the book.

More recently, these historical-critical, scholarly views that, at the outset, threatened the literary unity of the book of Isaiah have provided the means for showing just how integrally related the two parts of the book are to each other. The composition of Isaiah 1-39 reflects a systematic editorial accommodation of the older traditions retained in Isaiah 1-39 to those of Isaiah 40-66. So, for instance, the oracles against Babylon in Isaiah 13 and 21 anticipate the judgment against Babylon in the latter half of the book. Concomitantly, especially in Isaiah 56-66, the prophetic traditions often quote and interpret oracles found in the first half of the book. In other words, both parts of Isaiah have been edited to resonate each with the other. Isaiah 1-39 is already an admixture of traditions, including some contemporary with those of Isaiah 40-66. An independent collection of Second Isaiah prophecies probably never existed. The designations "First" and "Second" Isaiah for Isaiah 1-39 and 40-66, if they are intended to refer to independent literary compositions, prove to be glittering generalities that fail to reflect the complexity of the history of traditions in the book. The newly recognized evidence of subtle and pervasive redactional contributions throughout Isaiah 1-39 makes its interpretation as a whole impossible without reference both to Isaiah 40-66 and to the place of the book of Isaiah within a larger collection of scriptural books. At a minimum, Isaiah 1-39 never existed as an isolated unit of literature, either separate from the present book of Isaiah or independent from its scriptural context.

The nature of the composition of Isaiah 1-39 discloses another factor typical in the formation of biblical books. The editors of biblical books generally show no interest in disclosing their participation. Except for brief mention of Isaiah's writing oracles down in the form of "a book" (in 8:16 and 30:8), Isaiah 1-39 retains no indications of either the social phenomenon of prophecy itself or the identity of, or historical forces influencing, editors responsible for the later stages in the formation of the biblical text. The form and function of this biblical text resist any attempt to make these matters the key to its meaning, though they may certainly prove essential to illumine the text from a modern perspective. A historical reconstruction of even a historically "genuine" prophetic oracle may recover traditions that existed prior to their incorporation into a Scripture. Such an exercise in reconstruction should provide information helpful in reading the later context of Scripture, analogous to the way the study of the etymology of a word aids an understanding of its subsequent usage in the context of a particular sentence. However, conclusions reached from investigations in tradition history should never be confused uncritically with the meaning of the biblical text.

When read as part of Scripture, the text of Isaiah 1-39 belongs fully to the warp and woof of history. In this context, Isaiah 1-39 overtly represents prophetic traditions against the background of the major events of the eighth century B.C. Yet, these chapters are contextually tied to another historical episode of prophecy, that in Isaiah 40-66, which pertains to the Babylonian exile of the sixth century. This ordering of traditions in the book follows a logic and purpose at odds with that of historical writing, both ancient and modern. The very survival of the book over so many centuries implies that there was some other, very strong assumption regarding the value of this literature. Its value was determined less by the text's perfection, measured according to most historical standards, than by how well it could meet some specific religious expectations of future readers, who continually endeavored to preserve and understand it. It remains, as do most edited literary constructions that survive for centuries, the object of compromise and an approximation—from a historical perspective, "a reed shaken in the wind."

The preservation of the book of Isaiah with all of its modern historical duplicities finds justification precisely because this text is not just any text, but one with a specific historical pedigree. In Judaism it is a manifestation of the revealed Torah, wisdom, promise, and judgment of God. Christianity adds the assumption that the subject matter of the book of Isaiah is the gospel of Jesus Christ. Through its claim to additional revelation, made manifest by the addition of a "New Testament," Christianity altered the context of the book of Isaiah and changed its semantic import by making it part of an "Old Testament" of Christian Scriptures. This modification of the Hebrew Scripture to "Old Testament" within Christian Scripture itself grew out of historical responses to events in the life of the early church. Commentary on Isaiah 1-39 must necessarily be conscious of this complicated relation of text to history and to its religious subject matter whenever one speaks about the "meaning" of these texts, at least as we have received them as treasures from the past.

The aim of this commentary will be to describe, in historical and literary terms, the form and function of a scriptural text rather than to offer a pious or impious reading of a reconstructed history. In this regard, awareness of the history of religions and of religious comparativist insight into the nature of religions generally may prove as illuminating as detailed knowledge of the social history of ancient Israel. So too the internal register of wisdom and spiritual knowledge found in a Jewish or Christian believer may resonate more appropriately with certain key motifs and traces in this text than any purely "literary-aesthetic" approach.

The Composition of 1-39

The older prophetic traditions preserved in Isaiah 1-39, as well as in the book as a whole, are not organized simply around events in the life of Isaiah. Instead, Isaiah 1 and the recapitulation of the same themes in the last chapter, Isaiah 66, place emphasis topically on the word of God to God's chosen people and city, Jerusalem/Zion. These two chapters form the introduction and a retrospective conclusion to the book. In these chapters, one learns that the people of God have fallen into iniquity and have abused sanctuary worship. Zion abounds with injustice like Sodom and Gomorrah and almost experiences their fate. The rebellious inhabitants of Jerusalem will be purged with the fire of exile, so that a "few survivors" remain the only hope for restoration. The city will be destroyed, but it will be restored later as a citadel of justice and righteousness. Both chapters end with the same bleak image of the purge in which a fire will burn such that "none can quench" (1:31; 66:24). By this means the activity of Isaiah the prophet has been made secondary to his message, namely, the enduring word of God and its implications for the past, present, and future of both the people and the city of God.

Attentive to this larger pattern, Isa. 40:1-2 provides the major transition between the two parts of the book and maintains the same topical orientation as that found in the introduction and conclusion (see 66:13). "Comfort" is declared both to “my people” and “to Jerusalem” at a time when the “iniquity is pardoned.” This emphasis on the people and the city, found as well in the introduction and conclusion, is again picked up by the title of the book in Isa. 1:1 (also 2:1) in its explicit reference to both “Judah and Jerusalem.” The announcement of comfort in 40:1–2 assumes the aftermath of the Babylonian exile and clearly provides an introduction to the second half of the book in the light of the whole. Thus, the introduction and conclusion reinforce the basic pattern of the book of Isaiah, one that divides the oracles into a period of God’s wrath (2–39) followed by a later time of comfort (40–65).

Isaiah 12 occupies a similar pivotal position. It occurs after a long section associated with the Syro-Ephraimite war (5:8–11:16) and before the edited collection of oracles against the nations in Isaiah 13–23. Once more there is an explicit reference to the same basic themes of God’s present anger and future comfort, with an assurance that plays on the name of Isaiah: “God is my salvation” (12:2). Even the name of the prophet is not strictly historical datum but provides a typical expression of the prophet’s message. In Isaiah’s name we hear an adumbration of the central theme of Isaiah 40–66. In this way, “Isaiah” is personally linked to his message throughout the prophetic book of Scripture associated with him.

An attentive reading of Isaiah 2–39 will discover subsections comprising oracles of the same or a similar type. A basic distinction is made between judgment oracles and promise or salvation oracles. The promise oracles of 2:2–4 and 4:2–6 provide a framework around a long section of judgment oracles. As in the introductory chapter, each of these promise oracles contains prophecy of a future restoration of Jerusalem. Isa. 2:2–4 adds an explicit reference to the revealed Torah (Heb., “law/teaching”) of God that will be taught from Zion. The oracles between these promises similarly concern Judah and Jerusalem. This entire first section of the book of Isaiah is followed by the parable-like summary of this same message in the song of the vineyard (Isa. 5). Starting with Isa. 5:8 is a collection of oracles oriented around the events of the Syro-Ephraimite war (7:1–9). Using an editorial device, the composers have broken apart two original collections of prophetic oracles—a group of seven woe oracles against leaders in Judah and a cluster of judgment oracles directed against Ephraim (the Northern Kingdom, Israel)—to form a double inclusio or framework of oracles around the so-called testimony of Isaiah in 6:1–9:7. The last of these woe oracles concludes with a repeated refrain borrowed from the judgment oracles against Ephraim (see 10:4b).

Next, a series of promise oracles to Judah and judgments against Assyria follow in Isaiah 10:5–11:16. Isaiah 12, then, is another “song” that serves as a transition, similar to that of Isa. 5:1–7, between the preceding section and a collection of oracles against the nations in Isaiah 13–23. In the song of Isaiah 12, the preceding theme of God’s anger is taken up and reversed, and a specific assurance of “comfort” is added that did not occur before and is found again only in Isaiah 40–66. After the oracles against the nations, a group of promissory eschatological oracles occurs in Isaiah 24–27; they take up a number of themes and motifs from the first part of the book and project them into a vision of future restoration. One, then, finds in Isaiah 28–32 a return to judgment oracles against Judah and Jerusalem, followed, once more, by promise in Isaiah 33–35. Isaiah 34 and 35, in this last section, comprise virtually a mosaic of themes found only in Isaiah 40–66 and, therefore, they clearly anticipate the latter half of the book, which then becomes integral to the interpretation of Isaiah 1–39. Finally, there is a cluster of narratives in Isaiah 36–39 that pertain to a later Assyrian threat, after the end of the Syro-Ephraimite war.

This brief sketch demonstrates that a variety of criteria have governed the composition of Isaiah 1–39. Collections of judgment oracles are regularly followed by collections of promise oracles. A formal introduction begins the book, while “songs” in Isaiah 5 and 12 mark off whole sections and provide summarizing commentary on them. These songs also provide a transition between collections of different types. Moreover, in Isaiah 1–39, diverse traditions are often found clustered together in association with historical events of national significance (e.g., the Syro-Ephraimite war). In this manner, editors ordered the traditions on the basis of unrelated criteria, e.g., the literary type of the traditions, sequence of historical events, features in the biographical presentation of the prophet, and topical concerns.

The context of Isaiah 1–39 allows both for the time-bound quality of the prophet’s activity and for the timeless claim of the text on future readers. This complexity suggests a high degree of adaptation of traditions over a long period of time. In the present biblical context, one may detect principles of ordering retained from earlier periods of composition alongside different principles that pertain to a later reworking of the same traditions. The persistent anonymity of the editors, as well as their concern with preservation and the subtlety of their technique, suggests a certain anxiety of influence. The editors are not in any modern sense “authors.” Instead, they stand behind the text and push it forward in the name of Isaiah and with an import that may include but, at the same time, exceed their own views.

In support of this general pattern of organization in Isaiah 1–39, there are a number of repeated key motifs or refrains in these chapters that provide nuance and continuity throughout the differing subcollections. For example, in the judgment oracles of Isa. 2:6–22 there is a repeated poetic refrain that the high or proud will be brought low (2:11, 17). This same refrain, perhaps derived from an older form in 2:6–22, recurs after the song of the vineyard in 5:15. Such repetition throughout various subcollections of prophetic traditions establishes topical resonance between different sections of the book. For example, the aforementioned refrain, the high brought low, introduces the same theme in the judgment against Assyria in 10:33–34 and, again, in the promise oracles to Judah in 25:11–12 and 26:5. In a very similar way, an expression perhaps once belonging to the song of the vineyard in Isaiah 5 appears in 3:13–15 and elevates “the vineyard” into a key metaphor throughout Isaiah 2–39. Later plays upon the rare expression “briars and thorns” that overtake the vineyard recall the same set of motifs and are variously applied throughout Isaiah 6–39 (see 7:23–25; 9:18; 10:17; 27:4; 32:13).

As a last example, one finds around the testimony of Isaiah a repeated refrain: “On account of all this, his anger is not turned away; [in fact,] his hand is stretched out still” (5:25; 9:12, 17, 21; 10:4). In the transitional song of Isaiah 12, this same expression appears as a thematic summary of the first part of the book of Isaiah. Only there do we find that God’s “anger is turned back” and that “comfort” will follow (v. 1), as in Isaiah 40–66. Once again the refrain has become an idiom for integrating and interpreting diverse traditions. The same expression of God’s wrath is later applied to the “rod” of God’s anger, Assyria (14:24–27). Certain motifs and refrains become idioms that express a continuity in the message of Isaiah 1–39, and many of them are not carried over into Isaiah 40–66. They help to knit the diverse traditions of Isaiah 2–39 into a distinctive religious statement, separate from the continuation of prophecy in Isaiah 40–66.

However, a variety of features link the two parts of the book together editorially, including the presence of traditions from the second part within the first (e.g., Isa. 34–35) and citations from Isaiah 2–39 in so-called “Third Isaiah” (Isa. 55–66). Various promise oracles and “messianic” interpretations in the first part anticipate the traditions in Isaiah 40–66. (For discussion of these chapters as involving a “Second” and a “Third” Isaiah, see Isaiah 40–66, “Introduction.”) In the discussion of the “former” and “latter” things in Isaiah 40–55, the first part of the book is associated with the “former” things, and the last part is described as the “latter” or “new” things declared by the prophet. The claim in 44:24–45:7 that the appearance of Cyrus fulfills the “former” prophecy of Isaiah likewise holds the two parts together. The pattern of promise and fulfillment is analogous to that asserted for Jeremiah in Ezra 1:1.

The transition between 1–39 and 40–66 is achieved structurally by continuing the voice of the prophet in the first part into the second. The opening words of Isa. 40:1–2 reflect the voice of God (see Isa. 51:12) and are reminiscent of what belongs to a prophetic call. In 40:6, the response is the “I” of the prophet, who, in this context, can be associated only with Isaiah. Although the familiar voice of the human prophet occurs in the two parts of the book—the word of God is not made independent of human prophetic expression—the biographical identity of the prophet becomes vague and belongs only in the distant background of the text. Priority is given to the word of God itself; the prophet’s personality “withers” and “fades” biographically from our view like the “grass” and “flower” of Isa. 40:8. Other topics, themes, and key words form a bridge between the parts of the book as a whole. We find the anger of God in the first part turns to “comfort” in the second (12:1; 40:1; 49:13; 51:3, 12; 52:9; 66:13–14). The “guilt/iniquity” (1:4) spelled out in the first part is “pardoned” in the second (40:2). The “servant” in Isaiah 40–55 bears the guilt of Israel representatively; a lengthy confession follows in 64:4–8. We have already seen how Jerusalem/Zion is a key object of address throughout the book (e.g., Isa. 1; 40:2; 66). Also, the divine name “The Holy One of Israel” becomes a distinctive expression for God in all the major sections of Isaiah. The third part of the book (Isa. 55–66) takes up these key themes and, with citations from Isaiah 2–39, provides a unified topical statement reflecting the content of the book as a whole.

In sum, certain repetitions establish moments of contextual and topical resonance between subcollections of Isaiah 1–39 and become crucial idioms by which different prebiblical traditions can be read together biblically, that is to say, as part of the same book in the context of other scriptural books. We have already seen how idioms such as God’s “anger” and “comfort” go beyond either purely literary or historical analysis of biblical traditions. They prove essential to the formation of Isaiah 1–39 as a book of Scripture precisely because they assert how the older traditions relate to the subject matter of Scripture itself. Through resonance with each other, these inner-biblical plays in Isaiah 1–39 are constitutive of the biblical context and cause a single cumulative and memorable word to emerge from the context of the subcollections of these originally independent historical traditions.

The Historical Isaiah and the Book of Isaiah

The entire book is associated with "Isaiah" by the title in 1:1. The form of the title resembles that attached to other prophetic books. This editorial feature confirms that Isaiah belongs among other prophetic books, in the shadow of the Torah and separate from other writings such as Solomonic wisdom books. The title emphasizes that the message of God was delivered through the prophet Isaiah, a message bearing its own marks of continuity that are indicative of Isaiah's own personal stamp and provide a unifying strand within the book. By viewing the prophetic traditions that make up this book as part of a Scripture, the interpreter can settle for neither a purely historical reconstruction of prophetic traditions in the book nor an ahistorical literary assessment of the text. Though these and other investigations are integral to the larger task of biblical interpretation, the weight of interpretation must be, finally, on the form and function of the text that has been preserved as Scripture in the religions of Judaism and Christianity. At the same time, it is not the intention of this approach to reduce commentary on this text to subjective theological impressions, but to offer descriptions of how the book continues to make claims upon its readers. Such an approach assumes that the traditional definition of the "literal sense" sought to preserve a semantic level of significance to religious interpretation that cannot be sustained by a modern identification of that sense strictly with a historical author's intent.

The association of the prophet Isaiah with the entire book implies some unity to the message within the book and invites one to ask special historical and biographical questions. At the outset, these questions are similar to those any interpreter faces in considering the books of Moses, the psalms of David, the Solomonic books, or even the Letters of Paul in the NT. For example, Moses is associated with Genesis through Deuteronomy in the biblical tradition. However, there are changes in voice—from first-person reports to third-person descriptions of him. Even historical conservatives have recognized problems in attributing to Moses the account of his own death. Likewise, the book of Psalms, though associated with David, contains hymns assigned to figures either before his time (Ps. 90, Moses) or after (Ps. 72, Solomon). Again, within the Proverbs of Solomon, some collections are assigned to non-Solomonic authors (see Prov. 30:1; 31:1). The ending of Ecclesiastes is clearly the product of a later editor, as is the beginning. In none of these instances do we find evidence of a modern concern with historical authorship.

Rather than subjecting the biblical texts to questions arising from modern notions of authorship, one can begin with another inquiry. How is the message of Isaiah related to presentation of the prophet's life in this book? Implicit in this question is a recognition that the message of the prophet has a double voice, the human voice of a prophet and, behind it, the voice of God. A reading of Isaiah as Scripture entails an effort to hear the word of God as it is mediated through the human testimony of the words and deeds of the prophet. The biographical presentation of Isaiah provides a crucial element in the tapestry of these ancient human words by which the word of God is made available to later religious interpreters.

A primary concern, therefore, is to describe how the details of the prophet's life are presented in the book of Isaiah and to define the implications for interpretation of the book. First, by speaking of biographical "presentation" instead of modern historical biography, a distinction is made between the "historical" Isaiah as modern historians might try to reconstruct the "life" of an ancient person and the depiction of the biblical Isaiah as he appears in the book of Isaiah. Both a biblical and a historical portrayal of Isaiah, if they are sufficiently realistic, clothed in idiosyncratic dress, and existing to some degree in a memorable world of accidental events, are equally "flesh and blood" renderings of the prophet. What incites modern speculation about the historical Isaiah is a recognition that the biblical Isaiah appears as a believable, vital "life" caught up in the exigencies of historical experience. Without examining here the relationship between the historical and the biblical Isaiah, the concern of this commentary acknowledges and seeks to sustain the biblical presentation as constitutive of the book of Isaiah and integral to the syntax of the entire book. One should not confuse the recovery of a more "reliable" historical portrait of the eighth-century B.C. prophet with the discovery of a more reliable "Scripture," since ancient traditions do not become Scripture through their fidelity to principles of modern historiography. The transformation of ephemeral prophetic and nonprophetic traditions into a biblical book of prophecy belongs to another set of political and religious factors, with an entirely different purpose in mind.

Second, in Isaiah 2–39 the book's editors have made some effort to present the traditions in chronological order, according to the major historical events that punctuated the ministry of the prophet. The opening chapters of Isa. 2:5–5:7 represent Isaiah's earliest period of prophecy, when he pronounced judgment against the wrongdoing of complacent national leaders in Jerusalem. The narratives in Isa. 6:1–9:7 pertain to the later events of the Syro-Ephraimite war (735–733 B.C.) during the time of Ahaz. The note in Isa. 20:1–6 recounts the still later Philistine revolt against Assyria (713–711), and the reports in Isaiah 36–38 take up the subsequent interactions of Isaiah with Hezekiah when Jerusalem came under siege by the Assyrian king Sennacherib in 701 B.C. Isaiah 39 technically belongs before these events, since Merodach-baladan ruled Babylon in 721–710 B.C. Recalling a minor incident in the life of the prophet, this chapter makes clear that Jerusalem would not be rescued from the Babylonians in the way it had been spared from the Assyrians (Isa. 36–37). Therefore, Isaiah 39 now offers an impressive transition from the period of Assyrian hostility represented by Isaiah 2–39 and that of Babylonian captivity presumed by the chapters that follow. This biographical drive is so integral to the organization of materials in the first part of the book that many premodern interpreters speculated that the latter half of the book derived from the last phase of Isaiah's life during the time of Manasseh. This estimate held sway despite the lack of any mention of Manasseh in the title of the book.

Finally, the highly stylized depiction of the prophet in Isaiah 36–39 is complemented by some vivid images of the prophet's life in Isa. 6:1–9:7. The autobiographical sections in chaps. 7 and 8 provide an introduction to the prophet as a well-known public figure, with a family and children. He appears as one profoundly well versed in religious traditions and worship, one who has compassion—"How long, O Lord?" (6:11)—for those whom God has destined for destruction. Like any other human being, he depends on God's warning and encouragement regarding his actions during a time of crisis (8:11–15). A consistent element in his message appears to be that righteousness and trust in God, rather than international alliances, will provide Judah's only security. In spite of his despair and the resistance to his message, Isaiah finds the courage to "hope in" God and, at God's request, to record his teaching as a source of hope for later generations. The prophet's consistency, eloquence, and fearless confrontation of kings has given later interpreters good reason to speculate that he was probably a highly educated, stately, or even royal-like figure. The content of Isaiah's oracles suggests someone with detached compassion, without the type of passionate identification characteristic of Hosea. He appears well versed in wisdom traditions, but without Amos's zeal for biting satire. As a result, biblical readers easily sense that Isaiah has a personality distinct among biblical prophets. This dimension contributes to the impression that he is subject to familiar human frailties and that the word of God can be perceived only through the necessary limitations of its human mediators.

Isaiah and Christian Scripture

Because Isaiah 1–39 never existed as an independent unit of literature, an awareness of its wider context in Scripture should inform any commentary upon it. First, the aforementioned relationship of Isaiah 1–39 to 40–66 affects the manner in which the former has meaning as part of the book of the Isaiah. Second, the fact that Isaiah 36–39 derives essentially from 2 Kings 18:13–20:19 shows that the book of Isaiah belongs to a larger collection of scriptural books in the Hebrew Bible. Similarly, for example, "the Lord God is my strength and salvation" in Isa. 12:2 cites Exod. 15:2. Third, a Christian re-visioning of Isaiah occurs in light of the earliest kerygma (proclamation of the "good news"; → Kerygma) regarding the nature and significance of Jesus Christ and, later, through understanding Isaiah as part of an "Old Testament" alongside the "New." Such change in context introduces a change in the semantic import of the literature, and a biblical commentator must be conscious of this diversity. The first of these factors has already been considered, but the last two need further comment.

Some explicit verbal allusions to Isaiah do appear elsewhere within the Hebrew Bible (e.g., Ps. 119), though the book retains a high degree of independence in the collection of biblical books. One of the most significant connections between the book of Isaiah and other books of Scripture derives from the assumption that they share the same subject matter. The central subject matter of the Hebrew Bible is clearly the Torah, manifest most explicitly in Genesis through Deuteronomy—"the book of the law" (see Josh. 1:8). In the traditions of Isaiah 1–39 we find references to "torah" in the sense of the prophet's teaching (see Isa. 8:16, 20; 30:9). However, at a later editorial level another view of the Torah of God, reminiscent of the Mosaic law, has been introduced (see 2:3; 5:24; 42:4, 21, 24; 51:4, 7). Analogous to the relation between the prophetic word and God's word, the torah of the prophet now is identified with the divine Torah, known most clearly in the book of Moses. If "torah" in Isa. 1:10 once meant simply the teaching of the prophet, in the editorial formation of the book it gained new meaning, one that assumes the complementarity of the revealed Torah given to Moses. On the one hand, one can readily understand how Isaiah 1-39 and the book of Isaiah came to be read as commentary on the Mosaic Torah within Judaism. On the other hand, the lack of any explicit harmonization of the Isaian traditions with the Mosaic Torah intensified the demand for interpretation of the book as a part of Scripture.

Besides an understanding of the book of Isaiah as the Torah of God, Jewish interpretation also found in it a source of prophetic promise and judgment in the past, present, and future for contemporary interpreters, as well as a basis for attaining biblical "wisdom" rivaling that of the Solomonic books. In other words, the subject matter of the book of Isaiah is expressed through different biblical idioms of law, prophecy, and wisdom as major rubrics under which it could be studied as a guide to believers. In rabbinic Judaism, the presence of oral Torah in the form of the Mishnah and the Talmuds encouraged a dialectical or midrashic assessment of Isaiah. This way of interpretation sought to disclose the law of God as a guide to the obedient life.

The earliest followers of Jesus shared the interpretations of Scripture of their Jewish relatives and neighbors, except that the teachings of Jesus altered their perception of the overarching subject matter of the Bible. For the first Christians, the essential message of the Bible became the gospel of Jesus Christ, which arguably could still be complementary to the older rubrics of Jewish law, prophecy, and wisdom. The legal exposition of Isaiah ceased being a primary means of biblical interpretation (though it remained such in later rabbinic Judaism). At least, what survives in the NT is an orientation to Isaiah as wisdom (see James 1:10-11) consonant with the gospel and, above all, as prophetic promise that finds fulfillment in the kerygma of Jesus Christ.

Two sets of texts from Isaiah 1-39 were cited by more than one NT writer and can be considered representative moments of consensus in the Christian appropriation of Isaiah. First, Isa. 6:9-10, with its statement that God will prevent an understanding of the revealed word, provided Christians with an explanation for why Jesus spoke in parables (Matt. 13:14-15; Mark 4:12; Luke 8:10). Only the insiders could understand. In John 12:40 the disbelief of Jesus' own disciples, despite the many signs shown them, could be explained by citing Isa. 53:1 followed by Isa. 6:10. The refusal of Jews in Rome to accept Paul's testimony is explained by the same prophecy (Acts 28:25-27). Finally, in Rom. 11:7-8 the same words of Isaiah account for why Jews generally rejected the gospel and why the gospel is now offered to the Gentiles. Numerous allusions in the NT play upon this popular interpretation. The disappointment among the first Christians that most Jews rejected the new revelation of Jesus made sense when it was viewed as a fulfillment of the Isaian prophecy.

Second, Isa. 28:16, "I lay a foundation stone in Zion," and 8:14, "a stone of stumbling and a rock of offense," were commonly used to explain both the offense and the hidden significance of Jesus. In 1 Peter 2:6, 8, these verses are cited along with Ps. 118:22, "the stone which the builders rejected." Commonly in the Psalms and in other OT books God is referred to as a "rock" or as "my rock." In a related metaphor, the term "stone" could be considered to belong to this same vocabulary. Jesus represents the rejected stone that now has become the foundation or cornerstone for the house of the elect. It was customary for Christian interpretation of OT symbols for God to include reference to Jesus Christ. Hence, Jesus is the spiritual "rock" (1 Cor. 10:4). As an explanation of how the gospel came to be announced to Gentiles rather than only to Jews, Paul (Rom. 9:33) depends on both Isa. 1:9 and 8:14. The depiction of conditions after the Exile—"a few survivors" (1:9)—could be explained in Christian terms as a consequence of Israel's trying to obey the law through works rather than by faith. Isa. 8:14, then, proves to be a prediction of the later Jewish rejection of Jesus. In this way, an argument regarding how Jews should have obeyed the Torah is followed by a prophetic witness to the Jewish rejection of Jesus, who is "a stone of stumbling and a rock of offense."

At a minimum, these examples illustrate that the subject matter of the book of Isaiah in the Christian Bible was ultimately the gospel of Jesus Christ. The differing contexts of this book in two different Scriptures elicited very different ways of making sense of the book for the sake of faith. Isaiah became one of the most widely cited OT books in Christian preaching regarding the prophetic interpretation of the significance of Jesus' words and deeds, as well as a common authoritative resource in disputes over Christian doctrine.

The Text

Unlike some of the other prophetic books, Isaiah shows a remarkable consistency in preservation from the earliest available manuscripts to the received Hebrew Masoretic texts of the tenth century A.D. The discovery of copies of Isaiah from about 100 B.C. among the Dead Sea Scrolls (esp. 1QIsa), confirmed the pre-Christian antiquity of the book of Isaiah as it currently exists. The Greek translation, the Septuagint (LXX), and other versions contain only minor differences from the Hebrew text.

1:1–31

The Prologue

The opening section of Isaiah contains a title and an introduction to the book. The introduction (vv. 2–31) consists of a series of independent prophetic traditions (vv. 2–3, 4–9, 10–17, 18–20, 21–26, 27–31) that are loosely linked to each other through key words or themes. Most of this chapter, with the exception of 1:27–31, once provided an introduction to a smaller collection of prophetic oracles, perhaps 2:1–10:6 or 21:1–32:20. Certainly the last unit, 1:27–31, appears to be a later, postexilic addition that presupposes themes in Isaiah 40–66 and anticipates the final chapter, Isaiah 66. The concluding verse, 1:31, now plays upon—a fire “not quenched”—the last verse of the book, 66:24. Isaiah 66 is similarly concerned with the redemption of Jerusalem as “Zion” (v. 8), along with a variety of related motifs and themes already found in this chapter. Therefore, in its present form, this chapter provides a prologue including in its scope both Isaiah 2–39 and the entire book of Isaiah.

1:1, The Title of the Book. Modeled after the same style as the titles in Amos. 1:1 and Hosea 1:1, a very brief ascription of the book to Isaiah the prophet prefaces the book. The content of the entire book is described in technical prophetic terminology as a “vision” (cf. 2 Chron. 32:32) “which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem.” The expression “Judah and Jerusalem” occurs only here and in the subsequent title of Isa. 2:1, otherwise the order of these terms is reversed (3:1, 8; 5:3; 22:21). This sequence in the title corresponds to the order in which the nation and city are treated in the introduction that follows (1:2–31): first, judgment against the rebellious people of God; and second, implications of that rebellion for the city of Jerusalem (Zion) and its inhabitants. The preoccupation with Judah, the Southern Kingdom, and its capital city probably accounts for the listing only of the kings of Judah during the time of Isaiah, with no mention of their counterparts in the Northern Kingdom, Israel.

1:2–31, A Topical Introduction. Chap. 1 summarizes and prefigures the content of the book of Isaiah through a scenario of God’s purging and redeeming the nation of Judah. The people of Judah, brought up as God’s offspring, have forgotten their divinely appointed heritage and grown ignorant of their relationship to God. Their disobedience consists of open rebellion (vv. 2, 28) and sinful acts (vv. 4, 28). Verse 3 epitomizes the prophet’s indictment against them: “An ox recognizes its owner; even an ass [knows] its master’s crib. [But] Israel does not recognize [anything]; My own people do not understand at all.” There is redemption for only a “few survivors” (v. 9), those who “return to her [Zion] by righteousness” (v. 27; 35:10). In this scenario, Jerusalem as “Zion” appears as a central motif. Due to the corruption of its inhabitants, the city is called “Sodom” and “Gomorrah” (v. 10) and “a harlot” (v. 21). However, someday it will again be called “the city of righteousness, the faithful city” (v. 26).

The concept of the redemption and preservation of Zion plays a highly significant role in the composition of Isaiah, especially in chaps. 2–39. Repeatedly the prophet assures the leaders and the people that they must not be afraid. “Zion” is God’s special habitation, his “holy mountain,” that will not ultimately fall to the enemy. Belief in the “inviolability of Zion” may derive from the eighth-century prophet himself or from a later period, perhaps the reign of Josiah in the seventh century, after the Northern Kingdom had been taken into exile by the Assyrians. Regardless, it now accurately highlights an important, recurring note throughout the presentation of the prophet’s message in Isaiah 1–39.

The title and the introduction form the prologue to the book and provide a specific context for an interpretation of the prophetic traditions within the book of Isaiah. On the one hand, the whole book is associated with the eighth-century B.C. prophet Isaiah and his message. Just as the book of Psalms came to be associated with David, despite the presence of later psalms (Ps. 72, “of Solomon”), and just as Proverbs is linked with Solomon, despite later editing (Prov. 25:1), so the unity of the book of Isaiah is asserted by its relationship to the prophet and his message. Anticipating a later distinction between parts of the book in terms of the “former” and “latter things” (chaps. 41–48), 1:27 distinguishes between prophetic claims upon Zion “before” the Exile and those “afterward.” On the other hand, the introduction places an emphasis on the topical import of the prophet’s word as a source of the word and law of God. Though the Assyrian siege of Jerusalem in 701 B.C. still shimmers here and there behind some of the traditions in Isaiah 1, the present context employs them to make a historical generalization regarding God’s judgment and redemption of Judah. Biographical dimensions of the prophet himself find no place in this introduction, just as they remain absent in Isaiah 40–66. In the book of Isaiah generally, the message of the prophet takes precedence over interest in the exigencies of the prophet’s “life.” The introduction itself aims at the enduring implications of that message for future generations by emphasizing a pattern of divine response to the chosen people: God’s wrath is a means of purging; it is accompanied by a demand for repentance and right action and is followed by a vision of the full restoration of both the people and the city.

Promises and Judgments of Zion

In the initial section of prophecies, two promise oracles serve as brackets around a collection of judgment oracles. The topical concern in the introduction, God's word to both Judah and Jerusalem, is amply illustrated throughout these prophecies. Their setting suggests a period of relative calm before the storm, of complacency and injustice that the prophet eloquently condemns.

Zion, City of God's Law and Word

2:1, A Second Title. The title in 2:1 is remarkably similar to that in 1:1, though shorter in form. It repeats the inverted order of "Judah and Jerusalem" in contrast to the usual expression in the oracles themselves. This title helps to distinguish the introduction from the oracles that follow. The title appropriately corresponds to the section 2:2-4:6, with its threats and promises directed solely to the southern nation and its capital.

2:2-5, Zion, the City of God's Law and Word. The stress on the law or Torah and God's word (v. 3) from Zion, together with the ideal of a permanent end to war (v. 4), suggests that the tradition derives from some time after the destruction of Jerusalem. As in later, apocalyptic literature, the description of the city's restoration is here accompanied by cosmic changes "in the latter days" (v. 2). Most of this oracle (vv. 2-4) is identical with Mic. 4:1-3, and the title in 2:1 may also be intended to argue for its original association with the prophet Isaiah, rather than Micah.

In most collections of prophetic oracles, judgment oracles precede oracles of promise, instead of the order here. One explanation for this variation may be that the ordering does, in fact, place a promise oracle (2:2-5) immediately after the negative conclusion of the introduction. In addition, 2:2-5 makes an excellent transition by picking up themes from Isaiah 1, and yet, because of the title in 2:1, one is not permitted to confuse it with the introduction itself. It predicts the restoration of Zion and foresees a time when the word and the Torah ("teaching" or "law") of God will be taught to the entire world from Jerusalem.

The term "torah" in 1:27 probably means simply "the teaching" of the prophet Isaiah (cf.

8:16). However, Isa. 2:3 appears to interpret this same word contextually in terms of the larger revealed Torah, which came to be associated with the "Book of the Law" (Gen.-Deut.; see Josh. 1:8). In the formation of Jewish Scripture, the book of Isaiah was edited to reflect its role in a larger collection of books, with the Torah as its central subject matter. As a result, one may appreciate why later Jewish interpretation viewed Isaiah primarily as prophetic commentary on the revealed Torah. Isa. 2:2-5 points to this larger context for the book of Isaiah but does not take the next step of demonstrating practically how parts of Scripture will be read in the light of each other.

The Proud Made Low

In a peroration of judgment against arrogant and idolatrous leaders, the prophet's message is made memorable by a refrain that describes the humiliation of the proud. By contrast, "God alone will be exalted in that day" (vv. 11, 17). Some of the argument against dependence on soothsayers, diviners, and graven images seems more pertinent to later conditions of apostasy during the Exile and afterward. Nevertheless, the composition follows logically after the preceding unit because of its assurance that God will be exalted, which is similar to the preceding claim that the mountain of God "shall be established as the highest of the mountains" (2:2).

3:1-4:1

Judgment on Judah's Leaders and Zion's Daughters

Continuing the theme of God's wrath against wicked leaders and the immorality of rich landowners, the message points again to a coming social upheaval that will expose their false security.

3:1-12, Misguided Leaders. The prophets describe an impending famine and political anarchy. Children and random survivors suddenly become national leaders. Merely having a mantle becomes grounds for holding a position of authority, but such candidates will resist the opportunity because there is no food at home. Again, this portrayal recalls the preceding unit, reflecting a catalogue of consequences for those who, in a time of relative prosperity, arrogantly hold high offices and lead the people astray. In the last verses, the righteous have hope of receiving help according to their own deeds, while the wicked will reap what they have sown.

3:13-15, Against the Vineyard's Destroyers. This unit interrupts the consistent theme and style of the tradition in which it now stands. Its reference to God's judgment of "the people" offers a loose contextual bridge to the preceding verse, with its mention of "my people." The sudden mention of "the vineyard," with no explicit explanation of what it symbolizes, presumes some prior knowledge of its usage in Isaiah's oracles. The term occurs rarely in this way, once with an explanation in the "song of the vineyard" (Isa. 5:1–7) and again, in 27:1–7, in a promise of restoration that depends upon elements in 5:1–7. Verses 13–15 may have belonged originally with 5:1–7, perhaps between 5:3 and 5:4, in which case they once would have formed part of a juridical parable. In a juridical parable, the king or audience is asked to judge a case. After the case is decided, the one presenting it as a parable implicates the judge. The ones judging unknowingly judge themselves. Other examples of this type of parable in the Bible include David's confrontation with Nathan in 2 Sam. 12:1–13, as well as his being tricked by the wise woman of Tekoa (2 Sam. 14:4–17). In the context of Isaiah, these verses provide a graphic, summarizing indictment ("It is you!") directed against the leaders in Judah, one that resonates with the more detailed explication of the metaphor in 5:1–7. This vineyard imagery becomes a major way of explaining the rationale and the nature of God's judgment in Isaiah 1–39.

3:16–4:1, Complacent Daughters of Zion.

The city's wealthy women are mocked for their self-preoccupation, which is illustrated by an obsession with hairstyles, lavish clothing, and jewelry. Judgment will fall upon them no less than upon the corrupt men who have been the city's leaders.

The Glory of Survivors in Zion

The oracle at 4:2–6 maintains continuity with the oracles immediately preceding it through the theme "the daughters of Zion." Here they emerge "in that day" washed clean of past "bloodstains." Similar to that of Isa. 2:2–4, the promise of God involves an end to the judgment of Zion. In this section, only 2:2–4 and 4:5 speak of Zion as a "mountain," though the related depiction of the proud brought down and God being exalted is a recurring feature throughout. The oracle secures, from a perspective after the Exile, confidence that Zion will be restored and will surpass its former glory. An implicit assumption is that God will carry his chosen people through the worst purging judgment, without ever abandoning the goal of blessing them when they are transformed into an obedient and righteous nation.

The Song of the Vineyard

Verses 1–7 introduce "a song of my beloved," the owner of a cherished vineyard (vv. 1–2). Despite thoughtful planting, loving care, and diligent protection of the fertile field, the vineyard yields worthless, sour grapes. This poetic complaint is suddenly ("and now . . ." v. 3) transformed into a demand for legal adjudication by the listeners, the inhabitants of Jerusalem and Judah (vv. 3–4). The guilty party, still cast in metaphorical terms, is sentenced by the prophet (vv. 5–6). Then the author deciphers the parable explicitly and provides a summarizing indictment of the people of Jerusalem and Judah (v. 7). The tradition may derive originally from a longer juridical parable (see Isa. 3:13–15) and certainly retains the force of an invitation to judge unknowingly one's self. As poetry it depends on an analogous observation about what is natural and unnatural, in a manner typical of wisdom literature (see Prov. 25:19; 26:11; Sir. 27:6). Prophets frequently use the logic of wisdom literature to make their arguments incisive and unavoidable (see, e.g., Amos 3:3–8). In its present context, this song represents one of several key "songs" (see Isa. 12; 26) in Isaiah 1–39 that mark transitions between prophetic subcollections and summarize the import of prophetic traditions, either immediately preceding or following them. As "songs," these traditions contribute to our conception of the message of the book by looking forward to a time when Israel "will have a song in the night" (30:29), and especially, "a new song" (42:10).

Finally, some distinctive elements that occur in the song of the vineyard have been picked up and used again in other parts of Isaiah 2–39. For example, the expression "briars and thorns" occurs nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible and is applied repeatedly to describe the effect of God's judgment on Judah and other nations, especially Assyria (7:23–25; 9:18; 10:17; 32:13). This unit is significant because, as with the first chapter, a general pattern of God's response to believers is established that can apply to later generations, long after the specific historical events that the prophet himself addresses.

5:8–30

One Side of a Framework of Judgment Against Ephraim and Judah

Around the testimony of Isaiah, 6:1–9:7, two sets of judgment oracles have been placed to form a double inclusio or bracketing frame. The outer framework contains seven woe oracles: six on one side, and one on the other. Within this framework is another inclusio composed of judgment oracles punctuated by a refrain, "for all this his anger is not turned away; his hand is stretched out still" (5:25; 9:12, 17, 21). To distinguish the entire framework from the traditions that follow, the same refrain has been added as a conclusion to the seventh woe oracle (10:4). This editorial arrangement contributes significantly to the way in which these oracles are read together in the book of Isaiah. Addressing similar parties, as did the oracles in Isa. 2:6–22 and 3:1–12, the woe oracles on both sides (5:8–23 and 10:1–4) criticize rulers and leaders in Jerusalem. Thus they have the effect of maintaining continuity with the earlier oracles in chaps. 2–3, while placing further emphasis on the responsibility of leaders who, during the events lying behind 6:1–9:7, bring about the destruction of northern Israel. The core traditions of the testimony complement the poetry of the framework through narrative descriptions of the prophet Isaiah's encounter with the Judean king Ahaz and other national leaders.

Alongside the woe oracles in this section, the other judgment oracles in the framework are directed against both Judah and Israel. They foresee the defeat of northern Israel by the Assyrians (5:26–30). The intrigue attested within the testimony itself centers on this very issue, whether or not Judah should join a coalition with Israel and Syria against the Assyrians around 735 B.C. These events immediately precede northern Israel's defeat and exile in 722. The refrain associated with these judgment oracles that surround the testimony is employed editorially as a major motif elsewhere in Isaiah 1–39, even finally applied in judgment to the victorious Assyrians (Isa. 14:24–27).

Six of Seven Woe Oracles

The woe oracles condemn various groups of people in Jerusalem and Judah, including wealthy land holders, drunkards, arrogant sages, and corrupt judges. The seventh woe oracle (10:1–4a) probably once stood at the beginning of this collection. In their correct order, the first two oracles make the most substantial case against Jerusalem's leaders and now provide an initial heightening of certain concerns illustrated by the core traditions in the narrative testimony of Isaiah (6:1–7:9). These words of judgment in the woe oracles complement the scenario presented in the preceding song of the vineyard. In both, a promising situation is undone by a variety of self-indulgent actions on the part of those most responsible for the preservation of the southern city and country.

5:8–14, The First Two Woe Oracles. The first oracle describes the accumulation of property by a few, as well as the undermining of the relationship between families and their land in a farm economy. The victims become sojourners in their own country and have no means to survive. The second of these oracles contrasts the thirst for excessive drink and entertainment with the starvation of persons who should be held in high esteem. The threat in v. 14 recalls the judgment of exile and designates those addressed as Jerusalem's "nobility."

5:15–17, The Proud Made Low. The nobility and throngs of people who will "go down" (v. 14) are linked now to the familiar refrain of 2:6–22 in which the proud are "brought low" and "humbled." This echo of an opening section of the book of Isaiah establishes a consistent idiomatic rendering of the divine word of judgment across these prophetic traditions, one applicable to Judah as well as to Assyria (10:33–34).

5:18–24, The Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Woe Oracles. The prophetically misguided, the morally inverted, those wise in their own eyes, drunkards, and bribe takers are the objects of indictment in the fourth, fifth, and sixth oracles. A threat follows, introduced by a typical "therefore" as in the previous woe oracles (v. 13). In these threats the theme is that of famine and drought in the land. In v. 24 a number of expressions occur that are similar to the language in the judgment on the vineyard in 5:5–6. There is, however, a new theme struck in the second half of v. 24. The prophetic judgment is identified with the demands of the law, like that found in Deuteronomy (see Amos 2:4). Here, the interpretation of the book of Isaiah is held together within a larger context of Scripture, including the Torah revealed through Moses. Although the prophetic oracles themselves do not directly cite the book of the Torah, this note assures readers that these books belong together and make sense as Hebrew Scripture.

5:25–30

Judgment Oracles, "His Anger Is Not Turned Back"

The judgment oracle in 5:25 is directed against the Northern Kingdom, in contrast to the preceding woe oracles. It is followed by a graphic description of how God will use Assyria as an agent of his wrath.

5:25, A Sentence of Judgment. As part of a framework around the testimony in 6:1–9:7, this oracle helps to explain the reason for God's eventual destruction of both northern Israel and southern Judah. By contrast, the historical events within the testimony depict only the intrigue between prophet and the Judean king just prior to the exile of the Northern Kingdom, more than a century before Judah would suffer a similar fate.

Verse 25 begins abruptly with a hinge word, "therefore," like that introducing the threat following a woe oracle in the immediately preceding verse. One would normally expect an indictment to precede this threat as part of a single prophetic speech. However, the effect of this unusual use of older traditions heightens the force of the threat and allows the indictment of the preceding woe oracles to justify this threat as well. The threat in v. 25 clearly belongs to a group of invective-threat oracles, distinct from the woe oracles and ending with a familiar refrain: "On account of all this, his anger is not turned away; his hand is stretched out still." These same two lines are repeated verbatim at the end of oracles of the same type (see 9:12, 17, 21) and after the last woe oracle (10:4) on the other side of the testimony. Again this refrain, like "the proud made low" (5:15-17), becomes a major way of expressing the enduring nature of God's word, eventually applied even against Assyria (14:24-27).

5:26-30, Assyria as the Agent of God's Wrath. God "whistles" for Assyria, who responds obediently as a trained animal obeys its master. Assyria's attack is compared to that of a lion seizing its prey. The land of Israel is left devastated, appearing as a place of "darkness, distress, light darkened by its cloud." This description is the same as that found in the testimony (8:22), followed by a promise that, after the Exile, those who walked in darkness will "have seen a great light."

The Testimony of Isaiah

The collection in the next passages includes prophetic autobiographical reports and narratives about the prophet's interaction with King Ahaz and concludes with promises of God's restoration. The primary historical event behind these various materials is that of the Syro-Ephraimite war (roughly 735 B.C.), which developed in response to the growing military power of Assyria (→ Assyria, Empire of).

In 738, the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser initiated a campaign from the north into Syria and Palestine. In the reign of Judah's king Ahaz (735-715 B.C.), northern Israel formed a coalition with Syria against Assyria. Judah, having the benefit of some distance from the direct challenge of Assyria, refused to join that coalition. In an effort to force collaboration, the kings of Syria (Rezin) and Israel (Pekah) sought to replace by force the Judean king in the city of Jerusalem. Ahaz had many advisers during this precarious situation, including the prophet Isaiah (→ Ahaz).

The Syro-Ephraimite war inspired Judah to form an alliance with Assyria that led to the defeat of Syria and the Northern Kingdom, Israel. The Assyrians exiled all able-bodied Israelites in 722 B.C., the last record of the northern tribes in human history (→ Exile). More than a century later, Judah faced a similar exile under the Babylonian usurpers of the Assyrian legacy (→ Babylon).

When Isaiah's word was finally rejected by King Ahaz, God instructed the prophet to "bind up the testimony" concerning these events (8:16) as a future "teaching" and a later proof of the prophet's veracity. Much within the traditions of 6:1-8:18 may derive from this specific occasion, though the older material has been expanded to address a future audience. Accordingly, the composition of 6:1-9:7 underscores the abiding significance of Isaiah's prophecies associated with a historical turning point in the life of ancient Israel.

Isaiah's Vocational Justification

Sometimes described as "the call of Isaiah," the autobiographical statement by the prophet in 6:1-13 is properly a report of his commissioning to deliver a particular message of judgment to the people of God. It is dated to the same year as the death of King Uzziah (736/35 B.C.). The king's son, Jotham, died either before his father (perhaps having served as co-regent) or shortly after. Ahaz, Jotham's son, was king of Judah when Isaiah sought to carry his divinely appointed commission as a prophet to the Southern Kingdom. The narratives that follow (Isa 7-8) illustrate the prophet's confrontation with Ahaz during the intrigue of the Syro-Ephraimite war.

The account opens with Isaiah's vision of God in his temple. Immediately the prophet recognizes that he is a human observer of Yahweh's heavenly council. He properly fears for his life, since the realm of the holy can be dangerous to the profane world (→ Holiness). After a purification ritual, Isaiah hears God's request that someone be found to represent the heavenly ones on earth by announcing their decision. A similar scene is described by the prophet Micah, son of Imlah, in 1 Kings 22:19-23. In that case, a spirit volunteers to incite the royal prophets to lie to King Zedekiah, leading him to doom. In Isaiah 6, the prophet himself volunteers to be the messenger. However, the message he hears is harsh. Moreover, it is coupled with a command to dull the people's senses so that they are not able, through the hearing of it, to change their actions and be healed or redeemed.

In his prophetic role as intercessor for God's chosen people, Isaiah pleads with God, "Lord, how long?" (cf. Amos 7:2, 5). The answer offers no reassurance: every house will be empty, and the land will be, like the vineyard in 5:1-7, utterly desolate. Only the final line offers the slightest hope—a "holy seed" will survive in the stump of the tree that has been cut down and burned. This possibility hints at a concept, developed less ambiguously later in the book, of a surviving remnant of Judah through which God would restore the nation of Israel.

This commissioning report implies the same fate for Judah as for Israel. The woe oracles against Judean leaders and the judgment oracles against the Northern Kingdom surrounding the testimony underscore this assumption. The fragile optimism at the end appears as an afterthought, without in any way ameliorating the coming disaster. Only in time, well after a full contemplation of the torturous events of national devastation for both nations, can one detect a faint glimmer of hope in the stump that is left, a glimmer that will someday adumbrate a great light to those who walk in the darkness of exile (9:2).

The Prophet, King Ahaz, and the Syro-Ephraimite War

In a series of events associated with the names or naming of three children, Isaiah is depicted in the turmoil of social unrest in Judah (735-733 B.C.). The fulfillment of his commission in chap. 6 moves from direct conversation with Ahaz in chap. 7 to indirect communication with the leaders and the people regarding the word of God. The king's and the people's lack of response to the prophet's message has already been anticipated by the commissioning in chap. 6.

Occasionally, ordinary public activities of prophets could carry extraordinary significance. Beside professing oracles, prophets could dress or behave in ways that symbolized their message. Just as Hosea's marriage constituted a symbolic act of prophecy, so Isaiah's children, by their very names, carried a message throughout their lives. The Emmanuel child in 7:14 seems to belong to some unnamed woman, whereas Isaiah's son Maher-shalal-hash-baz is born of "the prophetess," who is surely his wife. Unfortunately, nothing more is said about her, and nothing is known about her contribution, if any, to the message of Isaiah. In the formation of prophetic books, such historical detail becomes increasingly secondary to the message of the prophet. In this respect, a theocentric set of concerns takes the place of an anthropological interest in the phenomenon of prophecy. This tendency in the formation of biblical books coincides with the demise of classical prophecy and the formation of a Scripture in the postexilic period.

7:1-9, Ahaz and Isaiah on the Highway to Fuller's Field.

In the period prior to the siege of Jerusalem, God instructs Isaiah to meet King Ahaz at a particular place with a message of hope. The account in vv. 2-9 now has a historical introduction taken from 2 Kings 16:5, reminding us that the larger context of Isaiah includes a collection of other scriptural books. Verse 2 confirms Ahaz's fear about the coalition of Syria and the Northern Kingdom. Isaiah meets the king soon after, accompanied by the prophet's son, Shearjashub (meaning, "a remnant shall return"). Isaiah's message is one of comfort and assurance that God will destroy Ephraim and Syria, but with the provision that the king "not fear": the king should not seek alliances with foreign nations instead of trusting in God alone to defend the nation. The ultimatum at the end of v. 9 falls, as the context later confirms, on deaf ears.

7:10-17, Emmanuel as an Unwanted Sign.

In an effort to convince the frightened king, Isaiah offers to provide any confirming sign Ahaz might be able to imagine. Attempting to conceal his unwillingness to obey the prophetic word, in a gesture of false piety, Ahaz refuses to "test God" (see Deut. 6:16). The prophet retorts with a judgment oracle that repeats not only the claim that Syria and the Northern Kingdom will cease to exist on their land, but that a similar disaster will befall Judah. The time of the destruction of the two northern nations is tied to the birth and early childhood of a boy named "Emmanuel" (lit., "God with us"). The name symbolized that the presence of God can be a source of the greatest comfort to the righteous (Ps. 139) or, as in this historical moment, an assurance of certain judgment to those subject to God's wrath (Amos 9:2-4).

"A Young Woman/Virgin Shall Conceive and Bear a Son and Shall Call His Name Emmanuel"

Differences in the English translations confirm that a range of problems are raised by Isa. 7:14 for Jewish and Christian interpreters. The Hebrew noun for "young woman" neither requires that she be a virgin nor precludes that possibility. The LXX rendered this noun as “virgin,” which was taken in Matt. 1:22–23 to be a promise fulfilled in the birth of Jesus Christ. However, many other Greek translations rendered the same noun as simply “young woman.” Of course, this issue is not a minor one in the history of interpretation. Martin Luther allegedly offered a hundred gulden to anyone who could show a reference in the OT to a married woman designated by this term. One might argue that the “young woman” in Prov. 30:19 is by implication not a virgin. In addition to this matter of controversy, the Hebrew in Isa. 7:14 does not specify the tense of the relevant verb. The most recent translation of the Hebrew Scripture by the Jewish Publication Society reads, “a young woman has conceived”; the choice of the future tense, “will conceive,” reflects a decision that more aptly favors the NT interpretations of this verse but is not dictated conclusively by grammar alone.

A distinction needs to be made between a narrowly focused historical interpretation of Isa. 7:1–17 and the way in which the prophetic context of Isa. 7:18–9:7 has played upon the original ambiguities of 7:14 and rendered its semantic implications, so that the older oracle now applies to other periods long after the time of the prophet. Within Isa. 7:1–17, the historical setting seems explicit enough. Because Ahaz refuses to ask for a sign to confirm divine deliverance from the Syro-Ephraimite threat to the north, the prophet rebukes the king and offers the sign anyway. Before a child named “Emmanuel” will reach an age sufficient to eat solid food, the northern threat will be removed, but Judah will then face an even greater threat than the current one. In this original historical setting, “the woman” appears to be a person known to the king and to Isaiah, and the child’s life should be contemporaneous with events of the next few years. One may certainly speculate on the earliest historical identity of the woman. She may have been Ahaz’s spouse, Isaiah’s wife (“the prophetess,” see 8:3), or some other woman.

Within 7:1–9:7, the original historical situation has been interpreted within a larger context of future prophecies. Consequently, the import of the child has gained a profundity far exceeding whatever were the original political circumstances of Isa. 7:1–17. The reference to the child’s eating “curds and honey” has been applied to a future Assyrian attack on Ahaz (7:20–21) and applied, by a later editor, to the miraculous sustaining of those who are left in the land of Judah after its defeat (7:21–22). The unusual name “Emmanuel” (Heb., “God with us”) now harbors in it prophetic implications for the destruction of Judah as well as Syria and Ephraim (8:6–8) and, finally, for the nations in the future that will so threaten Judah (8:9–10). The “child sign” seems to continue in 9:1–7, where the birth of a child (9:6) portends a comparable claim of God’s presence with Israel (9:4) in the period after the Exile, when “the people walked in darkness” (9:2). Even if the original tradition of 9:1–7 was once an independent, nonmessianic “royal psalm,” its present context in the book invites a messianic interpretation. So too Isa. 7:14 has similarly engendered messianic expectations regarding the Emmanuel child among both Jews and Christians, expectations based on the warrants of the text’s “scriptural” context in 7:1–9:7.

7:18–24, Future Implications. As a series of interpretations based on the Emmanuel prophecy, a set of four “in that day” prophecies follows. The first two concern God’s use of Assyria in a manner typical of the prophecy of the eighth-century B.C. prophet. The last two “in that day” oracles (vv. 21–22 and 23–25) are more complicated. The first seems to combine an initially negative picture—farms reduced to a few surviving livestock—with the impression that each cow will produce an “abundance of milk.” Instead of continuing the immediately preceding references to milk curds and wild honey as a sign of desperate people living off a barren land, one can imagine a land miraculously flowing with milk and honey. The second of these oracles returns to a description of destitution like that in the commission (6:11–12), repeatedly employing the unusual pair of words “briars and thorns” indicative, again, of conditions depicted earlier in the song of the vineyard in 5:1–7.

8:1–4, A Third Child and a Bleak Future. As a further sign of the impending collapse of Syria and Ephraim, the prophet secured officials to witness a large tablet he had prepared on behalf of his future son, Maher-shalal-hash-baz. Though what was legally accomplished remains unclear—perhaps it was a dedication to his son—the tablet undoubtedly became a matter of public record. By this means, Isaiah confronted everyone with the terrifying name, meaning “spoil speeds, booty hastes.” As with Emmanuel, a certain moment in the child’s development would not be reached before the announced judgment would fall upon the north.

8:5–10, Further Import of Emmanuel. In the present context, the prophecy in vv. 5–8 takes up once more threats associated with the Emmanuel child (7:17). The metaphors contrast the meager water supply of Shiloah with the abundance of the Tigris in the Mesopotamian valley, home of Assyria. The floodwaters of that great river will rise up to the necks of those who dwell in Judah. However, the next prophecy (vv. 9–10) moves in a very different direction. As in

Ps. 2:2, the nations, undoubtedly including Assyria and later Babylon, plot against the people of God. They will be "broken," and the concluding explanation, "for God is with us," plays once more upon the name Emmanuel. Here the Emmanuel child represents a sign for future hope after the judgment upon Israel.

8:11-15, Fear God, Not the Nations. The same message Isaiah has given to Ahaz is summarized in a general way. The lesson missed by Ahaz has likewise been forfeited by the people. The entire nation has failed to trust Yahweh for their security, in spite of God's threat that by such disobedience "both houses of Israel" (v. 15) will stumble, become ensnared, and be "broken."

A Written Testimony for the Future

In the present context, this binding and sealing of a "testimony" and "teaching" (lit., "torah") pertains to a moment in the life of the prophet when he first began to collect his oracles in written form. The "disciples" are probably students of the prophet or, at least, members of a group aligned with Isaiah the prophet. Some scholars speculate that these disciples could be simply Isaiah's children.

The written collection of oracles is clearly intended to represent the enduring message of the prophet up to the time of the collapse of Samaria in 722/721. Furthermore, vv. 19-22 anticipate its continuing value to still later students of the traditions of Isaiah during the period of the Babylonian exile. Though they will be tempted to consult various alien mediums, they are to remain faithful to the prophetic teaching of Isaiah. The final note about exile echoes the same condition of darkness, distress, and gloom that was forecast by the oracle (5:30) just before the testimony.

A Child of Messianic Hope

The foreboding implications of Isaiah's message during the time of Ahaz are contrasted with promises that indicate a reversal in the historical predicament of Israel. Besides the obvious transition in 9:1, from the "darkness" of 8:22 to the "light" of 9:2-7, the reference to a child being born recalls the earlier use of children as prophetic signs in the book of Isaiah.

If 9:2-7 were treated as an independent unit of tradition, it could be considered an ancient "royal psalm," possibly used in festival celebrations concerned with the enthronement of a king in Judah, perhaps with either Josiah or Hezekiah. Similar remarkable epithets ("Wonderful, Counselor, . . ." v. 6) are found in Egyptian hymnology in praise of the pharaoh and are typical of exaggerated language employed in ancient Near Eastern royal eulogies. Nevertheless, just as other royal psalms have been transformed into messianic psalms in the formation of the book of Psalms (e.g., Ps. 2), this hymn in its present context no longer points back eulogistically to a familiar royal figure. Instead, it looks forward eschatologically to a restoration of the promise to David of a kingdom with "no end" (v. 7). In the context of this book, this hymn offers, at a minimum, messianic hope for the period after the Exile (8:21-22). Cyrus came to be viewed in these terms (so Isa. 44-45), though not in a manner that would end interpretation of these messianic texts. Later generations of Jews and Christians would look for yet another future person who could more completely fulfill what is here promised.

9:8-10:4

The Other Side of a Framework of Judgment Against Judah and Ephraim

9:8-20, Judgment Oracles, "His Anger Is Not Turned Back." Three judgment oracles with identical concluding refrains indict the Northern Kingdom for wrongdoing, arrogance, and refusal to trust in Yahweh. Before the last of these oracles, their original audience is made clear by the claim, "Together they are against Judah" (v. 21). Undoubtedly, "they" denote northern Israel and Syria, as mentioned in the testimony (e.g., 7:1-2).

10:1-4, The Seventh Woe Oracle. The woe oracle in 10:1-4 is the last of an original collection of seven. The rest are clustered together in Isa. 5:8-24 as part of the framework around the testimony of Isaiah. This one offers a lengthy attack on corrupt Judean judges who leave the people without any recourse to justice. An editor has added the refrain, familiar in the preceding oracles of judgment, to the end of this woe oracle. This final repetition concludes the subsection (5:8-10:4) by highlighting a recurring theme, the way in which God's "anger" and "hand" address both Israel and Judah.

Woe to Assyria and Promise to Judah

Though the opening sections of the book of Isaiah have given most weight to woe, in these traditions in 10:5-11:16 a more positive note is struck. This collection is composed of prophetic judgments against Assyria and future promises to Judah. In their present context, they often pick up elements from judgment oracles in the previous sections and interpret them in terms of a divine promise that the enemy will be defeated and Judah will be restored.

A key motif that weaves throughout this section and connects it contextually to the previous section is a play upon the term “rod.” It first occurs in the testimony (9:4) in a series of metaphorical synonyms, including “yoke” and “staff.” Here, the judgment against Assyria begins with its identification as the “rod” and “staff” of God’s anger (10:5). However, Assyria arrogantly assumes its victory really was achieved by means of its own “hand” (10:10, 13, 14), in contrast to the above-mentioned refrain, “his [God’s] hand is stretched out still” (5:25; 9:12, 17, 21; 10:4). God mocks Assyria’s folly by asking if an “ax,” “rod,” or “staff” really has any power over the one who wields it (10:15). Israel, then, is encouraged not to fear Assyria, which is merely a “rod” and “staff” in God’s hand (10:24), and is promised that the “yoke” of Assyria will someday be removed from around Israel’s neck (10:27). Finally, a messianic king is to arise as a “shoot of the stump of Jesse” (see Isa. 6:13) who will chastise the wicked with the “rod” of his mouth (11:4).

10:5–15, Assyria, the Arrogant Rod of God. This account of God’s anger with Assyria turns on a theological principle found elsewhere in the OT. Though God does not have the same relationship with other nations as with Israel, these other nations are instruments of divine activity in the world. Hence, God is concerned about how they will assess the historical experience of Israel. In a similar way, Deut. 32:27 explains that God will turn away from punishing Israel if the other nations begin to say, “Our hand is triumphant; Yahweh did not perform all this.”

10:16–19, Assyria, Like a Condemned Vineyard. As Yahweh threatened to burn and devour even the “briars and thorns” of the vineyard (5:1–7), so Assyria confronts divine punishment.

10:20–23, A Remnant Shall Return. The interpretation introduced by the stereotypic phrase “in that day” stands in contrast to the last two lines of the preceding oracle against Assyria. There the “remnant” or “remainder” of trees, which symbolize Assyria, will be so few a child could write on all of them. Here, the few Judahites who survive the Exile will be a symbol of hope (→ Remnant).

10:24–27a, God’s Anger Turns Toward Assyria. Encouraging those in Zion not to be afraid, the prophet foresees a time when the anger against Judah will be directed against their present enemy, Assyria (see 14:24–27).

10:27b–32, The Advancing Enemy. An enemy, probably Assyria, traverses the map in its march toward an attack upon Jerusalem.

10:33–34, The Proud Assyrians Made Low. Echoing phrases from 2:6–22 and 5:15–17, what the Assyrians were instrumental in doing to arrogant leaders of Jerusalem and Judah will now be done to them.

11:1–9, A Shoot from the Stump of Jesse. Picking up on the brief note in 6:13b, the next verses continue the messianic promises of 9:1–7 in terms that require a fundamental change in the natural order of animal and human relations (vv. 6–9). The text envisions a time of “shalom” when everyone in the world will have full knowledge of Yahweh.

11:10–16, A Second Exodus for the Remnant Among the Nations. In a further interpretation of Ephraim and Judah as “the seed” in the stump of Jesse (11:1), a promise oracle identifies Judeans scattered among the nations as a special “ensign.” A second time (v. 11), the Diaspora will be drawn together from the nations to form the nation of Israel (→ Diaspora).

Anticipatory Praise

The song of chap. 12 expresses confidence in God and praise for God’s promised blessings. It stands between the first major collection of Isaiah’s oracles and the oracles against the nations (chaps. 13–23). Its most important role in the book is to foreshadow the contribution of Isaiah 40–66. The crucial lines occur in the first verse: “Your anger turned away; you comforted me.” This is the only occasion, outside the refrain in the framework around the testimony, that this same noun and verb (“anger,” “turned”) are found together in the book of Isaiah. Moreover, the second line is the only place in Isaiah 1–39 where an overt statement is made regarding God’s “comforting” Judah, the basic theme of the second half of the book. Isa. 40:1 opens accordingly: “Comfort, comfort my people, says your God.” The second verse in chap. 12 picks up again the basic message of the prophet to Ahaz (Isa. 7; 8:11–15). The assertion that God’s name will be “exalted” echoes the refrain in 2:11, 17 and 5:16.

The purpose of the song is to cast the traditions of 1–39 within the perspective of the book as a whole. The two basic parts of the book of Isaiah are presented as belonging to two different periods: a time of God's anger against Judah and Jerusalem (Isa. 1-39) and a time of comfort (Isa. 40-66). Already Isa. 1:24-26, in the introduction to the book, hinted at this same temporal distinction between a period of prophetic condemnation followed "afterward" by restoration. In Isaiah 40-55, this same distinction is made between the revelation of "former things," which by implication are found in Isaiah 1-39, and "new" or "latter things" in Isaiah 40-66. Historical events of the eighth century B.C. clearly do surface at many places in Isaiah 1-39, though the wider context of the book transforms the older prophecies generally into a message addressed to later generations. In Isaiah 12 "the word of God" appears as part of a transhistorical description of the nature of God's activity in the world.

In sum, Isaiah 12 illustrates once more that the book of Isaiah is not primarily an antiquarian record of prophetic activity but is intended to provide a depiction of the nature of God's relationship to a chosen people, and to humanity in general. This organization of ancient traditions in Scripture presumes their value to later generations and, like the psalm in Isaiah 12, addresses future readers in a "present tense." However, this specific orientation to ancient prophetic traditions does not deny that they finally remain a tapestry of human words, deriving from different times and places. Editorially, these traditions cohere under the impress of the presentation of the prophet Isaiah, dependent upon, but not determined by, ordinary concerns of history.

Oracles Against the Nations

Commonly within the biblical books of prophecy, oracles against various nations are found clustered together. Similar collections occur in Amos 1:3-2:6, Jeremiah 46-51, and Ezekiel 25-32. The earliest comparable example of oracles against a foreign nation occurs as part of the activity of the Moabite seer Balaam (Num. 22-24). As in that instance, the use of prophecy against other nations is often associated with holy war, and the first verses of the oracle directed to Babylon in Isaiah 13 suggest just such an application. However, the scope of God's confrontation with the nations in Isaiah 13-23 far exceeds that of a particular moment of prophetic activity. It extends to the entire world (13:11), involves cosmic changes (13:13), and entails a final reordering of relationships among all the nations. In the most radical terms, God will "in that day" be able to call Egypt "my people" and Assyria "the work of my hands" (19:24-25). A comparison of Isa. 13:1-16 with the opening verses of the prophetic promises in Isaiah 24-27 shows that these oracles against the nations are linked closely to an equally radical vision of the restoration of Israel. Just as Judah and Israel experience the wrath of God in response to their disobedience and yet look forward to a promise of divine restoration, so, too, judgment of nations according to the "purpose" or "plan" of God (see Isa. 14:24-27; 19:12, 17; 23:8-9) has beyond it a promise of future world peace.

Other elements within Isaiah 13-23 show how the place of these oracles within the larger composition affects their interpretation. Some repeated expressions within the judgment prophecies against Judah in Isaiah 1-12 recur in these threats against the nations. The imagery of the proud made low (13:11; 14:8-15; 16:6; 17:4) resonates with the refrain in 2:6-22. In 14:24-27 a direct play is made upon the refrain "his hand is stretched out still" in the judgment oracles of 5:25 and 9:8-20. At several places one hears again about the "rod," "staff," or "yoke" of nations that will be broken (14:5, 25, 29) in a manner that clearly recalls the same motifs in the promises present in 9:4 and throughout 10:1-11:16. This set of repeated words and phrases, which deepens in its religious significance, serves to provide continuity throughout the book.

The depiction of how God uses and relates to other nations precedes a similar concern with God's relation to the Persians in Isaiah 40-66. The appearance of Cyrus is introduced in 41:25 by the expression "I stirred up one from the north," using the same verb as 13:17, "I am stirring up the Medes against them." As with the nations, Cyrus's actions conform to God's "purpose" or "plan" (44:28; cf. 14:26), though he does not realize it (45:5; cf. 5:5-15; 14:5). Likewise, the threat against Babylon (13:17-22) closely parallels similar prophecies in 46:1-4 and 47:1-15. Once again, Isaiah 13-23 is significant because it marks out a specific religious vocabulary, providing transhistorical terms by which a believer can describe the world and the role of nations within it.

13:1-22, Against Babylon. The title (v. 1) sets the segment of traditions in chap. 13 apart from the preceding ones and associates it with the prophet Isaiah in the same style of 2:1. This and many of the prophecies that follow are designated by a technical term that can be translated either "oracle," "load," or "burden" (e.g., 13:1; 14:28; 15:1; 17:1).

13:1-16, A Holy War. The oracle encompasses the principal elements of a holy war, including inducement for national leaders to summon a public lamentation (cf. Joel 1:13-14; 2:15-17).

The nature of this battle leads to consideration of "the Day of the Lord" and a final cosmic punishment of evil throughout the whole world. Though the title has assigned this threat to Babylon, the elusive nature of the opening lines allows these words against Babylon to be viewed as a typological account of the final victory of God over all the world's unrighteous "in that day."

13:17-22, The Downfall of Babylon. Only here does the imagery identify explicit historical parties. The Medes, long-time allies of the Babylonians, will turn against them. Certainly, in the present context this threat anticipates the rise of the Persians and the defeat of the Babylonians, who were victorious over Judah about a century after the time of Isaiah's prophetic activity. Clearly, this portion of the book presumes the historical context of Isaiah 40-66.

14:1-27, Judah in Contrast to Babylon and Assyria

14:1-2, The Captors Are Captives. Judah and Israel are promised that those who took them into exile will one day become slaves themselves (see 61:5-7).

14:3-23, Taunt Against Babylon. The proud boasts of Judah's antagonist are portrayed as so pretentious as to be an assault on heaven itself (vv. 13-14). Hence, Babylon faces complete humiliation. In mockery of Babylon's sense of superiority, the dead in that once great nation will be left unburied in the streets.

14:24-27, Israel's Judgment Applied to Assyria. It is promised to Judah that Assyria will reap the same consequences as did the Northern Kingdom, Israel. The refrain in 5:25; 9:12, 17, 21; and 10:4, found within the framework around the testimony of Isaiah, is taken up and applied to Assyria (14:26-27). Likewise, the author proclaims a fulfillment of the promise in 9:4 regarding God's breaking of the "yoke" and "burden" that troubles Judah.

14:28-32, Against Philistia. Its title indicates that the date of the oracle in 14:28-32 coincides with the death of Ahaz, even as the commission report in Isaiah 6 is dated to the year Uzziah died. The death of a king represented a momentous and potentially dangerous period in which some word from God might seem timely. As in Isa. 10:5, a Mesopotamian power is called a "rod" of God. Philistia will suffer the effects of famine and destruction.

15:1-16:14, Against Moab. Two prophecies of threat occur in 15:1-9 and 16:1-5, followed by a lamentation with an additional prophecy in 16:12-13. Isaiah 16:4b-5 provides a messianic promise of the restoration of David's throne about to be fulfilled after the destruction of Moab.

17:1-11, Against Damascus and Israel.

The core of the prophecy in 17:1-6 probably derives from the period of the Syro-Ephraimite war (735-733 B.C.). Damascus and Israel, the northern opponents to Judah at that time, provoke God's anger. In expressions familiar already (2:6-22), "the glory of Jacob [Israel] will be brought low" (v. 4). Within this judgment is a promise (vv. 7-8) that "in that day" people will recognize "their Maker" and no longer worship objects of their own making. This concern with idolatry seems typical of conditions in the exilic period. By wedding traditions from different periods, the prophecy gains a topical quality and is no longer interpreted solely in connection with a singular historical event.

17:12-14, Against Assyria. The judgment directed to Damascus and Israel is followed by an oracle against their enemy, Assyria. Though these verbs do not explicitly name the one to be defeated, the expressions chosen hark back to descriptions of Assyria. The "roar of many waters" recalls the imagery in 8:5-8. The "roaring" noise is reminiscent of the description of the Assyrian onslaught in 5:26-30. The sudden terror "at evening time" in v. 14 undoubtedly brings to mind the events of 701 B.C., when Jerusalem was under siege and wondrously rescued by divine intervention (see Isa. 37:33-38). The last verse offers a summary and an appraisal of how these events fit into the plan of God, similar to the summary in 14:26-27. In the description of those who "spoil," "rob," or "plunder" echoes the name of Isaiah's child Maher-shalal-hash-baz ("spoil speeds, booty hastes"; see Isa. 8:1-4). By not explicitly naming the enemy, the text asserts a pattern of how God can respond to any who might be temporarily victorious against God's own people.

18:1-7, Against Ethiopia. The mention (v. 1) of ambassadors who arrive on papyrus ships to visit Judah may harbor references to the Ashdod rebellion of 713-711 B.C. or, earlier, to the organization of an anti-Assyrian rebellion by Egypt between 705-701 B.C. In both cases Hezekiah seems to have joined the coalition. All attempts to find security through alien alliances, rather than by reliance on God alone, are doomed. The last verse, like that of 19:24-25, gives a note of promise, pointing to a time when even the Ethiopians will come to worship at Mount Zion, and it anticipates the same hope as found in Isa. 45:14.

19:1-15, Against Egypt. Under Hezekiah, Judah often looked to Egypt as an ally in the hope of fending off northern enemies. This oracle offers a general threat against Egypt, prophesying anarchy among those who desperately consult mediums for advice (cf. Isa. 8:18-19), drying up of the Nile, and a confusion of the wisdom for which the princes of Zoan (a city in the northeastern delta region of Egypt) had been famous. The last verse contains a direct play on the language of the threat against Israel in 9:14, confirming again the topical character and vitality of these expressions describing divine wrath.

19:16-24, Israel, Egypt, Assyria: "In That Day." A series of five "in that day" oracles provides brief promissory comments that look boldly into the future. The hope expressed is remarkable in its universal breadth, envisioning the complete realization of the promise to Abraham, that through Israel all the nations of the world will someday be "blessed."

20:1-6, Assyria Against Egypt and Ethiopia. A further comment conveys another divine response to Egypt, and now Ethiopia. The reference in the title to Ashdod suggests the time of the Philistines' revolt of 713-711 B.C., when they were defeated by the Assyrians. Isaiah is presented as performing the symbolic act of walking naked and barefoot for three years as "a sign and a portent" (v. 3). This act signifies that Egypt, and Ethiopia to the south, will both suffer the same fate, as a result of their coalition with Judah in revolt against Assyria in 705-701.

21:1-10, Against Babylon. Similar to 13:17-22, the prophecy in 21:1-10 looks to the future of Judah's later antagonist. Babylon will fall to the Elamites and Medes and will be replaced as a major power by the Persians. The lamentation here is comparable to that of Isaiah 47. Again the fortunes of Assyria are made parallel to the later spoiler of Judah, Babylon.

21:11-17, Against Arabia. Dumah (v. 11), Tema (v. 14), and Kedar (v. 16) are probably all provinces of Arabia (Gen. 25:13-15). The underlying events remain obscure, despite a specific time of fulfillment mentioned in v. 16. The later Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible emended "Dumah" to read "Idumea" (Edom), which might be suggested by the reference in v. 11 to Seir, a region of Edom. However, the sequence does not require that Seir and Dumah be synonymous, for the second merely describes in poetic terms the location and activity of the prophet. From whatever period these oracles may derive, they proclaim further the universal nature of God's judgment on the nations.

22:1-14, Against the "Valley of Vision." The present context makes clear that Jerusalem (see vv. 8, 10) is the object of the prophecy against the "valley of vision." The Old Greek translation unnecessarily emended the word for "vision" to "Zion" to remove any ambiguity in the title. The title is taken from v. 5 and conforms in style to other titles in the oracles against the nations. Moreover, "vision" is a term summarizing the preaching of Isaiah, with its focus on the destiny of Judah and Jerusalem (Isa. 1:1; cf. 21:2). The oracle contrasts the unabandoned celebration of a temporary victory (vv. 1-2) with the impending destruction of the city. One can readily imagine such a response when Judeans claimed dramatic relief from the siege of Jerusalem in 701 B.C. (Isa. 37:36-38), in contrast to their despair when the Babylonians sacked the city many decades later, in 586 B.C.

This tradition, similar to Isaiah 39, overtly anticipates the conditions of Babylonian exile to which Isaiah 40-66 offers hope. The account is not simply a historical recollection of past events but is presented as a lesson to be learned regarding what God expects of those who seek salvation in the light of past divine judgment and continuing promises.

22:15-25, Against Hezekiah's Royal Officials Shebna and Eliakim. The officials mentioned in 22:15-25 are also cited in the narratives of Isaiah 36-37 (= 2 Kings 18-19). The reference to Shebna appears to be an editorial addition based on Isa. 36:3 and 37:2. The text announces judgment against two leading officials associated with Hezekiah, just as the king himself looks to the future judgment in Isaiah 39. In contrast to the king, whose prayers gain him personal redemption, the other leaders under Hezekiah meet their own fates according to their belief or lack of it. Shebna is portrayed as presumptuous and subject to divine wrath (vv. 15-19), whereas Eliakim, who bears the weight of the hope symbolized by the house of David, meets defeat in the end.

These elusive accounts about individuals known elsewhere in Scripture solely by their names illustrate God's continuing attention to the obedience and disobedience of specific individuals during a time of national judgment. The last verse warns that the actions of none of these leaders was exemplary enough or sufficiently effective to avert Babylonian exile.

23:1-18, Against Phoenicia. Any collection of prophetic oracles aimed at the nations of "the whole earth" (see 13:5; 23:17) would seem incomplete without including the mighty sea traders on the northern coasts of Palestine. As in many of the other oracles, the tone is more one of lamentation than of prophecy, but with a clear note of judgment and, finally, promise at the end. Actual historical circumstances are ambiguous, though the destruction of Phoenicia is explicit. Their destiny belongs to the "purpose" of God (vv. 8-9) and, as before, results from God's hand stretched out in anger (v. 11). The once great sea trader is reduced to playing the harlot "among all the kingdoms of the world upon the face of the earth" (v. 17). This note of universality recalls the same tone present at the beginning of the oracles against the nations in 13:5, 13. The final words are a promise to Israel that all the trading goods will “be dedicated to the Lord” and will supply needs for those who remain loyal to God.

Promises and Visions of the Future

Regarded by most scholars as one of the latest sections to be included in the book of Isaiah, chaps. 24–27 combine a great variety of traditions, including lament (26:7–19), thanksgiving (24:14–16a), judgment oracles (24:1–13), and promises cast as songs (26:1–6; 27:2–5) or as standard prophetic oracles (27:6–11). Interspersed throughout this collection are citations from different parts of Isaiah, including a full revision of the song of the vineyard according to a new vision of the future (27:2–5; cf. Isa. 5:1–7).

What is contextually significant about this loose collection of traditions is their aim to interpret the earlier oracles against the nations (13–23) explicitly in terms of God’s future restoration of the world. Just as Babylon appears in 13:1–16 first as an unnamed representative nation, so here in chap. 24 and in 25:1–4, a representative city is the object of divine wrath. This city is described in various ways throughout these chapters: “the city of chaos” (24:10), “the palace of aliens” (25:2), “the lofty city” (26:5), “the fortified city” (27:10). Scholars have speculated without consensus regarding its original historical identity. It seems clear the biblical writers intended that the identification of this city should remain elusive, foreshadowing Israel’s antagonists, as yet unnamed, in the final confrontation of God with the world’s evil powers. The destruction of this enemy city stands in sharp contrast to the restoration of the city of Jerusalem, “Mount Zion” (25:6–8, 9–12). The respective fates of these two great cities, facing a reversal of their fortunes in the course of God’s plan or purpose in history, constitutes a major theme within these chapters. Threats from the enemy city and its arrogant assertions of control in human affairs are interpreted from God’s point of view, which looks for “that day.” When “that day” comes, the world will be purged through the fire of divine wrath so that all people may live, at last, in peace, justice, and obedience to the laws of God.

Scholars debate how these traditions form a coherent composition. Chaps. 24–26 seem to interweave (in a liturgical manner similar to Isa. 33) prophetic threats against the enemy with various prayers, including songs of lament, praise, and thanksgiving from the righteous survivors in Judah. The last chapter contains a series of short, additional eschatological judgments, each introduced with the formula “in that day” (27:1, 2, 6, 12).

The Purging Judgment of an Evil World and Israel’s Praise to God

Chaps. 24–26 alternate prophetic words of judgment against unnamed enemy nations with the prayers of the redeemed in Jerusalem: 24:1–13, prophetic judgment; 24:14–16, description of praise; 24:17–23, judgment; 25:1–5, praise; 25:6–12, promise, praise, judgment; 26:1–6, praise; and 26:7–21, lament and a reassuring divine response. The collection contemplates “that day” and the final defeat of an unnamed enemy city that is a rival to Jerusalem.

24:1–13, Both the Earth and the City of Chaos Will Mourn.

The surface of the earth will be catastrophically “twisted” and its inhabitants “scattered” (v. 1). This ultimate judgment of the world occurs because the people have broken the laws of “the everlasting covenant” (24:5). This same expression is used elsewhere in Hebrew Scripture to designate the special covenant God made with Noah and the world surviving the flood in Gen. 9:16. An allusion is probably being made, as well, to legal ordinance regarding land polluted with blood (Num. 35:33). This combination of allusions links the text of Isaiah to the written Torah of Moses (Gen.–Deut.) with its account of covenants of revealed “laws” and “statutes” that postexilic Israel is to obey.

The last verses (7–13) describe various scenes of devastation among the people of the nations. Their joy, their singing, and their drinking of wine in celebration all come to an end. Only “a few” people survive (v. 6), and the streets of the “city of chaos” (vv. 10–13) are deserted and its gates in ruin.

The “Torah” in Isaiah 1–39

Because the “Torah” may be viewed as the central subject matter of the Hebrew Bible, the significance of this term in Isaiah 1–39 becomes important both for understanding later Jewish interpretation of these traditions within Hebrew Scripture and for appreciating Christian options for interpreting Isaiah in the context of Christian Scripture.

The term torah has a range of meaning that includes “teaching, instruction, and law.” This noun gained popularity as an expression of the content of the message of priests, prophets, and sages. The wide occurrence of the term to embrace the full range of biblical traditions made it an ideal concept to express the locus of biblical revelation. With the promulgation of the five-book Mosaic Torah under Ezra in the fifth century B.C., a literary standard or “canon” was established that highlighted the Torah as revealed law, with accompanying interpretation through biblical narratives and prose (see Deut. 1:5). Later, other books of Hebrew formed a "fence" or "halo" around this conception of the Torah and were viewed as commentary upon it. This scriptural ordering of traditions is similar to that of the Christian Gospels in the NT, followed by the Pauline Letters and other writings, as various witnesses to the one gospel of Jesus Christ.

The term torah occurs seven times in Isaiah 1-39 and twelve times in the entire book. Four of the seven instances in the first part of the book seem to equate torah simply with the oracles and interpretive traditions of the prophet. In 8:16 and 30:9, Isaiah's prophecies are written down and designated as "torah and testimony" and "the torah of the Lord." Also, in 1:10 and 5:24, God's torah is associated with the word of God delivered by the prophet Isaiah. However, the reference in 24:5 concerns "the statutes" and "an everlasting covenant," distinct from the teaching of Isaiah. Both of the remaining references (2:3 and 8:20) probably belong to the exilic and postexilic periods, when the Torah was specifically identified with the law revealed to Moses. Torah in Isaiah 40-66 consistently presumes a revealed Mosaic legislation as the norm against which to judge Israel's failure and the guide to future obedience and divine reward (see Isa. 42:4, 21, 24; 51:4, 7).

In sum, the book of Isaiah has identified the prophetic "word" and "torah" ("teaching") of Isaiah with the one Torah revealed in Hebrew Scripture. With these warrants, Jewish interpretation properly viewed Isaiah as commentary on the Mosaic Torah and assumed this same Torah to be a primary subject matter of the book of Isaiah. Though these literary connections are visible enough within Hebrew Scripture, the book of Isaiah still retains remarkable independence from specific interpretations of the Mosaic Torah. The possibility of reading the book as a source of divine promise or wisdom was, therefore, not negated by any harmonizing program in the late stages in the formation of the book. Christians, with differing views concerning the legal Torah, sought to minimize this connection in order to concentrate on promissory and sapiential (wisdom) interpretations of Isaiah, which find fulfillment or full disclosure in the gospel of Jesus Christ.

24:14-16, Songs of Praise, with a Note of Lamentation. Across the promised land, people rejoice and glorify God for what has happened throughout the world. It is logical to assume this voice, though unnamed, rises from those in Judah who have seen their vindication "on that day." The final verse expresses what may be a cryptic word of warning from the prophet to those who too readily rejoice in the defeat of their enemies. The last expression, dependent on 21:2, produces a mysterious effect, though it may be a text error and is omitted from the Old Greek translation.

24:17-23, Enemies Thrown into the Pit. Besides describing God's continuing confrontation with the surface of the planet ("the earth staggers," v. 20), this text reports that those who try to flee from the cities, as well as the disobedient "hosts of heaven," will be as prisoners in the pit. The pit is here a symbol of the dark recesses in which the shades of the dead roam with no escape. The "hosts of heaven" is a parallel expression to "the kings of the earth" and may indicate the stars that were thought to regulate human fate. More likely (and certainly a common assumption within the history of interpretation), these divine beings are to be identified as rebellious angels (Gen. 6:1-4). In the end, a restored Jerusalem, from which God will reign, will arise (v. 23).

25:1-5, Praise to God for the Destruction of "the Palace of Aliens." A prayer glorifies God for doing "wonderful things," including the destruction of the "the city" of the enemy, which will never be rebuilt. God himself is Israel's "shelter" in the storm that destroys the alien aggressors.

25:6-12, Promise, Praise, and Judgment Against Moab. Various traditions support the pattern of these verses. God will provide a banquet for the elect, and death will be "swallowed up forever." Verse 8 provides a hint of the words of comfort, which occur in the latter half of the book, that God will himself wipe away the tears of those who once suffered. Praise by the people follows in v. 9, language reminiscent of Isaiah 12. The last verses add a searing judgment against Moab, whose pride will be laid low (2:9, 11, 17).

26:1-6, A Song of Zion, a "Strong City." Picking up the central message of Isaiah, the author portrays Jerusalem as a city of "salvation," "perfect peace," and refuge for those who continue to maintain "trust" in God. Conversely, "the lofty city," which offered false security through moral compromise and international alliances, will be "made low, . . . cast . . . down to the dust" (v. 5), recalling again the imagery from Isa. 2:6-22.

26:7-21, A Hymn of Lament and an Assuring Divine Response. An extensive song of lamentation is followed by an assurance to the effect that in "a little while" (v. 20) the time of God's judgment of the nations will be complete and the answer to the prayers of Israel's past will be answered. It expresses hope, once more, for a time of peace (v. 12) and a restoration of the nation (v. 15). Within this portrayal is a remarkable affirmation that “your dead will rise” and that divine light will fall on the darkness of the realm of the shades in Sheol (v. 19). Probably, as in Ezek. 37:1–14, the language is a hyperbolic expression of confidence that God will restore the nation of Israel, but without an explicit or developed conception of the resurrection of individuals. This ambiguity leaves open other possibilities for later readers who contemplate a more explicit conception of the restoration of the dead within the religious beliefs of Judaism and Christianity.

27:1–13

“In That Day” and “Those to Come”

In a series of four additional notes, the future is explored as a series of wondrous reversals of the earlier devastations of Judah and Israel.

27:1, Slaying of the Serpent Leviathan.

Employing the common ancient Near Eastern symbolism of Leviathan, the monster of chaos, the prophet confirms God’s cosmic victory over the forces of evil in the world.

27:2–5, A New Song of the Vineyard, “In That Day.”

These verses provide the best example in the book of Isaiah of a full recasting of an earlier oracle of judgment (5:1–7) according to a message of promise that allows a reverse interpretation of its imagery. This recasting is significant since the theme of “the vineyard” and motifs within the “song” of Isaiah 5 became constitutive throughout Isaiah 1–39.

Yahweh is presented immediately as the owner of the vineyard and as the one who waters and guards it. The key motif of “briars and thorns,” applied repeatedly in Isaiah 1–39 to symbolize the implication of God’s wrath (5:6; 7:23–25; 10:17; 32:13), can never invade this vineyard. On the basis of this promise, Israel is twice encouraged to make peace with God.

27:6, “Jacob Shall Take Root.” As in the preceding new song of the vineyard, this promise takes up a memorable theme and asserts it in unequivocally positive tones. What was a mere seed in the stump in the commission of Isaiah (6:13b) becomes subject to a promise of new growth (so Isa. 4:2; 11:1, 10). The emphasis here is on restored Israel “filling the whole world with fruit,” consonant with a theme in this section and in the oracles against the nations regarding God’s judgment and renovation of the entire earth.

27:7–11, The Fortified City Lies Desolate.

As in the beginning of this section, an unnamed city is deserted, its population decimated. Connected to this bleak picture is the assurance that, through the experience of exile, “the guilt of Jacob” has been removed. In relation to the unnamed city itself, the prophet condemns a group of people who remain “without discernment.” Perhaps the city of Samaria and the people later described as “Samaritans,” who came to be regarded by many postexilic Jews as a misguided people (→ Samaritans), provide the historical background. Regardless, in the context of Isaiah 25–27, a city is portrayed as representative of false centers of power and pretension that can be contrasted with God’s chosen people and city of Zion.

27:12–13, The Exiled Return. The section concludes with the remnant of exiled Israel returned to their land and to “the holy mountain” of Jerusalem.

Judgments and Promises to Judah

The pattern of judgment followed by promise oracles is basic to the book of Isaiah. Consistent with this pattern, Isaiah 28–35 offers a collection of, essentially, judgment oracles against Judah in chaps. 28–32, followed by a liturgical condemnation of Assyria in Isaiah 33, and then oracles of promise in chaps. 34 and 35. A closer examination suggests further resemblances between these chapters and other sections of the book. Within Isaiah 1–12, there were seven “woe oracles” against Judah (5:8–24 and 10:1–4) around the testimony (6:1–9:7), followed by judgments against Assyria, which were introduced with a woe oracle in 10:5–11. The same pattern may be observed in the organization of Isaiah 28–32. The collection of judgments is introduced and segmented with woe oracles (see Isa. 28:1; 29:1, 15; 30:1; 31:1), followed by a liturgical condemnation of Assyria that begins with a woe oracle as well (see 33:1).

In very general terms, the prophecies in Isaiah 2–9 concentrated on Judah’s response during the time of the Syro-Ephraimite war; those in Isaiah 28–32 are mostly related to later events associated with Hezekiah’s rebellion against Sennacherib (705–701 B.C.), as are the subsequent narratives in Isaiah 36–37. Despite this evidence of different historical periods underlying these prophetic oracles, these historical backgrounds play a persistent but limited role in the present context. The editors have presented the prophecies in continuity with the pattern present in earlier portions of the book. The chapter reinforces the now familiar scenario of God’s judgment, followed by the assurance of divine promises, national restoration, and world peace. Throughout the various subcollections, editors have ensured that the language reverberates with certain recurring idioms indicative of the message and distinctive style of Isaiah.

28:1-29

Woe to Ephraim and to the Rulers in Judah

28:1-6, Proud Ephraim Is Brought Down.

The woe oracles in the first section of the book concerned Judah (5:8-24; 10:1-4) and were preoccupied with excessive drinking on the part of leaders as a sign of the fading glory (v. 4) of the nation. Now, with the addressee as Ephraim, the author picks up again the familiar motif of the proud being cast down to the earth (v. 2). The punishment, which seems to assume the exile of the Northern Kingdom, introduces the rest of the judgment oracles in Isaiah 28-32 as focusing on Judah, which remains in the land.

28:7-13, Misguided Priests and Prophets.

An indictment is made of those who, like the Ephraimites, remain drunken and resistant to the consistent message of Isaiah not to resist the Assyrian threat (v. 7). The meaning of the repeated lines (vv. 10, 13) continues to be debated, and they vary greatly from translation to translation. The Old Greek version took the words to mean "affliction upon affliction, hope upon hope." These repetitious monosyllables may be part of a chant used by children in learning the alphabet. Whether the line is a childish ditty or drunken nonsense, it indicates how they misunderstood the word of God and serves as a sign associated with their punishment.

28:14-22, Rulers of Jerusalem Rebuked.

The nation's political leaders are portrayed as "scoffers" (vv. 14, 22), who have made a "covenant with death." Foreign alliances again fly in the face of the prophet's message to believe and have no fear; God has made a promise to Zion.

28:23-29, God's Actions Are Like Those of a Wise Farmer.

Drawing on common knowledge about the different times and the various planting and harvesting techniques that ensure a successful farm, a parable is provided that explains the diverse ways in which God responds to his people. The wisdom of such a farmer is comparable to the wisdom of God. This analogy perhaps answers those who question the counsel of the prophet during the Assyrian crisis.

29:1-24

Woe Ariel, City of David

29:1-8, The City Under Siege. Jerusalem (Ariel) is under siege as a judgment of the Lord, but the siege is suddenly averted by a "visitation" of the Lord (vv. 5-6). The occasion for this saying was probably the wondrous abandonment of the siege by Sennacherib in 701, as described in Isa. 37:33-38.

29:9-12, A Spirit of Deep Sleep. Consistent with God's statement in the commissioning of Isaiah in 6:9-10, the people will be blind to the truth of the prophet's word, though their eyes are wide open. Although the prophet's message is clearly present before them, it is like a sealed book, they cannot appropriate it.

29:13-14, Lip Service in Worship. The same theme of a lack of understanding, despite a verbalization of beliefs, leads God to increase the confusion of the wise in Judah.

29:15-24

Woe to Ones Hiding from God's Counsel

29:15-16, Those Who Turn Things Upside Down. Many of the prophet's earlier oracles mocked the Assyrians for thinking they were more than a mere "rod" of God's wrath (10:15). The unresponsive in Judah are here portrayed as equally foolish, thinking they are the potter when they are only the clay. They falsely assume they can do things in secret that will never be exposed.

29:17-24, A Vision of Promise. This note offers assurance that the deaf will someday hear and those blind to the message in Judah will understand it. These words clearly set the preceding judgments of Isaiah 28-29 within the context of a divine plan in which the destruction is intended to purge the nation of disobedience and lead to a time of discernment and restoration.

30:1-33

Woe to the Rebellious Children

30:1-5, "A Plan, but Not Mine." Warning is given to those who, as did Hezekiah, seek alliances with Egypt as a way to hold off the enemy. All these efforts lack God's counsel and will end in public shame.

30:6-7, Egypt's Worthless Help. These obscure words seem to describe the dangerous route of emissaries from Judah who seek Egypt's help. The reference to Rahab, a mythical monster of chaos, makes mockery of the great images of gods in Egypt, which are intimidating in appearance but powerless to move.

30:8-17, A Book of Divine Instruction Despised. As in the testimony (6:1-9:7), the prophet is once more presented as making a public record of his message, which the officials have refused to hear or acknowledge. As in the commissioning of Isaiah (6:9-10), the leaders of Judah actively seek to be ignorant of the prophet's message, even encouraging prophets to lie so that the oracles may be heard as they wish them to be. An indictment and threat follows (vv. 12-14) that finds vivid analogy to Judah's ruin with a break in a wall and a shattered vessel. Finally, the oracle repeats what has been heard before, namely, that Judah has rejected the central message of Isaiah (v. 15) and will, therefore, fall victim to its enemies.

30:18-26, A Wondrous Restoration. As in 29:17-24, promise is juxtaposed with the announcement of divine wrath to clarify the purpose and goal of the chastisement of God's chosen people. In terms like that of Isaiah 24-27, the graciousness of God will conclude the period of punishment by establishing a whole new situation for Zion. The blindness and dumbness that have plagued Judah will disappear. Idolatry will be abandoned; the natural order will be transformed so that rain will be unusually abundant; and the moon will be as bright as the sun. God will completely heal "the wounds inflicted by his blow."

30:27-33, The Fall of the Assyrians. Consistent with the preceding assurance is a statement that anticipates the sacking of Nineveh, the capital city of Assyria, in 612 B.C. After abandoning the siege of Jerusalem in the time of Hezekiah, the Assyrian king confronts the full retribution of God, and Judah exults in the triumph of God over the long-familiar adversary.

31:1-32:20

Woe to Those Who Go Down To Egypt

The prophet explores a theme familiar within this section of the book by continuing to denounce those who seek security in an alliance with Egypt.

31:1-3, Egypt Instead of the Holy One of Israel. In a poignant reminder that horses and chariots are not comparable to the power of God, Judah is warned, once more, against making foreign alliances. Judah's dependence on such alliances entails a political compromise that explicitly rejects the counsel of Yahweh.

31:4-9, Yahweh as a Lion. The description of God as a wild beast in pursuit of prey recalls the imagery of Assyria's attack upon Judah (Isa. 5:29-30). God, like a hovering bird, will protect Jerusalem.

32:1-8, Eyes Shall See, Ears Shall Hear.

As with other prophecies of promise, a common feature in Isaiah is the appearance of an ideal king who will "rule in justice." Accompanying this event will be a reversal of the responses by the people listed in the commission of the prophet (6:9-10). They will, at last, "see" and "hear"; their minds will become rational; and they will be able to speak clearly (v. 4). Verses 6-8 probably derive from later, postexilic interpretation cast in language typical of wisdom literature. A series of proverbial sayings contrast the actions of "the fool" and "the scoundrel." The writer seems to assume that when the people can hear and see normally again, then the logic of wisdom will be applicable in a standard fashion. This passage illustrates well both the independence and complementarity of wisdom and prophecy.

32:9-14, Women Who Are at Ease. In a threat against wealthy women, similar to that of 3:16-17, the prophet summons them to mourn (vv. 9-12) over the destruction to come "in little more than a year." The description of the destruction of the city plays directly upon the language of the song of the vineyard in Isa. 5:1-7. In place of a fruitful economy, there will be "thorns and briars"; the once "joyful city" will be deserted, and its "watchtower" will be inhabited by wild animals.

32:15-20, Justice as a Future Promise. A fitting positive conclusion to all that has preceded in Isaiah 2-32 looks toward the time when all the promises given will be fulfilled. The final wisdom saying, "Happy are those . . ." (v. 20) provides comfort for those who will live in the time of "peace." Such will be the reward for those who obey the prophetic instruction to seek "righteousness, quietness, and trust forever" (v. 17). By so referring to the essence of the prophet's message to troubled eighth-century B.C. Judah, the earlier sections in the book are brought to a crescendo and made to apply to later readers. These verses may once have belonged to the conclusion of an edition of Isaiah's oracles completed during the reign of Josiah, an edition that included much of Isa. 2:5-32:14.

Woe to the Destroyer

A summary of the prophet's message is accompanied by an appropriate response by the people. Chap. 33 is a composite of once independent units or fragments of tradition, suggesting a special function prior to its placement here. It may once have been a prophetic liturgy that expressed, in a later period, the people's recognition of Isaiah's prophecies and their desire for God's salvation. Performed with antiphonal responses, this impressive oral tradition contains the laments of the people and a challenge to them to be righteous, as well as a vivid denunciation of their enemy. The different traditions have not been harmonized and are, therefore, readily discernible: vv. 1–6, a prophetic threat against “the destroyer”; vv. 7–9, a lamentation of the people; vv. 10–13, another threat against the enemy; vv. 14–16, a Torah interrogation like that found in Pss. 15 and 24:3–6; vv. 17–19, a promise oracle; vv. 20–22, a hymn of confidence like that of Psalm 23; v. 23, another threat; and v. 24, a prophetic promise to Judah. Whether or not the unnamed enemy was Babylon, as seems plausible, the context of this chapter makes it representative and applicable to future times when foes rise up against those who look to the words of Isaiah and hope for a messianic age of peace.

The Future of Zion

Much like those in the preceding chapter, the traditions in chaps. 34–35 are editorial compositions that recall the earlier traditions in Isaiah 2–32 and anticipate those found in Isaiah 40–66. Whoever composed them had traditions from both these parts of the book of Isaiah at hand. Chaps. 34–35, a learned transition between these differing sets of traditions, weaves them together thematically. The subtle relationships between these two chapters suggest that they were originally composed together. They build on a familiar pattern of judgment against the nations (34:1–17) and promises of deliverance to Judah (35:1–10).

Judgment Against the Nations

Continuing important themes found in the oracles against the nations (Isa. 13–23), chap. 34 addresses a prophetic judgment to all the people of the earth, expressing the rage of God “against all the nations” (v. 2). In a melange of poetic descriptions, the prophet paints a picture of bloody consequences, deserted strongholds, and the ruins of once famous cities overtaken by nature. The perspective is cosmic—“the skies will roll up like a scroll” (v. 4)—and depicts a final confrontation between God and all the nations of the earth. A prime example is made of Edom, whose name will be changed to “No Kingdom.” An unusual note is the command that one should “seek and read from the book of the Lord” (v. 16). This admonition presumes the existence of some authoritative “book” of prophecy. In theory, this phrase once could have referred to some unknown collection of oracles, perhaps either an earlier collection of Isaiah’s prophecies or oracles against the nations. Nonetheless, in its present context, this authoritative book seems to refer to the book of Isaiah as a whole. This tradition belongs to the latest stages in the formation of the book, and presents an admonition to its future readers. Cast in the voice of the prophet Isaiah, this reference is comparable to that of Moses in Deut. 31:26–29.

A Summary of God’s Promises

Resembling 32:15–20, chap. 35 brings the oracular prophecies in the first part of the book to a rapturous crescendo. The wilderness left in the wake of Judah’s destruction will blossom; the weak will be made strong; waters will flow in the desert; and wild animals will no longer roam the ruins of the city. This great reversal of earlier misfortunes will be greeted by the people as they march to Zion with joyful songs. Note how songs punctuate the book of Isaiah (5:1–7, 12) and offer guides to interpretation of the prophecies within it.

Many of the expressions in 35:1–10 are direct citations of or allusions to the oracles in Isaiah 40–55. At the same time, the passage contains numerous references to the preceding traditions. In v. 4, Isaiah’s central message, “Be strong, fear not,” is reaffirmed. In vv. 5–6, the blindness and deafness of those who have heard the word of God through the prophet recall the report of the commission of the prophet in Isa. 6:9–10. The depiction of a “highway” echoes similar accounts in 19:19–25 and 27:12–14. The effect, within this context, gives readers an epitome of the promises of God throughout the book of Isaiah. The portrayal of restoration far exceeds the historical experience of Judah both after the return from the Babylonian exile and after the return from the Diaspora to the land of Israel. Its horizon lies in the ultimate renovation of the entire world and, consequently, in the hope of future readers of this prophetic book.

Jerusalem and Further Intrigue with the Assyrians and the Babylonians

With the exception of the long prayer of Hezekiah in 38:9–20, chaps. 36–39 are taken verbatim from 2 Kings 18:3–20:19. The first two chapters concern the siege of Jerusalem in 705–701 B.C. by the Assyrian king Sennacherib and God’s wondrous deliverance. The last chapter finds, in the visit of a Babylonian king, a prediction of Judah’s later devastation and exile under the Babylonians in 586 B.C.

The change in the context of these traditions, from their former place within the books of 1 and 2 Kings to their use in the book of Isaiah, entails a natural shift in their interpretation. Concern with the city of Jerusalem remains prominent in these chapters. The prayer of Hezekiah paradigmatically shows how one should respond to Isaiah's message and, by analogy, summons a similar response from postexilic Jewish believers. Hezekiah's illness, like Judah's exile, is perhaps something God "has done" (38:15); the king's prayer to be restored to health and to be allowed to live (v. 16) corresponds to the national hope of Judah. There is a resonance between personal and communal experience in this text. Such resonance is reinforced by God's response to Hezekiah, which includes a defense of Jerusalem from further attacks by the Assyrian king (38:6).

Finally, Isaiah 39 serves to shift readers' attention away from the events around the Assyrian threat in the eighth century B.C. to later Babylonian destructions in the sixth. Typically, it prepares readers for the "comfort" given to those in Babylonian exile (Isa. 40–66). In 40:2 this very focus on the fate of Jerusalem is expressed again, as it is throughout the book of Isaiah generally (see Isa. 1).

God's Deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib

The siege of Jerusalem in 701 B.C. and the claim of the city's sudden deliverance occasioned a wide variety of responses, both as a subject in the oracles of the prophet and in these narrative accounts. Elsewhere in Scripture additional narrative reports are provided in 2 Kings 18:13–16 and in 2 Chron. 32:1–23. There is even an account in the annals of Sennacherib that makes reference to Hezekiah and to the siege of Jerusalem, though without mention of a sudden departure by the Assyrians. The relation between the historical events and these differing traditions remains a perennial topic of scholarly debate. The biblical traditions obviously are written with a purpose in mind other than chronological reporting of historical events. The overall structure and selectivity of these reports reflect the same perspective. A scenario of similar events is repeated in both 36:1–37:9a and 37:9b–39. Each narrative includes an Assyrian threat to Hezekiah, Hezekiah's response, Isaiah's prophetic word of assurance, and deliverance as fulfillment of the word of the prophet. In both accounts, there is an escalation of the threat and of the tension felt by the king. In the first, the king assumes mourning dress and goes to the Temple to pray (37:1); in the second, his lengthy prayer forms part of the report (37:16–20). In the first, Isaiah sends a brief message of promise to the king (37:6–7); in the second, the prophet's oracle starts a long denunciation of the enemy (37:22–29). In the first, the Assyrian king is diverted by a false rumor (37:8–9a); in the second, an army of the heavenly hosts directly intervenes and slays 185,000 Assyrian soldiers while they sleep (38:36). These accounts appear remarkably suitable to the larger purpose of the book of Isaiah, with its concern for the restoration of Jerusalem. They explore the way in which human responses move God to leave a blessing when one might expect only a curse.

36:1–37:9a, Rescued by a False Rumor.

The first scenario of events gives greatest weight to the intimidation by and verbal abuse of the Rabshakeh to the inhabitants of Jerusalem. "The Rabshakeh" is a title, perhaps meaning "chief cupbearer." The position of this person may have been similar to that of Eliakim, the steward of Hezekiah's palace. Addressing Hezekiah by name, the Rabshakeh publicly denounces the confidence of Hezekiah and the people that God will save them from the Assyrian king. The effect of this caustic speech is heightened by the Jerusalem officials' interruption of it and their request that the emissary speak in Aramaic rather than in Hebrew, which the city's inhabitants could understand. Refusing this request, the Rabshakeh intensifies his denunciation and in a lengthy argument encourages the people of Jerusalem to defect before it is too late (36:13–20). The author creates suspense through the details describing the officials rending their garments while bearing the news to the king of Jerusalem. The king rushes to the Temple to pray and sends for Isaiah, who can give a fresh word from God. According to the word of God, the Assyrians take seriously a false rumor and abandon the siege. A common human experience, falling prey to a false rumor, is here seen specifically as an act of divine intervention.

37:9b–38, A Wondrous Deliverance. The opening connection with the preceding account is vague. In any case, a further confrontation takes place between the king of Assyria and Hezekiah. This time the Assyrian message is brief and focused on discrediting Yahweh as powerless against the Assyrian deities. Hezekiah takes the letter to the Temple and offers an extensive prayer that expresses his confidence in God and the need to show the world of nations that "you alone are the Lord" (v. 20). The word of God through Isaiah recalls common themes in chaps. 2-35; for example, the lofty will fall (v. 29); God will bring things to pass according to a divine plan (v. 26); and God has intimate knowledge of the nations regardless of their acknowledging God (v. 28). This word is accompanied by a divine promise regarding the remnant of Judah that will take root and grow from "out of Jerusalem." The assurance by God, that "I will defend this city" for the sake of David (v. 35), points again to a view of Zion's inviolability, which is affirmed throughout Isaiah 1-39. The deliverance is tersely described and expanded by an account of the death of the Assyrian king in a coup carried out by his sons while he was worshiping his gods. Yahweh's willingness to save Jerusalem has been illustrated graphically here and prepares the reader of this book for the hope expressed in Isaiah 40-66, namely, that through mighty acts of God the city will be rebuilt out of the rubble of Babylonian destruction.

Hezekiah's Recovery from Illness

Within the context of internationally significant events attested in Isaiah 36-37 and 39, the story of Hezekiah's recovery may seem incidental and very personal. Hezekiah has been ill and is near death. Isaiah brings word to the king that he will soon die. Rather than acquiescing to this oracle, King Hezekiah asks God to remember that he has done consistently as king that which God has demanded. A new word comes through Isaiah that includes an assurance that fifteen more years will be added to the king's life, that Assyria will not conquer Jerusalem in this time, and that the sundial will reverse itself as a sign (vv. 5-8, cf. 7:11) of God's will to do these things. A lengthy prayer of Hezekiah has been inserted subsequently (vv. 9-20). The story concludes with a note regarding the way in which Hezekiah was healed.

This story is significant since it presents Hezekiah as an exemplary believer and illustrates how prayers of the righteous can change God's response. The last two verses are out of place because the question in v. 22 has already been answered by vv. 7-8, as in an earlier version of the same story (2 Kings 20:8-11). The sequence of elements in the original story has been disturbed by the addition of the prayer (vv. 9-20) so that Hezekiah now appears to offer two prayers. The former may be considered a summary of its later written counterpart. The first, as found also in 2 Kings 20, simply asserts his innocence; the second account (Isa. 38:9-20) consists of a complaint, reminiscent of laments in the Psalms, that ends with communal praise: "We will sing . . . at the house of the Lord" (v. 20). The similarity to the psalms of David is conspicuous. This presentation has the effect of illustrating how the Psalms offer models of prayers to be offered by individuals in times of stress and calamity.

Jerusalem and the Future Babylonian Threat

The account in chap. 39 corrects any impression gained from the preceding account that might seem to preclude the possibility of the capture of Jerusalem at a later time. The king of Babylon, a minor kingdom during the time of the mighty Assyrians, pays a visit to Jerusalem and to King Hezekiah. Hezekiah proudly displays all the national treasures. After the visit, Isaiah asks the king of Judah what he showed to the Babylonian king. When the prophet hears that it was everything of value, he delivers an oracle of judgment. The Babylonians will someday return with a great army to rob Judah of all that Hezekiah has proudly shown. The only compensation to Hezekiah, presumably because of his obedience to God (38:3), is that the calamity will not occur in his generation. Hezekiah responds with thankfulness that, at least in his days, there will be "peace and truth." Ironically, the same king who saw the most dramatic deliverance of Jerusalem is the first to hear of a distant threat against the city from the Babylonians.

The placement of this story after the preceding chapters appears intentional, since the historical events are prior to those referred to in Isaiah 36-37. Within the book of Isaiah, this tradition brings a fitting conclusion to Isaiah 1-39, for it predicts the Babylonian exile, which the oracles in Isaiah 40-66 turn to address. The opening words of Isaiah 40 replace words of judgment with comfort, both to the people in Babylonian exile and to the city of Jerusalem. The unjust city that now lies in ruins will be fully restored to become the righteous city that God had purposed it to be from its beginning (Isa. 1 and 66).

ISAIAH 40-66

RICHARD J. CLIFFORD

Isaiah 40-55 and 56-66 are collections of prophetic speeches dating to the second half of the sixth century B.C. and appended to chaps. 1-39, the bulk of which records the eighth-century ministry of Isaiah of Jerusalem. The separation and delineation of chaps. 40-66 is the achievement of critical scholarship in the last two centuries; even the names "Second" and "Third" Isaiah are modern designations for these two anonymous collections. Prior to the Enlightenment, it was assumed that Isaiah wrote chaps. 1-66 of the Book of Isaiah in the eighth century B.C.

Chaps. 40-55 are easily dated. The author assumes throughout that his hearers in Babylon are aware that Cyrus II, king of Persia, will conquer the Neo-Babylonian Empire. Such an assumption was possible only after Cyrus deposed his sovereign Astyages of Media in 550 B.C. and conquered Croesus of Lydia in 547. Second Isaiah must have preached, therefore, in the 540s, probably until the entry of Cyrus's army into Babylon in 539. The author of chaps. 56-66, probably a disciple, preached in Jerusalem to a mixed community of residents and those who had returned from exile in Babylon. Most, if not all, of these chapters come from the period between Cyrus's edict in 538 and the rebuilding of the Temple in 515.

The Prophetic Tradition

Both prophets spoke from a centuries-old prophetic tradition. The pre-exilic institutions (esp. monarchy) that defined the prophet's social role had been destroyed by the deportations of the early sixth century B.C., but the prophetic literary tradition survived. That tradition divided God's relations with Israel after the conquest into three successive stages, sin, punishment, and restoration; each involved a prophetic task. The first was the period of Israel's sin, during which prophets prepared the people to submit to impending divine punishment at the hands of the Assyrians (Amos, Hosea, Isaiah) and the Babylonians (Jeremiah, Ezekiel). The second stage was the punishment itself, exile; the prophets preached submission and hope of restoration (Jeremiah and Ezekiel). Second Isaiah belongs wholly to the third stage; he preached restoration. Like other prophets who anticipated in their own lives the divine plan for Israel, the prophet-servant exemplifies acceptance of the exilic punishment and obedient return. His task was to deepen the spirit of acceptance and to lead the return. The author of Third Isaiah defined what restoration meant. To be present physically in Zion is not enough; the people must await a winnowing judgment that will make them true Israel.

Isaiah's own version of the tradition influenced Second and Third Isaiah. Zion is the dwelling of the all-holy God, where Israel comes to life. Isaiah preached the decree of judgment he heard in the divine assembly (chap. 6); the author of Second Isaiah preached the decree of restoration he heard (40:1-11). The Assyrian king had been the instrument of punishment for Zion (10:5-19); the Persian king was the instrument of the restoration for Zion (44:24-45:13). Second Isaiah also exploits several times the darkness-light sequence of 8:16-9:7 for exile-restoration. He utilizes, of course, other traditions, e.g., the new exodus-conquest tradition from Hosea 2 and Ezekiel 20.

Third Isaiah is eclectic, borrowing Second Isaiah's servant language to describe the righteous poor who will inherit the land and occasionally turning its predecessor's new exodus-conquest notion into the righteous path that leads to life, a theme of wisdom literature. From Isaiah comes the idea of a winnowing judgment in Zion separating out true Israel (1:21-28; chaps. 28-33). Pre-exilic denunciations of false leaders and false worship are used to resolve community conflicts. New is his judgment oracle; instead of indicting all Israel, it distinguishes between the wicked and the righteous, assigning a different lot to each. New also is a lack of specificity about the human agency that will accomplish the divine plans, a harbinger of later apocalyptic literature.

Appropriate Method of Study

A major problem affecting interpretation of both prophets is how to determine the length of the units that make up their collections. The dominant approach today, heir to both the source criticism of B. Duhm's influential commentary of 1892 and the form criticism of H. Gressmann, J. Begrich, and C. Westermann, is especially sensitive to "logical inconsistencies" and to what is typical and recurrent in the chapters. The method is quick to find sources and insertions, e.g., the idol passages (e.g., Isa. 41:21–24) and the four “servant songs” (Isa. 42:1–4; 49:1–6; 50:4–11; 52:13–53:12), and to define the unit based upon a judgment about its genre. Not surprisingly, such an approach concludes there are between forty-five and seventy separate and relatively brief units in chaps. 40–55. J. Muilenburg’s pioneering 1956 commentary, unusually appreciative of poetic originality and rhetoric, argued for nineteen lengthy compositions. In this commentary I follow Muilenburg, though with emphasis upon the prophet’s program of action. I propose that there are seventeen substantial speeches, which advance their ideas with remarkable subtlety and compactness. The boundaries proposed for some speeches are tentative.

Message of Second Isaiah

The prophet’s persistent use of five paired concepts provides a convenient entry into the style and thought of the chapters (and a further argument that the speeches are long and closely argued). By the interplay of these concepts, he interprets the national tradition to the exiles and exhorts them to act. The first two pairs are “first” and “last,” and Babylon and Zion. “New things” sometimes means the new exodus-conquest, which is contrasted with the “first things,” the old exodus-conquest; Israel must leave Babylon (Egypt) and journey to Zion (Canaan). The new act is validated by its resemblance to the ancient one. Babylon, like Egypt of old, is the land of oppression and false gods (chaps. 46, 47), to be stripped by Yahweh of her “lords” (the gods Bel and Nebo) and her children (inhabitants). Zion, on the other hand, is to be glorified by the return in the exodus-conquest of her Lord and children (49:14–26; 50:1–52:8; chap. 54). The next two contrasts are also linked: Yahweh and the gods, Israel and the nations. In the polytheistic ancient Near East, a god was acclaimed supreme by powerful action. The most powerful action was creation, which in the ancient East was creation not just of the physical world but of a fully articulated society. In Second Isaiah, creation occurs through the defeat of the enemies that keep Israel from coming into being in Zion; the enemies are both historical (Babylon) and suprahistorical (the sterile and impassable desert that bars the people’s return to Zion). Only Yahweh predicted Cyrus’s victory over Babylon and the journey through the desert (esp. in the great trial scenes, 41:1–42:9; 43:9–44:5; 44:6–23; 45:14–25; and in chaps. 48 and 49), proving he creates Israel by mere word. The fourth polarity, Israel and the nations, is closely related to the third, because each nation reflects on earth the power of its patron god. The nations’ mute and immobile statues reflect only the nothingness of their heavenly patrons. Israel, however, when it acts by taking part in the exodus-conquest through the sterile desert, witnesses to the supremacy of Yahweh (43:9–10; 44:6–7; and 55:4–5). The fifth and last polarity is the servant and Israel. The servant, honored and obedient friend of Yahweh, represents what all the people are called to be; hence there is a polar relationship between servant and people. Like the servant, Israel is called to accept the Exile as just punishment from Yahweh (50:4–11) and to march in the exodus-conquest (42:1–9; 49:1–13; 52:13–53:12).

The servant in Second Isaiah has fascinated readers from earliest times. The loyalists of the book of Daniel understood themselves as the servants, “the wise” (playing on a meaning of 52:13; RSV: “he shall prosper”) whose death aids the many to understand (Dan. 11:32–35). The righteous sufferer in the Wisdom of Solomon draws on the same speech, as do NT passages like Mark 10:45 and Acts 8:28–35. Modern controversy about the servant stems largely from B. Duhm’s Die Theologie der Propheten in 1875, which isolated “the servant songs” (42:1–4; 49:1–6; 50:4–11; 52:13–53:12) as the work of an author other than Second Isaiah. Scholars have attempted to identify the servant with many different historical figures, but without reaching a consensus. In recent years interest has turned to the servant’s function rather than his identity. Most still hold, however, that the servant songs are additions to the text.

This commentary proposes the songs are integral to their contexts. Duhm, influenced by source criticism from pentateuchal research, failed to recognize the servant–people dialectic. “Servant” in Second Isaiah has a politico-religious meaning: an official whose relationship to his god or king is one of loyalty and love, in keeping with the personalized politics of the culture. His task was to see that the people did the will of his sovereign; he stood over against them on the side of his god or king and also represented them to the sovereign. The servant’s dialectical role is especially clear when he anticipates in his own person the divine plan for all the people. Moses fled Egypt and met God at Sinai (Exod. 1–4) before the people did in Exodus 19–24. Jeremiah underwent in his famous confessions the people’s anguish of exile. (Both Moses and Jeremiah, significantly, serve as models for the portrait of the servant in chap. 49). The servant has submitted to the Exile and is preparing to return to Zion in a new exodus-conquest. The people are called to be like the servant or, more accurately, to be the servant, accepting exile and returning to Zion.

The structure of chaps. 40-55 shows no overall design. Isa. 40:1-9 and chap. 55 are obviously opening commission and final exhortation. Cyrus appears from chap. 41 to 48, and Zion, as a developed theme, from 44:24 to the end.

The complex speeches have a single aim: to persuade the exiled people to join the servant in that act through which they will become Israel once more, the exodus-conquest.

Was Second Isaiah's basic prediction largely mistaken? Despite the conquest of Babylon and the resumption of national life in Zion, many scholars suggest that his predictions of unalloyed happiness and political power remained entirely unfulfilled (see Whybray). One must respect, however, his either/or preaching of creation: either the triumph of Babylon and the desert or the creation of Israel in Zion by their defeat. The problem of "unalloyed happiness and political power" becomes the stuff of Third Isaiah's preaching.

The divine word, however, did exceed its late sixth-century B.C. realization. The message lived on to animate "the wise" of Dan. 11:32-35, the righteous of Wisdom of Solomon, and early Christians, all of whom looked for the regeneration of Israel through the vicarious action of the servant.

Message of Third Isaiah

Though scholars are not all agreed that chaps. 56-66 are from a single author, a minority postulating the chapters to be an anthology from different times, there is a consistent message. To the returnees, uncertain about their claim on the land and what it means to be Israel in a still devastated Zion, the prophet preaches that Yahweh in a future act of judgment will rebuild the community in Zion so that the divine glory will be revealed. To be Israel means adhering to the commandments and awaiting that creative visitation. The divine act will separate true Israel from the wicked, who oppress their neighbors and close themselves to the coming renewal.

The coming judgment of upholding the poor and putting down the wicked seems, to some scholars, to reflect class conflict between the Zadokite party, who wanted to rebuild the Temple according to Ezekiel 40-48, and the visionaries of Third Isaiah, who expected God to create directly a new, egalitarian community. There is undoubtedly class conflict behind the chapters, but to be specific regarding the groups is difficult. Hebrew rhetoric customarily dramatizes moral choice as a conflict between wicked and good groups; hence, sociological conclusions must remain tentative.

Chaps. 56-66 are structured around a centerpiece, chaps. 60-62, the glorification of Zion; five speeches precede it, and five follow. Chaps. 60-62 are framed by a lament ending with the coming of Yahweh to Zion (Isa. 59:20-21) and by a poem that reports the coming of Yahweh to Zion (63:1-6). The latter poem is followed by a lament (63:7-64:12). The first section, 56:1-8, declares righteousness to be the only criterion for entry into the new Jerusalem, even for foreigners. The last section, 66:18b-24, depicts a great procession to Zion, with foreigners bringing their gifts.

Second Isaiah

40:1-11

God Decrees Salvation for Exiled Israel

The scene, like chap. 6 of Isaiah, is the divine assembly in heaven, presided over by Yahweh, the God of Israel. In comparable scenes outside the Bible, the gods, after discussion, decree what will happen on earth. In such scenes within the Bible, Yahweh's decree is supreme; discussion is only about which of the thoroughly subordinate heavenly beings will carry it out (1 Kings 22:19-23; Job 1:6-12; 2:1-6). This scene alludes to and reverses Isaiah 6, in which Israel's punishment was decreed and the prophet sent to announce it. The voices in 40:1-5 are those of the heavenly courtiers implementing the decree. In vv. 6-8, one of them speaks to the prophet, who, like his master, Isaiah of Jerusalem, is told to announce what he has seen and heard to the people of God. Jerusalem, personified as a mother and queen, is told to go up to a high mountain and announce the coming of Yahweh to the cities of Judah.

40:1-2, Convey the News of Release! A heavenly official conveys the divine command to the court in v. 1. The period of punishment is over. Ancients often imagined divine visitations lasting for a set term; Jeremiah, for instance, saw the Exile as lasting seventy years (Jer. 25:11; 29:10).

40:3-5, Build a Highway for Our God. An official commands the assembly to build a road through the desert separating Babylon from Palestine, impassable because of its lack of water and precipitous slopes (like the deserts of Sinai and the Negeb rather than the sandy Sahara). "Highway" alludes to the exodus-conquest from Egypt to Canaan through the Wilderness of Sinai as well as to the triumphant procession of God's people to his shrine after his creation victory (cf. Exod. 15:13-18); it may also refer to the processional ways of Babylonian feasts. Israel's return home will manifest Yahweh's glory because the nations will see that Yahweh is able to snatch his client people from Babylon and revive them in his own land.

40:6-8, The Prophet's Commission. A courtier tells the prophet to publicize on earth what he has seen and heard, just as his prophetic predecessor had been told to do in 6:9. Attending the divine assembly is a mark of the authentic prophet: "For who [among the false prophets] has stood in the council of Yahweh, and seen and heard his word?" (Jer. 23:18). The prophet as representative of the people must (Isa. 40:6) express the community's exhaustion, and does so in traditional lament language; they are "like grass killed by the withering wind" (cf. Pss. 90:5-6; 103:15-16). Isa. 40:8 provides the courtier's response, "Yes, the people are broken but God's word is able to revive them."

40:9-11, Jerusalem Announces the Coming of the Lord. The news is conveyed first to Zion, who is to go up to a mountain and announce to the cities of Judah that their God comes, as a shepherd (a traditional designation for king) leading the flock in a new exodus-conquest (cf. Exod. 15:13-18; Ps. 78:52-55).

Strength for an Exhausted People

In the opening scene, the heavenly messenger states that the word of Yahweh will overcome the weakness of the people (40:7-8). The prophet must, therefore, encourage the people exiled in Babylon, and this he does in a series of three rhetorical questions, showing their fears to be groundless: fear of the nations seemingly greater than they (vv. 12-17), fear of the religion (cultic images) and kings of their oppressors (vv. 18-23), and fear of the other gods (vv. 25-26). Yahweh will provide strength for the journey to Zion (vv. 27-31). A series of questions designed to destroy preconceptions about how God acts in history is found also in Job 38-41, where they bring Job to a new openness to God's ways.

40:12-17, The Nations Are Nothing Before Yahweh. Verse 12 asks who gathered the raw material of the universe, and vv. 13-14 who planned its arrangement into a beautiful world. For Second Isaiah, the answer is "Yahweh alone." Verses 15-17 state that the nations, whom Israel fears, are merely part of the raw material effortlessly weighed out by Yahweh (v. 12). Note the correspondence between the weighing of the material of the universe in v. 12 and the weighing of the nations in vv. 15-16. Verse 15 should be translated: "See, the nations are a drop in the pan [of the scales], like clouds on the scale are they reckoned. See, the coastlands lift it [the pan] like dust."

Symmetry in Isaiah 40:12-17

VERSE 12	VERSES 15-16
waters	drop of water
heavens	clouds of heaven
earth	dust of earth mountain	Mount Lebanon

40:18-24, Neither Statue nor King Represents the True God. In the ancient Near East the deity became present to the earthly worshiper by cult statues and/or by the king as son of god. The earthly form resembled, however crudely, the heavenly being, and hence represented the god on earth. In vv. 18-19, the prophet radically criticizes cult images: they represent mere human activity. He points rather to the Maker of the world, who is above such representation (vv. 21-22). The other representatives of the gods, kings ("shoots," "plantings," and "roots," in the palace language in the culture), rule by Yahweh's sufferance, liable to be blown away by his storm wind (vv. 23-24).

40:25-31, No Heavenly Being but Yahweh Can Impart Strength. Having shown the earthly images of the gods to be powerless, the prophet turns to the gods themselves, who were sometimes believed to be visible in the stars; these "gods" serve Yahweh in the heavenly army and march at his command (vv. 25-26). Since there exists no other divine power save Yahweh's, how can Israel say its God pays no heed (v. 27)? Yahweh's strength is available to those who wait for him, enabling them to make the journey toward Zion.

The Verdict in Favor of Israel

The relentless questioning of the previous section, 40:12-31, was addressed to Israel so as to convince it that only Yahweh was powerful. The questions in this section are addressed to the nations and their patron gods to the same end and, further, to demonstrate that Israel has a mission to the nations. It is a great trial, in which the entire world is summoned before the divine creator and judge. There are two parallel sections; ancient hearers were able to grasp the out-

	I. 41:1-20	II. 41:21-42:9
Summons to trial	41:1, 5-7	41:21-22b
Interrogation and verdict on nations/ gods	41:2-4	41:22c-29
Commission of Israel	41:8-20	42:1-9

line and interplay of the two versions of the one trial. In each section, the nations are summoned to bring their "gods" (their statues) before the divine judge and to prove their gods predicted the great events that were reshaping the world, the victories of Cyrus the Persian. A god's prediction of Cyrus's victories would prove the word of that god controlled human history; that god would be the supreme god. But the gods provide no predictions; they are shown by their silence to be nongods, nonexistent. Yahweh then declares that he has predicted Cyrus's victories and Israel's rebirth, that his word brought it about. Yahweh's people are therefore vindicated, and the gods' peoples are censured.

41:1-20, The First Trial Scene. The nations are summoned and asked to prove their gods are behind Cyrus by bringing forth oracles predicting his successes (vv. 1-4). Verses 2-3 show that Cyrus embodies the storm wind of Yahweh, already seen to be controlling history in 40:7 and 24, enabling him to uproot kings; like the wind he is not bound by roads. Verses 5-7 describe the fearful nations coming with their statues to the trial. Repetition of several words and phrases in vv. 5-7 and 8-13—"fear," "ends of the earth," "help," "say," "encourage"—show the contrast between the nations and Israel. In vv. 5-7, the gods are silent while the fearful people who made them chatter away aimlessly; in vv. 8-13, Israel is silent while Yahweh commissions it. Israel is given a mission in vv. 14-20. In vv. 14-16 the mountains and hills, which make the desert impassable, are to be leveled to make the highway announced in the heavenly assembly (40:3-4). Israel threshes the mountains, and the divine storm wind carries the refuse away. The other danger of the desert, its life-threatening sterility, is so tamed that rivers, ponds, and trees abound (vv. 11-19). When people see the desert mastered, they will acknowledge that Yahweh is unique (v. 20). Second Isaiah sees the return to Zion as the defeat of the desert, just as the old tradition saw the first exodus-conquest as the defeat of the sea; each form of chaos kept the people from its land.

41:21-42:9, The Second Trial Scene. The second scene repeats the outline of summons (41:21-22b), legal questioning (41:22c-29), and commission (42:1-9) but varies the emphases.

In the second scene, the questioning of nations and the commission to Israel is more specific. 41:21-29, Summons, Interrogation, and Verdict. After the summons, the divine judge asks what gods have predicted Cyrus's conquests, meaning what gods by mere word have brought them about. The statues' silence shows the gods had done nothing. The judge-questioner finds the gods null and void, like precreation chaos before divine shaping (vv. 24, 29). Yahweh is the one who predicted and is now bringing about what is happening. Second Isaiah does not identify the predictions about Cyrus; probably they are Isaian texts about Yahweh's control of the Assyrian king (e.g., 10:5-19) and about the restoration of Zion.

42:1-9, The Commission of the Servant. After exposing the gods by debunking their images, Yahweh turns affectionately to Israel and says it can communicate his gracious power by its activity (vv. 2-4). Verse 4 probably refers to the justice introduced into the land at the accession of ancient kings, like David, who "became king over all Israel and . . . administered justice and righteousness to all his people" (2 Sam. 8:15). Former royal functions are now exercised by all the people, as elsewhere in Second Isaiah. Verses 5-8 summarize and develop the preceding point. Yahweh creates a peopled universe; Israel has a special call to make Yahweh known to the rest of the peoples (vv. 6-7). By accepting its commission to take part in the exodus-conquest and victory over the desert, Israel will image forth Yahweh's lordship. Yahweh will not be represented to the world by statues (v. 8). Verse 9 is the last word of the judge, summarizing his verdict on world history and pointing to the future.

Israel Called to Hear and See God Who Acts

Psalms 96 and 98, which both begin with "Sing to Yahweh a new song" and with other language nearly identical to v. 10, provide important clues to the genre of the passage: a hymn of victory. The whole world, animate and inanimate, is called to praise Yahweh, who has created the world by defeating forces hostile to human life. Israel, however, has a special role: "Tell among the nations, 'Yahweh reigns!'" (Ps. 96:10; cf. Pss. 96:3; 97:8-12; 99:1-9).

42:10-12, Hymnic Introduction. As in Psalms 96 and 98, the whole world is to praise Yahweh for creating.

42:13-17, Yahweh Defeats Threatening Sea. Yahweh is portrayed as a sleeping warrior aroused at last to defend his people (v. 13); such warriors worked themselves into a frenzy before marching to the battlefield (v. 14). Verses 15–16 show the warrior pushing back Sea to its proper sphere so that life-supporting dry land can appear, as in Ps. 104:5–9: “I will dry up mountains and hills, all their vegetation I will dry. I will make rivers into coastlands [meaning, the formless waters are now bound by coasts], pools I will dry up.” Chaotic waters and primordial night are placed in their proper spheres so that human life is possible. Yahweh, who alone made the world, is alone worthy to be praised (Isa. 42:17).

42:18–25, Israel’s Distress Is Punishment for Its Sin. Israel is to recognize the truth of the teaching (v. 21b) about light following exilic darkness (8:16–9:7). That teaching is proven true in its present distress (42:22); divine glory will shine forth through human weakness. Its suffering was not from chance or its enemies’ power (vv. 23–25) but from the just will of Yahweh (v. 21).

43:1–8, Yahweh Calls His People to Journey. The people are not to remain ignorant of their new situation. The time of punishment is over; they are called to pass through fire and water to join others in the march homeward. Verse 8 undoes the grim decree of Isaiah in 6:9–10, “Go on hearing but do not understand; go on seeing but do not perceive,” which introduced the period of punishment.

Israel a Witness to Yahweh

Like 41:1–42:9, Isa. 43:9–44:5 is a trial scene, contrasting the nations and their gods with Israel and its God, Yahweh. The emphasis is almost entirely upon Israel and the way it witnesses in both past and present. Israel is called a witness here, in 44:8–9, and in 55:4; in each case the people witness to the nations that Yahweh is the sole powerful deity. By its prosperity Israel had always been a sign of its patron’s fidelity and power: “May God be gracious to us and bless us. May he make his face shine on us, that your way be known on earth, your saving power over all the nations” (Ps. 67:1–2). The king, however, had a special witnessing role, providing the visible sign of Yahweh’s creation victory: “I will place [the king’s] hand on the Sea, on the Rivers his right hand. . . . Yes, I will make him my firstborn, the highest of the kings of the earth” (Ps. 89:27; see also Ps. 18:43–44). But before it can witness to Yahweh’s supremacy, Israel must acknowledge its sinful refusal to worship, and experience divine forgiveness (43:22–28).

43:9–15, Israel Is to Witness Yahweh as Sole Deity. As in 41:1–42:9, the nations are summoned by the divine judge: can their gods prove their unhindered word caused Cyrus’s success? Before they even reply, Yahweh appoints Israel as witness to his supremacy. A subtle chiasmic, or envelope, structure underscores Israel’s witnessing.

A Appointment of Israel as witness: “you are my witnesses,” v. 10a, elaborated in v. 10bcd.

Its witnessing: no God except Yahweh exists, v. 10ef; no God except Yahweh acts (“saves”), v. 11ab.

B Proof: I am the only God who acts effortlessly according to his word, v. 12ab.

A’ Appointment of Israel as witness: “you are my witnesses,” v. 12c.

Its witnessing: no God except Yahweh exists, vv. 12d–13a; no God except Yahweh acts [no other god can stop his work], v. 13bc.

Part B is central. Verses 14–15 answer the obvious objection: if Yahweh is supreme, why is Israel still captive to Babylon? The answer: Yahweh has already knocked down Babylon’s gates.

43:16–21, The New National Story. Yahweh provides a new script for the nation. They are no longer to recite as their national story (v. 18) the crossing of the sea and the defeat of Egypt (vv. 16–17) but instead the crossing of the desert, now made so fertile and friendly that even its wild animals honor Yahweh. The people are created anew and show it by praising God.

43:22–28, Israel Must Be Forgiveness. The probability of Israel recognizing and witnessing Yahweh’s new deed is slight, since it has failed to recognize Yahweh’s hand in the punishment of the Exile: “But you did not call me, you did not weary yourself [in prayer, cf. Pss. 6:6 and 69:3] on my account, O Israel” (Isa. 43:22). Divine forgiveness is needed for Israel to witness (v. 25), since the people cannot act by themselves (vv. 26–28).

44:1–5, Israel, Like the Desert, Will Be Healed. The passionate commission in vv. 1–2 shows the depth of divine love. As the desert was healed of its aridity and enmity with God (43:19–20), so will the people be healed (44:3–5). The wind of God, which had devastated the people (40:7), here heals them. The people will bear the names that will mark them as Yahweh’s people.

44:6–23

Witnesses to Their Maker

Most commentators regard vv. 9–20 as an addition by someone other than Second Isaiah, and many translations print the verses as prose. The verses, however, continue the topic of witnessing begun in vv. 6-8, and their arrangement as prose is simply an editor's decision; they can just as easily be arranged in poetic lines, despite some lines overloaded due to textual corruption. The scene is a cosmic trial, by now familiar from 41:1-42:9 and 43:9-44:5. Familiar too is the logic: the nations witness to their gods (in the form of statues), whereas Israel witnesses to Yahweh. The question: what god predicted contemporary events so as to prove his or her unimpeded word shaped historical events? The poem consists of five stanzas of eleven to thirteen lines each, except for the fourth, which has thirty-two lines.

44:6-8, Israel's God Shapes History. Israel has heard his prediction of contemporary events and must therefore confess that only he is supreme among the gods. It has experienced the God who acts and is therefore a true witness to Yahweh's supreme control of history.

44:9-11, The Nations' Gods Shape Nothing. Ironically, the prophet calls the nations "creators" and the statues they create "their witnesses." Since the nations' metal and wooden witnesses can do nothing, their creators are shamed when summoned to stand and answer the divine judge (v. 11).

44:12-13, Creators of Metal and Wooden Gods. Ancient statues were made either of metal or of wood overlaid with precious metal. In the first of the two parallel tableaux, the metalworkers' labor leaves them exhausted, drained of strength (v. 12). In the second tableau, woodworkers produce a statue in human form to dwell in a house of god (v. 13)!

44:14-20, The Raw Material of the Statues. Ritual texts from Babylonia give elaborate directions for planting and nurturing sacred trees from which statues were made. In v. 14, the artisan goes out to the nursery and selects the right tree. The emphasis throughout is on the wood before the artisan "creates." In its raw state, the wood is useful for warming oneself and baking bread. After its shaping it will be useless and a cause of shame (vv. 9-11). The artisans do not realize their folly.

44:21-23, Israel, and All the World, Is Called to Show Forth Yahweh's Glory. Yahweh declares Israel to be the servant, the favored one, whom he has created and to whom he remains loyal (v. 21). Israel has failed to recognize its call to show forth its patron's supremacy and hence needs forgiveness to do so (v. 22). The people are to join all parts of God's world in giving praise, including the trees of the forest!

Cyrus Is the Instrument of Yahweh

In the eighth century B.C., Yahweh chose the Assyrian king to be his human instrument, "the rod of my anger" (10:5). To Second Isaiah in the sixth century, Cyrus the Persian king becomes the instrument of divine mercy by allowing exiled populations to return to their homelands and by helping to rebuild native temples. As Israel resisted seeing the Assyrian king as Yahweh's instrument so they resist seeing Cyrus in that role. The purpose of the speech, therefore, is to convince them of Cyrus's role in the divine plan (45:1).

In all three sections of the speech (consisting of twenty, thirty-three, and twenty lines, respectively), Second Isaiah alludes to the great poem of chap. 10. "My shepherd, he will do my pleasure," in 44:28, reverses "the rod of my anger," in 10:5; "I will give you treasures of darkness," in 45:3, alludes to "to take spoil and seize plunder," in 10:6; and clearest of all, "Does the clay say to the potter?" in 45:9, rewords "Shall the axe vaunt itself over the one who hews with it?" in 10:15.

44:24-28, Yahweh Decrees the Rebuilding of Zion by Cyrus. Verse 24 powerfully states for Israel the sole divinity of Yahweh; the proof is that he alone made heaven and earth. Those who worship other gods, therefore, do not speak the truth (v. 25); only Israel's prophets speak the truth on behalf of the one God (v. 26ab). And the prophets have revealed God's decree, expressed in the threefold "who says" of vv. 26c, 27a, and 28a: the rebuilding of Jerusalem and its daughter cities, the victory over cosmic waters, and the commission of Cyrus to rebuild the Temple. The three commands are aspects of one act. Chaotic forces hostile to the existence of the people are to be curbed; city and temple, essential for peoplehood in the ancient Near East, are to be rebuilt. Cyrus, destroyer of the Babylonian Empire, will do the building by his royal decrees.

45:1-8, All Will Acknowledge Yahweh's Choosing of Cyrus. Yahweh commissions Cyrus in the elaborate palace language of the day; he will march before his armies and give him plunder (vv. 1-3b). Cyrus will at length acknowledge that it is the God of Israel who is giving him success (v. 3cd). Three times in this section the successful mission of Cyrus leads to acknowledgment that the God of Israel is the only God, vv. 1-3, 4-5b, and 5c-7. The third acknowledgment is climactic; not only is Israel's God solely responsible for Cyrus's victories, but he alone is responsible for creating all that exists (vv. 6-7). Verse 8 invites that world to display the victory: the heavens are to rain down the waters, now tamed, that give life; the earth, made fertile, is to bloom.

45:9-13, Israel Must Accept God's Plan.

All creation is called to celebrate, but God's own people balk. Like the foolish Assyrian king (10:15), they do not see Yahweh controlling events. Fools in the biblical sense, they deserve the harsh questions of v. 11. The discourse ends appropriately with vv. 12-13. Yahweh is the complete master, creating and directing the earth with human beings and the heavens with angelic beings (v. 12).

Zion Is the Site of Victory

The previous speech clarifies, for the first time, Cyrus's role in restoring the people. This speech makes clear, for the first time, the full significance of Zion, the goal of the journey the people are to undertake. Temples and holy cities in the ancient East were often celebrated as the place where creation took place, as the polar opposite, therefore, of primordial chaos. Even the nations acknowledge this function of Zion.

The passage's unity is shown by the approximately equal four stanzas (seventeen, fourteen, fifteen, fourteen lines, respectively) and the recurring Hebrew words, "pray, address fervently," "be hidden, secret," "save, be victorious," "be righteous, reliable," "be ashamed." Other passages with similar themes, Isa. 2:1-4, on the one hand, and Psalms 2 and 72, on the other, show Isa. 45:14-25 to be a single scene. Isa. 2:1-4 foresees the day when the nations hear the voice of Yahweh and stream toward his mountain, and the psalms show the defeated enemy kings bringing tribute.

45:14-17, The Tribute of Kings. Yahweh announces that foreigners will bring tribute to Zion and confess that "only in your midst is God, there is no other God." That it is Zion who is addressed by the nations is clear from the Hebrew; the reiterated second-person feminine pronoun (customarily used of Zion) and the confession that Yahweh is in her midst is frequent in Zion songs (in Pss. 46, 48, and 76). The nations speak from the end of Isa. 45:14 to v. 17; change of person within a speech is not unusual in Hebrew style. Their confession that Yahweh is a hidden God (v. 15) refers to his apparent withdrawal when his people were exiled.

45:18-19, Yahweh Finds the Earth and Sanctuary. Yahweh vigorously restates the nations' confession, proclaiming himself the only creator. The phrase "he found it" describes both the founding of the earth and the founding of Jerusalem (Pss. 48:8; 87:5) and of his sanctuary (Exod. 15:7). The world is no longer chaos, where God's word does not sound, but habitable land (Isa. 45:18f-19b), where Yahweh can speak and be sought in his shrine (v. 19cdef).

45:20-21, God Summons the Nations.

From the secure site of cosmic victory and just governance of the universe, Yahweh summons the nations to a trial. As in other trial scenes, 41:1-42:9 and 43:9-44:5, he asks the nations which of the gods they carry with them spoke the word that foretold and effected Cyrus's victories. Only Yahweh spoke the word.

45:22-25, Only in Yahweh Is Prosperity to Be Found.

Since Yahweh is the only God, all nations must journey to his shrine to find blessing (v. 21). To the one God is due their homage (vv. 23-24a). The nations will be ashamed because their patron gods are nothing (v. 24bc). Yahweh is the reason for Israel's triumph (v. 25).

46:1-13

Yahweh Carries His People to Zion

Ancient poetry spoke of Yahweh carrying Israel: "You have seen what I did to Egypt. I carried you on eagle's wings and brought you to myself" (Exod. 19:4); "He spread his wings, he lifted [Israel] up, he carried him on his pinions" (Deut. 32:11). Second Isaiah draws on that tradition in 40:11: "He will carry them in his bosom." The word "carry," connoting the great act by which Israel moved from being a slave in Egypt to being Yahweh's servant in Canaan, succinctly expresses the contrast between the Babylonians, who carry their gods as they flee their city, and Israel, who is carried to the city of its God (vv. 1-7). A second characteristic of Israel's God is his word, which effects what he predicts (vv. 8-10). Israel is to allow itself to be carried to Zion by its God, who acts through Cyrus (vv. 12-13).

46:1-4, Yahweh Carries Israel. Verses 1-2 picture the Babylonians carrying statues of their gods Bel and Nebo, fleeing the city before the invasion of Cyrus. The statues bob up and down with the motion of the pack animals. How different are the survivors of Israel, who have been carried and can count on being carried in the future because of the fidelity and unmatched power of Israel's God (vv. 3-4)!

46:5-7, There Is No Other God. The assertion in v. 4 that Yahweh will carry Israel is proven here as in 40:18-20. Human beings made the other gods. The motionless and dumb statues prove the deities cannot carry their clients.

46:8-13, Come to Zion. Second Isaiah rebukes the rebellious of Israel who do not trust the God who has carried them from of old (v. 8). Their God has spoken the word that is moving Cyrus to bring them home (vv. 9-11). The exiles are literally far from the place where justice is placed (cf. 45:14-25); they must allow themselves to be carried to Zion.

47:1-15

Lady Babylon Is Dethroned

Fair maiden Babylon (not "daughter of Babylon") is to descend from her throne (v. 1) and be silent (v. 5), in contrast to Dame Zion, who goes up to a high mountain and loudly proclaims the coming of her Lord (40:9). Babylon's "lords," Bel and Nebo, have departed (chap. 46). Her children, those who worship in her midst, are lost (47:8-9). Zion, on the other hand, is about to have the "divorce" from her Lord reversed (50:1) and see the return of her children (49:14-26). She will be told, "Arise, shake off the dust, sit [on your throne], O Jerusalem" (52:2).

The genre is a taunt song, like those against Tyre (Ezek. 27:1-36), the prince of Tyre (Ezek. 28:1-10, 11-19), and the king of Babylon (Isa. 14:3-21). It asks contemptuously: where now is the strength you used to dominate others? Since it is Yahweh the judge who speaks, the taunt song is a judgment finding Babylon guilty of opposing the divine plan that had made it Yahweh's instrument (vv. 6-7). It did not recognize Yahweh's lordship but claimed ultimate power for itself (vv. 8d, 10f).

47:1-5, Queen Babylon Becomes a Slave.

Yahweh commands the queen to leave her throne and city stripped as a prisoner and to assume a slave's duties.

47:6-7, Babylon Exceeded Her Mandate.

As in Isa. 10:5-14, in which the Assyrian king exceeded Yahweh's mandate by redrawing God-given boundaries and boasting, "By the strength of my hand I have done it" (10:13), so Babylon was unnecessarily cruel (47:6) and thought herself to be immortal, a divine claim (v. 7).

47:8-9, The Sentence. She loses her claims to glory—her marriage to the city gods and her throng of citizen-worshippers—at a single stroke. The very suddenness suggests divine intervention.

47:10-11, Babylon's Delusion. The queen is now taunted for her renowned lore, which allowed her to predict the future and to assure success. In v. 10, Babylon utters a threefold boast, and in v. 11, disaster is said three times to come upon her. As each wave hits, the great merchant city is unable to use its wealth to avert it.

47:12-13, Her Seers Cannot Save Her. Babylon is allowed "benefit of counsel" in her trial, but her famous diviners offer no useful advice. How could they know the future, which is in the hands of Yahweh?

47:14-15, Her Resources Offer No Help.

Her seers and her vast network of traders cannot save her. With the queen herself, they leave the once-great city.

48:1-22

Openness to the Interpreting Word

Chap. 48, a carefully constructed poem, affirms that every act of Yahweh is accompanied by an interpretive word, which invites the people to respond appropriately. Such a word accompanied the first great deed that created Israel, the creation/exodus-conquest, so that rebellious Israel would not credit its idols with the deed (vv. 3-6b). In this time of a new creation/exodus-conquest, signaled by Cyrus, Yahweh gives such a word (vv. 6c-8), transmitted through the prophet (v. 16d), a word that invites both belief (vv. 17-19) and action (vv. 20-21). The theme of the word of the Lord gives the whole chapter a coherence.

There are other arguments for the chapter's coherence, apart from the poem's logic. The same verb, "call oneself, be known," with humans as subject, occurs three times in the first section (vv. 1-11) and, in the second section (vv. 12-21), three times conveying the meaning of "call, summon," with Yahweh as the subject. The second section, vv. 12-21 (thirty-seven lines), repeats the first section, vv. 1-11 (thirty-eight lines), the same way 41:21-42:9 repeats 41:1-20. The first part bids Jacob to hear (48:1-2) because, in view of Israel's rebelliousness, a divine word always accompanies the divine deed, whether in the past or the present (vv. 3-8). The second part bids Jacob hear (vv. 12ab), reiterates the link between word and deed (vv. 12c-13), and declares that the new deed is Cyrus's defeat of Babylon, accompanied by a prophetic word (vv. 14-16). Verses 17-19, like vv. 9-11, restate the divine purpose, intent on good even in the face of Israelite obstinacy.

48:1-2, Israel Names Itself Invalidly. At the beginning of the first part, Israel, addressed with its titles expanded severalfold, is declared to be worshiping invalidly. The invalidity is explained in v. 2. Verse 2a, lit., "but from the holy city are they called," means that the people are known from their city of origin, the city of God. If the people do not worship in their God's city, they do not worship validly. During the Exile, it was of course impossible for Israel to worship in Zion; Ezekiel and Jeremiah acknowledge the fact (Jer. 29; Ezek. 11:16). But for Second Isaiah, the exilic period is over, and Zion again exercises its claim as the exclusive place for Israelite worship.

48:3-8, Word Precedes Deed. Yahweh predicted the first creation/exodus-conquest so that Israel would know who was the true author of the deed and not credit it to an idol (vv. 3-6b). The prediction probably consisted of the pentateuchal promises of progeny and land to the patriarchs and the promise of Canaan to Moses. Today (vv. 6c-8), Yahweh predicts a new creation/exodus-conquest so that Israel will know its true author. The prophet is aware of Israel's tendency to say, "I knew it already"; hence to deny as Yahweh's all acts contrary to its own expectations and biases.

48:9-11, The Divine Purpose Shall Stand. Though negative upon first reading, vv. 9-11 are positive, stating Yahweh's work will proceed irrespective of popular response. The work is founded on Yahweh's zeal for his name (v. 11). Verse 10 declares that Israel's present distress is not an argument against God's sovereignty; its distress was due to deliberate testing.

48:12-16, Yahweh Predicts Cyrus. In vv. 12-13, beginning the second part, Israel hears the familiar recital concerning the creation of heaven and earth and of all who dwell therein (vv. 12-13). When Yahweh summons those whom he has created, all of them utterly dependent upon him, can any one of them claim to predict and interpret what the creator is about to do (v. 14ab)? The new deed is Yahweh's choosing Cyrus (vv. 14c-15). Just as Yahweh was not silent about the old deeds but predicted and interpreted them (vv. 16a-c), so he is not silent about today's act, "Now the Lord Yahweh has sent me [Second Isaiah], endowed with his spirit" (v. 16d).

48:17-19, The Divine Purpose Stands, Whether Israel Obeys or Not. Israel has heard the word interpreting the significance of Cyrus. If they would only heed the new promise, their prosperity would be like Israel when it obeyed the ancient word. In words reminiscent of the promise to Abraham and Sarah (cf. Gen. 22:17-19), they would live and not be cut off (Isa. 48:18-19).

48:20-21, Leave Babylon! The proper response to Yahweh's word delivered through the prophet is an act: they are to become part of the new exodus procession. On the way their conversation is to express their redemption. They will experience the prosperity promised in v. 18bc, even in the infertile desert. Verse 22 appears to be an addition denying to the wicked a share in the prosperity enjoyed by the obedient.

49:1-26

The Servant Is Commissioned to Lead the People

The nations see a double restoration: the servant Israel, who has lost all the insignia of peoplehood in the Exile, embarks on a new creation/exodus-conquest (vv. 1-13, fifty-five lines); Dame Zion, who has lost her children and buildings, is rebuilt (vv. 14-26, fifty-three lines). The commission of the servant is modeled on the commission to Moses and to Jeremiah. There are two types of commission in the Bible: the type represented in 1 Kings 22:19-22, Isaiah 6, and Isa. 40:1-9, in which the prophet in the divine assembly willingly assumes responsibility for communicating heavenly decisions to those on earth, and the type represented in Exod. 3:1-4:17 (Moses), Judg. 6:11-24 (Gideon), and Jer. 1:4-10 (Jeremiah). In the latter type, the person resists the call, and his resistance must be overcome by signs and dialogue. Moses cites the people's lack of confidence in him (Exod. 4:1) and his lack of eloquence (Exod. 4:10). Jeremiah (whose commission is modeled on Moses') points to his youth and lack of eloquence (Jer. 1:6). The dialogue in Isa. 49:3-5, "he said," "but I said," "and now Yahweh says," is reminiscent especially of Jer. 1:4-10, "but I said," "Yahweh said," "and Yahweh said to me." The servant, who is to lead the new exodus-conquest, is clearly modeled on Moses and Jeremiah.

Further evidence for the unity of the passage is the Second-Isaian device of creating two sections of approximately equal length that each make the same point (cf. 41:1-20 and 41:21-42:9; 48:1-11 and 48:12-21). In 49:1-13, the servant's resistance is overcome; in vv. 14-26, the disbelief of Dame Zion. Verses 8-12 are a natural continuation of the commission in vv. 1-7; the call to the new Moses is fulfilled in the exodus-conquest of vv. 8-12. Verse 14, which begins the second section, would be impossible abrupt without the preceding lines.

49:1-13, The Commission of the Servant.

The nations are invited to look on, as in 52:13-15, while the servant narrates his commission to them. They will be astonished when they see a people they thought had been annihilated restored, with a divinely chosen leader (vv. 1-6), land (vv. 8-12), and a holy city with temple and citizens (vv. 14-26).

In the dialogue between God and the prophet, modeled on those between God and Moses (and Jeremiah), the prophet's plea of exhaustion (v. 4) is ruled out as an impediment to the task. The task is specified in v. 5abc: to bring Israel back to Yahweh in Zion. The task of the universal God's servant cannot be limited to Israel (v. 6). The nations will be enlightened when they see the servant, humbled in the defeat of exile and rescued by the God who chose him (v. 7).

Before going on to vv. 8-13, a word needs to be said about how the servant, called "Israel" in v. 3, can have a mission to Israel. As pointed out in the introduction, many commentators distinguish an individual servant of the four "servant songs" (42:1-4; 49:1-6; 50:4-11; 52:13-53:12) from servant Israel elsewhere in Second Isaiah. They therefore excise "Israel" in v. 3. This excision is unwarranted and unnecessary if one understands that servants of gods or kings were understood dialectically, in relation to their master and to their people. All Israel is called to be like the servant.

Isa. 49:8-13 specify the task. Just as Moses led the people to Canaan and apportioned the land (v. 8), so the servant will bring forth the people from bondage and will lead them through the desert, now tamed by Yahweh, to Zion (vv. 9-11). The people will proceed to Zion (v. 12) not only from Babylon; but from all places of exile (including Syene in Egypt). All nature is to praise Yahweh, for he has comforted his people (cf. 40:1).

49:14-26, Dame Zion Is Consoled. The gathering of the exiles is only half the story. As in Jer. 31:15-22, one of the sources for this section, the bereft mother must be consoled. As divine-human dialogue persuaded the servant in Isa. 49:1-6, so dialogue with Yahweh gradually turns the mother's discouragement and exhaustion to amazed joy. The mother's fatalism, expressed in her proverbs (vv. 14, 24), is fully addressed by Yahweh's repeating and reversing them (vv. 15, 25). In v. 16, Yahweh adapts the well-known metaphor of constant remembrance in Deut. 6:8, "You shall bind them [the words of the Law] as a sign on your hand, and they shall be a symbol on your forehead." The glory of a city is its walls, buildings, and thronging crowds. Mother Zion will joyfully contemplate her complete restoration (Isa. 49:17-21), in contrast to Dame Babylon, who suffered the loss of her "lords" and of her children in chap. 47. Just as the nations see the people's rise in 49:7, so they do here; kings are summoned by a flag (cf. 11:10-11) to bring the prisoners home and bow down before the people of the only God (49:22-23). Because it is Yahweh who contends, no tyrant can gainsay his intent to gather all his people (vv. 24-25). In the defeat of the enemies, who are forced to eat their own flesh and blood (an allusion to cannibalism in siege-induced famine, as in the curses of Lev. 26:29 and Deut. 28:53-57), all flesh will acknowledge Yahweh as Israel's God.

The Disciple Reveals the Divine Plan

Isaiah, frustrated by his eighth-century audience's refusal to prepare for the judgment, commanded his disciples to write down his message (8:16-18; 30:8-14) so that when judgment finally came, the people would see that their defeat resulted from Yahweh's plan. In this speech, the prophet declares that he is one of those disciples of Isaiah (50:4-9); his faithful bearing of punishment and his rescue enable him to teach his fellows where salvation is now to be found (50:10-51:18).

Since most scholars deny that 50:4-11 has anything to do with 51:1-8, it is necessary to demonstrate the passage is a unit. Some phrases are repeated in both sections with only slight variation, suggesting a deliberate reprise: "near is the one who declares me innocent," in 50:8a and 51:5a; and the repetition of the metaphor "to be worn out like a garment" in 50:9cd and 51:6cde and 51:8ab. Moreover, the pattern of the thanksgiving psalm has shaped the whole. The thanksgiving psalm is essentially the report of a rescue; the singer tells how he or she was rescued by God from an affliction—illness, false accusations, inability to visit the Temple, or the psalmist's own folly. Having been rescued, the psalmist can now declare before the assembly the wonderful rescue of God, and thus invite the whole community to give praise. Sometimes the psalmist becomes a teacher, teaching trust in God on the basis of the experience of rescue. Ps. 34:1-13 is a good example: "I sought Yahweh and he answered me. . . . Come, O children, listen to me and I will teach you the fear of Yahweh. What person is there who desires life, and covets many days, that he may enjoy good things? Keep your tongue from evil, and lips from speaking deceit." The prophet describes his suffering and rescue in 50:4-9 and teaches the people on the basis of that experience (50:10-11; 51:1-3, 4-5, 6, 7-8). The suffering in 50:4-9 is specific: it is the second stage in the prophetic scenario, the time of punishment that preceded the present time of salvation.

50:1-3, Because of Your Sins Yahweh Left His Wife and Children.

Isa. 49:14-26 spoke of Dame Zion's loss of husband and children. Isa. 50:1-2b declares this double loss did not occur because of Yahweh's weakness but because of the people's sins; no one heeded Yahweh's words (v. 2ab). Verses 2c-3 show that this double dismissal cannot have come from anyone wresting them away from Yahweh, since he alone is powerful. Yahweh alone made the world by pushing back to their boundaries the waters that once engulfed earth (v. 2efg; cf. commentary above on 42:13-17); he also created the exilic night, covering the heavenly luminaries so that darkness enveloped the earth (3ab).

The last phrase requires comment. In the first of the two Isaiah passages concerning disciples mentioned above, 8:16-9:7, the eighth-century prophet spoke of the impending judgment as darkness and distress: "In the former time he humbled the land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali, but in latter time he will glorify the way of the sea, the land beyond the Jordan, Galilee of the nations. The people who walked in darkness have seen a great light." Second Isaiah seems to have taken the sequence of darkness-light from this text as descriptive of his prophetic scenario of punishment and restoration. Hence 50:3 declares that Yahweh deliberately created the period of exilic darkness, when wife and children were sent away.

50:4-11, The Disciple Teaches the People. Second Isaiah is one of the Isaian disciples who knows the divine plan of darkness-light, punishment-restoration, so that he can teach the exhausted people. Daily the disciple receives instruction (v. 4). In the period of darkness, he submitted to the punishment sent by God, unlike the rebellious ones spoken of in 30:8-14. (There are remarkable verbal echoes of 30:9, 12 in 50:4, 10). Like the faithful lamenter in Lam. 3:30, he gave his cheek to the smiter and was filled with insults (Isa. 50:5-6). Like the sufferer in the thanksgiving psalms, he did not give up, for Yahweh was there (vv. 7-9). Now the disciple can teach those among the people who "fear Yahweh" (v. 10a) yet "lie in a bed of pain" (v. 11f) to "walk in the light of your fire." The last phrase is obscure, but may allude to Isa. 2:5, "O house of Jacob, come let us walk in the light of Yahweh," i.e., now that the light of restoration has come, let it light your path to Zion.

51:1-8, Yahweh's Consoling Presence Is Now Found in the Holy City. The four stanzas (vv. 1-3, 4-5, 6, 7-8) all develop in different ways the teaching of the disciple of 50:10-11: the presence of Yahweh that was with me in the period of dark exile is now, in the period of light, to be found in Zion. All four stanzas begin with a masculine plural imperative, the usual form for addressing all Israel. In 51:1-4, Yahweh blessed Abraham and Sarah by giving them progeny. Yahweh will "comfort" Zion and give her progeny as David "comforted" Bathsheba in 2 Sam. 12:24. Isa. 51:4-5 refer to Isa. 2:1-4, where Yahweh's teaching and word go forth from Zion to the nations. Isa. 51:6 alludes to songs of Zion like Psalms 46 and 48, which declare Zion to be the firm point in a tottering universe. Isa. 51:7-8 focus on those prepared to come to Zion, assuring them that mere human beings cannot harm them, for Yahweh's victory is forever.

Because of the fidelity of the disciple who knew that Yahweh was with him in the period of darkness, the people learn that in the period of light Yahweh will be with them in Zion.

Prayer to Yahweh the Warrior

The stanzas in 51:9-52:12 appear at first glance to be unrelated, and few commentators see them as a single speech. Many regard the placement of the three similar imperatives in 51:9, 51:17, and 52:1 as later editing. They admit Isa. 51:9-16 is a lament with response, but view 51:17-23; 52:1-2; 52:3-6; 52:7-11; and 52:11-12 as separate sections or fragments. This commentary proposes that the section is modeled on the communal lament, examples of which include Psalms 44 and 74, and Isa. 63:7-64:12. Communal laments contain a recital of the events that brought Israel into being (51:9-11) so as to pose the question, Will Yahweh allow that act to be undone by the present enemy? Communal laments also contain vivid descriptions of the present crisis (51:17-23) and urgent pleas for help (51:9ab). Divine responses recur throughout this speech, 51:12-16, 21-23; 52:1-2, 7-10. Another argument for the unity of the section is that the opening recital of the creation of Israel in 51:9-11, describing the return of the redeemed to Zion in v. 11, receives a response only in 52:11-12. Also, Dame Zion's loss of her children (51:20) is not redressed until 52:7-12.

51:9-11, Appeal to the Warrior. Hebrew style sometimes uses the concrete noun for the abstract quality, "arm" for "power," and "feet" for "messenger," e.g., 52:7. As in 42:13-14 and Ps. 78:65, the divine warrior is asleep and needs to be aroused by his needy clients. Appeal is made to the act of creation that brought the people into existence—the defeat of Sea, when the waters that covered the entire earth were forced back to their proper boundaries, the upper and lower oceans (cf. Ps. 104:5-9; Isa. 43:12-16; Gen. 1). Second Isaiah identifies creation and exodus-conquest, for the defeat of Sea allows the entry of the people into Canaan. The question is posed acutely: will you let Babylon annul your creation?

51:12-16, Yahweh's Response to the Appeal. Yahweh proclaims himself their consoler (v. 12a). His question, "Who are you to fear a mere mortal?" seems to rebuke the people's question, "Was it not you . . ." in vv. 9e and 10a. Can the people have so forgotten their creator as to fear mere humans (v. 13)? The oppressed shall be saved (v. 14), for "I am Yahweh your God," who defeated Sea and said, "You are my people" (vv. 15-16). Verse 16ab seems awkward and interrupts the connection between v. 15 and v. 16cd. It may be parenthetical, an assurance given to the servant that Israel is already protected.

51:17-20, The Suffering of Jerusalem. Jerusalem is to rouse itself rather than Yahweh, who, as the preceding section shows, has always been alert (v. 17ab). Nonetheless, there is compassion despite this rebuke. Jer. 25:15-29 equates the effect of suffering Yahweh's punishment with drunkenness in a way not dissimilar from Isa. 51:17. Dame Zion is disgraced in having no children to lead her home (vv. 18, 20). A Ugaritic text describes the ideal son: he "takes [his father] by the hand when he is drunk, carries him home when he is sated with wine" (see Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts, p. 150). Reversal of Zion's fortunes consists not only of vengeance on her enemies (vv. 22-23) but also of restoration for her children.

51:21-23, Jerusalem's Enemies Drink Her Cup. From Jerusalem reeling from the blows of Babylon (v. 21), Yahweh takes her cup and forces her enemies to drink from it.

52:1-2, Jerusalem Is Awakened and Adorned. With the same imperatives in which she earlier had addressed Yahweh (51:17), she is told to rise and array herself in queenly garments (contrast Babylon in 47:1-3), for the enemies that stripped her are gone.

52:3-6, I Will Not Permit My Name to Be Profaned. The verses are later glosses. Israel will be redeemed without money (v. 3), meaning that no conventional army will redeem it. Israel was attacked for no reason by the Egyptians and by the Assyrians (the enemy in Isaiah's time). Yahweh will act, and in that act people will recognize him as God (vv. 4-6).

52:7-10, Yahweh Is Spied Approaching Zion. Yahweh's approach is described through the eyes of the sentries on the walls. 2 Sam. 18:19-33 similarly builds suspense through the device of sentries' conversation. The lament of Jerusalem is answered; Yahweh has come as redeemer.

52:11-12, Leave Babylon for Zion! In the new exodus-conquest the people are to bring back the vessels taken by Nebuchadnezzar when he destroyed the Temple (2 Kings 25:14-15). They shall not go out in haste as in the first exodus (Exod. 12:11; Deut. 16:3), for the Babylonians are defeated. Yahweh leads a peaceful procession, protecting the people, like the pillar of cloud in the first exodus. The arm of Yahweh has acted (Isa. 51:9).

The Servant Justifies the Many

There is widespread agreement on the dimensions and genre of the speech in 52:13-53:12 but not on its meaning. Divine speech in the first person (52:13-15; 53:11b-12) frames a speech by a different speaker in the third person. The genre utilized in 53:1-11a is the individual thanksgiving psalm, but it is radically transformed. The thanksgiving is essentially the psalmist's report to fellow Israelites (often called "the many") of his rescue by God from an affliction that separated him from God and community. "The many" are invited to give thanks with the psalmist: "With my mouth I will give great thanks to Yahweh; I will praise him in the midst of the many" (Ps. 109:30). Second Isaiah, however, alters the genre; the rescued person is silent, and the many tell of his rescue of them.

The material is traditional, but its arrangement is startlingly new and has given rise to many questions. Who are the speakers in 53:1-11a, the nations or Israel? Who is the servant? Does the servant die and undergo resurrection? How does the servant "bear the sins" of the many?

52:13-15, Kings Are Amazed at the Transformation of the Servant. In 49:7 the nations were startled to see the once-exhausted servant leading the people to Zion. Here Yahweh gives a judicial verdict in favor of the servant and against those who interpreted his condition as divine rejection.

53:1-11a, The Many Acknowledge the Servant Has Borne Their Sin. In thanksgiving psalms, the person rescued speaks of his vindication to the many, but here the many speak while the servant is silent, thus illustrating v. 7 (cf. Ps. 39:2, 9). They can hardly believe their rescue came from one so lowly (Isa. 53:1-3). Servants in the Bible were often of lowly origin: Moses, Gideon, and Jeremiah all reminded God of their lack of talent; even David in the estimate of his family was totally unsuitable as a candidate for kingship (1 Sam. 16:1-13).

In Isa. 53:4-6, the speakers declare the servant has borne their sins. Here we must attempt to answer two difficult questions: who are the speakers, and how does the servant bear others' sins? The speaker seems to be exiled Israel, not the nations. In Second Isaiah the nations are spectators at the reemergence of Israel. They are part of important scenes as chorus, not protagonist. Israel, therefore, is "the many" whose sin the servant bears.

How does the servant bear the sins of Israel? One must avoid reading NT ideas into the Isaian text (Mark 10:45; 14:24; and parallels use similar language to interpret the death of Jesus) or denying vicarious suffering in the OT simply because it is not found anywhere else. A good starting point is the observation that most Hebrew words for sin can mean both the act and the state resulting from the act. "To bear the sin" therefore means to bear the consequences of sin. The people of the Exile, for example, had to bear the consequences of the sins of their pre-exilic ancestors, "Our fathers sinned and are no more [they are not living so as to suffer the consequences of their act], and we bear their sins" (Lam. 5:7).

How could the servant bear the sin of his contemporaries, "the many"? A partial answer is given by 50:4–11, in which the disciple accepted the sufferings of the Exile as sent by God; he offered his back to the smiters, his cheek to those who plucked his beard. Most of the exiles did not regard the Exile the way the servant did, to judge from the preaching of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. They fled from it, either attempting to return prematurely or giving up all hope of return and settling in. They did not bear the consequences of their sin. True expiation could come about only through obedient submission in the period of punishment and obedient return in the period of restoration. But so long as Israel, in the person of the servant, acted obediently, the nation continued to exist. In 53:4–6, the many finally come to this awareness.

Verses 7–9 speak of an unjust trial ending in a disgraceful death. Actual death seems unlikely; the servant's rehabilitation in vv. 11b–12 would have to be a heavenly judgment scene. Rather, a "death experience" is described, like the psalmic "going down to the pit" (e.g., Pss. 28:1; 30:3; 88:4; 143:7). The servant's entire life, from birth (Isa. 53:2) to death, was one of suffering and rejection.

In the last stanza of the speakers' statement, 53:10–11a (unfortunately the text is damaged), the many see that the servant's suffering was part of God's plan. There is a hint in v. 10d, explicit in vv. 11b–12, that his reward is to possess the land; in Deuteronomy "to lengthen the days" is a phrase describing life in the promised land.

53:11b–12, The Servant's Reward. The servant's self-conscious acceptance of the pain of exile as the deserved punishment from God, his "bearing of the sin" of Israel and his leading it in the exodus-conquest, wins him the great prize—possession of the land. To be in God's land, Zion, makes one righteous, pleasing to God. Isa. 8:16–9:7, which speaks of possessing the land after the darkness of defeat, provides important clues to the meaning of the verses. Verse 11a should read, with LXX, "he shall see the light," a reference to the dawning light in 9:2. Isa. 9:3 likens the joy of possessing the land to the joy of warriors dividing spoil (v. 12ab).

Due to the servant's exemplary bearing of the guilt of all Israel, the whole people is now free to enjoy the great gift—the land. The servant's suffering is accepted as valid, while the many—and the nations—look on in amazement.

54:1–17

Yahweh Returns as Husband to Zion

Zion, the wife of her Lord and the mother of her inhabitants, has been at the center of Second Isaiah's preaching since 44:24–45:13, a text that provides Cyrus's commission to rebuild her. Whether indirectly, through mention of her counterimage Babylon (chaps. 46; 47), or directly (45:14–25; 49; 50:1–51:8; 51:9–52:12), interest in Zion has been constant. The prophet had to contend with the exiles' reluctance to leave the splendid city of Babylon for unwarred and ruined Jerusalem. He therefore emphasizes Yahweh's guarantee to make Zion the most beautiful and secure city in the world.

The unity of the chapter is suggested by the sections of approximately equal length: 54:1–5, twenty-one lines; vv. 6–10, twenty lines; and vv. 11–17, twenty-two lines. This device has been seen before in 48:1–11 and 12–22 and in 49:1–13 and 14–26. There is a clear logic to the drama: Yahweh exhorts Zion to rejoice at her husband's return (vv. 1–5), assures her that his return will be permanent (vv. 6–10), and then specifies how his protecting presence will be mediated (vv. 11–17). The fact that a tent is mentioned in vv. 1–5 and a temple-city in vv. 11–17 is no argument against unity. Old Canaanite tradition, preserved in the Ugaritic texts, portrays the gods as living either in a majestic tent or in a palace of wood and stone. Psalm 84 speaks of Yahweh living in a tent (vv. 1–2) and in a house (v. 4).

54:1–5, Zion Is to Sing at Her Husband's Return.

Like the once barren Hannah, who sang, "The barren woman has borne seven, but she who has many children is forlorn" (1 Sam. 2:5), Zion is told to sing of her miraculous birth. Isaiah had praised Zion as a "quiet habitation, an immovable tent, whose stakes will never be plucked up, nor will any of its cords be broken" (Isa. 33:20, RSV). Elsewhere in the Bible (Ps. 48; Rev. 21:9–27) the sacrality of the divine dwelling is extended to the entire city. Here the old dimensions of the tent city are too narrow for the hordes of Zion's children and must be extended (Isa. 54:2–3). The shame attached, in ancient Israel, to a woman without husband, children, or property will be removed by her husband, the creator of the world (vv. 4–5).

Yahweh's return is rooted in his loving commitment; in vv. 6-10 "Yahweh says," or a variant, is repeated five times. The contrast in v. 7 is clear in the Hebrew, lit., "small moment" and "large mercy." Love's oath this time is permanent, the same oath through which Noah was promised that there would never again be a flood (Gen. 9:11). Even storms paradoxically show the new security of Zion (Isa. 54:10), where Yahweh's eternal love is available to all his people.

54:11-17, Rebuilding the City. Verse 11 alludes to the storm and loneliness that have shaken Zion, and promises rebuilding with precious stones befitting God's dwelling (vv. 12-13). Isa. 2:1-4 predicted the exaltation of the mountain of the house of Yahweh, whence Yahweh's teaching would go forth. Zion's inhabitants are appropriately called disciples ("taught by Yahweh"), who prosper because of their observance of the teaching. Songs of Zion, especially Psalms 46, 48, and 76, sang of Zion as the one firm point in the universe where God's enemies are defeated, and Isa. 54:14 echoes those promises of safety. Verses 15-16 explain why Zion is secure: Yahweh, as creator of all, controls even the enemies and the makers of their weapons. The last couplet, v. 17cd, interprets renewed Zion as the "patrimony" of Israel, given in the new exodus-conquest. Those who live in it are righteous.

55:1-13*Come to the Life Offered in Zion

Contrary to most commentators, I take chap. 55 as a single speech: vv. 1-5, eighteen lines; vv. 6-11, twenty-one lines; and vv. 12-13, nine lines. Stanzas 1 and 2 are parallel, each inviting the people to Zion, where life is offered. Stanza 3, half the length of the first stanza, concludes the invitation by an announcement of the procession to the shrine. Correspondence in length between lines of a single section has occurred before, e.g., in 40:12-31, with stanzas of eighteen, twenty-two, and twenty-six lines respectively. The best proof of unity, however, is the parallelism and interplay of vv. 1-5 and 6-11, as well as their natural connection to vv. 12-13.

55:1-5, Come to the Banquet in Zion. This section makes use of the genre of the gods' or goddesses' invitation to a banquet, attested from the late second (in the Ugaritic texts) to the late first millennium (Prov. 9; Sir. 24). In this genre, the deity invites humans to a banquet, first offering food, and then life, fellowship with the deity. Proverbs 9 is a good example: "Whoever is inexperienced, let him turn in here, whoever lacks understanding, I say 'Come eat of my food, and drink of the wine I have mixed. Leave aside folly and live, walk in the path of insight. For with me your days will be multiplied, and the years of your life increased'" (Prov. 9:4-6). To enter the banquet hall of Dame Wisdom, one must "leave aside folly," an injunction implicit in Isa. 55:2 and explicit in 55:7-8, "Let the wicked person leave his way."

What is the meaning of "to live" in v. 3b? In Proverbs 9 it is the intentional search for wisdom, which brings one close to God. In Isa. 55:3, the bond with God exists through the covenant, in pre-exilic days made with the Davidic king but now with those who come to Zion. The Davidic king witnessed the power of Yahweh to the world (cf. Pss. 18:43-45; 89:20-27; see commentary above on Isa. 43:9); the witnessing is now to be performed by the people who return to Zion, an instance of the transferal to the whole people of tasks once performed by kings and prophets.

In the ancient Near East, king and temple were closely associated. The building, or rebuilding, of a temple, signifying the renewal of creation, was celebrated with a great feast. The previous speech, 54:11-17, narrated the building of the Temple. Celebration of divine and human kingship (in the democratized sense) is therefore appropriate.

55:6-11, Come to Where Yahweh's Word Bears Fruit. The thought advances as it did in the first section: the summons to the sanctuary (v. 6 is to be translated, "Seek Yahweh where he may be encountered, call upon him where he is present"), the insistence upon conduct appropriate to the divine presence (vv. 7-8), the movement from food ("providing seed to the sower, bread to the eater") to life with Yahweh through commission ("accomplishing what I desire, succeeding in what I command").

Jer. 29:10-14 provides an impressive parallel to the passage, declaring that God's plans are to bring Israel back to where they will call upon me, seek me, and I will be found by you (vocabulary similarities to Isa. 55 are in italics). According to Jeremiah, when seventy years (the period of punishment in his reckoning) were up, Israel was to come back and find God once again in the Temple. Second Isaiah held the same basic belief but expressed it in different language.

Verses 8-11 develop the idea that human plans (not RSV: "thoughts"), like human life, depend utterly upon the heavens. Only those will live who obey the divine word, which accomplishes all its purposes.

55:12-13, The Procession Along the Sacred Way. Verses 12-13 conclude the chapter and the prophecy. The prophet urges the exiles to join him in a new creation/exodus-conquest, before which all nature is in awe (v. 12). The plants of the desert are replaced by evergreens, which shall stand by the highway, a memorial to the new exodus, just as the twelve stones of Joshua were to the old (Josh. 4:6-7).

56:1-66:24

Third Isaiah

56:1-8

Yahweh Will Gather Yet More Worshipers

A divine speech invites two hitherto excluded categories, eunuchs and foreigners, to become members of the holy people. In the coming judgment only those who observe the commandments will be among God's people. They will be brought to "my holy mountain" (v. 7). "Salvation" and "deliverance" refer to a future divine visitation, like that foretold in Isa. 1:21-28. The prophet's words function like the entrance rites, Psalms 15 and 24; Isa. 33:13-16 and 55:6-7, that admitted one to the Temple. The alternation between first and third person is not a sign of later editing; such alternation, even within a single verse as in v. 6, is common, especially in divine speech.

In v. 1, the imperatives, "Keep justice and do righteousness," define membership in Yahweh's people: righteous conduct in God's presence (v. 2cd; → Righteousness). The Bible sometimes defines roles by citing the divine command to the person in the role, e.g., man and woman, in Gen. 1:28, "Be fruitful and multiply"; Israel, in Lev. 19:2, "You shall be holy, for I Yahweh your God am holy"; judges, in Deut. 17:18-18:1. The word "righteousness" (RSV: "salvation") characterizes both divine and human activity in Isa. 56:1bc; the righteous God comes to a righteous people. In v. 2, only those who obey the commandments are admitted into the divine presence. "This" in v. 2a refers primarily to the righteous acts that follow; these acts are examples of the general imperatives of v. 1b. Sabbath observance is paired with a general avoidance of evil (v. 2cd); juxtaposition of general and concrete precept is characteristic of prophetic preaching, e.g., Isa. 1:16-17; Jer. 22:3, and Ezek. 45:9. Sabbath observance was emphasized in the Exile and thereafter because it defined the people, who had lost other insignia; it is not an externalizing and trivializing of religion. In the face of the divine declaration of what makes a people holy, human words of exclusion have no weight (Isa. 56:3). Foreigners "who have attached themselves to Yahweh" and who carry out the tasks of the law of Moses are admitted here and in 66:20; elsewhere foreigners per se are excluded and even reckoned as enemies (60:10; 61:5; 62:8). Eunuchs were excluded from "entering the assembly of Yahweh" in Deut. 23:1; male worshipers were to be physically integral. The two groups are addressed in inverted order (vv. 4-7). In vv. 4-5, eunuchs who observe the Israelite religion will have "a hand and name" in the Temple and in Jerusalem. "Hand" here, as in 1 Sam. 15:12 and in 2 Sam. 18:18, means "monument"; "hand and name" is a hendiadys (two words coordinated by "and" that refer to one thought) for a monument causing one's name to be remembered. The eunuch who has no son to carry on his name, "a dry tree," has a future within the future of the people. In Isa. 56:6, no less than seven clauses—all expressing fundamental loyalty to God—impress upon the foreigner-converts how deep their conversion has to be. "Covenant" (v. 6) means the totality of commandments. "To bring to my holy mountain" (v. 7) alludes to venerable poetry such as Exod. 15:17, Deut. 32:13, and Ps. 78:54, in which Yahweh leads his people through the wilderness from Egypt to worship at his holy mountain in the land of Canaan. "Rejoice," in the parallel verse, refers to joyous and vocal participation in worship (Isa. 56:7cdef). The last phrase of v. 7, "my house shall be called a house of prayer for all the peoples" (cited in Mark 11:17 and parallels), invites those who had been excluded to the sole place of encounter between Yahweh and the community. Verse 8, the climax, declares that the welcome to the two categories of outcasts provides only one part of a yet more ambitious divine plan: to invite yet more people to the flock. Righteous conduct, not simply physical membership, makes a member of the community.

Punishment for the Idolatrous Oppressors of the Faithful

Whether the passage 56:9-57:13 is a unity is debated; the relevance of 57:1-2 to the rest is unclear to many commentators, as is the connection of 56:9-12, a denunciation of careless leaders, to 57:3-13, a denunciation of idolaters. But the passage is a unity; denunciation of leaders prior to condemnation of the people is attested elsewhere (e.g., Hos. 4:1-10; Amos 6:4-7). Moreover, typical Third-Isaian vocabulary unifies the whole section: "come" in Isa. 56:9, 12; "understand" in 56:11; 57:1; "beds" in 57:2, 7, 8; "to place in the heart" in 57:1, 11; and the Heb. root nchl, "valley" in 57:5, 6, and "inherit" in 57:13.

56:9-57:2, Divine Punishment Against the Careless Leaders. Divine punishment is announced to the leaders first and then to the people. God's summoning of the wild beasts to attack the unprotected flock or vineyard (both traditional images of the people) occurs in Jer.

12:9-13; Ezek. 14:15; and 34:5. "His/its watchmen" (Isa. 56:10) has no clear antecedent; it probably refers to Yahweh by anticipation, the speaker of the opening summons to the beasts. "Watchmen" is a term for prophets (Hos. 9:8; Jer. 6:17; Ezek. 3:17; 33:7), who are usually imagined to be on the walls of a city, but here they may be shepherds in the field because the dogs are probably shepherd dogs (cf. Job 30:1). At any rate, the leaders are blind, deaf, sleepy, wine-sodden, intent only on their appetites, neglectful of the people. Such, alas, are the shepherds, declares Isa. 56:11c; they are without understanding, thinking the future to be a mere repetition of the present (v. 12). Refusal to see a novel, divinely fashioned future was also condemned by Isaiah in chaps. 28-32. Isa. 57:1-2 provides a conventional description of the injustice brought about by the irresponsible, selfish shepherds. Psalms 12, 37, 49, and 73 all describe an unjust world in which the righteous person suffers at the hands of the wicked. Ps. 12:1 is the prayer of one trapped in such a world, "Come to rescue, Yahweh, for the godfearer has disappeared, for the faithful have vanished from the children of men." Though the syntax of the obscure Isa. 57:2 suggests that the oppressed person of v. 1 is expressing the hope of one day being rescued, the laments just cited suggest another, more plausible, interpretation: the verse continues the complaint of the just person that the unjust are flourishing (cf. Pss. 10:3-11; 73:4-9).

57:3-13, Divine Judgment in Favor of the Righteous. The divine judge summons the guilty people, "the children of diviners" and adulterers (v. 3), because of their false worship and infidelity. The rites described in vv. 5-9 are not prescribed by Yahweh; those who engage in them condemn the one God (v. 4; cf. 37:23). The rites of 57:5-9 aim to protect and enhance the fertility of humans, animals, and the soil, a deep concern of farmers in arid Palestine. Sacrifice of the firstborn child, forbidden in Israel (Exod. 13:1-2, 11-16; → Firstborn, First Fruits, Firstling), placated the god, who would then not claim subsequent children. The sexual rites were apparently carried out with cultic prostitutes representing gods or goddesses to promote fertility. The shrines are conventionally described by earlier prophets as being "under the terebinths" (Hos. 4:13) and "under every green tree" (Jer. 2:20; 3:6, 13). Such activity constitutes a covenant with the gods (Isa. 57:8c). Verse 6 plays on v. 13; a remote and arid valley (Heb. nachal) symbolizes your inheritance (nchl), whereas the righteous will inherit (Heb. nachal) the fertile land; "portion" and "lot" are also terms for the land allotted by God to Israel. Verse 9 is obscure; oil and perfume are given to a god whose epithet is "the king," and envoys are sent far and wide. The actions may honor El, the king of the Canaanite pantheon, to whom children are offered and for whose blessing sexual rites are carried out. Israel does not grow weary of this fruitless cultic activity (v. 10), does not revere God as ultimate (RSV: "fear"), does not invoke (RSV: "remember") Yahweh; Israel mistakes Yahweh's silence for impotence (v. 11). In vv. 12-13, Yahweh, as sole God, announces his judgment: "I hereby pronounce judgment upon your deeds" (lit., "your judgment and your deeds," a hendiadys). By this decree, Yahweh decides in favor of the aggrieved righteous of 57:1-2 and against the unrighteous of vv. 3-11. The righteous, those who hope in Yahweh alone, will inherit the land. The author has drawn on Psalm 37, with its reversal of the fortunes of the good and the wicked, especially vv. 9, 11, 18, 22, 29, 40, and also upon Isa. 65:13-14.

God Will Lead the Humble Faithful

This speech, alluding to earlier prophetic texts that declare God's wrath or absence, refers to specific sins of Israel. God's wrath will not be permanent; it will be turned into loving care by free divine decision. Second Isaiah's call for a new exodus from Babylon becomes a metaphor for "the way" of the wisdom literature, on which the righteous consciously place themselves.

57:14-17, The All-Holy Dwells with the Lowly. "Build up a highway" alludes to 40:3 except that "way" and "stumbling block" become metaphors, as in Psalm 1 and Proverbs 1-9. Isa 57:15 impressively declares the Most High to be on the side of the lowly, bringing them to life. Verses 16-17, like 54:7-8, attribute God's wrath to Israel's sin and not to divine impotence. "A contrite or broken spirit" is the way to assure his return (→ Wrath). The words recall Ps. 51:17, "My sacrifice, O God, is a spirit broken; a heart broken and crushed, O God, you will not reject." As in 1 Kings 8:27-30, 33-34, a stark contrast is drawn between God's lofty dwelling and his gracious presence to those who repent. Isa. 54:7-8 is incorporated in v. 16 but changed considerably. Modern translations generally interpret v. 16cd after the Septuagint (LXX) paraphrase: "For spirit will come forth from me and I have made all breath," but the literal Hebrew text is to be preferred: "Yes, because of me spirits flag, [for] it is I who made the breath of life"; all is attributed to God. This stage of the speech, the self-willed wandering of the people, ends in v. 17c.

57:18-21, Yahweh Turns and Leads the Lowly. God then "sees" their confusion caused by his absence in v. 18, just as he saw the people's plight in Exod. 2:25 and Isa. 58:3a.

Spontaneously he resolves to heal them; he will lead them along the right path to where their ritual mourning, "the fruit of their lips," will find acceptance. In 57:19-21, God unambiguously declares his will to save the repentant in Zion and in far-off lands and to punish the wicked. As in Psalm 1, where the wind blows the wicked like chaff, the wicked here are uprooted, ceaselessly churned by the sea. Israel far and near is to turn to God who dwells with the lowly.

The Fast That Yahweh Wants

Though some scholars believe that chap. 58 is a composite (vv. 1-3a plus 5-9 making up the original kernel), the passage develops a single idea coherently: liturgical fasts win Yahweh's favor only when people act justly by caring for the poor. Verses 13-14 include sabbath observances among the required acts of justice, as does 56:1-8; Israel did not reduce obedience to social justice alone.

58:1-3b, The Prophet Is Instructed. Verse 1 instructs the prophet to speak like a trumpet (cf. Hos. 8:1) and gives a reason for the ensuing judgment: the people seek oracles from priests and prophets but do not "do righteousness" (the same phrase expressing total fidelity, as in 56:1). Popular frustration at God's silence is felt particularly at the fasts (Isa. 58:3a), which had been observed on the fourth, fifth, seventh, and tenth months since the destruction of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. (Zech. 7:1-7; 8:19).

58:3c-5, The Prophet Denounces the Fasts. Though the people approach God as if they were a righteous nation (v. 2cd), they oppress their neighbor. Their self-abasing gestures are not accepted (v. 5).

58:6-14, Proper Repentance and Its Fruits. In v. 6 begins the first of three long conditional sentences; the others begin at vv. 9c and 13. What Yahweh requires in the first sentence is that they liberate and care for the poor, the needy who are victimized by the wicked (→ Poor). For their fasting to be accepted, they must reverse the behavior described in vv. 3b-4. Verses 8-9b depict what the divine response will be to such conversion: their light and healing will shine forth; God will lead them and will answer their prayer.

In the second conditional sentence, if you free the poor (vv. 9b-10) then your light will shine, and Yahweh will lead you (vv. 10b-11 = v. 8). Verses 11d-12 show the happy effects of God's favor: the people will have water in abundance, and their city will be rebuilt, the goal of the fasts.

In the third and climactic "if . . . then" series, righteousness is interpreted as keeping Yahweh's Sabbath, a day for joy and for casting off willful conduct (v. 13). As in 56:7-8 and 57:13, Yahweh's protection is described in terms of exodus-conquest. Isa. 58:14 cites the great poem of Israel's origins: "He will put them on the high places of the earth, he will let them eat the produce of the field" (Deut. 32:13). There is a progression in the fruits of repentance in the three sections, culminating in the third: secure possession of the land.

Those Who Repent in Zion Will Be Saved

Most scholars believe that chap. 59 is a redactional unit, i.e., its unity is the work of an editor rather than the prophet. The prophet rebukes a complaint, typical of community laments, that Yahweh is silent (v. 1ab), vigorously showing that the people, not Yahweh, are responsible for their plight (vv. 2-8). A traditional lament follows in vv. 9-15b. Verses 15c-20 are the divine response to the lament: judgment in favor of the righteous. Verse 21 is generally seen as an addition.

59:1-8, Prophetic Rebuke of a Lament Complaint.

In communal laments such as Pss. 44:9-25 (esp. vv. 23-24); 74; 77 (esp. vv. 7-10); 89:38-51; and Lamentations, the people complain of God's indifference at his people's suffering in order to rouse him to action, e.g., "Why do you hold back your hand?" (Ps. 74:11a). Isa. 59:1 alludes to such a complaint about Yahweh's power. Such near blasphemy deserves the prophetic rebuke of vv. 1-8. The first part of the rebuke, vv. 2-4, vigorously directs the blame away from Yahweh and onto the people, declaring that "your" sins are the reason for God's absence; the Hebrew suffix "your" is repeated nine times in eight verses. The description of "your" sins (vv. 1-4) resembles other cultic rebukes (e.g., Ps. 50:16-21; Isa. 1:14-15). Isa. 59:4 mentions legal abuses (Job 5:1; 9:16; 13:22 show the legal context). The word "no one" in Isa. 59:4a, like "no one" in Pss. 12:1-2; 14:1, 3 (= Ps. 53), provides part of a conventional description of corrupt society. Isa. 59:5-8 includes traditional language for deep-rooted perversity (cf. Ps. 58:3-5): evil conduct ends in frustration (the vain weaving in Isa. 59:6) and death (the poison of v. 5). Human life is a path (a metaphor repeated six times). As is common in Third Isaiah, words from the one section recur, often without development, in another: "hand," "blood," "no one," "justice," which appear in vv. 1-4, reappear in vv. 5-8.

59:9-15b, The Lament. The people now lament God's absence from their suffering for the reasons shown them by the prophet: they themselves have made a corrupt, self-enclosed society that cannot save itself. "Therefore" (v. 9) they lament, i.e., lift up to Yahweh their dashed hopes for "redress" and "vindication" (better than RSV: "justice" and "righteousness" in vv. 9ab, 11cd, 14). The "path" metaphor of the rebuke in vv. 7-8 is continued in the lament of vv. 9b-15: "righteousness has not caught up with us," "we walk in gloom," to grope along a wall, to stumble, to enter. The lament lays out before God the community's disappointment and sadness (vv. 9-11), its living with the consequences of sin (vv. 12-13), and its corrupt institutions (vv. 14-15b). The climactic example of social corruption, oppression of the righteous ("the one who turns from evil is despoiled," v. 15b), is important; it will be picked up by v. 20b, only "those who turn from sin in Jacob" will be redeemed in Yahweh's judgment.

59:15c-20, Yahweh Sees and Comes as Redeemer to Zion. The total corruption of the people is abhorrent to Yahweh (v. 15cd). Because there is not one just person to intervene for the people, someone like Moses in Exodus or the servant in Isa. 53:12, Yahweh alone must right things (Isa. 59:16). As a warrior he arms himself (vv. 17-18; cf. 42:13-17; 51:9-11) and goes out against his enemies. The whole world will fear the name of the Lord when they see this redeemer, like a pent-up stream and a roaring wind, coming to vindicate repentant Zion (59:19-20; cf. 1:27-28). Verse 20b follows up on v. 15b: the innocent victims of social injustice will be rescued.

59:21, The Spirit and the Covenant. The next verse seems a comment on rather than an integral part of the preceding passage. The wind, or spirit, of Yahweh as he comes to the city (v. 20) is declared to be a permanent feature available to the inhabitants of the renewed city, enabling them to be faithful and to give praise to Yahweh. In Num. 11:23-30, the spirit is given to all the people in response to the question, "Is the hand of Yahweh shortened?" just as in Isa. 59:1.

60:1-22 Zion's Glory

Chap. 60 is the first of three sections, the others being chaps. 61 and 62, that speak of God's grand design for Zion and for its inhabitants; the chapters constitute a striking change from the judgment of the preceding and following chapters. The prophet, in chaps. 60-62, draws on a variety of traditions: Zion songs (such as Pss. 46, 48, and 76) in which enemy kings are defeated at the foot of the holy mountain; royal songs (such as Pss. 18:43-45; 22:27-28; 72:8-11, 15) in which the king is saved from his enemies who recognize the grandeur of Jerusalem; Isaian texts (such as 2:1-5; 8:22-9:7) in which Israel is bathed in divine light; and Second-Isaian texts (such as 49:14-26; 54) in which God promises Dame Zion that the nations will bring back her dispersed children and rebuild her walls. Using these traditions Third Isaiah composed chap. 60, a unified poem asserting the brilliance and vitality of God's city. This transformation of the present devastated Jerusalem has no timetable: "I Yahweh will hasten it in its time" (v. 22). The poem consists of a preamble, vv. 1-3, and three sections of approximately equal length, vv. 4-9, 10-16, and 17-22.

60:1-3, Preamble. Verse 1 summons the city to rise up from its lowliness and shine with the brilliance of Yahweh. "Light," "Yahweh," "glory [of Yahweh]," occur in parallelism, showing that God's presence in the temple-city (the two are not really separate here) is symbolized by light. Divine light overcame primordial night at creation (Gen. 1:1-5; cf. John 1:5) and overcame the night of foreign domination (Isa. 8:22-9:2). In Isaiah the light embodies itself in the teaching given on Mount Zion (2:5), to which the nations make pilgrimage. These verses make that contrast even more stark; outside the circle of God's presence all is primordial night.

60:4-9, Worship in Zion with the Wealth of the Nations. The section 60:4-9 is unified by the summons to Dame Zion (v. 4) and by her surprised and delighted question (v. 8; cf. the similar sequence of summons and question in 49:18, 21). Unlike chaps. 49 and 54, however, the section does not primarily announce restoration of children to barren Zion but the arrival of worshipers at the one place where true worship can be offered. Jews in exile, "your sons . . . your daughters," must therefore come to Zion (60:4). Zion's joy (v. 5) comes from participating in celebration and from seeing the nations acknowledge the sole divinity of Yahweh. The nations' tribute—gold, frankincense, flocks, and rams—is exclusively for the worship of Yahweh, not the enrichment of the people. The caravans (v. 6) are an allusion to Ps. 72:10-11. The answer to Zion's astonished question (Isa. 60:8) about the sailing ships states the purpose of all the activity: the honoring of Yahweh in Zion.

60:10-16, Foreigners Will Rebuild Jerusalem. The nations supplied materials for worship in the previous section; here they rebuild the city and Temple. There seems to be no sharp distinction between city ("walls" in v. 10a) and Temple ("sanctuary" in v. 13c); the entire city is hallowed. To the city once abandoned and rejected, with no trade routes (“no one passing through” in v. 15), there comes building material (vv. 11–13) with which the foreign kings can build (v. 10). Kings present their tribute with Eastern gestures of submission (so Ps. 72:8–11) as they acknowledge the city of Yahweh (Isa. 60:14).

Verse 12 is generally considered a later addition; it is metrically overlong, and its harsh threat seems out of keeping with the tone of the rest. Israel knows its Lord by his act—the pouring in of precious building material.

60:17–22, Replacement of the Old Order. Conventional building materials are inadequate for the new city; moreover, the city’s rulers require renewal (v. 17). Third Isaiah here as elsewhere does not distinguish sharply between the physical city and its spirit, the inner and the outer. In addition, Hebrew royal poetry often pairs virtues, e.g., “righteousness and justice are the foundation of your throne, steadfast love and fidelity walk before you” (Ps. 89:14). Such paired virtues characterize ideal governance, e.g., Isa. 1:26; 9:7; 11:4–5. Isa. 60:17, lit., “I will make your governance Peace and your officials [not RSV: ‘taskmasters’] Righteousness,” promises that the rulers of the new city will govern according to the divine plan. As a result of that governance, the cry “Violence” and “Wrack and Ruin” will no longer be heard (v. 18ab). Walls and gates are also given names expressing their essence, customary in the ancient Near East (v. 18cd). Next, sun and moon are replaced by the light/glory of Yahweh (vv. 19–20; cf. vv. 1–3; Rev. 21:23). In the dramatic perspective of this poem, everything becomes insignificant except the brilliant presence of God in Zion. In Isa. 60:21–22 all of Dame Zion’s children are declared righteous, the climax of the several renamings in the poem. “Righteous” means acceptable to God; they are therefore given the land, the reward of the righteous (Ps. 37:29). In Isa. 60:22, God’s blessing enhances vitality; the least shall become a clan. The last verse, v. 22cd, entrusts the timetable of the transformation to God, “In its time I will hasten it.”

The Prophet Is Sent to the Poor

Chap. 61 is a single poem with a single theme: Yahweh appoints the prophet to announce to the poor they are to be glorious among the nations. In vv. 10–11 he leads the revived community in a thanksgiving that anticipates the salvation he so decisively announced in vv. 1–3. The central section, vv. 4–9, develops the theme of deliverance for the poor. Underlying the poem is the biblical conviction that the ‘anawim, the poor (victims of the wicked who wait for Yahweh), will see Yahweh reverse their situation, since injustice insults Yahweh, the creator of a just world. (Jesus begins his public ministry in Luke 4:18–19 with Isa. 61:1–2.)

61:1–3, The Prophet Is Anointed to Preach Liberation to the Poor. Third Isaiah confidently proclaims that the spirit of Yahweh is upon him, enabling him to preach this message of liberation. Pre-exilic writing prophets, with the exception of Ezekiel, generally were endowed with the Deity’s word rather than with the spirit of God, perhaps to differentiate them from popular ecstatics. The Second-Isaian servant, however, was granted the spirit (42:1; 48:16d), and the speaker continues that tradition here. Only priests and kings were regularly anointed in pre-exilic Israel, with the possible exception of Elijah in 1 Kings 19:16. “Anoint” here (as perhaps in the Elijah text) may be figurative for “appoint,” parallel to “send” in the next verse. “To announce good news” is properly the work of sentries or messengers, who, in Second Isaiah and elsewhere (40:9; 52:7–8), announce a specific event in the immediate future. The good news here, however, is a reversal of fortune that lies in the unspecified future; lack of specificity is suggested by the parallelism of “year” and “day” in Isa. 61:2. The five terms for the afflicted in vv. 1–2 are synonyms. All the terms describe the righteous poor, unjustly kept from their reward. As in 42:7 and 49:9, those for whom salvation has not yet occurred are called prisoners. The year of release for the poor is at hand (Lev. 25:39–41; Ezek. 46:17). In Isa. 61:2, RSV’s “day of vengeance” is better translated “day of vindication,” a time when God rights wrongs. Verse 3 is confused, lit., “to place [?] for the mourners of Zion”; it is perhaps a corrupt repetition of v. 2c. It is certain, however, that “to give them a turban instead of ashes” (v. 3b) parallels “comfort all the mourners” (v. 2c). In v. 3bcd the mourners are clothed in priest’s attire; “turban” and “a splendid garment” are preferable to RSV’s “garland” and “mantle of praise.” Oil, turban, and garments suggest the consecration of priests (Exod. 28–29; Lev. 8). The liberated, festally attired people are to be “righteous terebinths,” long-lived trees with spreading branches, which constitute an apt symbol for the restored and vital people who will show forth God’s power to bring victory.

61:4–9, Restoration and Glory. To this revived group is given the privilege of rebuilding the ruins of God’s land (v. 4). Of vv. 5–7, Ibn Ezra, eleventh century A.D., wrote perceptively: “The other nations will resemble the Israelites, and the Israelites will be like the Aaronites; the Israelites will therefore receive the abundance of nations as their tithes.” Priests in the ancient Near East lived off the revenues of temple lands and the offerings of the faithful; they were thus left free for divine service. The difficult Hebrew of v. 7ab, lit., "Instead of your shame, a double portion; and people cried out 'shame their lot,'" is probably to be read as follows (corrected words are in italics): "Because their shame was double, shame and spitting [cf. 50:6] their lot, therefore they shall inherit a double portion in their land, everlasting joy shall be upon their heads." Just as the Israelites saw priests as specially blessed by Yahweh, so the nations will see the renewed community as blessed.

61:10-11, Song of Thanksgiving. As in thanksgiving psalms, which are public celebrations of divine rescue of a person or community from near destruction, the speaker of v. 1 anticipates celebrating divine rescue. Lament psalms sometimes praise God proleptically, before the actual salvation (e.g., Pss. 22:22-28; 31:21-24). The priestly metaphor continues in the clothing with festal garments (v. 10; cf. Exod. 29:5-9; Isa. 61:10e reads, "like a bridegroom who 'priests it' with a turban," i.e., wears a splendid priestly turban. Like 55:3-5, which speaks of the royal people revealing God's glory to the nations, so these verses speak of a priestly people performing the same task.

Prayer for the City's Restoration

Commentators agree that chap. 62 comprises, at least, a redactional unity. The prophet announces the city's new name, indicating a change of mission (vv. 1-5). The sentries remind God of the promise; on its basis they urge the people to open the transformed city to those still exiled (vv. 6-12).

62:1-3, Prayer for a New Name. So great is the contrast between the ruined city and the traditional promises about it that the prophet must break forth into ardent prayer on behalf of Zion (v. 1). Some scholars suggest that the "I" of v. 1 stems from God, who is now breaking his silence. Yet the verse is a prayer like vv. 6-7, not an announcement of action, as in Pss. 78:65-66 and Isa. 42:13-17. The praying person will not cease until Zion's victory and triumph are so visible "that the nations will see your victory . . . and call [reading an infinitive] you by a new name, which the mouth of Yahweh will give." In the Bible, name reveals essence, and a change in name, a new direction, e.g., Abram and Sarai to Abraham and Sarah in Gen. 17:5-15, and Jacob to Israel in Gen. 32:28. The new name of Zion is only given in Isa. 62:4; it is Yahweh's to assign (vv. 2d, 4). Verse 3 views the vindication of Zion as the bestowal of a splendid crown and royal turban, the investiture signifying bestowal of office.

62:4-5, The New Name. As in Gen. 17:5, 15 and 32:28, the old name is nullified before the new one is assigned. "Abandoned" and "Desolate" yield to "Hepzibah" (a woman's name meaning in Heb. "my delight rests on her," said by the delighted parent) and Beulah ("married"). The verses allude to 54:1-8, and perhaps to Hosea 2, where Yahweh, the husband, supplies the grain and wine to the wife, as he does in vv. 8-9 of our passage. Most scholars read v. 5, by a slight change, "your builder [i.e., God]," instead of the senseless "your sons" of the Masoretic Text (MT). Verse 5a refers back chiasmatically to v. 4d to "marry," and v. 5b to "delight." It is always Yahweh who initiates marriage in the Bible.

62:6-7, The Sentries Are to Pray. Every walled city had its sentries to watch out for the welfare of the inhabitants. These are to join in the prophet's fervent prayer that Zion's victory and triumph (v. 1) arrive soon. Day and night they will lift up to Yahweh, "cause him to remember," the condition of the city; they are neither to rest themselves nor let Yahweh rest until Jerusalem is rebuilt in such a way that it wins praise over all the earth.

62:8-9, God's Oath, the Sure Foundation of the New Name. Yahweh swears that Israel will eat the grain and the wine it produces, and not be forced to use it for tribute to foreign kings.

62:10-12, Preparation to Welcome the Remaining Exiles. In chap. 49, after Zion was assured that her children would return, God promised to raise an ensign to guide the nations carrying the exiles home (49:22). Here the inhabitants of Zion themselves, certain of her vindication, are to go out, complete the highway into the city, raise the ensign among the peoples (v. 10), and repeat (vv. 10-11) the proclamation of Second Isaiah (40:3, 10). Isa. 62:12 reworks Isa. 11:10-12, though the purview of our prophet is limited to the exiles. "They" are the returning exiles, and "you" are Zion, the city that makes all who come into it holy.

Day of Punishment for the Nations

All commentators agree vv. 1-6 are a unit, many suggesting that this judgment followed by the lament of 63:7-64:12 and the lament with judgment in chap. 59 frame chaps. 60-62. Purification of Zion is but one task of the righteous and powerful God; the other is punishment of the nations who exceeded their mandate to be the instruments of God's wrath against Israel (63:1-6). As in Isa. 10:5-19 and 14:24-27, which together describe the divine punishment of the Assyrian king for excessive cruelty in carrying out his role as the "rod of my anger" (10:5), the nations are punished for their excessive cruelty to Israel before and during the Exile. The wrath of God constitutes anger directed at injustice done by the wicked against God's people.

In 63:1, a speaker, presumably in Zion, asks the approaching bloodstained warrior who he is. The speaker is perhaps a sentry on the city wall but more likely is a speaker in a ritual, as in Ps. 24:7-10, "Who is this king of glory?" (cf. Ps. 118:20). The ritual questions are asked to allow the warrior to recount his exploits. Edom had become the enemy because of its incursions into ill-defended Judah during the Exile (Ps. 137:7; Lam. 4:21-22; Ezek. 25:12; 35:1-15; Obad. 13-14). Along with its capital Bozrah, Edom provides, therefore, the appropriate site for the punishment inflicted upon all sinful nations. To the first question, "Who are you?" the answer is, "I [Yahweh], acting in justice." To the second, "Why are your garments red?" the answer is that they are bespattered from Yahweh's battle in Edom (cf. Isa. 34). The warrior acted alone, possibly because there is no Cyrus here to do his will, but more probably because only Yahweh can redress such massive injustice. Yahweh acted alone against Egypt in Exodus 1-15 and against the Assyrian king in Isa. 10:5-19; 14:24-27.

Isa. 59:15-20, the other side of the frame enclosing chaps. 60-62, announces that Yahweh, after repaying his enemies, "will come to Zion as Redeemer" (59:20). In this scene the warrior arrives at the gates, seeking admission to his city. Are the people ready to welcome the God who demands righteous conduct?

A Communal Lament: The National Story

Nearly all scholars agree that 63:7-64:12 forms a single impressive communal lament. All the conventions of the form appear: the recital of the deeds that brought Israel into existence (63:7-14) with mingled complaint against God, prayer for rescue, and acknowledgment of sin in 63:15-64:12. Other biblical laments, such as Psalms 44, 74, 77, 80, 83, and 89, similarly retell the creation of Israel as Yahweh's people in his land and complain that Yahweh no longer protects their secure dwelling in his land or sanctuary. They ask: will Yahweh allow his act to be nullified by mere human enemies? The lament is to be dated sometime before the rebuilding of the Temple in 515 B.C.

In 63:7-14, the speaker recites before Yahweh the story of Israel's origins in order to persuade him to be faithful to that original loving act. Verses 8-14 tell a single story: God freely chose his people and became their savior in Egypt, his presence leading them through the wilderness (vv. 8-9). Their rebellion and consequent punishment (v. 10) did not nullify God's work because Moses succeeded in persuading God to appear among them again and lead them to his holy land (vv. 11-14). Verse 8ab presents a divine declaration making them his people, like divine declarations in Exod. 6:6-8; 19:5-6; 20:2-3, and Lev. 26:11-12, where the divine word creates a people. Egypt, to be sure, is not mentioned, but v. 9b alludes to the Exodus, "No angel, no messenger (but) his presence saved them" (cf. Exod. 32:34; 33:2-3, 14-16). Yahweh's lifting and carrying Israel (Isa. 63:9) utilizes the venerable tradition of God's carrying the people to Canaan (cf. Exod. 19:4; Deut. 32:11; Isa. 40:11; and chap. 46). With Isa. 63:10 the history departs from other communal laments (except Ps. 106) by including among the "days of old" the rebellion and punishment of the people, their repentance under Moses, and Yahweh's return to them as guide to the land. Isa. 63:10 is central because of its position (eight bicola, or poetic lines, preceding and following), by its picking up earlier phrases (e.g., emphatic "they" in v. 8; "to become their enemy" echoing "to become their savior" in v. 8c; "he fought against them" echoing "he redeemed them" in v. 9c) and by its shifting of the traditional "his presence" of v. 9c to "his holy spirit" (a shift of terminology that will be extended in later verses to "his holy spirit" [v. 11], "his glorious arm" [v. 12], and "spirit of Yahweh" [v. 14]). Moses is the subject of "he remembered" (v. 11), in spite of scholarly opinion proposing God or the people as subject. The people are the subject of a plural verb in the immediately preceding verse, whereas the verb in v. 11 is singular; God could not be the subject, since the complaint of vv. 11c-14a is governed by "remembered." Verse 11 should be translated: "then remembered the days of old Moses his servant." The exceptional Hebrew word order, verb-object-subject, of v. 11 frames (with v. 9d) v. 10 by the phrase "days of old." In vv. 11c-12b, Moses first complains that Yahweh neglects him, Yahweh's servant, exactly as he does in his pentateuchal complaints (Exod. 32:30-34; 33:13-16; 34:9; Num. 11:10-15). He uses the polite third person, appropriate to a servant addressing his master (cf. 1 Sam. 26:19-20; 2 Sam. 7:18-29). Yahweh's drawing him out of the water could refer either to Exodus 2 or, metaphorically, to drawing him out of danger (cf. Pss. 18:16; 30:3; 40:2). Only afterward, in Isa. 63:12c-14a, does Moses plead for the people, using the traditional argument that Yahweh's honor ("to make for himself a glorious name" in v. 12d) demands that he remain faithful to the Exodus. Verses 13-14a, which have frequently been emended, make perfect sense if they are divided properly:

"[Where is] the one who caused them to walk through the deep like a horse in the steppe? They did not stumble, like a beast in the plain." (For the parallelism of "cause to walk" and "they did not stumble," cf. Jer. 31:9.) Isa. 63:14b is the divine response to Moses' complaint: "The spirit came down and rested upon him"; i.e., Moses is the mediator of the spirit to the people. This particular version of the national story, in which the people's rebellion did not definitively end Yahweh's presence, is designed to encourage the people to pray, using the language in 63:15-64:12, that Yahweh come down to meet them despite their sin.

The Lament Prayer

As comparable communal laments make clear, the historical recital is exactly tailored to the aim of the lament. Psalm 44, for example, recalls Yahweh's conquest of Canaan before it complains that the enemy overruns the land. Psalm 89 tells the story of the powerful installation of the Davidic king as highest of the kings of the earth (Ps. 89:27) before complaining that the king is suffering defeats. Our text tells how, despite the people's sin that made God their enemy, Moses' intercession occasioned the return of the spirit that led them to the shrine. In the prayer, the people complain that the shrine is in ruins (Isa. 63:18; 64:10-11) and that Yahweh has become their enemy (63:17, 19; 64:5, 7), just as he had been in the days before Moses' intercession (63:10). Moses' success in persuading Yahweh to return to his people emboldens the people to pray for a new divine-human encounter (64:1-5b). Communal lamentation typically mingles direct prayer in the imperative mood, motives for divine action, questions such as "How long?" or "Where are you?" and descriptive complaint.

63:15-19, Look Down, Our Father, and Turn to Your Servants! The prayer builds on the recital. Verse 15 asks God to look down from his holy and glorious abode upon the plight of the people, using the very adjectives for his dwelling that described his presence in days of old ("holy spirit" and "glorious arm"). As in 63:11-14, it asks where now are the power and compassion evident in earlier days. With its reference to "our Father" and "our Redeemer," v. 16 harks back to God calling Israel "my children" and becoming their redeemer in 63:8-9. The vigorous complaint of vv. 17-19 reproaches God—to whom it attributes for the moment all initiative—for allowing Israel to appear as if it had no protecting God. The speaker hints that God's honor is at stake. We are your special property (lit., "heritage"); it is your sanctuary that is destroyed (v. 18); no one would ever judge that we are your people from the condition we are in (v. 19). This reproach resembles Moses' complaint in 63:12c-14a, which reminded Yahweh his honor was in question ("to make for himself an everlasting name," v. 12d).

64:1-7, O That You Would Come Down to Rescue Us!

The prayer asks (v. 1) that Yahweh not only look down (63:15) but come down from the heavens, just as the spirit of Yahweh came down upon Moses and the people in 63:14b. The same Hebrew word for "come down" is used in both verses. In Israel's venerable poetry, Yahweh appeared in storm to rescue his people in time of need (Exod. 15:4-10; Judg. 5:4-5; Deut. 33:2-5; and esp. Ps. 18:6-19 = 2 Sam. 22). Isa. 64:1-5 make up an extended wish, dependent upon the syntax of v. 1a, that Yahweh come down now as he came down in days of old (63:14b). The second half of 64:3 should be excised as a doublet of v. 1b. Verse 4 continues the wish of v. 1 and should be translated, "as when you do wonders we do not expect, what was not heard of, not perceived, what eye had not seen, O God, except you, who act for those who wait for you." The verse perhaps alludes to Isa. 48:6-8, which predicts salvation in such terms and prays for the fullness of the Second-Isaian promise. Though some scholars interpret "meet" in v. 5 in its frequently attested hostile sense, so that Yahweh attacks the righteous person (so JPS), the verb "to meet" (like other Hebrew verbs of solemn encounter) can be used in a friendly sense as well (e.g., Gen. 32:2). Here the verse is to be read, "Oh, that you would meet [favorably] the one who rejoices in doing justice," thus aptly concluding the prayer for Yahweh's coming down to the sanctuary.

Isa. 64:5c-7 continue the prayer that Yahweh come down by their stark portrayal of God as absolute master—even to the extent of attributing the people's sin to his absence, his "hiding his face"—and the people as mired in sin.

64:8-12, Our Father, Look Down! The thought returns to the recital of 63:8-9, God as Father, Israel as his children. As the Father who created us, pity the work of your hands! The people appeal to Yahweh's care for his creation, not to their virtue. The recital of 63:7-14 ended in v. 14bcd with Israel led to Yahweh's holy territory or shrine. Their ruined shrine suggests to the nations that Yahweh is not able to sustain into the present his past saving action. The psalm ends with a question: will you keep silent? The people have faith enough to hold Yahweh to the promise contained in the act that brought them to existence.

65:1-25*The Righteous Shall Inhabit the Land

Scholars generally agree that chap. 65 is a unified whole, though, as is often the case with Third Isaiah, there is disagreement whether the entire chapter was composed as a single unit, or whether segments were gradually added to a core, vv. 1-16a. Those who hold the latter opinion point to the exclusive concern with the wicked-righteous contrast in vv. 1-16a and with the righteous alone in vv. 16b-23, and suggest that v. 24, with its obvious reference back to v. 1, artificially links the two originally separate sections. The date of composition too is debated, though recent scholarship rightly rejects a Hellenistic date for the rites of vv. 3-5 in favor of the late sixth century. This commentary proposes an originally single composition chiefly because dual judgment upon the wicked and righteous in Jerusalem was frequent in some Psalms (e.g., 50; 76) and elsewhere in Third Isaiah (56:9-57:13; 58; 59). The emphasis throughout chap. 65 is on the city, or land (sometimes called "mountain," singular or plural) purified of sinners.

65:1-7, Sentence upon a Faithless People.

Some prophetic judgments portray Yahweh wronged by the people and hence justified in condemning them. In Isa. 1:2-3, Yahweh is the loving father of ungrateful children, and in Amos 2:9-12, the gracious giver of leaders who are not heeded. Yahweh here is eager to be worshiped and inquired of at the Temple, the meaning of "seek," "ask," "find," but the people seek other gods (Isa. 65:1d-5). They do not use Yahweh's name (v. 1d). They anger him (vv. 3ab, 5cd) by worshiping in unauthorized places (v. 3cd), by seeking oracles from the dead through the practice of incubation (sleeping in a tomb to receive communication in dreams, v. 4ab), by not observing the dietary laws (v. 4cd), by assuming they have become holy, set apart, and warning off the profane lest their holiness be contaminated (v. 5ab). Such willful behavior offends the one who has always been accessible to those who approach in the right spirit (v. 5cd). The just God, who punished false worship in the past, announces punishment for it now (vv. 6-7). "It is written" (v. 6a) may cite an actual text regarding divine justice or it may state an axiom: sin is always punished. The verses declare the present sins to be equivalent to pre-exilic sins "upon the mountains, upon the hills" (e.g., Deut. 12:2; 2 Kings 16:4; Hos. 4:13; Ezek. 6:13).

65:8-10, My Chosen Ones Will Inherit the Land.

These verses are crucial to the speech. The destruction threatened in vv. 1-7 is not directed at all Israel (v. 8). Yahweh is about to do a new thing and will bring forth a group from the people who will inherit the land. Just as farmers do not destroy a cluster of grapes since it contains the juice that will become wine, so Yahweh will not destroy all Israel since among them are "my servants." They will inherit the delightful pasture stretching from west (Sharon) to east (Valley of Achor that terminates near Jericho). Third Isaiah alludes to the servant of chaps. 40-55; through the servant(s), Israel will continue to exist.

65:11-12, The Sword for Those Who For-sake Yahweh. The same judicial act that gives a future to "my servants" (v. 8) punishes the idolaters. They preferred the gods Gad ("Fortune") and Mani ("Destiny") to Yahweh, who invites obedience and righteous behavior (v. 12c; cf. vv. 1-2, 24). Biblical judgment is not a decree but an act upholding the righteous and putting down the wicked so as to make known the righteous God.

65:13-16, The Judgment Itself. These verses describe the judicial act: the righteous and the wicked are publicly assigned their places. The verses have in view the new creation (vv. 17-25); they announce who will inhabit the new land. The wicked are addressed directly in the second person; the righteous, in the third person. God's new city/land/mountain(s) are only for the holy. Like the old entrance liturgies, e.g., Psalms 15; 24; and Isa. 33:13-16, which admitted only the obedient to the sacred precincts, these verses admit the obedient to the new Jerusalem described in Isa. 65:17-25. "My servants shall eat . . . shall drink" in v. 13 points ahead to vv. 21-22. "My servants shall sing . . ." in v. 14 points ahead to vv. 18-19. In v. 15, the chosen will use the name of the rejected sinners as a curse; i.e., they will say of their enemies, "May you meet the fate of the sinners who were excluded from the new creation!" Verse 15b, "May Yahweh slay you," seems to be a later attempt to supply the words of a curse. Whoever bless themselves (in the new creation) can be sure that God is there to effect the blessing (v. 16), another pointer to vv. 17-25. In v. 16ef, "the former troubles," i.e., the iniquitous present age when the wicked reign unchecked, are to end with the new creation. The whole section echoes Psalm 37, where "the meek" and "the lowly" inherit the land, and it anticipates the Beatitudes in Matt. 5:2-12 and Luke 6:20-26. In the light of the Isaian context, the Beatitudes are judgments regarding who may enter the kingdom of God.

65:17-25, New Heavens and New Earth.

These verses echo and expand chaps. 60-62. Where Yahweh lives there can only be victory and life; evil and premature death have no place. Verse 20 is widely regarded as a later addition; in any case the verse is somewhat confused. No invaders will take the homes and farms of the righteous; they will enjoy the land throughout their long lives and will be seen by all as blessed by Yahweh (vv. 21-22). God's readiness to hear prayer in the shrine will be respected by the people (v. 24), not abused as in 65:1-2 and 65:11-12. The paradisaic scene, which recalls Genesis 2, Isa. 2:1-4, and Isa. 11:6-9, represents the world Yahweh intended. Biblical creation is not the formation of the physical universe alone, but of a people.

Judgment in Jerusalem in Favor of the Righteous

Verses 1-16 provide a judgment oracle: the ritual acts of one group of Israelites are condemned, and another group's acts are accepted. Some scholars find several discrete units here, but the condemnation of one group of Israelites and the upholding of another is common in Third Isaiah (e.g., 56:9-57:13; 58; 59; 65). The group relying on ritual alone without regard for obedience (vv. 3-4) and denying the imminent coming of Yahweh (v. 5) will not enter the New Jerusalem. The new city is created by an act of divine judgment (vv. 5-16).

66:1-2, Where Does Yahweh Dwell? Solomon prayed at the dedication of the Temple: "Will God dwell on earth? See, heaven and the highest heaven cannot contain you, how much less this house that I have built! . . . Yet hear the prayer of your servant and your people Israel when they pray toward this place" (1 Kings 8:27, 30). The Temple is the place where God graciously meets the penitent people. The prophets from the beginning protested empty ritual; even the Psalms rebuke it, e.g., Psalm 50. Third Isaiah reiterates this criticism; he is not rejecting worship as such, since pure and obedient worship characterizes life in the New Jerusalem. He dwells with the obedient and with those who hope for his coming.

66:3-4, False and Disobedient Worship.

The worship of those who do not respond when Yahweh calls, i.e., who are disobedient (v. 4c), is equated with murder and false worship (v. 3): "the one who slaughters oxen (in sacrifice) is a slayer of humans." These shocking equations are the strongest of the three passages in Third Isaiah that equate disobedient worship with pagan worship; the others are 57:5-10 and 65:2-5. Entry into temples was carefully regulated in antiquity; humans had to negotiate that holy realm according to divinely given rubrics so as not to offend the gods. The worshippers in our text have not followed the divine commands; their refusal to obey incurs divine wrath (66:4).

66:5-6, Yahweh's Theophany Rejects the Scoffers. Against those who scoff at his coming, Yahweh cites their ridicule of his true servants: "Let Yahweh show his presence that we may see your joy!" Those doubting the freedom of God to act will be disgraced when the storm god is manifested in thunder from the Temple.

66:7-9, Mother Zion Gives Sudden Birth to Children. Yahweh comes as warrior at the birth of the city. In Second Isaiah, Zion was portrayed as a mother whose barrenness was healed by the children surrounding her (48:17-21; 54:1-8). Here the talk is not of returning exiles but of birth pangs and instantaneous birth. Later apocalyptic literature makes frequent use of the metaphor of birth pangs for the conflicts preceding the end time. These verses are but one of several descriptions of the creation of the new city; others are chap. 60 and 65:17-25. In all of them, the emphasis is on a purified people rather than on buildings. The marvelous birth also alludes to the once barren ancestral wives, to Sarah, to Leah, and to Rachel, who became fruitful as a result of a divine visitation.

66:10-14, Rejoice and Be Comforted in Jerusalem! The figure of childbirth continues. The newborn children rejoice with their mother and drink from her breasts (vv. 10-11). A divine word accompanies the new creation. The unfilled promise of 48:18-19, "If only you would heed my commands, your peace would be like a river," is at last fulfilled in 66:12. The maternal metaphor continues with Yahweh becoming the mother, a remarkable portrayal of God as feminine. So close is Yahweh to Zion that her nurture is credited to him. The mother comforts Israel the son; his body thrills with joyous satisfaction. The public transformation of Israel is itself the judgment (v. 14cd).

66:15-16, Judgment in Storm. These verses pick up 66:6, in which Yahweh from his Temple roared in thunder against his enemies. Verses 5-16 are a single judgment scene; Yahweh upholds his faithful ones and condemns their enemies. Verses 7-14 are the judgment in favor of the faithful ones, predicted in vv. 2 and 5. Verses 15-16 are the other side of the same coin, the punishing of those who violated the canons of true worship (vv. 3-4) and scoffed at the coming of Yahweh (v. 5). Verse 14d immediately prepares for vv. 15-16. The imagery is drawn from the picture of the storm god vanquishing his enemies with wind, lightning ("fire"), and sword. The Bible frequently depicts the triumph of the righteous by showing the defeat of their wicked oppressors; it does not portray good and evil abstractly but good and evil people in conflict.

Judgment in Jerusalem

Much of Third Isaiah has been concerned with the appearance of Judge Yahweh in Jerusalem, to uphold the righteous and to put down their oppressors, acknowledged by all as just and holy. The Isaian tradition affirms that judgment takes place in Jerusalem, which is thereby transformed into a righteous city (e.g., 1:21-28; 4:2-6). Songs of Zion celebrate the defeat of Yahweh's enemies at the foot of the holy mountain (e.g., Pss. 46:6; 48:3-8; 76:1-2).

66:17-18a, Addendum to the Judgment Scene of vv. 15-16.

In the ancient world, people prepared themselves for encounter with the gods by rituals that separated them from the profane world; often they bathed, donned special clothing, and abstained from sexual activity. Those preparing themselves for false worship will be attacked by Yahweh in the judgment described in vv. 15-16. Verse 17 extends into v. 18a: "They shall one and all come to an end—oracle of Yahweh—for I know [following the LXX and the Syriac version] their deeds and their plans."

66:18b-24, The Final Judgment in Jerusalem.

These verses have in mind the indefinite future. The subject in v. 18b is uncertain ("I [Yahweh] am coming," or "the time is coming"), as is the mood (perfect or participle) of the first "come" in v. 18. Presumably the time is subsequent to the purification of Zion described in the previous chapters. Judged and restored Zion is now a place where "my glory" of vv. 18b and 19 is visible. Yahweh gathers those who will see his glory. He will give them a sign, a convincing display of divine power, which "the survivors" will use in preaching the divine glory in far distant lands. "Survivors" suggests that the preachers are those who have survived the judgment of Zion. It is not clear if the survivor-emissaries are Israelites or Gentiles from the first gathering in v. 18b. In any event non-Israelites bring the scattered children of Zion to the holy mountain in a procession like Israel's to Zion. Some of the exiles will become priests and Levites; living in foreign lands has not disqualified them from this office. Verses 22-23, like 65:17-25 and 66:7-14, affirm that the New Jerusalem is not a matter of buildings but of obedient people living long and worshiping Yahweh. Isa. 66:24 continues the same scene; the establishment of peace is the defeat of the rebellious, whose bodies lie at the foot of the holy mountain as a testimony to the divine victory. The prophet may be alluding to an actual site to the south of Jerusalem, the Valley of Hinnom (Heb. gehinnom, whence the English "Gehenna"), the site of a city dump, which was full of fire and worms. The harshness of the final verse was recognized by the Masoretes (rabbinic scribes), who directed that, when it was read in the synagogue, v. 23 was to be read again so that the book would end on a hopeful and merciful note.

JEREMIAH

THOMAS W. OVERHOLT

INTRODUCTION

The first two sentences of the Book of Jeremiah summarize the book's contents—the “words of Jeremiah”—and assign it a date—the reigns of the last four kings of Judah (1:1–3). One soon discovers, however, that the book is neither a straightforward chronicle of that historical period nor simply a verbatim collection of the prophet's utterances.

Even casual readers of the book of Jeremiah will observe three things, the first of which is that its content is diverse and loosely organized. There is no narrative or plot line or any other principle of organization (e.g., chronological order or arrangement by topic) that encompasses the book as a whole. Instead, one finds a variety of literary forms in both poetry (e.g., oracles of judgment and of salvation, individual laments) and prose (e.g., biographical narratives, sermons, a letter). Sometimes these forms occur in homogeneous units (2:1–3:5, oracles of judgment; chaps. 37–44, biographical prose); sometimes they are widely dispersed (the individual laments are scattered through chaps. 11–20). A number of different audiences (kings, nobles, priests, other prophets, the general populace, foreign nations) and problems (the threat of war, drought, contemptible behavior) are addressed, and a variety of metaphors employed (see, e.g., 2:1–4:4; 12:7–13). Whole verses, or passages, may even be repeated (6:12–15 and 8:10–12; 10:12–16 and 51:15–19).

A second observation is that some sections of the book seem to have a special biographical interest. Though the oracles of judgment reveal little about the prophet himself, the opposite is the case for the narratives of chaps. 26–29 and 36–44, which report his activity in the framework of datable historical circumstances. Third, one observes that Jeremiah seems to have been embroiled in controversy with officials of the state (chaps. 26; 36–37), priests (20:1–6), and other prophets (chaps. 28–29).

These observations give rise to a like number of questions to which we must turn before beginning the commentary: what types of literary material are found in Jeremiah, and how are we to understand the way these were combined to form the present book? To what extent does the book provide us with biographical information about the prophet? What was the importance of the prophet and the traditions about him in the context of the social, political, and religious settings of the period during which the book of Jeremiah came into existence?

Literary Form and Composition

The book of Jeremiah contains both poetry and prose. Materials of these two types tend to be gathered into different sections of the book, although intermixing of types is frequent (→ Poetry).

The poetry consists of prophetic utterances of several types, concentrated in chaps. 1–25 and 46–51. The most common form is the “oracle.” The use of direct address couched in the first person (the “I” is God, not the prophet; see 2:1–3) shows that these were thought of as God's words delivered through the prophet to a specific audience. They tend to be brief and composed in one basic pattern (e.g., 5:10–14). This pattern contains an introduction (v. 10), an accusation (vv. 11–13), a formula signifying that the message is from God (v. 14a), and an announcement of God's judgment against the people (v. 14b). These elements and this order are not, however, invariable. Thus, in the complaint (or “lawsuit”) form of the oracles, the prophet states on God's behalf a grievance against the people (e.g., 2:5–9), but there is no announcement of judgment.

Oracles like these are common to prophets both in the Old Testament and elsewhere (→ Prophet). Beside the specific content of what he says, Jeremiah's uniqueness is sometimes evident in stylistic variations on the form. One of these is his use of rhetorical questions, which often set the stage for an accusation directed against his audience (e.g., 2:11–12, 32; 3:1–5). It would seem that, like any effective speaker, Jeremiah made use of forms he and his audience were familiar with, but modified them to suit his own purposes.

Another type of poetry important in the book of Jeremiah and occurring in no other prophetic book is the personal complaint, or lament (see 11:18–12:6; 15:10–21; 17:14–18; 18:18–23; 20:7–18). These complaints share certain formal characteristics with the individual lamentations in the Psalms. Since the latter are usually understood to have been used in a ritual context and by a variety of different persons, the question of the extent to which these complaints give us useful information about Jeremiah himself has been hotly debated (see the Short Essay “Jeremiah's Complaints”).

The major prose passages in Jeremiah may be classified into two types, biography and prose sermons. The former are narratives that speak about Jeremiah in the third person, reporting things that he did and said and placing these within an identifiable social and historical context (see 19:1–20:6; 26; 28–29; 36; 37–45; 51:59–64). The prose sermons, in which Jeremiah sometimes refers to himself in the first person (e.g., 11:6, 9; 16:1), are reports of speeches the prophet is said to have delivered (see 7:1–8:3; 11:1–14; 16:1–13; 17:19–27; 18:1–12; 21:1–10; 25:1–14; 35:1–19). Occasionally, the same incident will be reported in both types of prose (e.g., cf. 7:1–15 with chap. 26; 25:1–11 with chap. 36).

Authorship of the “biographical” passages has often been attributed to Baruch, a scribe associated with Jeremiah, who on two occasions wrote down a collection of the prophet’s utterances (36:4, 32). However, such attribution of authorship cannot be verified (→ Baruch). Though these passages are somewhat scattered, their arrangement is roughly chronological. They do not, however, constitute a connected biography in the modern sense of the term.

Besides being couched in the first person, the “prose sermons” have two other formal characteristics: most begin with a special heading (“the word that came to Jeremiah from the Lord”), and several display a three-part structure that includes a summons to repentance (e.g., 7:3–7; 11:3–7; 17:21–22), a description of the people’s lack of repentance (7:8–11; 11:8–10; 17:23), and an announcement of the punishment that will inevitably come to them (7:12–15; 11:11–17; 17:27). The sermons also contain a large number of stock words and phrases (e.g., “rising up early and sending/speaking” [RSV: sending/speaking “persistently”] in 7:13, 25; 11:7; 25:3–4; 35:14–15; “turn every man from his evil way” in 18:11; 25:5; 35:15; “other gods” in 7:6, 9, 18; 11:10; 16:11, 13; 35:15). Examples of this stereotypic language can be found in other portions of the book, both poetry (cf. 23:22) and prose (cf. 26:3; 36:3, 7), as well as in Deuteronomistic writings (cf. Deut. 6:14; 2 Kings 22:17). The latter fact has led to the view that these “sermons” are a Deuteronomistic reworking of the prophet’s message (→ Deuteronomist).

The case for a Deuteronomistic revision of the prose sermons is not conclusive, however. Some of the stereotypic language found in them (e.g., the first of the examples cited in the preceding paragraph) is unique to Jeremiah, and this may suggest that both Jeremiah and the Deuteronomists were influenced by a style of expression used in Judah (or among a specific group of Judeans) during the late seventh century B.C. There are similarities between the point of view of the prose sermons and that of the Deuteronomistic writings—for example, the idea that Judah’s downfall could be attributed to its having rejected the word of God sent via the prophets (cf. Jer. 7:25–34; 25:4–11; 26:4–6; 29:17–19; 35:15–17; 36:1–31; and 44:4–6 with 2 Kings 17:13–18; the Deuteronomists’ belief in the authority of the prophetic word is stated in Deut. 18:15–19). Often, however, these ideas can be found in the pre-exilic edition of the Deuteronomistic History, so there is no need to explain their presence in Jeremiah as the result of an exilic revision of his words.

It is also important to note that Jeremiah’s religious viewpoint was not in complete harmony with the Deuteronomists’. For example, whereas they take a positive interest in the Jerusalem Temple and make it the central institution in Judah’s religious life, Jer. 7:1–15 (cf. chap. 26) condemns the people’s excessive trust in the Temple and its rituals. Therefore, though they are in important respects similar, it seems best not to think of the Jeremian traditions as having undergone a systematic Deuteronomistic revision. We will return to this point below.

Composition. We have seen that the book of Jeremiah contains material of several distinct literary forms and that these are sometimes found in relatively homogeneous blocks, but we should not infer from this that there were corresponding written sources from which an editor or editors constructed the book in its present form. The relationships among the types of material are more complicated than that. We have already noted, for example, that the larger sections of the book contain a mixture of literary forms (e.g., chaps. 1–25 are composed largely of poetic oracles but also contain examples of both biographical prose and sermons). In addition, language characteristic of the prose is also found in the poetic oracles (e.g., the phrase mentioned above, “turn every man from his evil way,” appears in 23:14, 22).

Despite the intermixing of literary forms, several major blocks of material can be identified within the book of Jeremiah. Chaps. 1–25 seem to constitute a unit composed largely of poetic oracles and prose sermons. This block begins with an account of how Jeremiah was commissioned to be a prophet (1:4–19) and ends with a reference to a “book” in which the prophet’s utterances were recorded (25:13). Much of the material in chaps. 26–45 is more “biographical” in nature, and what is not, chaps. 30–31, makes up a block the content of which shows a preoccupation with prophecies of hope for the people’s future. Chaps. 46–51 are a collection of oracles directed against Judah’s traditional enemies among the surrounding nations.

Within these larger blocks one can find smaller groupings united by such things as a common theme (e.g., 2:1–3:5, Judah’s unfaith-fulness to its God; 21:11–23:8, criticism of Judean kings; 23:9–40, Jeremiah's prophetic opponents) or by their relationship to a specific historical situation (e.g., chaps. 27–29 reflect disputes over foreign policy during the reign of Zedekiah). That chaps. 27–29 have to be seen as a separate block of tradition is evident not only from their content but also from several stylistic features of the Hebrew text that set them off from other material in the book: the name of the Babylonian king appears there as "Nebuchadnezzar," whereas elsewhere the spelling is "Nebuchadrezzar"; proper names compounded with God's name, Yahweh, tend to appear in their shortened form (Heb. Yirmeyah, "Jeremiah") rather than their full form (Yirmeyahu); and Jeremiah (as well as his opponent, Hananiah) is referred to by the title "the prophet."

A basic datum about the book, then, is that it contains chunks of material that from the standpoints of literary form, style, and content are to some extent different from each other. The question is, How are we to interpret this fact? Are these implications for the history of the book's composition? For example, some have held that, in its original form, prophetic speech was poetic and that, therefore, only the poetic oracles found in the book could be considered the original and authentic words of Jeremiah. But it would seem that there is no way to be certain either that the prophet spoke (or wrote) only poetry or that all the book's poetry stems originally from him. In fact there is general agreement between the message contained in the "prose sermons" and that in the oracles, and some have held the view that both derive ultimately from the prophet.

So, we are faced with something of a paradox: the present form of the book of Jeremiah is both difficult and easy to understand. The difficulties stem largely from the variety of literary forms it contains and the fact that there appears to be no completely satisfactory way to explain their distribution. In addition, the specific historical setting of many individual passages is unclear. The identity of the "enemy from the north" mentioned in chaps. 4–6 has been debated for years, but no consensus has emerged. Even where seemingly firm dates are given (e.g., 1:2, 626 B.C.), reasons have been found to doubt their accuracy.

On the other hand, it is easy enough to grasp the book's broad thematic unity, namely, a concern to interpret Judah's present historical circumstances in terms of the people's past behavior and to make projections about its future. This is a concern that the prophet would have shared with many others, and one that could have motivated both the preservation of and reflection on his words.

What seems clear is that the prophet himself began the process by which his utterances were, from time to time, reinterpreted in the light of current events and written down. The incident reported in chap. 36 provides an illustration. According to the narrative, in the year 605 B.C. Yahweh instructed Jeremiah to make a written collection of oracles, which he had uttered over a period of two decades (assuming the traditional date for the beginning of his activity [1:2]). Verse 29 indicates that a dominant theme of this collection was the threat that Judah would be conquered by "the king of Babylon."

Now, a number of oracles in chaps. 4–6 and 8–10 speak of an attack by an unspecified enemy from "the north," though in the early days of his activity the Babylonians were not yet a power to be reckoned with. By 605 B.C., however, they were the dominant nation in the region, and it seems plausible to assume that, when he gathered together his oracles of judgment against the people of Judah, he specifically designated Babylon as the agent through whom God would punish them. Behind this reinterpretation of his earlier oracles lies the assumption that they were as relevant in 605 as they were when they were uttered—indeed, that their predictions were just then on the verge of being fulfilled.

Seven years later, in 597, the Babylonians did overrun Judah and Jerusalem and carry the king and some of Jeremiah's countrymen into exile (2 Kings 24:8–17). Since Nebuchadnezzar installed a new king on the throne and Judah retained its identity as a nation, the question would have arisen whether these events could be considered the complete fulfillment of the prophet's predictions. Chapters 27–28 show that Jeremiah faced this issue by incorporating Nebuchadnezzar's activity into his conception of God's plan for the nation and by opposing those who believed that Judah had been sufficiently punished and that soon its fortunes would be restored.

Nor was it the prophet alone who engaged in the reinterpretation of earlier predictions of national disaster (see commentary below on 4:5–6:30). Not even the poetic oracles were immune to alteration in response to the catastrophe of the nation's collapse. Thus, in 15:2, the triad of terms, "sword, famine, and pestilence," which occurs frequently in Jeremiah (seventeen times, with occasional variations in order; see, e.g., 14:12; 21:9; 24:10; 27:8, 13), is altered to include a fourth, "captivity." The latter term refers obviously to the Exile.

But chap. 36 also illustrates the difficulty that attends any attempt to construct a series of steps in the composition of the book of Jeremiah as we have it. The narrative itself is clear enough: during the years 605–604 B.C. the prophet is said to have twice dictated to Baruch a collection of his utterances spanning the whole period of his activity. The second scroll was dictated after the king destroyed the first. It contained "all the words" of the first scroll, as well as "many words like them" (36:32). If we assume that the second edition of the scroll formed the nucleus for the subsequent collection of materials associated with Jeremiah, then we should be able to find that scroll in the present book, as well as evidence of the contents of its predecessor. But we cannot, at least not with any certainty. Over the years a variety of hypotheses about the contents of the scroll have been offered, some of them quite complicated. Even a brief sampling of opinion—it has been claimed that the scroll is to be found in chaps. 1–6, or in 1:4–9 plus chaps. 46–47 plus 4:5–6:26 plus 14:1–15:3, or in chaps. 1–11, or in the "prose sermons"—indicates both the variety of hypotheses that have been proposed and the lack of consensus on the matter.

Behind the discussion of the book's composition lies the problem of how one is to judge the authenticity of the various materials that form its content, the criterion of "authenticity" being that the words can be understood to have come from the prophet himself. Among those who sought to identify the prophet's "original" words, there was for many years a bias in favor of the poetic oracles, but this view has increasingly been challenged. Some have argued that certain prose passages (e.g., chap. 27) should be understood as containing "genuine" words of the prophet. Others contend that at the very least the prose, especially the sermons, preserves the gist of what Jeremiah said. But we may note again that there is no consensus on an inventory of authentic Jeremiah utterances, and it may well be that this search is flawed by an overemphasis on tying the contents of the book exclusively to the prophet's life and activity.

This judgment is not to deny that the prophet's life is important for understanding the present shape of his book. Other things, however, are also important. Above all, we need to ask who was responsible for collecting and preserving his words and why they felt it important to do so. As we shall see, the community must have played an important role in Jeremiah's actual prophetic activity. The community or groups within it also had a stake in preserving traditions about Jeremiah's activity.

It is possible, for example, that in its present form the prose of the book has been shaped by the need of Judeans living in exile in Babylon to provide themselves with a reasonable interpretation of the events of their recent past. The fall of Jerusalem (597 B.C.), and ultimately of the nation (587), were social and political disasters that precipitated a crisis in Judean religion. People now asked whether God had abandoned his people and whether the promise that a member of David's house would always sit on the throne in Jerusalem (see 2 Sam. 7; Ps. 132) was defunct. In an attempt to answer such questions, the Judeans in exile (re)interpreted traditions about the prophet. But in doing this they were only continuing a process begun by Jeremiah, who, as we have already seen, on at least one occasion set a collection of his older oracles in the context of an emerging national crisis. In the final analysis, we should take a rather broad view of the "authenticity" of materials in the book. Both the prophet and those who preserved the traditions of what he did and said felt free, as occasion demanded, to reapply words they understood to be those from God to situations different from those in which they were first uttered.

We have several times mentioned the lack of any apparent principle of organization in the book of Jeremiah. This trait, shared with other prophetic books, has sometimes been attributed to the theory that, in their present written form, they represent loose assemblages of sayings and stories that at first circulated orally. In the case of Jeremiah, this explanation is not sufficient, since we know that the process of committing his prophecies to writing began with the prophet himself (chap. 36). Still, studies of oral performance and transmission in modern cultures suggest a way of understanding how the reinterpretation of the prophetic traditions may have proceeded. What such studies reveal above all is the influence of the audience upon narrators, who shape their material in response to the audience's makeup and concerns.

It was Judeans in and after the Exile who were the primary audience for the emerging written compilation of Jeremiah materials. It is safe to assume that those who had not given up their religious beliefs would have been intensely interested in discovering both a reason for their fate and some prospects for their future compatible with traditional notions about the relationship between God and his people. This quest for understanding, at the hands of exilic editors of the Jeremian materials, would account both for their being preserved and for the form in which they have come down to us.

This understanding of how the tradition developed raises another question about the book's composition: was the Jeremiah tradition reworked into a "Deuteronomistic edition" sometime during or after the Exile? The presence of prose sermons that in content closely agree with the Deuteronomistic interpretation of the nation's history has led some to suggest that it was. But the evidence is ambiguous. Note, for example, that both Jeremiah and Deuteronomy stress the necessity for the people to be obedient to the stipulations of God's law (e.g., Jer. 6:16–21; 7:1–15; 11:1–13; 22:9; 34:8–22; Deut. 5; 7:12–16). Both aim to guide the people's actions so as to safeguard their possession of the land (e.g., Jer. 7:3, 7; 25:5; 35:15; Deut. 11:8–22; 12:1; 16:20; 19:8–9; 23:20; 25:15), and in both the message is couched in essentially conditional terms (e.g., Jer. 4:1–4; 5:7–17; 26:1–6; Deut. 11).

Such similarities, which are not confined to the prose sermons, may represent basic agreement between Jeremiah and the Deuteronomists (the first edition of whose history dates from the time of Josiah, the late seventh century B.C.) on the interpretation of current events. Furthermore, it is difficult to see how conscious editing of Jeremiah could have resulted in such compositional disarray.

Alternatively, we can envision a communal attempt to find relevance in the traditions about what the prophet did and said that proceeded in a much more varied, piecemeal, and gradual way (see, e.g., commentary below on 2:1–4:4 and 8:4–10:25). The quest for understanding, not compositional coherence, guided the formation of the book. In fact, much of the sense of coherence one feels when reading the book of Jeremiah derives from a consistent interpretation of the nation's fate: disasters came because of the people's unfaithfulness to Yahweh. This viewpoint is evident not only in the prose "Temple sermon" (7:1–15) and the "Deuteronomistic" reflections on the covenant (11:1–14), but in shorter prose insertions like 3:24–25 and in 17:19–27, both of which share the point of view of the prose sermons.

If this is the way the tradition grew, perhaps all we can say about the final form of the book is that it represents a loosely structured compilation of the Jeremiah materials available at the time when the text as we have it was written.

Text. The original language of the book of Jeremiah is Hebrew, but there is an important Greek version dating from about the third century B.C., the Septuagint (LXX; → Septuagint). A special problem arises for interpreters of Jeremiah because of two significant differences between the LXX and the Hebrew Masoretic Text (MT), upon which English translations are based (→ Masorah): the LXX of Jeremiah is approximately one-eighth shorter than the MT, and in it the "oracles against the nations" appear following 25:13 (in the MT they form chaps. 46–51).

Studies of manuscripts from the Essene library at Qumran (→ Scrolls, The Dead Sea) have revealed that by the first century B.C. two different Hebrew traditions of the book of Jeremiah existed, one apparently identical to the MT, and the other closely resembling the LXX. Since the longer version frequently repeats verses and adds details to the narrative but seldom offers any change in basic content, the most likely explanation is that the MT represents an expansion of an earlier Hebrew text corresponding to the LXX.

The text of Jeremiah 27–29 can serve as a case in point. The MT contains a number of verbal embellishments: it is fond of titles (e.g., "the prophet"; cf. 28:5; 29:29), and it continually identifies the king of Babylon as Nebuchadnezzar (27:8, 20; 28:3, 11, 14; 29:1–3). The LXX identifies Nebuchadnezzar the first time he is mentioned, 27:6, but omits his title thereafter. Moreover, the LXX expands the so-called messenger formula ("Thus says the Lord") by adding "of hosts, the God of Israel" (27:21; 28:2, 14; 29:8, 25). In addition to these differences, there are a number of shorter expansions in the MT, like the phrases "the people, and the cattle which are on the face of the earth" (27:5) and "and I will scatter you, and you will perish" (27:10).

There are, finally, a number of expansions in the MT a verse or more in length, e.g., 27:7, 12b–14a, 17, 21; and 29:14. One of these, 29:16–19, clearly disrupts the context in which it occurs. But despite these considerable differences between the two versions of the text, the important observation is that the narrative is, in all its essentials, the same. The expansions in the MT are, for the most part, simply expansions of ideas or actions already present in the shorter text.

The Prophet in His Book

Like other prophetic books, Jeremiah begins with a superscription (1:1–3) that locates the prophet in a specific historical setting. Here we learn that he was born to a priestly family of the village of Anathoth (approximately three miles northeast of Jerusalem) and that his prophetic activity began in the thirteenth year of King Josiah's reign (626 B.C.) and continued until the second conquest of Jerusalem in 587.

The book of Jeremiah is unique, however, in the amount of additional information it seems to supply us about its prophet. The prose sections sometimes give detailed descriptions of Jeremiah's interaction with his fellow Judeans (king, princes, priests, prophets, and the general populace; e.g., chaps. 26; 27–29) and, sometimes, even with foreign emissaries (27:1–11; 39:11–14). Chaps. 21–45 contain a great many specific dates (e.g., 25:1; 36:1; 39:1–2), as well as references to events that can be easily dated (e.g., 21:1–2; 24:1; 34:1, 6–7), and chaps. 37–44 focus on the prophet's activity at the time of Nebuchadnezzar's second conquest of Jerusalem.

We also appear to have information of a more personal nature about the prophet. Though the narratives tell us that audience reaction to his message was often hostile (e.g., 26:7–9; 43:1–4) and that he sometimes was abused as a result of what he said (e.g., 20:1–6; 37:15; 38:1–6), the laments seem to reveal Jere-miah's own feelings about the difficulty of his task and the hardships he was forced to endure in its performance (e.g., 11:18–20; 15:10, 15–18; 20:7–12, 14–18). We are even told he was forbidden to take a wife (16:1–4). On the other hand, we have no information about his age, personal appearance, means of support, and the like, and we do not know the date of his death, though he is often assumed to have died in Egypt (chap. 44).

For this sort of information we are dependent largely upon the “biographical” prose and the poetry of lamentation. However, there are critical problems associated with each of these bodies of material. It has sometimes been argued that the biographical prose was written by Baruch, a trained scribe who was closely associated with Jeremiah (32:12–16; 26:4–19, 27–32; 43:3). There is no firm evidence for this supposition, however, and since much of the material is scattered through chaps. 19–36 and has affinities with the Deuteronomistic understanding of the nation's fate, the assumption that we are dealing with a “biography” of the prophet is questionable. As regards the laments, the form and language are to some extent stereotypic, reflecting lamentations in the book of Psalms, which should make us wary of taking at face value all the apparent individual references in the Jeremian laments. Still, it is hard to deny the impression that these lamentations contain elements that are specific to Jeremiah's situation (see the Short Essay “Jeremiah's Complaints”).

Date of Jeremiah's Call. The question of the accuracy of the traditional date for the beginning of Jeremiah's prophetic activity (the “thirteenth year of Josiah” is 626 B.C.; so 1:2; 25:3) may serve as an example of the difficulties that attend any attempt to construct an accurate “biography” of Jeremiah. Note first that, though there are references to later kings Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, there are no accounts of Jeremiah interacting with Josiah, and it is even difficult to locate any of the book's contents specifically in that king's reign (3:6–10, the only passage so dated, may be a later addition). Jer. 2:18 seems to assume that Assyria is still a viable power, thus presupposing a date prior to about 614. Apart from these texts, the most one can do is argue that the religious situation in Judah in the period before Josiah's reform (621 B.C.; see 2 Kings 22:1–23:25) would have provided appropriate occasion for delivering the oracles of chaps. 2–3.

There is a second problem. Apparently, from the very beginning of his career Jeremiah expected that Judah would suffer military defeat at the hands of an unnamed enemy from “the north” (1:13–16). Oracles announcing this threat are found in chaps. 4–6 and 8–10 (see 4:6; 6:1, 22; 10:22). But in the years following 626 B.C. such an attack did not materialize, and it is not even clear whom the prophet identified as the foe. A common suggestion has been the Scythians, a nomadic people from the north whose unsuccessful attack on Egypt was described by the Greek historian Herodotus, but the lack of direct evidence makes this hypothesis unlikely (→ Scythians).

The problem is complicated by the fact that two passages dated to the period 605–604 B.C. specifically identify the Babylonian king, Nebuchadnezzar, as the agent of imminent destruction (25:1, 8–9; 36:9, 29). Are we to infer from this that the prophet was wrong in his first prediction, and that two decades later he suggested a new identity for the invaders? Some have been reluctant to accept this conclusion on the grounds that as a true prophet Jeremiah could never have been wrong or change his mind about such a serious matter. Such a view, however, fails to allow for an ongoing process of reinterpretation of earlier utterances by the prophet himself and his successors, and thus represents a too static notion about how prophecy operates.

A third problem involves the relationship of Jeremiah to Josiah's reform of the nation's religious establishment and to the document important for that reform (2 Kings 22:8–13), generally believed to be an early version of the book of Deuteronomy. Again, the evidence is ambiguous. Some have seen in the sermon on the covenant (Jer. 11:1–13) explicit reference to the reform (cf. 2 Kings 23:1–3) and an indication that Jeremiah supported it. However, the “Deuteronomistic” character of these verses makes confidence in such a view difficult (see commentary below). Jer. 6:19 is not so open to the latter criticism, but the exact referent of “my law” is uncertain. The Temple sermon, 7:1–15 and 26:1–24, might suggest that Jeremiah opposed the Jerusalem Temple establishment and must therefore have opposed a reform that had as its centerpiece a religion purified and centralized in that location. On the other hand, in 3:1 and 34:8–22 he seems to draw upon Deuteronomy's formulation of the law mandating centralization (cf. Deut. 24:1–4; 15:1, 12–18).

Perhaps, as some have suggested, Jeremiah ceased to act as a prophet for a time during the heyday of Josiah's reform. The oracles in chaps. 1–25 contain few indications of date, so this hypothesis cannot be proven, though there is precedent for such a period of withdrawal in Isa. 8:16–17.

One way to solve these problems is to argue that the traditional date for the call of Jeremiah is inaccurate. This can be done in several ways. One can emend the text of 1:2 and 25:3 on the grounds that they originally read “twenty-third year,” i.e., 616 B.C. One can eliminate these chronological references altogether as later additions, or one can understand "thirteenth year" as the date of the prophet's birth rather than his call. But to do any of these involves one both in an argument from silence (assuming that since Jeremiah did not come right out and say things that allow us to link his utterances to the reign of Josiah, he was not active then) and a willingness to overlook or explain away the specific evidence of the text (the references to the "days of Josiah" in 3:6 and 36:2, to "Assyria" in 2:18, and to the beginning of his prophecy in the "thirteenth year of Josiah").

"Biography" in the Service of Community. We have seen that there is little biographical information about the prophet to be found in the poetic oracles and that we must be careful about accepting at face value what we encounter in other materials. The search for the "historical Jeremiah" is an intriguing one, precisely because, by comparison with other prophetic books, in Jeremiah we seem to have so much information at our disposal. But we must also ask how much accurate data about the prophet's life we can expect to derive from material so preoccupied with interpreting the historical experiences of a nation.

The broader question is this: in what sense can the book of Jeremiah be considered the prophet's biography? And to the extent that it is, what is the relationship between "biography" and community? Egyptian tomb inscriptions written centuries before the emergence of the Israelite state in Canaan reveal the existence of a literary form that has been called "biography" or "autobiography." These inscriptions often contain a report of the person's installation in office by the pharaoh, a description of his assignment and his conduct in it, narratives about his birth and death, and the like. These are some of the very elements found in the book of Jeremiah. It is important to note, however, that these biographies present their subjects as the performers of a public function and give an account—to the gods and to the public—of the person's conduct in office. Contrary to modern expectations, these documents do not focus on the development of individual traits of character and personality. Where these appear at all, they are subservient to the person's performance of his public role.

One might well ask whether it is not a necessary feature of a biography that it be centrally interested in its subject. If the so-called biographical prose in Jeremiah (e.g., chap. 26) seems more concerned with depicting the people's rejection of God's message to them and the ultimate consequences of that than the life of the prophet, then perhaps we should not speak of "biography" at all. Still, it is obviously not the case that such passages as chap. 26 lack all interest in the prophet's personal history.

What we appear to have in Jeremiah is biography employed as a vehicle for addressing topics of larger than individual concern. The crucial question is not whether the narratives refer to historical traditions about the prophet. We assume that to some extent they do, since the descriptions are often extremely concrete (with dates, names, and events corresponding to those found in 2 Kings and in extrabiblical sources), and the laments contain convincingly personal references. Furthermore, prophecy is a social phenomenon. Intense emotional dialogue is basic to the functioning of an intermediary (see the Short Essays "The Interaction Between Prophet and God" and "The Social Dynamics of Prophetic Behavior"). Judging from comparative studies of prophets and similar intermediaries, the social dynamics of prophetic behavior depicted in these Jeremiah texts seem realistic. The question is, rather, how the overall purpose of the narrative affected the use of these historical traditions.

The Book in Its Contexts

The book of Jeremiah is not the product of a single person operating in a closely circumscribed time and place. To understand it, therefore, we must be aware not only of the contexts in which the prophet worked, but also those contexts in which traditions about his work were known, appreciated, and preserved, culminating in the book as it has come down to us. The time during which this development took place can be divided into two distinct periods, before the Exile and after.

Judah Before the Exile

Politics. According to the traditional date, Jeremiah's prophetic activity spanned the last four decades of Judah's existence as a nation (626–587 B.C.; 1:1–3). This period was a time of increasing internal factionalism and shifting foreign alliances.

The beginning seemed auspicious enough. Perhaps as early as 629, King Josiah (640–609) took advantage of Assyria's increasing weakness to reestablish Judah's independence and in the process brought under his control former Israelite lands to the north. As part of this effort, he undertook a major reform of the nation's religious establishment (2 Chron. 34:1–8; → Josiah).

For Judah, however, the growing weakness of Assyria was in the long run a mixed blessing, since it both permitted and was hastened by the rise of the Neo-Babylonian Empire. In the years 614–609 the Babylonians and their sometime allies, the Medes, inflicted a series of defeats upon the Assyrians, which brought that empire to an end. Egypt, looking out for its own interests, had by this time become an ally of Assyria, and in 609 Pharaoh Neco marched north through Palestine to join in the attempt to recapture the city of Haran. Josiah moved to intercept him but was killed by the Egyptians in battle at Megiddo.

The death of Josiah was an important turning point, and a profound embarrassment. In retrospect we can see that the notion that Judah could exist as an independent nation, controlling Palestine as it had in the days of David and Solomon, was an illusion. It is symbolic of Judah's fate that two of its last four kings were installed by foreign powers (2 Kings 23:34; 24:17).

Still, not all of Jeremiah's contemporaries had such insight into their situation, and continuing hopes for national independence remained a source of internal tension until the very end. Probably, they did not share the embarrassment of the later writer of 2 Kings, who was left virtually speechless: Josiah, to whose life so many words had been devoted (2 Kings 22:1–23:25), was in death accorded a single verse (23:29). Josiah's fate falsified the assumption of Deuteronomists and prophets alike that the righteous and God-fearing person and nation will prosper.

After Josiah's death, Neco continued toward Syria, and the Judean "people of the land" installed Josiah's second-oldest son, Jehoahaz, as the new king. This selection, which violated the normal order of succession, suggests that Jehoahaz, like Josiah, pursued an "anti-Egyptian" foreign policy. This would explain why, on his return from the north three months later, Neco deposed Jehoahaz and replaced him with his elder brother, Jehoiakim (2 Kings 23:30–35), who proved to be a friend of Egypt in its struggles against Babylonia.

During Jehoiakim's reign, Babylonian power continued to increase. In 605 Nebuchadnezzar decisively defeated the Egyptians at the northern Syrian city of Carchemish, and in 604 he captured the Philistine city of Ashkelon, a close neighbor of Judah. About the year 603 Jehoiakim formally became a vassal of the Babylonian king, but after three years he revolted (2 Kings 24:1). Nebuchadnezzar was occupied elsewhere for several years, but in the spring of 597 he mounted a siege against Jerusalem, which fell on March 16 of that year.

Three months before the city's fall, Jehoiakim died (it is possible he was assassinated by opponents) and was succeeded by his son, Jehoiachin. The latter survived the siege but was among those persons and objects of booty carried off by Nebuchadnezzar into exile in Babylon (2 Kings 24:8–20). He was replaced by Zedekiah, the third son of Josiah to become king in Jerusalem in a decade.

Zedekiah's situation was not an easy one. Although Judah had been decisively defeated and was again a vassal of Babylon, the voices of nationalism were still heard. Even among those who understood the defeat as God's punishment were some who felt that their chastisement was now complete and that restoration would soon follow (see commentary below on chaps. 27–29). The fact that the previous king, Jehoiachin, continued to live in captivity in Babylon, where he was recognized as king by his captors and was able to exercise some measure of control over royal properties in Judah (2 Kings 25:27–30; → Jehoiachin), further complicated Zedekiah's situation. Early in his reign it appears that Judah and some of its neighbors began to plot a revolt against Babylon (see chap. 27), but nothing came of this. Later, Zedekiah did rebel. In January 588 Nebuchadnezzar began a siege of Jerusalem, which continued with one short respite until the walls were breached in July 587. Judeans were again carried into exile, but this time the city and its Temple were completely destroyed (2 Kings 25:1–21).

The Babylonians appointed a Judean nobleman, Gedaliah, to be governor over what remained of the former Judean state, but by 582 he was dead at the hands of a political rival. Fearing Babylonian reprisals, some of his followers fled to Egypt (2 Kings 25:22–26). Tradition has it that they carried the prophet Jeremiah with them against his will (Jer. 43–44).

Beginning in chap. 21, the book of Jeremiah contains many passages that either mention specific dates or refer to events that can be dated from other sources (e.g., 21:1–2; 25:1; 27:1; 34:1–2; 36:1; 37:1; 39:1–2). Since the prose narratives are concentrated in this part of the book, it is not surprising that many dates should appear here. What is particularly interesting is that the majority of these refer to two particular moments: 605 (the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and the year that Nebuchadnezzar defeated the Egyptians at Carchemish and became king of Babylon; e.g., 25:1; 26:1) and 597–587 (the reign of Zedekiah). The political fate of the nation dominates the book.

One of the notable features of Judean politics during the last decades before 587 was the division of the leaders into factions, or parties. The book gives these groups no names, but they can be identified by their views on foreign policy. One group, comprising kings Jehoiakim and Zedekiah and many of the nobles and religious leaders, was committed to Judean political autonomy. As a practical matter, this group generally favored alliance with Egypt and other steps designed to preserve, or (during most of the period) regain, independence from Babylon. The other, made up of a smaller group of nobles and their supporters among religious functionaries, believed that in the present circumstances it was necessary to submit to the suzerainty of Babylon. Both were able to rationalize their position on the basis of the religious tradition. Jeremiah sided with the latter group, and something of the bitterness of the dispute can be gathered from chaps. 27–29.

Among Jeremiah's consistent supporters in his confrontations with various kings were members of a particular noble family, the house of Shaphan. Shaphan himself had been Josiah's secretary and had had a prominent role in that king's religious reform (2 Kings 22:3–20). Shaphan had three sons: Ahikam, who was also involved in Josiah's reform and who later defended Jeremiah from an attempt to condemn him to death for treason (2 Kings 22:12–13; Jer. 26:24); Elashah, who once served as a messenger for both King Zedekiah and Jeremiah (Jer. 29:3); and Gemariah, who supported the prophet in the face of King Jehoiakim's hostility (Jer. 36:10, 12, 25). On the latter occasion Jeremiah's position was also supported by Gemariah's son, Micaiah (Jer. 36:11–13). One other member of the family is known: Gedaliah, son of Ahikam, whose politics can be inferred from the fact that Nebuchadnezzar appointed him governor after 587 and, according to tradition, put Jeremiah under his care (Jer. 39:14). This connection of the prophet with the house of Shaphan allows us to trace the pedigree of what some have called the "pro-Babylonian" party back to the time of Josiah's reform.

Religion. As in politics, the official religion of Judah during the decades before the Exile was dominated by the legacy of Josiah, who relatively early in his reign carried out a thoroughgoing institutional reform. 2 Kings 22 and 2 Chronicles 34 differ in their reports on the chronology of his activity, but the latter account, which sees it as extending over a period from approximately 628 to 621, is the more probable. The reform's main features, removal of foreign religious practices from both Jerusalem and its environs and from regions farther to the north (2 Kings 23:4–5, 15, 19–20) and centralization of worship in the Temple at Jerusalem (2 Kings 23:8–9; see Deut. 12:1–14), fit well with Josiah's political program of gaining independence from Assyria and reasserting Judean control over formerly Israelite territories to the north. A law book found in the Temple after the reform was already in progress (2 Kings 22:3–13; in all probability some portion of the present book of Deuteronomy) gave the activity additional impetus and occasioned a ceremony in which king and people formally renewed their covenant with God, pledging to keep his commandments (2 Kings 23:1–3).

From Jer. 44:15–19 we can infer that the reform was generally effective in bringing communal worship of other gods under control. But the enhanced position of the Jerusalem Temple and its priesthood also had the effect of providing a conceptual justification for foreign policy decisions that Jeremiah felt compelled to oppose (see 7:1–15; chaps. 27–28). The last decades before 587 were thus a period of intense politico-religious conflict between two groups of the nation's elite, each containing both prophets and members of the ruling aristocracy.

Reading through the book of Jeremiah gives one the impression that widespread apostasy among his countrymen was the feature of Judean society that disturbed the prophet most. Jer. 2:1–4:4, for example, is concerned entirely with that topic. The people are accused of forsaking their God, indeed, of trading him for other, less effective gods (2:9–13). In some of these oracles, apostasy appears to be both a religious and a political issue. In the prophet's view the adopting of new gods had diminished rather than enhanced the chances for national survival (2:14–19, 26–28, 36–37). It is not surprising that the nation's leaders (kings, princes, priests, and prophets, 2:8, 26–28) are singled out for special blame.

If Josiah's reforms were successful, how can we account for this emphasis? The oracles of chap. 2 have often been considered among the oldest in the book, and the situation mirrored in them might be the one that existed at the beginning of the reform. Moreover, although Josiah effected changes in public practices, private religious preferences of long standing may well have persisted. Another factor seems of greater importance. The Jeremiah traditions preserved for us in the book begin with the prophet but were brought to completion by a community that survived the nation's collapse and the prophet's death. The book both predicts and reflects upon Judah's end. And how could such a dire fate be explained? Already during Jeremiah's lifetime, one explanation, applied to the fall of the Northern Kingdom, Israel, was gaining acceptance, namely the Deuteronomistic notion that the nation fell because it had abandoned its God (2 Kings 17:7–18). It is, therefore, not so important to assess the actual level of apostasy during various stages of Jeremiah's career as to recognize that many of the passages of the book that take up this theme do so explicitly in the framework of reflection on the cause of the nation's demise (e.g., 7:16–20; 9:12–16; 11:9–13, 17; 13:1–11; 16:10–13; 22:8–9).

It is not always easy to discern precisely what Jeremiah intended in his accusations relating to the people's religious practices. The criticisms of his prophetic opponents, for example, can be quite general and vague (23:10–11, 14, 15b, 22b). Perhaps we can say that his central concern was with what he perceived to be the leaders' unwillingness to take God and his demands seriously (5:12–13, 20–25; 6:10; 7:21–26; 8:4–7; 15:5–9; 17:5; 22:21). But of course that is a judgment that can only be made on the basis of a particular point of view. It will become apparent that Jeremiah's opponents may reasonably have assessed their own religious position quite differently.

Society. Jeremiah seems little concerned with details of the nation's socioeconomic life. There are several references to oppression of the powerless by the powerful (2:34; 5:26–29), as well as a standard catalog of offenses reminiscent of the Decalogue: stealing, murder, adultery, and false swearing (7:9; cf. 5:2, 7b–8). The latter is part of a “prose sermon” that sets out the terms for the people's continued existence in the land and, in the process, elaborates a conceptual framework for understanding Judah's demise. One passage alludes to the potential for social chaos in a general pattern of deception and slander in personal relations (9:4–6, 8); another pictures the prophet as embroiled in an actual dispute concerning the manumission of slaves during the period of the final siege of Jerusalem in 587 (34:8–22). There are several references to breaking God's “law” (26:4; 44:10), as well as to the “covenant” (11:1–13; 22:9), all of which can be understood in the context of reflection on the nation's fall.

By contrasting to the much shorter book of Amos (see, e.g., Amos 2:4–8; 4:1–3; 6:4–7; 8:4–7), Jeremiah's lack of emphasis on socioeconomic conditions in Judah may seem surprising. Though it would be wrong to conclude that such matters were of little importance to Jeremiah and to those who transmitted the traditions about him, it does seem to indicate that in their day it was actions in the political arena that were perceived as most critical for determining the nation's future. What was at stake was national survival, and it was clear that the really important decisions affecting this lay in the realm of foreign policy.

In retrospect, Josiah's legacy proved to be uncertain. His reform of religious institutions, certainly a move that many considered exemplary, was part of a larger effort to make Judah independent from Assyria and establish it as a sovereign power governing an expanded territory. Whatever the fate of the reform, it is clear that in subsequent decades decisions to strive for such national autonomy led inexorably to the disasters that dashed all such hopes.

We can assume that both parties to the dispute anticipated Judah's survival. Kings Jehoia-kim and Zedekiah, along with their supporters in the political and religious establishments, interpreted survival in terms of autonomy from the dominant regional power, Babylon. The group to which Jeremiah belonged hoped for a cultural and religious survival that did not depend upon political independence. Therefore, the insistence upon autonomy in the face of Babylon's overwhelming military power seemed to them suicidal. To make things more difficult, each side was convinced that its position corresponded to God's plan for his people.

Pre-exilic Judean society was the context for Jeremiah's prophetic activity not just in the sense that it gave him something to talk about; it was also the context within which he worked. It is obvious that the prophet's oracles imply an audience, but the dynamics of his relationship to it were more complicated than the simple utterances of a message.

The book of Jeremiah contains many instances of social interaction between the prophet and others. There are references to his acting as an intercessor with God on the people's behalf; 42:2–6 seems to represent an “ideal” instance of such activity (see also 15:11; the thrice-repeated prohibition of intercession—7:16; 11:14; 14:11—implies that such activity was common). The fact that even his opponents continued to consult him (21:2; 37:3, 16–17; 38:14; 42:1–3) indicates a public acknowledgment of this aspect of the prophetic role.

But we learn most about disputes between the prophet and members of his audience. Some of the references to opponents are general in nature (1:17–19; 15:19–20; 17:14–18; 18:20; 20:8, 18), but others are more specific. Jer. 20:1–6 describes a public dispute with a high-ranking priest of the Temple, and this is only one of the attempts made by persons in positions of power to control the prophet's activity (cf. 11:21; 26:7–9; 29:26–28; 32:2–5; 37:13–15, 20–21; 38:15–16, 24–28). In the first instance Jeremiah was publicly punished (20:2). Evidently, a prophet was to be both consulted and controlled.

Over time Jeremiah's activities aroused such feelings of hostility that opponents plotted actively against him (11:18–19; 18:18, 22–23; 20:10; see the general references to “persecution” in 15:15; 17:18). Still, there is evidence of a certain reluctance to deal too harshly with him (38:1–13).

Among the important opponents that Jeremiah had to face were other prophets, who appeared to him to be mere supporters of the social and political status quo (23:14, 16–17; 27–29). Jer. 26:7–19 indicates that it was not easy for Judeans to pass judgment on the validity of competing prophetic claims. Some made the acceptability of the message itself their criterion (v. 11b; see 37:13–15), but for others overt behavior was the critical concern (v. 16). In a culture that assumed the existence of prophets, one apparently had to give the benefit of the doubt to those who displayed recognizable prophetic behavior (cf. Jeremiah's reaction to the prophet Hananiah, 28:11b).

All this took place within the framework of partisan dispute that we have already identified. That Jeremiah had defenders in high places in the government seems to have been an important factor in his survival (26:24; cf. 39:11–14).

Communities After the Fall of Judah.

The Exile began with a deportation of Judeans after the fall of Jerusalem in 597 B.C. For the next decade there were two communities and two living kings of Judah, and they faced a double task of accounting for the nation's fall and deciding on a course of action for the future. Their religious tradition made it easy enough to understand the disaster as God's punishment. The question now became whether the punishment could be considered complete and a restoration of fortunes expected. Some apparently held such a view (see chaps. 28–29). But Zedekiah's revolt against Nebuchadnezzar and the subsequent capture and destruction of Jerusalem made the question moot. Additional Judeans were deported to Babylon in 587, and again in about 582. Jer. 52:28–30 sets the total number of deportees at four thousand six hundred, though the discrepancy with 2 Kings 24:10–17 suggests that, if this number is accurate at all, it must refer only to adult males. We know that the exiles were the select of Judean society: royalty, nobility, soldiers, craftsmen, and religious leaders. According to 2 Kings 25:12, only the poorest remained in the land.

Not much is known about the life of the exiles in Babylon. There are indications that they built houses, raised families, and pursued livelihoods (Jer. 29:5–6; Isa. 55:1–2; → Exile). We are plagued with a similar lack of information about the other post-587 Jewish communities. Apparently, some who had fled the war and taken refuge in surrounding countries returned to the devastated homeland (40:11–12), but if Lam. 5:1–18 is any indication, life in Judah was difficult. When civil strife in the remnant community resulted in the death of the Babylonian-appointed governor, Gedaliah, some of those Judeans fled to Egypt (2 Kings 25:2–26; Jer. 41–43). Nothing is known about this group, though there is evidence of a continuing Jewish community at Elephantine on Egypt's southern border during the Persian period (→ Syene).

From the religious point of view, the main problem posed by the Exile was to understand why it had happened and what its implications were for the continued existence of God's people. The distinctive emphases in the book of Jeremiah as a whole seem to derive from such a need to understand. This concern would have been shared by both the prophet and those who transmitted and developed the traditions about him. The goal of the book they produced was not simply to preserve Jeremiah's words; it was to understand Judah's fall and the people's future.

It seems probable that this shaping of the tradition took place during the early decades of the Exile. Some passages show a certain bias in favor of the exilic community, identified as the "good figs" by comparison to the "rotten figs" who were left behind (chap. 24). Speculation about the length of the Exile was important to them (25:11; 29:1–14). We might even imagine the curiously anachronistic Sabbath regulation of 17:19–27 as deriving from attempts during the Exile to codify laws concerning religious practice.

The fact that there are many promises of eventual restoration of the people to their land is also in harmony with the hypothesis of an exilic setting (e.g., 3:14–18; 23:1–4, 7–8; 24:5–7; 27:22; 29:10–14, 32; 30:1–3; 46:27–28; 50:4–5, 19–20). Many of these passages occur in prose; many mention both Judah and northern Israel in a comprehensive promise of restoration. The "Deuteronomistic" explanation of the collapse of Israel and Judah as God's punishment for their wrongdoing allowed the people to believe that their defeat signaled neither that God was powerless to defend them nor that he had completely and finally abandoned them. There was hope for the future.

Point of View

The book of Jeremiah is a long and complex work. Though not, strictly speaking, a summary, the following sketch of the point of view toward it that has been developed in the preceding sections is offered for readers who wish to begin with an overview of the book's contexts and purpose.

Where did the material in the book of Jeremiah come from, and why was it preserved in its present form? There can be no single answer to this question. Rather, we must take into consideration the differing circumstances of the individuals and communities responsible for the preservation and development of Jeremiah traditions.

There are indications that the prophet himself made the first move to preserve formally his utterances in writing (see chap. 36). He did this after two decades of activity (1:1–3; 25:3; 36:2). It appears that the scroll he dictated was not simply a compilation of his earlier oracles but an interpretation of them in light of a new political situation (the unnamed enemy from the north of 1:13–16 and chaps. 4–6 was now specifically identified with the Babylonians; see 25:8–9; 36:29).

The purpose of dictating the scroll was not simply to preserve his writings, however. Under the circumstances (36:4–8), the scroll was a necessary alternative way of delivering his message to its intended audience, the Judean people and their rulers.

The scroll had another function as well. Jeremiah was not the only Judean prophet of his day; he was often in competition with others performing that role (see 6:13–15; 23:9–22; chaps. 27–29). Since they were all Judean prophets, they shared common patterns of behavior. Both Jeremiah and Hananiah, for example, spoke in the name of Yahweh and performed symbolic actions to augment the force of their utterances (see chaps. 27–28). They contradicted each other in their views of the political future of Judah and called upon their contemporaries to make important decisions. Without the benefit of hindsight, as provided by a record of Jeremiah's words, it was not easy for those who heard them to distinguish "true" prophets from "false."

It is clear that the simple claim to be a prophet was not always sufficient to win acceptance. Throughout his career, Jeremiah (like the others) needed to establish his own credibility, to gain a following so that he could influence behavior. He attempted to do this by the claims he made (see 26:12–15; 1:4–10), the message he proclaimed, the actions he performed (see 19:1–20:6 and the Short Essay "Jeremiah's Symbolic Actions"), and by direct attacks on his opponents (e.g., 6:13–15; 37:19). Making a collection of his earlier oracles and claiming that they referred to the present, looming Babylonian threat would have been one way of arguing for his legitimacy, especially in view of the criticism that was leveled against him, that his prophecies had not been fulfilled (so 17:15; 20:7–8). At this stage preserving the words was but one of a repertoire of rhetorical strategies utilized in his performance of his prophetic role.

The situation of the exiles was different. They did not have to argue for the legitimacy of Jeremiah's message, since history had already vindicated it; they could simply assume that he had been a true prophet. Their main problem was to make sense out of their current situation. In this effort they found Jeremiah's interpretation of Judah's fate (see, e.g., 4:13–18; 26:1–6) made-to-order and used it. In the process they shaped many of the traditions that had come down to them in the light of their own concerns (note how the conditional message of 26:1–6 is altered in 7:8–15; see also 7:16–8:3; 11:1–17; 15:2). Some of these developments produced statements with which Jeremiah probably would not have agreed (see chap. 24).

It is difficult to be certain when this process of reinterpretation and growth came to an end. The circumstances reflected in 17:19–27 and 22:24–30 may indicate that it continued into the postexilic period. In addition, for many years the book seems to have circulated in two written forms, identifiable in the texts we now refer to as the MT and the LXX. Everything that came to be included in the book of Jeremiah shared the authority of the prophet. Neither Jeremiah nor those who followed him seem to have believed that the significance of Yahweh's words was exhausted in the context during which they were first uttered.

Though it is beyond the scope of this commentary, it should at least be mentioned that the tradition lived on past the time when it was committed to writing and beyond the "Old Testament period" into the canons of the Jewish and Christian religious communities. The task of reinterpreting the words in new contexts—always full of hazards—has nonetheless continued.

The narrative of chap. 36 seems to promise that of all prophetic books Jeremiah will most easily yield to our view the authentic, original words of the prophet himself. We have already seen, however, that this promise remains unfulfilled, for the "original" scroll cannot be identified with confidence. The reason is by this time clear: the traditions in the book of Jeremiah were preserved as the result of separate actions over several generations, each of which was in response to a particular and immediate need. It is obvious that these needs shaped the collections. And it is understandable that, occupied with their own concerns, the exilic editors obscured the boundaries of the earlier collections. It is for this reason, therefore, that the following commentary does not make a systematic effort to isolate Jeremiah's "genuine" words.

Confronting the People with Words and Deeds

1:1–3

Superscription

The superscription is a statement in the third person giving information about the prophet Jeremiah and his activity. Such prefixes are a standard feature of most prophetic books in the OT.

The superscription contains four elements. It begins with a phrase that serves as the title of the collection ("The words of Jeremiah"). This is followed by biographical information ("the son of Hilkiah, of the priests who were in Anathoth in the land of Benjamin"), a statement about the basis of his prophetic authority ("to whom the word of the Lord came"), and a chronological reference fixing the dates of prophetic activity ("in the days of Josiah . . . [and] until the captivity of Jerusalem in the fifth month"). The first and third of these elements are always present in superscriptions to prophetic books, though frequently a single phrase serves for both (Hos. 1:1; Obad. 1:1). The second and fourth are sometimes absent. This suggests that the purpose of the superscription is to make two claims about the collection that follows: that it stems from a single, known individual and that, since this individual spoke at the command of Yahweh, the collection as a whole is to be viewed as containing Yahweh's words. The superscription asserts the authority of the prophet to legitimate the authority of the collection of traditions associated with him.

It seems unlikely that the author of the superscription believed that all the material in the collection represented Jeremiah's words (e.g., the extensive biographical narratives are obviously about his activity). What is evident in the superscription and in the collection, which it introduces, is the assumption that the activities of Jeremiah shed light on the relationship between Yahweh and his people.

The Jeremiah superscription has several peculiarities. For one thing, it has more biographical detail than most. This element is in character with the book as a whole and adds a poignant dimension to the prophet's complaint about persecution at the hands of the "men of Anathoth" (11:18-21). A second peculiarity is the precision in dating, specifying the exact beginning and end of Jeremiah's activity. However, the latter date (July 587 B.C.) contradicts reports in the collection of Jeremiah's activity subsequent to the fall of Jerusalem (40:1; 42:7; 43:8; 44:1, 24-25).

Jeremiah's Call

This passage contains an account of how Jeremiah came to be a prophet (1:4-10), plus a report of two visions. The first vision stresses Yahweh's determination to bring his words, uttered by the prophet, to fulfillment (1:11-12); the second sketches the content of those words: Judah will be destroyed by an enemy attacking from the north as punishment for its unfaithfulness to Yahweh (1:13-16). Verses 17-19 reiterate vv. 7-9. The passage thus makes the claim that Jeremiah was a designated prophet of Yahweh, ties the general content of his message to this commission, and addresses two problems that emerged during the course of his subsequent activity: the delay in the fulfillment of his prophecies, which tended to undermine his authority as a prophet (cf. 20:7-8), and the opposition that he encountered from people who rejected his message (cf. 11:18-12:6).

1:4-10, The Call. Jeremiah's call is described as a confrontation and dialogue with Yahweh that proceeds through four stages: commissioning, objection, reassurance, and sign. Since this is the same general pattern one finds in reports of the commissioning of Moses (Exod. 3), Gideon (Judg. 6:11-24), and Isaiah (Isa. 6), the account forges a link between Jeremiah and these great figures from the people's past. The language itself is sometimes stereotypic (e.g., the "Ah, Yahweh God" of Jer. 1:6 reflects the vocabulary of lamentation; cf. 4:10; 14:13; 32:17; Josh. 7:7; Judg. 6:22). However, the whole is presented as something the prophet actually experienced.

Such a call report is appropriate for someone thought to stand in special relationship to a god. Not just in ancient Judah, but in many cultures, the deity is understood to take the initiative in appointing persons to function in the role of intermediary. Call narratives make a formal claim that dialogue with the deity has occurred. In doing so they refer to a part of the prophet's experience that, because of its private character, would otherwise be unavailable to others. But though there is every reason to believe that they are based upon real experiences, the purpose of call narratives is not primarily (auto)biographical. Rather, their main function is rhetorical—to assert a claim to authority that is prior to and legitimates the claim made every time the prophet addresses an audience with a specific message from the god.

Of course, the authority of an intermediary is not established by a call narrative alone. It is primarily the prophet's behavior—both words and actions—that, when deemed appropriate by some portion of the audience, leads to a public affirmation of the prophet's authority. The call narrative can thus be viewed as a theoretical explanation of the cause of that behavior, which shifts the responsibility for it to the deity.

It is probable that the narrative as it stands reveals traces of other uses to which the tradition about Jeremiah's call experience was put. For one thing, intermediaries typically stand between specific peoples and their deities. Jeremiah was no exception; with great consistency he conveyed the rebukes of Yahweh to his Judean compatriots. Yet the narrative refers to him as a "prophet to the nations." Though chap. 27 records an instance in which Jeremiah spoke to foreign emissaries who had assembled in Jerusalem, the focus of his activity was national, not international. The phrase therefore may represent an interpretation by the exilic preservers of the tradition: since Jeremiah's activity had placed him directly in the middle of an important foreign policy dispute (see commentary below on chaps. 27-28), his original call was presumed to have mentioned international responsibilities.

Similarly, the claim that part of Jeremiah's task was "to build and to plant" (v. 10) does not correspond well with what we know about his activity. The phraseology of v. 10 has parallels elsewhere in the book. Once it describes Yahweh's options in dealing with his people (18:7-10), and once his punishment of them (45:4). Otherwise, the reference is to the possibility of political restoration after the long period of Babylonian dominance (24:6; 31:27-28; 42:10; cf. 12:14-17). It seems likely that the reference to building and planting represents a drawing out of the implications of Jeremiah's words in the period after the judgment he proclaimed had become reality.

1:11-19, Two Visions. There are close parallels to these patterned vision reports in Jer. 24:1-3 and Amos 7:7-9; 8:1-3, but it is not necessary to conclude from this that they are merely literary constructions. Comparative studies show that highly stereotypic vision experiences are nonetheless real to those who have them. A vision report constitutes a claim to have received a revelation from the deity and legitimizes subsequent behavior (cf. 1 Kings 22:17-23; 3:5-15). Visions both convey a message and authorize its delivery. They are a vital component of the prophetic process.

It is another question, however, how much the present account was shaped by subsequent events. The reference to invasion by a northern enemy could encompass both the rather general pronouncements on that theme in chaps. 4-6 and the later references to the Babylonians in 25:8-9 and 36:29 (cf. 21:1-10), and v. 15 appears to mirror 39:3.

On what occasions would the prophet himself have related the account of his commissioning? Comparative studies show that intermediaries sometimes recite their visions as part of a specific public act, and such a possibility cannot be ruled out. In 26:12 we see, however, that during a conflict, when his authority was challenged, a much simpler statement could suffice. Amos 7:10-17 provides an example of a prophet's appeal to his commission in response to a challenge to his authority. The fact that this is a narrative in the third person shows that others could utilize this appeal for the same purpose, namely, to establish the authority of Amos's words. In any case it is clear that the position of the account of Jeremiah's call at the head of the entire collection provides the underpinning for all the material that follows.

In fact the need to assert the legitimacy of Jeremiah's activity would have recurred, both during the period of his activity and subsequently, when his words were appealed to as authoritative. Whether or not the call narrative in its present form stems from the prophet himself, the claim it makes is crucial to his acceptance by the people. Prophets cannot function unless their claims to authority are acknowledged by at least some members of their audience.

The Interaction Between Prophet and God

The call narrative provides us with an important clue to the nature of the relationship between prophet and deity: broadly speaking, we must think of revelation in terms of dialogue, not monologue. It is easy to overlook this fact because the utterances of Jeremiah are understood to be the words of Yahweh. The book is replete with formulaic expressions that underscore this assumption: "Thus says Yahweh" (e.g., 6:22), "the word of Yahweh came to me saying" (1:4; 2:1), "Yahweh said to me" (3:6, 11), and similar phrases. In addition Yahweh gives Jeremiah visions (1:11-19), instructions (6:27; 7:16), and information (11:18-19).

But in addition to the visions reported in chap. 1, there are other passages that portray the prophet in dialogue with Yahweh (5:1-6; 12:1-6; 14:11-18; 15:10-21). The prophet's vehement response to words from Yahweh is mirrored in the diatribes of 17:14-18 and 20:7-18. Moreover, speech addressed to Yahweh was an integral part of Jeremiah's intercessory function (7:16; 11:14; 14:11; 15:11; 27:18; 37:3). Jeremiah considered standing in Yahweh's "council" to be an important prophetic experience, one that involves dialogue (23:18, 22).

Since the effectiveness of a prophet depended upon acceptance by an audience, reports of such dialogue should be seen as part of the rhetoric by which Jeremiah and those who transmitted the traditions associated with him sought to legitimize his words.

2:1-4:4

Accusations and Exhortations

The tone of this section is accusatory. The crime is apostasy, the people's abandonment of their God. The language is hyperbolic. It seems unlikely that the Judeans had abandoned their traditional god, Yahweh, altogether (as 2:11 suggests). What Jeremiah represents and forcefully states is the point of view of those Judeans who condemned any deviation from the ideal of exclusive loyalty to Yahweh.

In chap. 3 the idea of the people's "return" to Yahweh emerges as a theme. We learn that there are prior conditions for such a return (3:1) and that the people have refused to turn back to God (3:7, 10). Nevertheless, they continue to be invited to do so (3:12, 14, 22; 4:1). It is this content that sets the passage off from the preceding and following units (the call, and a series of oracles about an enemy from the north).

The chapters are rich in the use of figurative language, especially metaphor. Such language is nonliteral. It proposes identifications we know are not exact, making comparisons on the basis of presumed common qualities.

By far the greatest number of metaphors and similes are drawn from the realm of love and sexuality: the happy marriage (2:2), adultery (3:8, 20), prostitution (2:20, 33; 3:1–3, 6, 8), and even animal sexuality (2:23–24). Figures of speech are also drawn from agriculture (2:3, 20, 21), physical geography (2:31), social and economic life (2:11, 13, 14, 26, 32), and religious law (4:4). In most cases they refer negatively to the people's behavior.

Metaphors are suggestive and open-ended. By using an analogy that invites reflection, the prophet adds force to his accusation. We can imagine members of his audience asking, "Have our actions toward Yahweh really been like those of an unfaithful spouse? Must we then take them as seriously as we would behavior that disrupts a marriage? If we ourselves would be angry and prone to strike back when confronted by such behavior, why should Yahweh act any differently?"

The passage focuses on the past, but the historical allusions are rather general and vague (e.g., 2:7b, 14–16, 20). In particular there is an ambiguity in the use of the term "Israel," which sometimes refers to the whole people in the period before the monarchy (2:3), sometimes to the Northern Kingdom (3:6, 8, 11, 18), and sometimes to Judah (2:26–28). This ambiguity, as well as the fact that we have here a mixture of poetry and prose (3:6–10, 15–18, 24–25), raises the question of why the separate units within this section occur in their present order. An obvious suggestion is that some units were originally composed as comments on others. In particular, the units woven together in 3:6–4:4 form a complex fabric of elaborations and clarifications. Since 2:1–3:5 plus 3:19–20 seem to be the verses that elicited the comments, they are probably the oldest. Still, it is difficult to be confident that even here everything originated with Jeremiah. It is possible, for example, that 2:20–28 owes its present shape to an attempt to explain why Judah fell to the Babylonians.

The whole section 2:1–4:4 provides a good example of the complex way in which the Jeremiah tradition grew. Far from being concerned to preserve only the actual words of the prophet, the transmitters, motivated by an overriding interest in understanding the implications of those words for their current situation, willingly incorporated commentary into the text.

2:1–3:5, Inexcusable Sin and Yahweh's Judgment. In 2:14–19 there is an allusion to a sequence of historical events. First "Israel" (the Northern Kingdom) was destroyed (by Assyria in 722 B.C.). Then the Judeans (note the shift to the pronoun "you" in v. 16) suffered a blow at the hands of Egypt, presumably the death of Josiah in 609 B.C. (see 2 Kings 23:28–30). Verse 17 offers an interpretation applicable to both these disasters. Yet despite the warnings of history, Judean officials ("you," v. 18) continue to seek national security in the form of alliances with foreign governments. To the prophet these overtures are tantamount to forsaking God. Verses 29–30 make essentially the same point—that the people have failed to learn the lessons implicit in their past misfortunes—but without alluding to any specific event. Such statements clearly rest on the theological assumption that Yahweh is in control of historical occurrences, which he manipulates according to his own purposes, in this case punishment and instruction.

3:6–10, Israel and Judah's Harlotry. These verses can be thought of as an attempt to clarify the potentially ambiguous reference to "Israel" in 2:14–15. The distinction between the Northern Kingdom (Israel) and Judah is made explicit, and the latter is criticized for not having heeded the warning implicit in the destruction of the former.

3:11–14, Judah Worse Than Israel. There now comes an elaboration in which the unfortunate Northern Kingdom is viewed more favorably than Judah (v. 11). The grounds for this comparison are not stated explicitly, but can be inferred from v. 10: Judah failed to heed the warning implicit in Israel's defeat. The contrast between the two is heightened by the allusion to 3:5. The same presumed willingness of Yahweh not to be "angry for ever," which gave the Judeans a false sense of confidence in their own future security, is offered as the basis of Israel's hope of restoration. The conditions for this restoration are that they acknowledge the cause of the nation's downfall—as interpreted by the prophet—and make whatever changes in behavior are required for a "return" to Yahweh. Again, there is a contrast with the Judeans, whose statements of confidence had no effect upon their behavior (3:5b). There is, however, a significant Judean modification in this pro-Israelite statement: Israel's restoration will not be as an independent nation, but as part of a group based in Jerusalem (v. 14).

The contrast set up in these verses is reminiscent of chap. 24, where the Judean exiles are designated "good figs" and their compatriots who remained behind after the Babylonian victory in 597 B.C. are the "bad figs." Historical adversity is interpreted as punishment, and wrongdoers who have been punished are elevated in status over those who have not. Ezek. 16:51–52 may indicate that this theme was a topic of speculation during the Exile, which is probably when the reflections contained in Jer. 3:11-14 originated.

3:15-18, Return and Restoration. This unit clarifies the idea of a restoration to Zion introduced in v. 14. The point of view is clearly exilic: the Ark, and presumably the Temple in which it was housed, no longer exists, and the people of both Israel and Judah are assumed to live to the north of their original homeland. Jerusalem will become the focal point of a new order, which will incorporate other nations as well.

3:19-20, God's Children. These verses return to the theme of 2:1-3:5 and may originally have been contiguous with them.

3:21-25, Return and Healing. Appropriating from vv. 11-14 the theme of Israel's "return," vv. 21-23 add a positive response. The latter motif is further elaborated in the prose unit, vv. 24-25.

4:1-2, Return and Blessing. These verses set out the conditions for some future act of "return" to Yahweh, which will have benefits for other nations as well (cf. 3:17). The term "Israel" is ambiguous, but the allusion to 3:15-18 suggests a reference to the people assembled in the coming restoration.

4:3-4, Admonition and Threat. Prefaced by a new heading, addressed to the "men of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem," the subject (warning) and figure of speech (circumcision) change. At first glance, we seem to have a warning that suggests a way to avert a coming disaster, but its position at the end of the larger section suggests that it may have been placed here as a further interpretation of Judah's downfall.

4:5-6:30

An Enemy from the North

The focus of the unit 4:5-6:30 is on the threat of an invasion from the north (4:6; 6:1, 22), a theme introduced in 1:13-15. Though this threat is referred to in several other passages (10:22; 13:20; 15:12), the enemy is not identified until 25:9, where the Babylonian king, Nebuchadnezzar, is named. The unit combines descriptions of an enemy attack with more standard oracles of judgment, interspersing interpretations of the calamity's cause.

The "attacking enemy" passages (4:5-8, 13-17, 19-22, 23-28, 29-31; 6:1-5, 22-26) picture Judah, especially Jerusalem (4:6, 14, 16, 31; 6:2, 6, 23), invaded by a nation that, though anonymous, is clearly a great international power (4:7). Stereotypic language of attack is employed (cf. Isa. 5:26-30). In addition, the derogatory reference to Judah's dependence upon foreign alliances (4:30) echoes 2:18. One has the impression that the attack is impending, if not already in progress (4:15-17, 19-21, 29; 6:24-25). There are calls to flee (4:5-6a; 6:1), references to destruction (4:6b-7, 20, 23-26, 29; 6:2-8), and lamentations (4:8, 13, 19, 31b; 6:24, 26).

The oracles of judgment (5:1-9, 10-17, 20-29, 30-31; 6:9-12, 13-15, 16-21) are somewhat loose in form; for example, one incorporates elements of dialogue (5:1-6), another rhetorical questions (5:22, 29). They are addressed to the Judeans (5:1, 11, 20), against whom they level, in rather general terms, a variety of accusations: they have violated Yahweh's law (5:1-2, 4-5, 25-26; 6:19), refused to take him seriously (5:11-13; 6:10, 17), and worshipped other gods (5:6-8, 23-24; cf. 2:11, 20); their officials are corrupt (5:30-31; 6:13-15a; cf. 2:8). As a consequence, Yahweh is about to intervene to destroy them (5:6, 14-17; 6:11-12, 15b, 21). One senses an echo of 2:30, namely, the idea that the people have refused to be instructed by their past misfortune (5:3).

The interpretations included in 4:5-6:30 make it clear that the disaster is not just a random event, but an act of judgment by Yahweh in response to the Judeans' own behavior (4:8, 12, 17-18, 22, 26b, 28; 5:19; 6:6-7, 27-30). The accusations contained in the judgment oracles underscore the same point. This explanation is timeless in the sense that it could be applied to any disaster that befell the nation (that is the implication of 2:30 and 5:3). Though the unit contains no unambiguous historical allusions that would allow us to date the attack or identify the enemy, it is clear that those who collected these traditions viewed them from the perspective of the Babylonian exile. The few prose sections that occur here point to the destruction of Jerusalem as Yahweh's act of judgment against Judean apostasy (4:11-12, 27; 5:18-19), but they contain an expression of hope as well: Yahweh will not "make a full end" of the people (4:27; 5:18). Those in exile were conscious of being that remnant (see commentary above on 3:11-14).

Jer. 5:18-19, a straightforward attempt to explain the Exile, has close parallels in Jer. 9:12-16; 16:10-13; 22:8-9; Deut. 29:22-28; and 1 Kings 9:8-9. These passages tend to follow a common outline: after a narrative introduction, the question of why Yahweh has destroyed his people is posed. The answer is invariably apostasy, and the punishment exile. If not the mark of a Deuteronomistic "edition" of the book of Jeremiah, these passages are at least in agreement with the viewpoint of the Deuteronomists.

Within the unit several different attitudes toward the prophets are displayed. Apparently, those who announced misfortune were ignored (5:13; cf. 2:30, which suggests persecution), whereas those who prophesied "peace" received a favorable response (5:31; 6:13–15). This implies the importance of the audience in prophetic activity (see the Short Essay “The Social Dynamics of Prophetic Behavior”). The comment in 4:10 that Yahweh had “deceived” his people points in another direction. The deception referred to seems to be the conviction—dashed by the Exile—that Yahweh would guarantee Judah’s security, precisely the message of the prophets whom Jeremiah considered false (6:13–15). The writer held Yahweh responsible for this conviction, presumably because he sent the prophets who reinforced it. The uncritical attitude about prophecy reflected here (i.e., everyone who claims to be a prophet is one) differs from Jeremiah’s willingness to make judgments between competing prophetic claims.

Among the prophets, Jeremiah was not alone in having to combat an assumption on the part of his audience that the nation was secure from the threat of military defeat (5:12; 12:4; 21:13; cf. Amos 9:10; Isa. 5:18–23; Mic. 2:6; 3:11). Mic. 3:11 specifically links this confidence to the presence of Yahweh in their midst, as does Jeremiah in his Temple sermon.

Jeremiah’s Temple Sermon

Two passages, 7:1–15 and 26:1–24, refer to the same event, an occasion on which Jeremiah stood in the Temple and addressed those who entered with the message that unless they changed their behavior Yahweh would certainly destroy Jerusalem and its sanctuary. What differentiates them is their points of view on this event. Jer. 7:1–15 is a “prose sermon” and concentrates on the prophet’s words; chap. 26 is “biography” and gives more details about the interaction between Jeremiah and his audience.

The confrontation occurred in 609 B.C., a time of political upheaval in Judah and the region. King Josiah had been killed in battle by the Egyptians, who later deposed his son Jehoahaz after only three months’ reign and replaced him with a more trustworthy ally, Jehoikim. A struggle between Egypt and Babylon for the control of Palestine was under way, and in Judah questions of national security and prosperity were paramount.

Jeremiah’s message seems to have attracted considerable attention, since a group consisting of priests and prophets instituted a legal proceeding against him. They accused him of prophesying the destruction of Temple and city and sought to have him executed (26:8–9, 11).

Deuteronomy’s legislation assumes that Israel had both an interest in and a right to exercise control over the activity of prophets, and it provides two instances in which a sentence of death might be handed down: if the prophet spoke in the name of some god other than Yahweh or if the message spoken was not commanded by Yahweh (Deut. 13:1–5; 18:20). Both the fact that Jeremiah spoke in Yahweh’s name and the nature of his defense (26:12b, 15b) indicate that the latter was the substance of the charge against him.

As a guide to adjudicating such a case, Deut. 18:21–22 sets forth the criterion of fulfillment of prophecy—if the specific prophecies do not come to pass, then Yahweh has not sent the prophet. By this criterion, Judah’s current political situation might seem to confirm the message of peace uttered by Jeremiah’s prophetic opponents (cf. 6:13–15) and to discredit his message of doom (20:7–8 shows that the failure of prophesied events to occur was a major problem for Jeremiah). But such a criterion is difficult to apply satisfactorily (see the Short Essay “The Problem of ‘False’ Prophecy”).

The princes, before whom the case was argued, acquitted Jeremiah, but not, as we might expect, by affirming their conviction that Yahweh had in fact sent him with a message of doom. To the contrary, it was sufficient that he had come forward and spoken in Yahweh’s name. When the elders then cited the precedent of Micah (whose century-old prophecies of doom still awaited fulfillment, 26:17–19), they explicitly rejected content of a certain type—threats by Yahweh against his own people—as a criterion for acceptable prophecy. The implication of the whole proceeding is that persons who manifest a certain kind of behavior recognizable as “prophetic” are to be given the benefit of the doubt and considered prophets.

The Uriah episode (26:20–23) shows that other factors could enter into such decisions. Like Jeremiah, Uriah prophesied in the name of Yahweh that the nation would be destroyed. But in his case, the king and princes wished to put him to death and succeeded in doing so. Since such a message would seem to undermine national security, their action is not very surprising.

It would appear that the behavior of Jeremiah and Uriah was essentially the same. The crucial difference in their situations seems to have been that Jeremiah had strong supporters among the princes (26:24). It is difficult to know why he had such a following (religious-political affiliation? family ties?) while Uriah did not, but the narrative clearly illustrates the importance of a group of supporters for prophetic activity.

The Social Dynamics of Prophetic Behavior

Prophetic communication is dialogical at two levels. On the one hand, the prophet both hears and responds to the deity (see the Short Essay

"The Interaction Between Prophet and God"), and on the other, the prophet's audience does not receive the words passively; its reactions make a difference. Research in the social sciences has shown that "charisma" is, in some sense, always attributed. An audience will judge positively a prophet whose behavior fits certain stereotypes and whose message is acceptable from the standpoint of certain socio-political and religious convictions.

We may observe that prophecy can only occur in societies that harbor a belief in the existence of a god (or gods) able and willing to intervene in the events of the world, as well as the conviction that one legitimate mode of such intervention is the words and actions of human intermediaries. The Judah of Jeremiah's day was such a society. The Temple sermon, however, makes it clear that such beliefs do not preclude a critical evaluation of prophetic activity (cf. 5:12–13). Indeed, we see not only that evaluation occurred, but also that it was affected by differences of opinion. Sometimes, portions of the intended audience are unwilling to listen to the prophet at all (6:10).

The Temple sermon is not the only indication that a prophet's audience assumed the function of judging what was acceptable as prophecy (see 20:1–2; 26:7–9, 16–19; 29:24–28; 38:5). In reality the hearers decided who was to be considered a prophet, since without acceptance it is impossible to function in that role. The case of Uriah shows that rejection sometimes took extreme forms (26:20–23; cf. 2:30).

Unanimous support of a prophet is not the issue. But since communication between the divine and the human worlds stands at the heart of the process of intermediation, some level of human acceptance and support is necessary. The different fates of Jeremiah and Uriah show that the relative power of the group of supporters can also be of great importance. The struggle to gain support was a continuing one for Jeremiah (see commentary on chap. 28 and the Short Essay "Jeremiah's Symbolic Actions").

At the core of the dispute mirrored in the Temple sermon incident is a difference of judgment about the nation's fate. Jeremiah's accusations and threat of disaster were opposed, especially by members of the political and religious establishment, though they knew that his was not a new view about the people's fate (26:18). The basis of their confidence was not just wishful thinking, but a religious conviction mirrored in the words, "This is the temple of Yahweh. . . . We are delivered!" (7:4, 10). This conviction was anchored in the royal ideology: Yahweh had chosen Jerusalem to be his habitation, had founded David's house as the royal line in it, and had established both forever (2 Sam. 7; Pss. 89; 132; Isa. 29:1–8). It was strengthened by historical experience: by Jeremiah's time both dynasty and Temple had endured for nearly four centuries.

Jeremiah's interpretation of Judah's fate, shared by the Deuteronomists and many in exile who wanted to understand the reasons for the nation's fall, was based on the conviction that the covenant between Yahweh and his people was conditional. He described the confidence of the Judeans in the worst possible light—it was based on a "falsehood" that had allowed them to think that they could break Yahweh's law with impunity—and countered their belief with a reference to the fate of Shiloh. The analogy between the two cities is close. In the days before the monarchy, Shiloh had been the resting place of Yahweh's Ark and the only known location apart from Jerusalem of a "temple" of Yahweh (1 Sam. 1:9; 3:3). Furthermore, one may observe a similar mechanical view of the security afforded by Yahweh's presence during times of crisis in the Israelites' manipulation of the Ark at the time of the Philistine wars (1 Sam. 4:3). Nonetheless, Shiloh had been destroyed, according to Jeremiah, because of the people's "wickedness." The same could happen to Jerusalem.

This was not simply a theological dispute. Ideology and foreign policy were intermeshed, and we know that Jeremiah did not hesitate to draw specifically political inferences from his convictions (see chaps. 27–29). The fact that the book contains two accounts of the Temple sermon suggests both that some such occurrence was an important skirmish in Jeremiah's ongoing confrontation with Judah's rulers and that it provided significant material for exilic collectors of the Jeremiah tradition.

There is, in fact, evidence that the account in 7:1–15 is a product of the community of exiles: though the tone of Jeremiah's message seems to be conditional—if you mend your ways you will be spared (vv. 3–7; cf. 26:2–6)—the treatment of the Shiloh analogy in vv. 8–15 implies that the nation's fate is already sealed. The tradition has been preserved for us in such a way as to acknowledge and explain the nation's fall.

Jeremiah's Struggle Against "Falsehood"

The Hebrew word sheqer (basically, "lie") occurs frequently in the book of Jeremiah. In the main it is used in three interrelated contexts: reference to a pervasive but false sense of national security (7:4, 8), to Jeremiah's opponents among the prophets (6:13; 27:14, 16; 28:15), and to loyalties to gods other than Yahweh (3:23; 10:14; 16:19).

Though the term can refer to everyday pervariation (37:14), such usage is rare. Rather, it labels—as the Temple sermon passages show—a certain attitude about the relationship between Yahweh and the nation, the social and political implications that were drawn from that attitude, and the utterances of those who espoused it. What the prophet struggled against was a pervasive falsehood that he understood to be present at the core of Judah's national existence and that he saw as a serious threat to that existence (see the Short Essay "The Problem of 'False' Prophecy").

The term sheqer is widely distributed in the book, occurring in all three major types of material—poetry, biographical prose, and prose sermons. Such occurrence may be taken as an indication both that we are dealing with a major theme of Jeremiah's message and that those who collected and preserved the traditions associated with him shared his concern to interpret the nation's fate, as well as his general point of view on that matter.

Supplements to the Temple Sermon

Jer. 7:16–8:3 is not part of the Temple sermon, but a separate unit made up of three sections that loosely approximate the oracle form (accusation, followed by an announcement of Yahweh's intervention). The accusations focus on religious practices, especially the worship of gods other than Yahweh and the offering of sacrifices. Because of these acts, Yahweh "has rejected and forsaken the generation of his wrath" (7:29) and will destroy their land.

The passage contains phrases characteristic of the prose sermons. Some of these it shares with the Deuteronomist (e.g., "provoke me to anger," 7:18 [cf. 1 Kings 14:9]; "obey the voice of Yahweh," 7:28); others are peculiar to the Jeremian prose (e.g., "cities of Judah and streets of Jerusalem," 7:17, 34; "I have persistently sent," 7:25).

The unit is not really a sermon, however, for it takes the form of Yahweh speaking to Jeremiah (7:16, 27–28) about Judah. Nor does it present an entirely accurate picture of the prophet's activity, since the prohibition recorded in v. 16 does not jibe with accounts of Jeremiah's intercessions, some coming from late in his career (18:20; 21:1–2; 37:1–10; 42:1–22; for a parallel to 7:17–20, see 44:15–19).

It is best to see the unit as an exilic comment on the cause of Judah's destruction, an event mirrored in 8:3. The prohibition against intercession serves to strengthen the judgment about the seriousness of the people's actions and perhaps also to protect Jeremiah's reputation as a prophet by heading off the charge that his intercessions had been powerless to prevent the nation's fall. The same prohibition occurs in two other prose passages devoted to elucidating the cause of exile (11:14; 14:11). The unit is located where it is in the book probably because, like 7:1–15, it focuses on unacceptable religious practices and is concerned to reflect upon the causes of exile.

Coping with Catastrophe

Jer. 8:4–10:25 has ties to the "enemy from the north" oracles of 4:5–6:30, though in general its component sections differ from these in form. Oracles of judgment are infrequent (8:4–13; 9:2–9). Instead, one finds cries of lament and mourning (8:18–9:1; 9:10, 17–22; 10:19–21), a "dialogue" (8:18–9:1) in which the speakers change with confusing rapidity (Jeremiah, 8:18–19a; the people, 8:19b, Yahweh, 8:19c; the people, 8:20; Jeremiah, 8:21–9:1), and a polemic against idols that contains a hymn of praise to Yahweh (10:1–16).

Twice an attack from the north is mentioned (8:16–17; 10:22; cf. 4:13), drawing a specific connection to chaps. 4–6, though now the invasion is viewed as unstoppable (8:17). There are additional reflections of the immediately preceding chapters in 8:8–13 (against the Judean leaders; cf. 5:30–31 and 6:13–15, which is repeated almost verbatim), 8:18–19a and 8:21–9:1 (Jeremiah's personal reaction to the people's fate; cf. 4:19–21), 8:19b (on Zion's security; cf. 7:4, 10), 9:7 ("refine" and "test"; cf. 6:27), 9:9 (cf. 5:9, 29), and 8:19 and 10:1–16 (polemic against idols; cf. 7:17–18, 30).

The dominant theme of the unit is coping with disaster. No hope is expressed that, if the people repent, they can avoid catastrophe. Rather, the nation's downfall seems already to have occurred, though perhaps in the not too distant past. In all likelihood, the poetry of these chapters reflects the Exile but has not yet developed elaborate rationalizations of it, which is evident from the relatively large number of poetic passages in which either the people or the prophet are pictured as struggling with a disaster that seems at the very least to be virtually complete (8:14–15; 8:18–9:1; 9:10, 17–22; 10:19–21). The mood is typified by the wailing of the people: "How we are ruined! We are utterly shamed, because we have left the land, because they have cast down our dwellings" (RSV). By contrast, the prose of 9:12–16 is much more dispassionate in its attempt to explain the disaster (cf. 5:18–19).

This unit, then, does not simply mirror the warnings of chaps. 4–6. Though it takes up the same theme of attack from the north, it presupposes a later time. This recognition allows us to surmise why it came to be placed here. The Temple sermon (7:1–15) and its supplement (7:16–8:3) may be considered the pivot of a larger section of the book, chaps 4–10. Following the warnings of a possible invasion from the north (chaps. 4–6), the Temple sermon establishes that the punishment such a disaster would represent is irrevocable. Chaps. 8–10 indicate that this judgment has been executed. Since this organization would have been motivated by reflection on the events of 587 B.C., the overall organization of the passage mirrors the concerns of the exilic community. Along these lines we can note that in the Temple sermon there is a tension, if not a contradiction, between the open-ended warning that allows for the possibility of repentance and escape (7:5–7) and the announcement that punishment is inevitable (7:13–16). The parallel account of the sermon in 26:4–6 agrees with the former, not the latter, sentiment.

Repetition in the Book of Jeremiah

Even apart from the occurrence of various formulas like “Thus says Yahweh,” the book of Jeremiah contains a great deal of repetition. Frequently, this is at the level of words and phrases (e.g., “to pluck up and break down . . . build and plant,” 1:10; 12:14, 17; 18:7–10; 24:6; 31:28; 42:10; 45:4), but sometimes passages several verses in length are repeated (e.g., 6:13–15 and 8:10–12; 10:12–16 and 51:15–19). Occasionally, whole episodes are reported from different points of view (7:1–15 and 26:1–24; 21:1–12 and 37:3–10; in both these sets the first passage is a prose sermon, the second a biographical narrative).

There is no single explanation that will cover all such repetitions. Sometimes the influence of standard prose conventions of Jeremiah's day or of the Deuteronomists may account for the choice of specific vocabulary. At other times we may be confronted with favorite expressions of the prophet (or some transmitter of his traditions, e.g., 2:13 and 17:13; 5:9, 29 and 9:9; and 11:23b; 23:12b; 48:44b and 49:8b). Some doublets are likely the result of the oral transmission of the oracles (e.g., 6:13–15 and 8:10–12).

It is striking that many such repetitions occur in interpretive prose sections devoted to specifying the causes of the Exile and speculating on the shape of the people's future. That is true, for example, of four of the six passages linked to 1:10 (12:14, 17; 24:6; 31:28; 42:10), as well as of the prohibitions against intercession (7:16; 11:14; 14:11), 9:15b (mirroring 23:15), 15:13–14 (cf. 17:3–4), and 16:14–15 (cf. 23:7–8).

Jer. 22:3 repeats 21:12 in the course of elaborating the short oracle against the king in which the latter verse appears (21:11–14). The compilers of the tradition obviously found some verses to be relevant to more than one context. Thus, a combination of polemic against idols and hymn of praise came to function both as a part of a larger description of Judah's actions (10:12–16) and as an assurance of Yahweh's power to bring about the defeat of Babylon (51:15–19). A statement of assurance (30:10–11) became part of a collection of oracles concerned with the people's future restoration (chaps. 30–31), as well as of an oracle directed against a specific enemy, Egypt (46:27–28). The same words were used to describe Judah's northern attacker (6:22–24) and, later, Babylon's (50:41–43).

Taken as a whole, the repetitions in Jeremiah give us a hint of the long and lively process of collection and compilation that lies behind the present form of the book.

The Broken Covenant

Both the opening formula (“The word that came to Jeremiah from Yahweh”) and its general contents identify Jer. 11:1–17 as a prose sermon. The parallel to 7:1–20 is especially close: both begin with a statement of what is required of the people (7:3–7; 11:2–5), followed by a declaration that they have actually been disobedient (7:8–11; 11:6–10), an announcement that Yahweh will intervene to punish them (7:12–15; 11:11–13), and a prohibition—because of their apostasy—against the prophet's interceding on their behalf (7:16–20; 11:14–17).

Because it is prose, this unit is better described as a “sermon” than an “oracle,” though it contains the elements of a traditional oracle of judgment. Addressed to “the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem,” it accuses them of having failed to obey Yahweh's commands (11:8a, 9–10, 13) and announces the punishment that Yahweh will levy against them (v. 11). Verses 12–13 mirror the language of the oracles (cf. 2:26–28).

The striking feature of the unit is that its argument develops the theme of the covenant relationship between Yahweh and his people. The presence of this issue, plus the fact that the passage contains no date or datable allusion, has led to considerable debate over its setting and reference. There are three main options.

First, Jeremiah might be referring to the covenant made at the time of Josiah's reform (cf. 2 Kings 23:1–3; note that the same participants—men of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem—are mentioned in both). This reference is an appealing interpretation because it would provide us with at least one clear indication of the prophet's attitude toward the reform, but it cannot be proven.

Second, Jeremiah might be referring, in a general way, to the Sinai covenant (rather than to Josiah's specific renewal of it) to provide a context for his condemnation of the people's behavior. Though specific mention of this covenant is somewhat rare in the prophetic books, precedents are available (e.g., Hos. 8:1-3).

Third, many have seen this unit as an example of Deuteronomistic editorial activity. Especially in vv. 3-5, the language corresponds closely to Deuteronomy (cf. v. 3 with Deut. 27:14-26, v. 4 with Deut. 4:20, v. 5 with Deut. 8:18 and 31:20, and vv. 4-5 with Deut. 26:8-9), and, like the Deuteronomistic History, the passage displays a well-developed covenant theology. (On the matter of a "Deuteronomistic edition" of Jeremiah, see Introduction.)

The term "covenant" presents a problem. The occurrences are almost exclusively in prose sections, which are either exilic in date or do not refer to the relationship between Yahweh and his people. The topic in chap. 34 is an agreement on the part of the king and the people of Jerusalem to free their Hebrew slaves (34:8, 10, 13, 15, 18). The context of the occurrence in 22:9 is an exilic interpretation of the causes of the nation's collapse, and in 31:31-34 it is a description of a "new covenant." The remaining occurrences outside of chap. 11 are in passages that refer to the eventual restoration of the people to their land and seem to be products of exilic reflection and hope (3:16; 32:40; 33:20-21, 25; 50:5). The only occurrence in the poetry (14:21) is in a communal lamentation in which the people, anxious to influence Yahweh to act on their behalf, remind him of their long-standing relationship with him.

The fact that the exilic community elaborated the idea of covenant does not require one to view 11:1-13 as purely a product of the Exile. Jer. 7:1-15, and its parallel in chap. 26, show that the prose sermons may derive ultimately from Jeremiah's speeches. As we have seen, the theme in chap. 11 mirrors that of chap. 2, and if we understand v. 8b to refer to the collapse of Israel in 721 B.C. (see commentary above on 2:1-3:5), v. 11 can be taken to refer to the impending fate of Judah.

The sermon proper ends at v. 13. The following prohibition against intercession (vv. 14-17) no longer speaks of the covenant, and probably represents an editorial addition after the fashion of 7:16-8:3.

Though it is likely that the wording of this sermon on the covenant is exilic, it is possible that, in its essentials, it goes back to Jeremiah. One might object that even if it contains no explicit reflections on the catastrophe of 587 B.C., thematically it is quite similar to them. However, such an interpretation of the people's history was in the air during the decades before the Exile. We see it reflected in the pre-exilic Deuteronomists' view of the fall of Israel (2 Kings 17:1-18), as well as in Jeremiah's oracles (e.g., chap. 2; 4:16-18). When Judah and Jerusalem were finally destroyed by the Babylonians, the prophet's analysis was ready to hand as a tool for interpreting what was now past.

11:81-12:6

Jeremiah's First Complaints

In two pairs of speeches, words of Jeremiah are followed by words of Yahweh. The first pair (11:18-23) loosely resembles an oracle of judgment; the second (12:1-6) has the form of a dialogue.

Jeremiah's speech in 11:18-20 begins as a narrative describing how Yahweh revealed to him the plotting of his enemies and ends as a prayer for vengeance against them. This is followed by a speech of Yahweh addressed specifically to "the men of Anathoth," which includes both an accusation against them (11:21) and an announcement that Yahweh will send against them, as punishment for their deeds, an attacking army that none will escape (vv. 22-23). In contrast, 12:1-4 finds Jeremiah speaking directly to Yahweh, complaining about his opponents (even accusing Yahweh of having strengthened them, v. 2a), justifying himself (v. 3a), and requesting vengeance upon them (v. 3b). Yahweh's response is in two parts: a rebuke of the prophet (v. 5) and words of comfort for him in the face of his enemies' attack.

The accusation leveled against the opponents differs in the two sections. In the first there is specific mention of a plot to murder Jeremiah (11:19b), as well as reference to the attempt by the men of Anathoth to use death threats to control his activity as a prophet (v. 21b). In the second the primary reference is not to actions against Jeremiah, but to the people's false sense of security: they do as they please in the confidence that Yahweh will not "see" (which assumes he will not bring about) their "end" (v. 4).

Several difficulties arise if one tries to read these two pairs of speeches as a single unit. One is the difference in the accusations against the prophet's enemies. Another is the tone of warning in 12:6, which seems out of place after the earlier revelations to Jeremiah about his enemies' activity (11:18-19). It is therefore best to assume that they were originally two separate units. Each is a complete communication, with the enemies the focus of the first and the prophet himself the focus of the second.

There are strong echoes of the psalms of lamentation in these complaints. Compare, for example, 11:18-19 with Ps. 56:5; the cries for vengeance in 11:20a and 12:3a with Ps. 26:1-3; 12:1b with Ps. 10:1-4; and 12:4b with Ps. 10:13b. This does not mean that Jeremiah could not have spoken these words, but it does suggest that we cannot assume uncritically that he did (see the Short Essay "Jeremiah's Complaints").

Furthermore, it is impossible to identify specific settings for these two units. The first alludes to an attempt (or series of attempts) by the men of Anathoth to control Jeremiah's activity as a prophet. The second reflects a negative response by his audience to his message that their overconfidence in Yahweh's protection has set them up for disaster.

Given this uncertainty about historical setting and the use within them of stereotypic language, what can one learn from these units about Jeremiah himself? In particular two things seem clear: that in the exercise of his prophetic function he encountered serious opposition and that as a result he sought help from Yahweh.

It is interesting that the source of opposition is specified as the "men of Anathoth" (11:21, 23) and kinsmen (12:6). There is a strong tradition that Anathoth, about three miles northeast of Jerusalem, was a residence of priests (Josh. 21:18; 1 Kings 2:26) and the home village of Jeremiah, himself a member of a priestly family (1:1; 29:27). Chap. 32 shows that not all the prophet's relationships with citizens of Anathoth were strained. What, then, can one make of this opposition? One obvious point is that priests, together with prophets, were prominent among Jeremiah's opponents (see 26:7-9, 11). The probable reason for their hostility was his condemnation of the doctrine of national security based on the royal ideology and his prediction of the destruction of Temple and city. He attacked their vested interests, and their negative response was predictable.

What is most clearly reflected in these units is the process of intermediation, seen from the prophet's point of view. Jeremiah felt himself a man caught in the middle, under attack from both sides. Compelled to function as a prophet, he understood himself to be criticized by Yahweh for lack of proper performance (12:5). Yet he could not perform his function effectively in the face of strong opposition to his legitimacy, for that is the thrust of his opponents' attack: their attempt to silence him with a threat (11:21b) presumes their judgment that he was not a valid prophet and that, as an impostor, he must die (see Deut. 18:20; Jer. 26, and the Short Essay "The Social Dynamics of Prophetic Behavior").

Jeremiah's Complaints

At five places in the book of Jeremiah, one encounters poetry that seems to voice the prophet's personal complaints against both his human enemies and God (11:18-12:6; 15:10-21; 17:14-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-18; there may be a total of seven individual poems here, assuming breaks after 11:18 and 20:13). These poems have been given various names, which in turn have implications for how we are to understand them. To refer to them as "complaints" or "confessions" emphasizes the personal dimension of their contents, suggesting that in them one sees the prophet bemoaning his fate and lashing out against his opponents. To refer to them as "laments," however, emphasizes the stereotypic nature of much in their language and calls to mind their close affinities with the generic prayers of lamentation, which had a place in Israelite ritual.

With respect to form, there are three elements that recur in these poems: descriptions of the adversaries' behavior (11:18-19, 21; 12:6; 15:10; 17:15; 18:18, 22b; 20:7b, 10), appeals to God to act against the adversaries (11:20; 12:1-4; 15:15a; 17:14, 17-18; 18:21-23; 20:11-12), and the prophet's attempts at self-justification (12:3a; 15:11, 15b-18; 17:16; 18:20b; 20:7-9—in the form of a rebuke of his opponents). In three places, God's responses to the complaint are given (11:22-23; 12:5; 15:19-21).

All these elements are characteristic of the individual psalms of lamentation, with which Jeremiah's complaints also share similarities in vocabulary and expression. The latter are too numerous to list, but the following may serve as illustrations: cf. Jer. 11:20a; 12:3a; 20:12 with Ps. 26:1-3; Jer. 15:15 with Ps. 69:7; Jer. 15:17 with Pss. 26:4-5; 88:8-12; Jer. 15:18 with Pss. 38:5-8; 42:10; Jer. 17:18 with Ps. 35:4-6; Jer. 18:18, 22b with Ps. 57:6; Jer. 18:21-22 with Ps. 109:6-15; Jer. 20:7-8 with Ps. 22:6-8; and Jer. 20:10 with Ps. 31:13.

It is probable that the individual laments of Psalms are standard prayers used during the performance of certain Temple rituals. Though no one would deny they were uttered by real persons with real problems, it is pointless to try to discern behind them specific individuals and situations. The Psalms, therefore, attest more to stereotypic patterns than to individual creativity, a conclusion strengthened by the virtual absence of historical allusions in them.

Given the similarity between Jeremiah's complaints and these psalms of lamentation, one must raise the question of the extent to which the form gives us any accurate biographical information about the prophet. There have been arguments at both extremes on this issue. Many have seen a personal crisis of vocation and faith reflected in these poems. A few have argued that such laments could never have broken loose from their liturgical setting and become purely "spiritual" utterances, but must always have remained tied to the liturgy. In this view the prophet of the laments is enacting his role as intercessor between God and the nation, and his distress expresses the people's fate.

Because it emphasizes individual emotions and experience to the exclusion of communal patterns of behavior, the former view seems too "modern." The latter, however, is based on the dubious assumption that forms of speech at home in public rituals could not, or would not, be dislodged and used on other occasions. The truth, no doubt, lies somewhere between these extremes.

Despite important similarities, certain features distinguish Jeremiah's complaints from the lament psalms and encourage the perception that his complaints contain references to the prophet's own experiences. For example, there is the matter of God's answer to the complaint. In the psalms of lamentation, one often finds a sudden shift in tone from distress to confidence: God has heard the prayer of the righteous sufferer and has (or will) come to the rescue (20:11; cf. Pss. 6:9-10; 22:22-31; 56:12-13; 109:30-31). Although one of the responses incorporated into Jeremiah's complaints has a similar tone (11:22-23), the other two are, above all, rebukes of the prophet for his weakness (12:5; 15:19-21). In addition, certain verses seem to have derived from specific experiences of the prophet. In 17:15 the speaker quotes his adversaries, who have taunted him because "the word of the Lord," which he has spoken, has not come to pass, a theme echoed in 20:7-8. The "I" of 18:20 must refer to a single individual who interceded with God on behalf of a larger group, with which he now finds himself in conflict. There is a reference to the adversaries as "men of Anathoth" (11:21-23) and kinsmen (12:6), and we know that Anathoth was Jeremiah's home village (1:1; 32:6-8). Furthermore, it is clear from references to the internalizing and speaking of God's "words" that the speaker was (or was pictured as being) a prophet (15:16, 19; 17:15-16; 20:7-10). On the other hand, the reference in 15:17 (cf. 16:5-9), which seems so personal, actually uses stereotypic language (cf. Pss. 26:4-5; 88:8-9). Hence, it is difficult to have confidence in 15:17 as a reflection of Jeremiah's actual experience.

It should be noted in passing that the social situation suggested by the complaints is entirely realistic. Anthropological field studies of contemporary cultures yield numerous examples of intermediaries contesting with their gods, encountering hostility in their audiences, and suffering in their private lives the pervasive (and often negative) effects of the demands of their role.

It is uncertain whether the present order of the complaints is chronological. What can be said is that the picture they present of the prophet's situation becomes increasingly dismal. The first three contain answers, albeit somewhat harsh, from God, but none thereafter do. The last has the tone of abject despair (20:14-18).

Other prophets faced opposition (e.g., Amos 7:10-17; Isa. 8:9-22), and one may assume they felt frustrated. But there are no complaints attributed to them. So, it is not entirely clear why these poems, attributed to Jeremiah, were even preserved. Their picture of a threatened and complaining prophet has been both puzzling and disconcerting and has frequently led to theological explanations: they illustrate the truth that God chooses and empowers just such persons to serve him; or they reveal the plight of one of the last of Israel's prophets, who had experienced through his own suffering and disappointment the hopelessness of actually carrying out the prophetic mission. Whatever the truth of such explanations, it will be more in harmony with the view of the book and its contexts sketched in the Introduction to ask what social factors might be involved in their creation and preservation.

One may start with the assumption that the picture the complaints present of a man who suffered both with and at the hands of his contemporaries has some basis in actual experience. That one who suffers might publicly complain is no more than one would expect. That in doing so he would utilize his culture's standard vocabulary of complaint is not surprising. Those complaints that were formalized as poems may originally have been part of the rhetorical arsenal used by Jeremiah in the conflict with his prophetic opponents: they would certainly (from his point of view) establish a stark contrast between his faithfulness to Yahweh's difficult commission and the easy task of prophets who spoke only what the people wanted to hear, a message of peace.

As the tradition developed, the complaints must have been preserved, at least in part, because they were attributed to Jeremiah. But it also seems clear that they fit well the contexts in which the book of Jeremiah came into being. The picture they give of suffering would have been useful to persons trying to make sense of the events of the times, whether in the prophet's day or during the Exile. The "lessons" to be learned from them (e.g., that in such times even a prophet must suffer and may become discouraged and angry, or that God's anger with the people had become so intense that it carried away innocent and guilty alike) no doubt differed from person to person. But to emphasize only the biographical dimension of these complaints is to miss their larger message and that of the book.

Yahweh's Response to Disaster

The unit 12:7-17 has two parts, vv. 7-13 and 14-17. The first may be considered a lament, not because of the language it uses (in contrast to Jeremiah's complaints), but on the basis of the underlying sympathy expressed in v. 7 and in the repeated phrase "my heritage" (vv. 7, 8, 9). We learn at the beginning of the lament both that Yahweh has abandoned his heritage (v. 7) and his reason for doing so, namely, the people have displayed hostility toward him analogous to that of a wild beast, v. 8. What follows is essentially an elaboration on the first issue, which uses a series of metaphors and describes the enemies as wild beasts (v. 9, accepting Holaday's translation of the first phrase: "Does the hyena look greedily on my possession for me?") and as shepherds (= kings; see 2:8; 23:1-4). These have brought destruction upon the land of Judah (vv. 10-11a, 12). The account seems to assume that this devastation has already occurred. In addition, reference to those who have not learned the proper lesson from the events (v. 11b) suggests that the catastrophe referred to may have been the military harassment of Judah that culminated in Nebuchadnezzar's first conquest of Jerusalem (597 B.C.; see 2 Kings 24:1-2, 10-16). Verse 13 may be a reference to drought.

In the second section, 12:14-17, there is a change from poetry to prose and from reflection on Judah's fall to an address directed at its neighbors. The theme is the restoration of Judah and, after suitable punishment ("plucked them up," vv. 14, 15), of its former enemies as well. The "plucking up" recalls 1:10, though as applied to Judah in v. 14, its meaning is reversed: that nation will be rescued from captivity. This restoration of Judah's enemies is conditional, depending upon their conversion to the religion of Yahweh (vv. 16-17). The latter is symbolized by the swearing of oaths in Yahweh's name. Such oaths seem to have been common (see 1 Kings 1:29; 2:24), and the assumption here is that the specific god mentioned in them could be taken as an indication of where one's religious loyalties lay. The passage is connected thematically with vv. 7-13 (note the word "inheritance" in vv. 14, 15), but the viewpoint is clearly exilic. Judah's punishment had been accomplished. Hope for restoration was the logical sequel to preceding laments.

A Vision of Destruction

Jeremiah is instructed by Yahweh to purchase and wear a linen undergarment and, subsequently, to make two trips, one for the purpose of burying it and the other for the purpose of retrieving it. The unit concludes with an interpretation of this series of actions (vv. 8-11). The description is highly pictorial and is often considered to be an account either of a symbolic action or of a vision.

The plausibility of the former view depends in part on the location of the place to which the prophet was sent. The text reads "Euphrates," but a round trip from Jerusalem to that river would involve a journey of approximately seven hundred miles. To circumvent this problem, it has been suggested by some scholars that the reference is to "Parah," a spring some six and a half miles to the northeast of Jerusalem, a manageable journey. But "Euphrates" may be the better reading, since there is another reason to believe that we should not consider this text to represent a symbolic action: the account has the form of a dialogue between Jeremiah and Yahweh; nowhere does it mention an audience before whom the actions were performed and to whom the accompanying words were addressed (see the Short Essay "Jeremiah's Symbolic Actions").

It is best to see this passage as a vision report. The dialogue form provides the key to this understanding (cf. 1:11-12, 13-16; Amos 7:1-9; 8:1-4). No audience is necessary. The vision communicates to the prophet Yahweh's attitude about the current situation, which can then be taken up into the proclamations he delivers to the people. The message is clear enough. The undergarment—purchased and worn, hidden away and spoiled—is a metaphor for the intimate relationship that existed between Yahweh and Judah, which the latter's rebellious actions have brought to ruin (v. 11). Indeed, there is a double sense in the picture of the garment's being "spoiled": the former intimacy is no longer possible, and the nation will be made to suffer as a result (v. 9). The mention of the Euphrates in this connection is entirely appropriate and calls to mind the earlier oracles concerning a foe from that northern region who would despoil (or had already) the Judean countryside. One may observe that the action depicted preserves the main parts of an oracle of judgment, an accusation and an announcement of punishment.

More About Judah's Fate

The unit 13:12-17 contains four short sections on the theme Judah's fate. The first, vv. 12-14, opens with the prophet quoting a proverb that seems to suggest that prosperity and good times are the norm. The anticipated response of the people suggests that this saying expresses their conviction. But Jeremiah reinterprets the proverb by transferring it to a different context—from social drinking, symbolizing the good life, to drunkenness, providing a metaphor for the disaster that will befall Judah (cf. 25:15-29, and also Ezek. 23:33, where an explicit reference is made to the fall of Samaria).

Jer. 13:15-17 contains a general call for the people to respond to Yahweh's words, followed by a threat about the dire consequences of not doing so. Failure to respond will cause the prophet to weep, since "Yahweh's flock is taken captive." The latter phrase suggests a date after 597 B.C.

There follows an address to the "queen mother" (vv. 18-19), who might be either the senior wife of a ruling king (beyond childbearing age and perhaps no longer an active conjugal partner; e.g., Bathsheba in her later years) or a widow and the mother of the ruling king. The queen mother, a person of importance in Judean society, seems to have functioned mainly as a counselor (see 1 Kings 1:11-40). The oracle assumes that a deportation has already occurred, perhaps that of 597 B.C. Note that 2 Kings 24:12 specifically mentions the queen mother among the exiles.

The longest section, vv. 20-27, returns to the theme of the enemy from the north. The dispersal of the "flock" (v. 20; two Hebrew words for "flock" are used) may contain a double entendre, suggesting the scattering both of the Judean army (contrast the reference to the strength of the attacking "shepherds" and "flocks" in 6:3) and of the population (see 23:1-3) as well as the loss of countryside and livestock (cf. 5:17). Use of birth pangs as a figure for acute distress suffered in the face of impending attack recalls 6:24. The question "Why?" (v. 22) sounds like an attempt to explain the Exile, but this interrogation could be a device for presenting an accusation against the people. Certainly the answer to this question, that they have "forgotten" Yahweh and "trusted in a lie" (25b), corresponds to a main theme of Jeremiah's proclamation (see the Short Essay "Jeremiah's Struggle Against 'Falsehood'"). It also provides a plausible conceptual framework for the attitude of the people mirrored in vv. 12-14. The accusation of "harlotry" recalls 3:2, 9.

It is difficult to discern a specific original setting for these sections. The last may come from the period before the first deportation of Judeans to Babylon, but it is improbable that the others do. Together they form part of a rather loose assemblage of oracles and interpretations that begins in 12:7.

14:1-15:9

Reflections on the People's Lamentations

The heading of this passage (14:1) announces that the topic is a drought. The first sections may in fact reflect a real drought, but later in the unit the people's fate is described in terms of military defeat. However, both drought and warfare result in the destruction of the people, and both are susceptible to the same interpretation.

The unit begins with a description of the effects of a drought (14:2-6), which is followed by a confession and plea addressed to Yahweh by the people (vv. 7-9) and his response to them (v. 10). The focus then shifts to Jeremiah; vv. 11-16 record (in prose) a dialogue between him and Yahweh and vv. 17-18 his lamentation over what has happened to his people. Following another segment of communal lamentation (vv. 19-22), Yahweh comments to Jeremiah on the futility of interceding for such a people (15:1-4). The final section is reminiscent of an oracle of judgment (vv. 5-9). From 14:11 on, references to the nation's fate are dominated by images of war: the standard pair "sword/famine," or a variation on it, occurs six times (14:12, 15, 16, 18; 15:2; cf. 15:3, 9); 14:18a suggests a city under siege; 14:19b (= 8:15) and 15:6b-9 mirror a military attack. Only 14:22a mentions drought.

Though it can be segmented into smaller sections that differ in style and content, there are also indications that this passage should be treated as a single unit. First, Jerusalem is the focus of attention (14:2; 15:5; cf. 14:17). Second, the tone of lamentation is pervasive. Taken together, 14:2-6 and 7-9 display the standard form of a psalm of lamentation (description of distress, vv. 2-6; confession, v. 7; plea for help, vv. 8-9a; expression of confidence, v. 9b), and vv. 19-22 have the same elements in identical order. Verse 7, especially, mirrors the language of the Psalms (cf. Pss. 25:11; 32:5; 38:18; 79:9; 109:21; 143:11). Jer. 14:17-18 and 15:5 also echo the language of lamentation. Third, the problems of intercession on behalf of the people (14:11-12; 15:1) and false prophets are each dealt with twice. This observation may offer a clue as to why several of the smaller units were combined into the larger text.

The lamentations were occasioned by disasters—drought and war—that the text views as past occurrences. The responsibility for these events is placed directly on the people (14:10, 14-16, 18b; 15:4, 6), who themselves are pictured as acknowledging it (in the "confession" section of their laments, 14:7, 20). The fact that the people engage in pleas to Yahweh for assistance, however, indicates that they did not view the breach between themselves and Yahweh as pessimistically as the prophet did (cf. 14:11-12; 15:1).

One can only speculate about the precise setting of the original segments. The condemnation of Jeremiah's prophetic opponents (14:13-16) would fit the intensity of the prophetic struggle, which characterized the years 597–587 B.C. (see chaps. 27–29). Jer. 14:13 may even represent an attempt by Jeremiah to excuse the people's behavior by laying the blame for it at the feet of his prophetic opponents. On the other hand, there are some indications of the context of the unit in its present form. The expansion of the standard list, "sword, famine, and pestilence," to include "captivity" (15:2) and the reference to the sins of King Manasseh (15:4; a theme of the exilic Deuteronomists, see 2 Kings 23:26–27) suggest exilic reflections on the fall of Judah. If 14:18a refers to a siege of Jerusalem, that of 588–587 is the most likely candidate (it lasted about eighteen months, and during it there was famine in the city, 2 Kings 25:3). Such a reference would provide another indication of an exilic date for this text.

Taken as a whole, this unit should be viewed as a literary construction, a small, independent collection of Jeremiah traditions. That it is not a ritual text utilized on the occasion of a national fast for seeking aid in the face of drought or enemy attack is indicated by the form of the first lament (the description of distress in 14:2–6 is in the third person, not the first, as we would expect in a prayer), by the dialogue between the prophet and Yahweh that appears parenthetically in the middle of it, and by the exilic interpretations it contains. Its presence at this particular point in the book of Jeremiah is perhaps best explained by the proximity of other lamentations, the prophet's own complaints found in 11:18–12:6 and 15:10–21.

Complaints and Interpretations

At the beginning and near the end of the unit 15:10–17:27, one finds additional examples of Jeremiah's complaints to Yahweh (15:10–21; 17:14–18). Their theme is persecution, the result of the people's hostile reaction to his prophetic message (15:15b–17; 17:15–16; cf. 11:21). These complaints bracket a miscellaneous collection of materials that focus on that message, justifying it both theoretically and by reference to the actual destruction of the nation. At the end there is a section on the Sabbath, which may be understood as a priestly application of the lesson of the Exile to the postexilic situation (17:19–27).

15:10–21, Two Complaints. This unit consists of two complaints (vv. 10–14, 15–21) cast in the form of dialogues (see the Short Essay "Jeremiah's Complaints"). Verses 10–14 present some special difficulties. First, Jeremiah laments his birth because everyone makes light of (or, curses) him. Yet the reason given for this reaction, that he has been neither a lender nor a borrower, sounds curiously weak by comparison to the rationale for opposition supplied in vv. 15b–17; 17:15–16; and 20:7–10. Second, vv. 11–12 are difficult to translate. The Hebrew text makes it clear that the speaker is Yahweh (v. 11 begins, "Yahweh said"), and the gist of what follows is that he has (or will) protect Jeremiah in times of distress (cf. NEB; the RSV conveys an entirely different sense). Third, in vv. 13–14 the addressee shifts abruptly, as Yahweh utters a threat against the people. In the earlier complaints, there were responses both to the prophet (12:5–6) and to the people (11:21–23), but these were not directly connected. Since Yahweh's response to the prophet's complaint (vv. 11–12) completes the dialogue, it seems likely that the following threat, mirroring as it does the destruction of Jerusalem, conveys exilic interpretation, the purpose of which is to vindicate the prophet's earlier message.

In the speech that begins the second dialogue, Jeremiah laments the fact that he is persecuted and protests his own righteousness (vv. 15–17), claiming that his dedication to Yahweh's word has made him a social outcast. He ends with the accusation that (contrary to vv. 11–12) Yahweh has not protected him (v. 18). Yahweh's response combines insistence that Jeremiah "return" to his task (v. 19) with an assurance of protection (vv. 20–21) in language reminiscent of 1:18–19. This second complaint has close affinities with some of the Psalms. Like the earlier complaints, it seems to reveal a prophet caught, by the nature of his task; between an insistent God and a hostile audience.

16:1–13, Symbolic Actions. This section contains reports of three symbolic actions (see the Short Essay "Jeremiah's Symbolic Actions"), followed by an interpretation that places them in the context of the Exile. In the first (vv. 1–4), the prophet is instructed to remain unmarried and childless, since the coming warfare will be utterly destructive of families ("sword," "famine"). In the second (vv. 5–7), he is told not to participate in mourning rites. The rationale for this prohibition is that Yahweh intends to remove his "peace" from the land, with the result that death (in war) will become so widespread as to undermine normal mourning customs. The third (vv. 8–9) incorporates a prohibition against participation in festive social gatherings, since Yahweh is about to bring "mirth" and "gladness" in the land to an end (elsewhere in the book this language is associated with the fall of Judah to the Babylonians; cf. 7:34; 25:10).

What follows by way of interpretation of these actions (vv. 10–13) is a standard piece of exilic reflection on the causes of the nation's demise. These verses assume that that national catastrophe has already occurred. In addition, they provide an explanation for it that justifies the suffering Yahweh inflicted on his people. These verses may have been included at precisely this location in the book because of their thematic connection with the preceding complaint (15:17).

16:14-17:4, Hope and Doom. Parts of this section alternate between words of hope and of doom in a manner reminiscent of Isaiah 9-11. Jer. 16:14-15, a repetition of 23:7-8, voices the exiles' hope for restoration to the homeland. Verses 16-18 evoke an image of the completeness of the people's defeat and give the standard reason for it, apostasy. The chapter's only poetic verses, 19-20, take up a theme of thanksgiving (v. 19a; cf. 2 Sam. 22:3 and Ps. 18:2) and deal with rival gods in a fashion similar to 10:1-16 and 14:22. Jer. 16:21 and 17:1-4 are threats, the first quite general and the second mentioning apostasy (v. 2; cf. 2:20) and apparently assuming the Exile (v. 4; cf. 16:13). Thus, this section is dominated by two of the main concerns of the exilic community: to identify the cause of its present situation and to contemplate a more favorable future.

17:5-13, Wisdom Poetry. This section, a collection of wisdom psalms, comes as a surprise. There is a remarkable similarity between vv. 5-8 and Psalm 1, and vv. 9-10 have parallels in Ps. 26:1-3 and Jer. 11:20a and 12:3a. Verse 11 is a proverb on the theme of the impermanence of unjustly acquired wealth, and vv. 12-13 pair praise of Yahweh with the observation that all who forsake him, "the fountain of living water" (cf. 2:13), will perish. The underlying theme is that evil will inevitably be punished and good rewarded. We can thus think of these fragments as expressing an explanation of the nation's demise. This and the presence of the key word "heart" (vv. 1, 5, 9, 10) may account for the inclusion and the present location of this collection in the book.

17:14-18, Complaint. Like other complaints, this one contains an appeal to Yahweh for help (vv. 14, 17-18), a description of the adversaries' behavior (v. 15), and a self-justification (v. 16). This time, however, there is no response from Yahweh. The opponents' hostile derision centers on the fact that the words Jeremiah has uttered against the nation have not come to pass (Ezek. 12:21-28 echoes a similar problem), suggesting a date sometime before 597 B.C. At least some of Jeremiah's audience was no longer willing to take him seriously, to acknowledge his authority as a prophet of Yahweh, which would have made his social position precarious indeed (see the Short Essay "The Social Dynamics of Prophetic Behavior"), and it is easy to conceive of such a social setting giving rise to a complaint like this one. It is worth noting that by way of self-justification Jeremiah denies responsibility for the offensive content of his message (v. 16). He was, again, a man caught in the middle.

17:19-27, Sabbath Admonition. This extended reflection on keeping the Sabbath is an anomaly in the prophetic literature. It begins with an accusation that the people have failed to heed the warning to keep the Sabbath (vv. 20-23). A conditional statement then follows, to the effect that, if the people again observe the Sabbath, the Davidic dynasty will be perpetuated, Jerusalem will remain inhabited, and the broader Judean population will continue to worship in the Jerusalem temple. Infraction of the Sabbath ordinance, however, will lead to the destruction of Jerusalem. Some of the language is characteristic of the Jeremiah tradition (vv. 20, 25: "men of Judah, inhabitants of Jerusalem" occurs fourteen times in Jeremiah; see 11:2, 9), and some is reminiscent of Amos (v. 27: the kindling of a devouring fire; cf. Amos 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 14; 2:2).

The institution of the Sabbath seems to have existed in Israel from a comparatively early date (→ Sabbath). There are laws requiring its observance (e.g., Exod. 20:8-11; 23:12), and it is mentioned in historical narratives (2 Kings 4:23) and prophecy (Amos 8:5; Isa. 1:13). But this particular interpretation of the Sabbath's importance appears to be postexilic (cf. Neh. 13:15-18). The passage thus appears to be a rather late priestly attempt to defend current religious and political practice by linking failure to observe the Sabbath to the national catastrophe of 587 B.C. and by justifying the absence of a king in postexilic Israel.

This entire unit (15:10-17:27) is, then, a mixed collection of prophetic complaints and reflections on the prophet's and the nation's fate. The materials come from a variety of times and historical contexts, from before the Exile until after the restoration of the people to their land. What the various sections have in common is their struggle to understand events.

18:1-20:18 Narratives and Complaints

18:1-12, The Potter. The heading identifies this narrative, in which Jeremiah draws an analogy between a potter's activity and Yahweh's, as one of the prose sermons. The description of the potter at work (vv. 1-4) demonstrates that the artisan has total control over the clay with which he works, and that is the point of the analogy: Yahweh has the power to do as he wishes with his people (vv. 5-6). In vv. 7-10, however, the focus changes abruptly. Instead of the "house of Israel," the subject is any "nation," and Yahweh's power to build is explicitly paired with his ability to destroy (see 1:10). Verse 11 returns to the original train of thought. Its threat of punishment directed against Judah can be viewed as an application of the general principle stated in v. 6, and this is followed by a call to repentance (cf. 7:5-7). The people's response (v. 12) occurs in the form of a quotation. The language is extremely self-incriminatory, suggesting an exilic interpretation, the intent of which is to blame the nation's collapse on the behavior of its citizens.

Thus, the narrative contains several layers of interpretation. There is the original prose sermon (vv. 1-6 plus 11), which seems to preserve the gist of one of Jeremiah's public addresses (see commentary above on 11:1-17). The "quotation" is probably exilic and has the effect of absolving both Yahweh and Jeremiah of responsibility for Judah's fall to the Babylonians. As for vv. 7-10, concern with the conversion of other nations seems more appropriate to the late exilic or the postexilic periods (cf. Isa. 42:6; Zech. 2:10-12); the verses are clearly not Deuteronomistic (cf. Deut. 4:19-20).

18:13-17, Israel's Apostasy. The condemnation of "the virgin Israel" expressed in these verses develops the rather vague self-incrimination of v. 12. The basic accusation is apostasy. Rhetorical questions, which expect the answer no, contrast the constancy of nature with the inconsistency of the people. Together with the reference to exchanging Yahweh for other gods (vv. 13-15a), they are reminiscent of oracles earlier in the book (cf. 2:9-13, 32; 3:21), as is v. 16a (cf. 4:7). However, though in 4:7 it is an attacking enemy that makes the land desolate, v. 16a holds the people responsible. This and the fact that v. 16b expresses the same sentiment as Lam. 2:15-16 (post-587 B.C.) and v. 17a mirrors the prose of 4:11 suggest that 18:13-17 may be a product of exilic interpretive activity.

18:18-23, Complaint. These verses make up another of Jeremiah's complaints. Verse 18, quoting an anonymous "they," describes the behavior of his adversaries that motivated the complaint: angered by his announcement that the activity of certain elite groups in Judean society (priests, wise men, prophets) would come to an end, they were plotting against him. Since the downfall of the nation is the most obvious context in which such an end could come about, we may infer that the message to which they were reacting spoke of Judah's destruction.

The other parts of a traditional lamentation follow in rapid succession. Verse 19a is an appeal for aid. Verses 19b-20a—"Hearken to the voice of my adversaries, 'Will evil be repaid for good?' For they dug a pit for my life"—describe the adversaries' behavior, and v. 20b is a self-justification. Verses 21-22a are another appeal for aid, this time in the form of a call for the destruction of his opponents' families. The siege imagery employed is a variation of a favorite triad, "sword, famine, and pestilence" (occurring in some combination twenty-nine times in Jeremiah). There are echoes here of an earlier accusation against the people that they had spoken falsely by claiming that Yahweh would "do nothing" and that, therefore, they would not "see sword or famine" (5:12), as well as echoes of Yahweh's answer to the first complaint: he will punish the prophet's enemies by giving their young men to the sword and their children to famine. Verse 22b repeats v. 20a, and the complaint ends with yet another appeal for aid: Yahweh knows of their plots against Jeremiah, and therefore should overthrow, not forgive, them.

Following an introduction in narrative prose (v. 18), the complaint focuses on the adversaries' behavior and the appeal for Yahweh's action against them. There is little by way of self-justification. The claim that Jeremiah's enemies are plotting to kill him (vv. 18a, 23a) picks up the theme of the first complaint (11:19, 21) and is in harmony with more general references to persecution in 15:15 and 17:18.

What was behind such extreme behavior? We can infer from the "quotation" (v. 20a) that Jeremiah's adversaries were convinced of the correctness of their own position and actions, which they believed were in the best interests of national security and destined for success (cf. 5:12). Jeremiah's attack, alluded to in v. 18, denied both contentions (see the Short Essay "Jeremiah's Struggle Against 'Falsehood'"). In their view, his attack was treasonous. They were angered by what he said (11:21) and were convinced it was false prophecy (17:15). This was not simply a religious dispute, but a political one as well. In the last decades before the catastrophe of 587 B.C., there were two identifiable political factions in Judah, and the prophet identified himself with one of them (see commentary below on chaps. 27-29). The plots against the prophet can be easily explained in the context of the ongoing dispute between these factions. Thus though the complaint is grounded in episodes of the prophet's life, it also offers more clues about prophecy as a social process than it does specific biographical information (see the Short Essay "The Social Dynamics of Prophetic Behavior").

19:1-20:6, Symbolic Action and Persecution. This biographical narrative describes one of the prophet's symbolic actions and an official response to it. Though it is presented in the form of instructions from Yahweh to Jeremiah, 19:14 implies that the action was carried out.

Jeremiah was told to buy a ceramic pot, assemble a group composed of elders of the people and senior priests, go with them to a valley south of Jerusalem (→ Hinnom, Valley of), and proclaim there a specific message addressed to the "kings of Judah and the inhabitants of Judah." The latter contains a general threat of impending disaster (v. 3), an accusation that the people have been guilty of apostasy and of offering child sacrifices (vv. 4–5; → Topheth), and a more specific threat that "this place" (the valley, but by extension the city as well) will be attacked and, after experiencing the horrors of a siege, defeated (vv. 6–9). The comment that this defeat will make void the plans of Judah and Jerusalem can be seen as a reference to the foreign policy of Jeremiah's opponents.

The symbolic action itself follows. Jeremiah breaks the pot and announces that "this people and this city" will be irreparably broken because of their apostasy. The idea that the city will be made "like Topheth" harks back to the destruction and burial mentioned earlier (vv. 7–9, 11) and also to the defiling of the religious site itself during Josiah's reform (2 Kings 23:10).

The reference to child sacrifice (vv. 4–5) is puzzling. It could indicate that such offerings, attested in the time of Manasseh (2 Kings 21:6), had resumed after the death of Josiah. This is uncertain, however. Jer. 44:16–18 suggests that Josiah's reforms of worship persisted after his death, and the force of vv. 12–13 seems to rely on Topheth's still being defiled. It is conceivable that vv. 2b–9 are an exilic interpretation elaborating on the accusation and threat from the vantage point of what had already happened. Support for this view is provided by the close correspondence between vv. 4–5 and 2 Kings 24:3–4—the exilic Deuteronomists' description of Manasseh's sins.

Following this incident, Jeremiah went to the court of the Temple and delivered a summary of his threat before a wider audience (vv. 14–15). This occasioned a response by Pashhur, a Temple priest and administrator, who beat Jeremiah, placed him in stocks, and put him on public display (20:1–2). The prophet's response was to rename the priest "Terror on every side" (v. 3; cf. 6:25, where this phrase describes the people's response to an invasion from the north, and 20:10, where it describes Jeremiah's response to his enemies' actions). The name symbolizes the fact that Pashhur will be a "terror" both to himself and to his friends: they and the whole land will suffer death, plundering, and exile at the hands of the Babylonians (vv. 4–6). The assertion that Pashhur has misled his friends (v. 6b) is the key to this condemnation. His reaction to Jeremiah's message was based on a partisan political position, supported, of course, by an appropriate religious ideology. From his own standpoint Jeremiah was convinced that this position would lead to disaster.

Jeremiah's Symbolic Actions

In addition to prophets' words, one sometimes encounters reports of prophetic deeds unusual enough to merit special attention. Within the OT, such "acts of power" can be separated into two categories. There are, first of all, acts that are within the capabilities of any individual to perform. These are often referred to as "symbolic actions." Jeremiah's breaking of a pot (19:1–15) and Isaiah's walking the streets naked and barefoot (Isa. 20) are examples of actions of this type. Second, there are actions, often referred to as "miracles," that appear to go beyond what we normally think it possible for human beings to do. Isaiah's causing the shadow on the sundial to move backward (Isa. 38:7–8 = 2 Kings 20:9–11) and the stories of Elijah and Elisha recalling the dead to life (1 Kings 17:17–24; 2 Kings 4:32–37) are examples. In the OT, most actions of this type are attributed to Elijah and Elisha. The attempt to understand these accounts does not depend upon belief that such things actually happened.

Although there are no "miracles" in Jeremiah, there are a number of "symbolic actions": his refraining from marriage, mourning rites, and feasting (16:1–9), his breaking of the ceramic pot (19:1–13), his wearing of yoke-bars (27:1–22), his buying a field in Anathoth and protecting the deed (32:6–15), his setting wine before the Rechabites (35:1–19), and his sending a book to Babylon with instructions that it be read aloud and then destroyed (51:59–64). Some might also wish to include the prophet's "eating" of Yahweh's "word" (15:16) and his carrying a "cup of wine" around for various persons to drink (25:15–29), though the second, especially, seems unlikely to refer to an actual occurrence. The account of how Jeremiah hid stones in the pavement at the entrance of the pharaoh's palace (43:8–13), though in character with the other symbolic actions, seems to come from an exilic editor who knew of Nebuchadnezzar's campaign into Egypt in 568 B.C. In addition, the book provides accounts of symbolic actions performed by three other persons, Hananiah (who broke the yoke-bars that Jeremiah had been wearing, 28:10–11), Pashhur (who beat Jeremiah and put him in the stocks, 20:1–2), and King Jehoiakim (who cut and burned the scroll containing Jeremiah's oracles as it was read to him, 36:23). Pashhur's action has the special feature that it apparently involved the exercise of legal authority.

Though there are no miracles reported in the book of Jeremiah, an examination of stories of that type can give us some insight into the symbolic actions. Frequently, the miracle stories in the Elijah and Elisha narratives speak of a response by those who witness the act. Whether these witnesses are inclined to be well disposed or ill disposed toward the prophet, the nature of the response is always essentially the same, namely, to acknowledge the prophet's power and, therefore, his authority (see 1 Kings 17:24; 18:39; 2 Kings 1:13-14; 2:15; 4:37).

It is worth noting that acts of this type are relatively common in shamanistic performances of certain native North American and Arctic peoples (e.g., Paiute, Kwakiutl, Tungus), as well as those of other types of intermediaries (e.g., shaking tent "conjurers" of the Ojibwa). In these contexts, one of the major functions of such acts is to engender belief in the power and authority of the practitioner. Even where these "miracles" are widely known by members of the audience to be sleight of hand and where some of the audience is skeptical of the ritual, the fluid performance of such acts enhances the chances of acceptance for the intermediary. This structural similarity suggests that the accounts of Elijah's and Elisha's "miracles," whatever the reality of the events that underlie them, may have played an important role in the process by which these prophets gained acceptance.

The accounts of symbolic acts in Jeremiah are simple and fairly regular in structure: the action is performed before an audience and is accompanied by words. The act is usually performed first, with the words following as an interpretation, but this is not always the case (see 19:1-13; 51:59-64). Sometimes a response is noted, and when this is the case it is always negative. The context suggests that the act and accompanying words are integral parts of a rhetorical situation. Their aim is forceful and convincing communication.

Symbolic actions have sometimes been understood as quasi-magical acts in which the prophet sought to set into motion that effect which his words anticipated. Others have seen them from a more theological perspective, namely, as symbolizing the guaranteed result of Yahweh's intended action, which had been revealed to the prophet. Observations about the miracle stories suggest a somewhat different way of understanding them. Prophets were dependent upon public support. They could not function without some measure of it (see the Short Essay "The Social Dynamics of Prophetic Behavior"). Moreover, continuing support could not be taken for granted. In the prophets' constant struggle to be accepted by and make an impact upon their audience, fluid actions reinforcing and reinforced by words would force a reaction and might predispose some toward acceptance of prophet and message. Symbolic actions may be seen as part of the rhetorical repertoire by which the prophet sought to gain the assent and support of an audience.

20:7-18, Complaints. These verses contain the last two of Jeremiah's complaints. The first (vv. 7-13) begins with a self-justification (vv. 7-9), followed by a description of the adversaries' behavior (v. 10), an expression of confidence (v. 11) and appeal for aid (v. 12; 11:20 is a close parallel), and a closing expression of confidence (v. 13). The latter has seemed to some to be too optimistic to stem from the prophet himself, but, given v. 11, it makes more sense to attribute it to him than to an exilic editor. Such a person, after all, would have known that neither Jeremiah nor the nation had been delivered.

What may one know about the dynamics underlying and giving rise to this complaint? Jeremiah accuses Yahweh of forcing him into a position where he is a laughingstock and an object of mockery (v. 7); Yahweh is requiring him to deliver a message of doom (cf. 17:16) that events of history have so far failed to confirm. The reaction of his audience to that message is stated somewhat more generally than in other complaints, but it fits the picture gained from the earlier ones (see commentary above on 18:18-23): they wish to eliminate him and his rival message about the nation's future. Both Jeremiah (along with his allies, for we may view him as a spokesman for his party) and his opponents were confronting the question of how the nation's future might best be secured. The rival positions had political and military implications, and the intensity of the conflict mirrors the seriousness of the stakes.

The Pashhur event seems not to have occasioned this complaint. These two episodes may have been placed in close proximity because they share a key phrase, "terror on every side" (20:3, 10).

Self-curses like the one that follows (vv. 14-18) are not, strictly speaking, part of the lamentation form (see the Short Essay "Jeremiah's Complaints"), but they certainly represent a "complaint" in the broad sense. Its obvious difference from the preceding complaint is the tone of abject despair, and its inclusion here has the effect of turning confidence into gloom. The most obvious interpretation of the curse is psychological. In this case, v. 18 would refer back to vv. 7–13 (and even to 1:5): Jeremiah's despair was the result of his impossible task. At the same time, v. 16 may suggest rage over the fate of the nation and thus hint at a social element in the curse.

Those who collected and preserved the Jeremiah traditions knew, of course, of the nation's demise. They were in a position to understand the sufferings of the prophet in a broader historical context. That they set this gloomy outburst at the end of the entire series of his complaints can scarcely have been an accident.

The Fate of Kings and of the Monarchy

The unit 21:1–23:8 is held together by a common subject, the kings of Judah, and a common theme, the royal ideal of justice and righteousness (21:12; 22:3, 13–17; 23:5–6; cf. Ps. 72). At its core is an orderly sequence of oracles, which begins with a general condemnation addressed to the “house of David” (21:11–22:9), progresses through utterances directed at specific kings (the arrangement is chronological—22:10–12, Jehoahaz; 22:13–19, Jehoiakim; 22:24–30, Jehoiachin), and ends with a general cry of “woe” concerning the deeds of the “shepherds” (kings) that becomes a promise of restoration for the nation (23:1–8).

The narrative about Zedekiah with which the unit begins is out of chronological sequence, but given the point of view of the exilic collectors and arrangers of the Jeremiah tradition, its position is logical. For them, the downfall of the nation and its last king was the decisive event to be recalled and understood, and they gave it pride of place in this collection dealing with the fate of the monarchy. It is worth noting that the sequence of kings addressed begins with Jehoahaz (609 B.C.). Josiah (640–609) is referred to as an exemplar of the royal ideal (22:15–16) but not addressed.

21:1–10, Jeremiah Responds to Zedekiah.

This prose sermon has striking similarities with the biographical narrative in chaps. 37–38. In both, Zedekiah sends emissaries to Jeremiah (one, a priest named Zephaniah, appears in both accounts) to ask him to intercede with Yahweh, and, in both, his reply makes it clear that Jerusalem is doomed (it will be “burned with fire,” 21:10; 37:10). The counsel to citizens to flee the city (21:8–10) appears almost verbatim in 38:2–3. There are some differences in detail. Jer. 21:2, 4 presupposes that a Babylonian siege of the city is in progress, whereas 37:5, 11 speaks of the siege having been lifted. In addition, the specific attention given to Zedekiah's fate (21:7) does not appear in chaps. 37–38. The setting of 21:1–10 must, therefore, be the period either just before or just after the temporary interruption in the Babylon siege of Jerusalem occasioned by Nebuchadnezzar's response to an Egyptian military challenge in the winter and spring of 587 B.C.

Jeremiah's reply to Zedekiah (vv. 3–7) was brutal: the city would be captured and he and the other survivors killed, for Yahweh himself was taking up arms against them. This prophecy seems not to have been literally fulfilled; Zedekiah was humiliated, blinded, and led away into captivity (cf. 2 Kings 25:4–7; Jer. 39:4–7). According to Jer. 52:11, he died there. This, plus the fact that the section is pure judgment with no accusation at all (as one might expect if the intent were to explain the nation's fall), suggests that the book here presents the essentials of a message addressed to Zedekiah, a logical extension of Jeremiah's straightforward statement on foreign policy reported in chap. 27.

The prophet's encouragement for the people to defect (vv. 8–10) recalls his own attempt to leave the city and undermines the credibility of his protestation to his captor that he was not deserting to the Babylonians (cf. 37:11–15).

21:11–22:9, Kingship. This general condemnation of Judean kings is composed of a matched pair of statements, the second of which (in prose) is longer and more elaborate than the first. Each begins with an address to the king (21:11; 22:1–2 adds his servants and subjects), followed by an exhortation for him to live up to the ideal of righteous rule familiar from Psalm 72 (21:12a; 22:3, developed after the pattern of 7:6). Both threaten destruction if the king fails to respond (21:12b, 14; 22:5–7).

Each has a unique feature. The first contains an explicit condemnation of those who hold to the belief that Yahweh will not allow his nation and city to fall (21:13; on this false sense of security, see 7:1–15 and the Short Essay “Jeremiah's Struggle Against ‘Falsehood’”). The second ends with a Deuteronomistic interpretation of the nation's fate (cf. 5:18–19), which moves the focus of attention from the king to the people.

22:10–12, Jehoahaz. This brief call to mourning reflects the fate of Jehoahaz, who was deposed by Pharaoh Neco after a reign of only three months and carried away captive to Egypt, where tradition says he died (cf. 2 Kings 23:31–34).

22:13–19, Jehoiakim. Jehoiakim is condemned for his failure to live up to the kingship ideal (vv. 13–15a, 17; cf. 21:12; 22:3), and his actions are contrasted with those of his father, Josiah, who did (vv. 15b–16). The announcement of the fact and form of his death (vv. 18–19) is apparently not historically accurate (the account of Jehoiakim's death three months before the fall of Jerusalem contains no indications of violence and is silent on the matter of his burial; see 2 Kings 24:6), which seems to indicate that this oracle was delivered while he was still alive.

22:20–23, Concerning Lebanon. These verses interrupt the sequence of oracles against kings. The identities of both the addressee (presumably, an "inhabitant of Lebanon," v. 23) and the "enemies" (who have already been destroyed, but whose captivity lies in the future, vv. 20, 22) are unclear. Verse 21 is the kind of accusation that is elsewhere made against Judah (cf. 2:20–25), and v. 23b recalls 6:24. Their inclusion here may be due to the reference to the scattering of the "shepherds" (i.e., kings; cf. 23:1–4) in v. 22.

22:24–30, Jehoiachin. The poetic portion of the oracle against Jehoiachin (vv. 28–30) raises, but does not answer, the question of why he and his children were carried into exile. The focus is rather on the announcement that he will have no successor on the throne. In the first instance, this would refer to the transfer of the succession to Zedekiah's lineage, but from the point of view of the exiles, it could be understood to refer to the end of the Davidic dynasty. Immediately after the Exile, a grandson of Jehoiachin, Zerubbabel, was appointed by the Persians to be governor of Judah. Some seem to have hoped that he would reestablish the Davidic dynasty of kings (see Hag. 2:20–23; →Zerubbabel). Those who opposed such a move may have made use of—may even have created—these verses. The prose introduction, which specifically mentions Nebuchadnezzar and says that nothing can stand in the way of the permanent exiling of Jehoiachin and the queen mother (note that the children are not mentioned), is an exilic clarification (before 587 B.C. the hope remained alive that Jehoiachin would be returned to his throne; see 28:1–4), which may postdate the king's death in captivity sometime after 560 B.C. (2 Kings 25:27–30).

23:1–8, Restoration. This concluding section, which speaks of the return from exile and the restoration of the monarchy, is exilic in origin. The earlier kings are held responsible for the Exile (vv. 1–2), but the real interest is in the restoration of the exiles to their native land and in a reformed monarchy (vv. 3–4). The following verses elaborate these points, but in reverse order. The restored monarch will continue the Davidic line. He will conform to the kingship ideal (cf. 21:12; 22:3; 33:14–16), and under him both Judah and Israel will dwell securely (contrast 21:13). The ingathering of the exiles (cf. 3:18) will supplant the exodus from Egypt as the paradigm for God's deliverance of his people from captivity (vv. 7–8 = 16:14–15).

23:9–40

Against the Prophets

The heading "concerning the prophets" (v. 9a) sets off the unit 23:9–40 from the preceding one devoted to kingship. Two oracles of judgment follow.

23:9–15, Judgment on Prophets. In the first (vv. 9–12), the focus is not yet exclusively on the prophets. Jeremiah's reference to his own emotional state (v. 9) is, as in 4:19, ambiguous. It seems probable that these verses provide us with clues about the psychology of revelation, though it is possible that the outbursts reflect an emotional reaction to conditions that the prophet observed among the people (cf. 4:20; 23:10). The accusation (vv. 10–11), directed against "both prophet and priest" (cf. 5:30–31; 6:13–15; 14:18), employs the language of drought. Both it and the following threat (v. 12) are quite general.

The second oracle of judgment (vv. 13–15) compares the prophets of Israel with those of Judah. The point is not to weigh the offenses of each group, but to show that Judah is as guilty as Israel was and can, therefore, expect a comparable punishment (cf. the Jerusalem-Shiloh analogy of the Temple sermon, 7:12–15). The accusation against the Judean prophets (vv. 14, 15b) is, again, somewhat vague. One may infer from the reference to "falsehood" (v. 14) that they were "peace" prophets. The threat (v. 15a) is stated in general terms. In fact, there is nothing in these two oracles to suggest a date of composition after the fall of Jerusalem.

The following sections present variations on the theme "I did not speak to the prophets, yet they prophesied." The application of the term "prophet" to these (from Jeremiah's point of view) inauthentic speakers raises the issue of how one is to distinguish "true" from "false" prophets (see the Short Essay "The Problem of 'False' Prophecy").

23:16–17, Prophets of Peace. This prose section clearly identifies these prophets with the message of assured national security that Jeremiah strongly opposed (see 6:14 = 8:11 and 7:1–15). Their message is not from Yahweh but is "a vision of their own mind."

23:18–22, The Prophet in God's Council. Against such activity, this text proposes a norm for the reception of authentic messages, which seems to presuppose some type of visionary experience, namely, standing "in the council of Yahweh" (vv. 18, 22). It is clear what one will hear in such a council: unless the people repent (v. 22b), they will be punished (vv. 19-20 = 30:23-24). Since the prophets were not commissioned by Yahweh (v. 21), we may infer that they had not stood in his council and were guilty of uttering a message that contradicted what was spoken there. The irony of this oracle is that Jeremiah criticizes his opponents for a failure that, in retrospect, he apparently shared (v. 22; cf. 25:3-5).

23:23-32, Prophesying Lies. This prose passage continues the theme of prophetic conflict. The problem here is that the author seems to disparage dreams (vv. 28-29), though in Israel they were considered, at least by some, a legitimate source of revelation (cf. Gen. 20:6; 28:12; 31:10; Num. 12:6; Deut. 13:1-5). Furthermore, it is not common in Jeremiah to find opposition to prophets couched in terms of "dreams." In 27:9 the prophet enumerates various intermediaries, including dreamers, but reverts to referring only to prophets when he addresses Judeans (27:14-15, 16-18; 29:8-9 is very similar to 27:9-10). The focus of 23:23-32 is actually on the content of the prophets' message. They justify this message by claiming it to be revelation ("I have dreamed," v. 25; "says [Yahweh]," v. 31), but (according to the author) they have really received it from each other (vv. 27, 30). That their message is characterized as "falsehood" (vv. 25-26, 32) indicates that the topic is still the peace prophets.

The criterion by which these prophets were judged false probably differed within various contexts. For Jeremiah himself, it would have been a matter of his conviction about the validity of his own message. He would have considered those with whom he differed fundamentally to be wrong. But from the point of view of the exilic preservers of the tradition, Jeremiah's view had been vindicated by the events of history. In fact it seems best to consider vv. 16-17 and 23-32 to be exilic elaborations on vv. 18-22. The sheer quantity of this interpretation (twelve verses commenting on an original five) may be due to the fact that, for the exiles, the existence of contention among Yahweh prophets in the pre-exilic period was a well-known scandal. It is this retrospective stance that justifies the otherwise virtually incredible condemnation of Yahweh prophets for engaging in standard prophetic behavior (v. 31). One may also note that what appears to be the ultimate criterion for judging the prophets "false," that their message did not "profit" the people (v. 32b), could not have been effectively used by their contemporaries. Indeed, neither the prophets of "peace" nor those, like Jeremiah, of "doom" had been able to save Judah.

23:33-40, "The Burden." This passage abandons the theme of the preceding sections. It reflects antagonism between Jeremiah and his audience, though its sense is somewhat obscure. Verse 33 is a wordplay on the Hebrew homonyms of massa', meaning "utterance" and "burden." The question, "What is the massa' [utterance] of Yahweh?" receives the reply (following the LXX), "You are the massa' [burden]." The question seems a sarcastic pun, implying that any "utterance" from Jeremiah, a well-known prophet of doom, will be a "burden" on the people. The reply reverses the judgment: it is the questioners who are the real "burden." Thus, this text seems to reflect the familiar sphere of conflict with the prophets of peace.

Verses 34-40 are probably an exilic elaboration of the prophetic conflict issue. They threaten punishment for individuals who take up such derision of Jeremiah's position (v. 34), continuing the wordplay of v. 33 (vv. 36-38). One may continue to inquire after Yahweh's word (vv. 35, 37), but now the criterion for judging authenticity is clear: Jeremiah's position has been vindicated by the events of history, and the Exile has become a perpetual source of shame for the people (vv. 39-40).

The Problem of "False" Prophecy

There is abundant evidence in the book of Jeremiah for conflict among prophets (cf. 5:30-31; 6:13-15 = 8:10-12; 14:13-16; 23:9-40; 27:1-29:32). The point of contention seems to be the content of the prophecies: some predict that the nation will dwell securely and at peace; others convey a message of doom. The narrative about Hananiah and Jeremiah (chap. 28) highlights this conflict in a striking way, since on the surface the two seem indistinguishable except for the content of their messages. Such conflicts were not unique to Jeremiah's time (see Mic. 3:5-12), though they may have intensified during the last decades of Judah's existence.

In Israel, as in other societies, periods of intense prophetic activity coincided with times of crisis. Thus, the decision about how to respond to a prophet was a matter of some urgency, and criteria for making a judgment became a necessity.

Among the exiles, there was apparently some ambivalence about the evaluation of earlier prophecy. This is strikingly illustrated by two passages that refer to the same message, "it shall be well with you" (4:10b; 23:17a) but understand its origin in opposite ways. In 23:16-17, the point is that the prophets have made up their message of peace; it was not from Yahweh (cf. Lam. 2:14). Jer. 4:10, however, suggests that it is Yahweh himself who is responsible for the deception of his people (cf. 1 Kings 22:19-23, and Jeremiah's complaints about Yahweh in 15:18 and 20:7). It seems that the conflict between apparently genuine prophets gave rise to a crisis in confidence about prophecy itself. The implication is that the prophets' audience possessed no sure criterion by which to judge between competing claims.

Though the conflict between prophets is a major theme in the book of Jeremiah, we can discern there no foolproof method for distinguishing among them. Jeremiah's charge that Yahweh had not commissioned his opponents (23:21) begs the question of how one might know this to be the case, and his own personal conviction on the matter would not be useful to other persons caught between competing claims. The attempt to distinguish between the forms in which the revelation came (cf. 23:27-28) is probably exilic, and in any case is not consistently applied (cf. chap. 28). In fact, with respect to the narratives dominated by prophetic conflict (chaps. 27-29) it is easier to list things that are not a factor in the prophet's evaluation of his opponents—association with cultic functionaries (27:9-10), personal immorality (not a factor in chap. 28 and only marginal in 29:23), and the fulfillment of prophecy (cf. Deut. 18:20-22 and commentary below on 28:9 and 37:16-21)—than to locate a specific criterion. People were apparently forced to respond to the prophets on the basis of an evaluation of their message.

Anthropological studies of contemporary societies may provide some perspective on the problem. It would appear that there are basically four criteria by which audiences evaluate prophetlike intermediaries: their behavior conforms to established patterns; their message conforms to traditional customs and beliefs and is adequate to the special circumstances in which it is uttered; they claim to have received a special commission from a deity; and they are successful (what they predict comes to pass, the specific problem is resolved, or the like). Evaluations of individual intermediaries do not necessarily involve all four of these criteria.

Both in Israel and elsewhere, the interpretation of crises, whether national, local, or personal in scope, took place within the range of possibilities offered by the particular culture within which the intermediary functioned. This means that inevitably both worldview and the more mundane facts of history, politics, and society were factors in the judgments made about them. In the Judah of Jeremiah's day, the crucial decisions seem to have been closely related to assumptions about the nation's destiny that mirrored religious convictions and had concrete implications for political action. The judgment that a particular prophecy was "true" was, as always, dependent upon the viewpoint and commitments of the person(s) making it (see commentary below on 38:14-28). The confrontation of Jeremiah and Hananiah (chap. 28) is a case in point.

A Vision of Figs

The setting of the narrative in chap. 24 is the period following Nebuchadnezzar's first conquest of Jerusalem. The dialogue format of the vision report recalls 1:11-12, 13-16 and, even more precisely, Amos 7:7-9 and 8:1-3.

The interpretation of what was seen, two baskets of figs, suggests a straightforward comparison of the exiles of 597 B.C. (the good figs) with King Zedekiah and the others who remained behind in Jerusalem (the bad figs). The former may look forward to restoration in their homeland; Yahweh will "build them up" and "plant them" (v. 6; cf. 1:10) and will "give them a heart to know" him (v. 7; cf. 31:33). The latter will be destroyed. The inclusion among the "bad figs" of "those dwelling in the land of Egypt" (v. 8) may stem from an exilic editor, since the only flight of Judeans to Egypt we know about came after 587 B.C. (see chaps. 42-44).

The book of Jeremiah contains a number of prose narratives about the reign of Zedekiah. In general, these display one of two points of view. The majority are in agreement with the present chapter in looking favorably upon the exiles and opposing Zedekiah and those who remained in the land after 597 (cf. 21:1-10; 29:1-32; 37:1-38:13; 38:24-39:18). In others, however, Jeremiah acts to enlist Zedekiah's aid in forestalling complete disaster. To this end he advocates submission to Babylonian rule (cf. 27:1-28:17; 38:14-23).

As it happens, the last major unit of the book's first part (chaps. 1-25) contains two such narratives, 21:1-10 and 24:1-10. These narratives frame two smaller collections of material, one concerning Judean kings (21:11-23:8) and the other, prophets (23:9-40). The narratives do not fit smoothly into this context. Although 21:1-10 does deal with a king, it is out of harmony with the chronological sequence of the oracles against the kings that follow, and 24:1-10 introduces an altogether new topic, namely, an apology for the community of exiles. However, the two narratives complement each other rather well. Both have as their subject Zedekiah, Jerusalem, and the fate of the exiles (21:8-9 advocates surrender, a voluntary joining of those in exile whom 24:4-7 identifies as "good figs"). The focus of attention in the former is the fall of the nation and in the latter the restoration of the exiles (note the contrasting tone of 22:24-30). Between these narratives stand two small collections directed against the leaders responsible for the national catastrophe (see 21:12; 22:5; 23:1-2, 21-22).

It would, therefore, appear that the present arrangement of chaps. 21-24 is the result of an ongoing process of reflection by Judeans living in Babylon after 587 B.C. on the causes of the nation's collapse and on the position of their own community of survivors (in relation to those who remained in Palestine after 587? see 39:10; 40:7-12) in Yahweh's plan for the future.

Confronting the People: A Summary

The narrative in 25:1-14 is dated 605 B.C., and a cross-reference is made to Nebuchadnezzar, who that year emerged as a power in the Near East by defeating the Egyptian army (→ Carchemish) and assuming the throne in Babylon. Chap. 36, an account of how Jeremiah dictated two versions of a scroll containing all the words he had spoken since the beginning of his prophetic career, carries the same date (see 25:1; 36:1). From 36:3, 29, one can infer that the content of those scrolls corresponds to the message given in summary form here (v. 3). Thus, as in the case of the Temple sermon, the book provides a prose sermon and a biographical narrative that grow out of the same event. We can also infer that what remains of these two scrolls may be found in chaps. 1-25, though there is no consensus on the identification of this material (see Introduction).

The structure characteristic of the prose sermons is evident here: a summons to repentance (vv. 3-6), followed by a description of the people's unrepentance (v. 7) and an announcement of punishment (vv. 8-11a). The stereotypic language of Jeremian prose predominates, e.g., "his servants the prophets" (v. 4; cf. 7:25; 26:5; 29:19; 35:15; 44:4), "other gods" (v. 6; over a dozen occurrences, including 7:6, 9, 18; 11:10), and "the voice of mirth" (v. 10; cf. 7:34; 16:9).

The passage has two distinctive features. First, it makes an explicit connection between the enemy from the north and Nebuchadnezzar (v. 9). It is not a matter of great importance that the tradition, as it has come down, makes it impossible to establish the identity of the enemy Jeremiah was referring to in the earlier oracles and visions (see 1:13-16; 4:5-6:30). By 605 the identification with the Babylonian king would have been obvious, and it is reasonable to assume that Jeremiah himself reapplied older oracles to the new situation.

Second, there is a section on the punishment of Babylon "after seventy years" (vv. 11b-14), a reference that is mirrored in 29:10. The sentiment echoed here is like that in Isa. 10:12-19, but the dates do not make sense: beginning with the conquest of Babylon by the Persians (538 B.C.) and adding seventy years yields 608 B.C., three years before the time of the narrative, whereas starting from the captivities of Judeans in 597 and 587 yields dates for the fall of Babylon at 527 or 517. Other computations (from the fall of Nineveh in 612 until that of Babylon, or from Nebuchadnezzar's accession in 605 until the fall of Babylon) are equally inexact. Whatever the arithmetic, it is clear that the people's crimes have been serious and the period of their punishment will be lengthy. Perhaps it is best, therefore, to see the number seventy as a way of indicating passage of two (or more?) generations. Whether the figure was originally suggested by Jeremiah is difficult to judge, though the reference to him by name in v. 13 suggests that the section as it now stands is an exilic reapplication of Jeremiah's own reapplication of his earlier oracles.

Yahweh's Wrath Against the Nations

The unit 25:15-38 contains two general oracles against Judah's traditional enemies. Unlike regular oracles of judgment, these make no accusations but contain only threats of punishment. Beginning at this point, there is a major difference between the order of the Hebrew and the Greek texts (see Introduction): the LXX omits v. 14 and inserts the oracles against the nations found in chaps. 46-51 (MT) between vv. 13 and 15, though in a slightly different sequence. This difference, plus the fact that a new topic (the cup of Yahweh's wrath against the nations) is introduced in v. 15, suggests that the inclusion of vv. 15-38 at this point is the work of exilic editors (see v. 18b, which refers back to the catastrophe of 587 B.C.). The list of kings to whom the cup is to be delivered (vv. 18-26) occurs in roughly the same order as the more extensive oracles against the nations (chaps. 46-51) but is more inclusive.

It is possible that the mention of "nations" in vv. 13-14 provided a convenient key for the attachment of these oracles. One may also note that v. 29 expresses a reaction that would be quite understandable on the part of the exiles (cf. Ps. 137), and, from their perspective, it is perfectly appropriate that the list of nations that Yahweh will punish (vv. 18-26) should begin with Judah and end with Babylon.

Verse 30 introduces a separate, though related, oracle, that elaborates the themes of Amos 1:2 (Yahweh "roars" like a lion, threatens the "shepherds," i.e., the leaders of the nations). In Amos, this verse serves as an introduction to a collection of oracles against the nations (Amos 1:3-2:16), but it might just as well be a conclusion. Considering its location in the LXX, that may have been its original function in the book of Jeremiah.

26:1-45:5

Narratives Concerning the Nation's Fate

26:1-24

Jeremiah's Temple Sermon

Chapter 26 contains the narrative account of what happened on an occasion when Jeremiah delivered a message in the Temple, precipitating an open controversy with and among members of his audience. (See commentary above on 7:1-15 for a discussion.)

27:1-29:32

Prophecy and Politics

These prose narratives deal with events that occurred during the year 594 B.C. Chaps. 27 and 29:1-23 have been considered prose sermons, chaps. 28 and 29:24-32 biographical prose. Such labeling shows just how problematic strict distinctions in the Jeremiah prose can be, since in structure and theme the passage forms a single unit.

These chapters are distinguished stylistically from the remainder of the book by the presence of both long and short spellings of Hebrew proper names like Jeremiah, Zedekiah, Jeconiah, and Hananiah (e.g., Yirmeyah, here 9 times, including 28:5-6, but absent elsewhere in the book; Yirmeyahu, here only in 29:27-30, but 110 times elsewhere). In other parts of the book, the longer spellings predominate. Furthermore, except in 29:21, "Nebuchadnezzar" is spelled with an n, rather than with the more usual r ("Nebuchadrezzar" occurs twenty-eight times elsewhere in Jeremiah), and there is a tendency to use formal titles like "the prophet" with prophets' names (see 28:5-6). On the differences between the MT and the LXX in these chapters, see Introduction.

The narrative flows continuously and proceeds chronologically. This is evident in the episodes described in chaps. 27-28 and is probable for chap. 29, which presupposes an interval after 597 during which the Babylonian exiles could begin to settle down and which, in the MT, is connected by a conjunction to the preceding narratives ("And these are the words of the letter . . .").

These narratives also have a thematic unity: they are preoccupied with the problem of the duration of Babylonian rule (27:6, 9-10, 14-15, 16-17; 28:2-4, 12-14; 29:4-9, 24-28). Here one sees Jeremiah dealing with the problem of the day: how to understand the significance of the capture of Jerusalem in 597 and the subsequent exiling of King Jehoiachin and others to Babylon (see 2 Kings 24:8-17). The fact that the city and nation were not completely destroyed rendered the meaning of the events ambiguous, leaving open the question of how long the submission to Babylonian authority would continue.

There was a basic difference of opinion on this matter. The faction to which Jeremiah belonged believed that Yahweh had granted Nebuchadnezzar a lengthy hegemony in the region—the exact duration is somewhat vague, but approximates three generations (27:7; 29:6, 10; cf. 25:12). The inaccuracy of these dates is an indication that these formulations may indeed go back to the dispute of 594 B.C. An opposing faction was convinced that, after a short period (28:2-4 says two years), the power of the Babylonians would be broken.

The narratives stress a religious interpretation of the political events. Jeremiah believed that Yahweh had established Nebuchadnezzar's power in the region (chap. 27). His opponents, on the other hand, presumably accepted defeat and exile as Yahweh's doing but thought of them as sufficient punishment for the people's behavior. They believed that Yahweh would now restore the nation (so chap. 28), and they set themselves in opposition to Jeremiah's interpretation.

It is important to note that there is adequate theological justification in the Judean religious tradition for both these positions. Jeremiah's viewpoint mirrors the Sinai covenant, in which national security and prosperity are contingent upon obedience to Yahweh's commandments. His opponents' position reflects the ideology of the royal covenant, according to which the nation may be punished by Yahweh but will not be finally abandoned by him (→ Covenant).

But this was not simply a dispute over points of doctrine. It is a struggle between two political parties, each seeking support for its position on the prime foreign policy issue of the day: the relationship of Judah to the dominant power in the region, Babylon. One may infer from the narrative in chaps. 27-28 that the specific dispute involved a proposal being entertained by Judah and its allies to revolt against their Babylonian suzerain. Presumably, they had found encouragement in a rebellion in Babylon during the year 595-594 (according to 28:1, the consultation of envoys and anti-Babylonian agitation took place in 594-593).

The stakes were high. For Jeremiah and his group (they might be called the "pro-Babylonian" party) the survival of those Judeans who remained in the land after 597 depended upon continued submission to Babylonian rule. (Jer. 27:13 shows that Jeremiah still believed survival was possible; but 24:8-10, which is the product of reflection among the exiles in Babylon after 587, stands in contrast.) For their opponents (whose nationalism prompted them to resist Babylonian domination and to seek support from the greatest of Babylon's rivals, Egypt) the issue was the political independence of Judah.

From the narrative one infers that Jeremiah was a public spokesman for one of these parties and Hananiah for the other. That the public utterances of such prophets played an important part in the struggle between competing ideologies is indicated by Jeremiah's attacks on the prophets associated with the rival party (27:9–10, 14, 16; 28:1–17; 29:8–9, 15, 20–32). Apparently, Jeremiah feared the prophets for their ability to influence opinion and action in the direction of aggressive nationalism.

These chapters contain parallel accounts of how Jeremiah confronted the problem of false prophecy, first at home and then among the exiles. The outline of the accounts is the same: there is a message (submission to Babylonian rule, chap. 27; defining the length of the Exile, 29:4–9), a negative response to that message by a prophet or prophets (28:1–4, 10–11; 29:15, 21–23, 26–28), and a resolution (a curse against the opposing prophet, 28:15–17; 29:21–23, 30–32). In chap. 27, this message is addressed in sequence to three different audiences (foreign emissaries, the Judean king, and the priests and people of Judah), and the accounts of these occasions are parallel in structure and vocabulary. Jer. 27:19–22 appears to be an exilic interpretation reflecting the final catastrophe of 587.

The narratives make it clear that, in the decade following the national catastrophe of 597, the people were confronted with a choice between two diametrically opposed positions. Each had concrete policy implications, and each was supported by one or more persons who, through their behavior, claimed to be prophets of Yahweh (both Jeremiah and Hananiah performed symbolic actions and prefaced their utterances with the formula "Thus says Yahweh"). The choice the audiences of the day were confronted with was both practical (what course of action will be most likely to ensure the nation's survival?) and theoretical (how can "false" prophecy be distinguished from "true"?).

That there were no easy, foolproof criteria for making the latter judgment is demonstrated by Jeremiah's reaction to Hananiah (see the Short Essay "The Problem of 'False' Prophecy"). According to the narrative, he initially proposed the criterion of fulfillment as the critical test of validity (28:6–10; cf. Deut. 18:22), and Hananiah's prophecy would seem a perfect opportunity to use such a rule, since his prediction was specific enough to be tested by future events (28:3–4, 11). But Jeremiah apparently did not wait for two years to pass. When he later condemned Hananiah, he made no mention of the prophecy not being fulfilled, but instead reverted to the general charge that Yahweh had not commissioned him. In effect, Jeremiah could only reassert his former claim that Yahweh had willed the present international situation and that, therefore, the only hope for national survival lay in submission to the Babylonian king (28:13–14; 27:11–12; cf. 21:8–10, where this message is applied to a later, more desperate situation).

The message to the exiles is the same: their future prosperity depends upon settling in and making the most of a long captivity (29:4–6). Here, too, there is an elaborate refutation of his prophetic opponents' assertions about the duration of exile. Though v. 23 seems to introduce personal immorality as a criterion for judgment in the case of Ahab and Zedekiah, the main issue is clearly political. Since Nebuchadnezzar executed these two prophets (vv. 21–22), it is reasonable to assume that he considered their activities a threat. It is likely that they expressed views on the length of his reign that were perceived as spreading unrest among the Judean captives.

Verses 24–28, which report a letter from one of these prophets to a priest in Jerusalem reprimanding him for not exercising his responsibility to control the prophet Jeremiah (see the Short Essay "The Social Dynamics of Prophetic Behavior"), are reminiscent of 20:1–6. Jer. 29:16–19, absent in the LXX, has nothing to do with the prophets. It is an exilic tirade after the fashion of chap. 24.

30:1–31:40

The Book of Consolation

Chaps. 30 and 31 form an independent unit preoccupied with the restoration of the people rather than the more usual condemnations of their behavior. Because of their content, they have come to be referred to as "the book of consolation."

The fact that 29:10–14 speaks of the future restoration of Judeans to their land (after "seventy years"; cf. 25:1–14) may have motivated the inclusion of these oracles at this point in the book. The theme of hope is continued in the narratives of chaps. 32–33, and it is also possible that the placing of such material at the beginning of the account of Judah's last days (chaps. 32–35; 37–44) was intended to make their proclamation about the people's future seem less an afterthought and more directly a part of Yahweh's plan. Thus, the position of the unit in the book itself might be viewed as part of an effort to console the exiles.

The core of the "book of consolation" is 30:5–31:22. Apart from some apparent supplements, it is a prophecy of the restoration of the old Northern Kingdom of Israel, overrun a century earlier by the Assyrians, who dispersed its population (721 B.C.; 2 Kings 17:1–6). The nouns of address (Jacob, 30:10, 18; 31:11; Israel, 30:10; 31:2, 4, 7, 21; Ephraim, 31:6, 9, 18, 20; Rachel, 31:15; note also the mention of Samaria in 31:5) clearly indicate this interest in northern Israel. Where the larger framework of the passage mentions Judah, it tends to do so in connection with Israel (30:3-4; 31:27, 31; the exception is 31:23-25).

This unit displays a logical sequence of thought. Though there is a note of hope in 30:7, 17, the focus is on the distress of the nation, whose ruin the prophet justifies as Yahweh's punishment of the people's sins. There follows in 30:18-22 and 31:2-6 an account of the restoration of northern Israel's land and cities, the multiplication of its population, and the return of prosperity and festivities, culminating in a pilgrimage to Zion (31:6). To this point no mention has been made of the Israelites deported by Assyria, and 31:15-20 begins with Rachel weeping for these, her lost children. In response, Yahweh promises to bring about their return, a change of heart made possible by their repentance (vv. 18-19). The unit concludes with a summons to the dispersed Israelites to return (31:21-22). The reversal of fortune is portrayed in a striking way: the "strong man" who a century earlier had quaked before the attackers like a woman in the pangs of labor (30:6) will now be sheltered (31:22).

Several verses in this unit should be considered later supplements. Jer. 30:8-9 is prose and takes up the image of the "yoke," which is central to chaps. 27-28, suggesting that it comes from the time of the Exile. Jer. 30:10-11 is a virtual doublet of 46:27-28, though the latter would seem to preserve a form closer to original (note the repetition of the phrase "fear not" at the beginning of the second verse). The idea that Yahweh will not make a "full end" of his people (see 4:27; 5:10, 18) is repeated, and is also transformed into a general threat against the people's enemies. Jer. 30:16-17 calls for vengeance against those who destroyed Jerusalem, and despite the conjunction, "therefore," does not follow logically from vv. 12-15 (how can "great" sin be the cause of vindication?). It is not clear to what 30:23-24 refers. These verses appear again in 23:19-20, and fit that context better. Finally, 31:7-14 contains striking parallels to the language of what biblical scholars call Second Isaiah, i.e., Isaiah 40-55 (cf. Isa. 40:3-5; 43:1-7; 48:20-21; 49:9-13; the idea that Yahweh has "redeemed" his people, v. 11, mirrors an important theme in Second Isaiah; cf. Isa. 41:14; 43:1, 14; 44:22-24). These verses seem to anticipate a restoration of the exiles to a Judean homeland (Zion, v. 12), something quite different from the pilgrimage from their own land to Zion envisioned in v. 6.

Is it possible that Jeremiah could actually have addressed the Northern Kingdom, Israel, over a century after its fall? The key to this question is found in the fact that these words about restoration end with a summons (31:21-22). Beginning in the 620s, King Josiah of Judah apparently made attempts to extend the boundaries of his kingdom into the northern Israelite region, which for a century had been controlled by Assyria. 2 Kings 23:4, 15 reports that his religious reform extended to Bethel (see also 2 Chron. 34:6-7), and since he was killed in a battle against Pharaoh Neco near the city of Megiddo (2 Kings 23:29-30; cf. 2 Chron. 35:20-24), one may infer that he had extended his influence at least that far north. Though the exact extent of Josiah's expansion is unknown, there is also archaeological evidence to suggest that he fortified towns in Judah and controlled territory on the Philistine coast. All this activity was possible because of increasing Assyrian weakness after the death of Ashurbanipal in 627 B.C.

Viewed in this context, the poem can be interpreted as a propaganda piece for Josiah's political and religious program, and it may be among Jeremiah's earliest utterances. Northern Israel would again be incorporated into Yahweh's realm, and would again be ruled by its own king, Josiah (30:21). Zion would again be the religious center to which northerners made pilgrimages, a practice that had been stopped by the first Israelite king, Jeroboam (1 Kings 12:26-33), but had reappeared by Jeremiah's day (41:4-5).

However, Josiah's hope failed, and eventually Judah fell as well. During the Exile, one had to envision the restoration of both northern Israel and Judah. By means of supplements and an editorial framework, the exilic assemblers of this little "book" (30:2) offered "consolation" to both north and south.

Jer. 30:1-4 and 31:23-26 provide the framework for the core unit. It begins with the usual formula of the prose sermons and announces that Yahweh will "restore the fortunes" of his people, mentioning first Israel and Judah (30:3; necessary to make connection with the content of what follows) and then Judah alone (31:23-25; necessary for the exilic situation).

The "book" ends with a supplementary group of three prose oracles, each beginning with the same introduction: "Behold, the days are coming, says Yahweh" (31:27, 31, 38). The first two of these mention both Israel and Judah, the last Judah alone. Verses 27-30 focus on a "proverb" (cf. Ezek. 18:2) to explain the hardships encountered by the survivors of Judah's fall as a result of the previous generation's sins (cf. 32:18; Deut. 5:9-10; Lam. 5:7). It is possible that the term "fathers" is intended to refer to the pre-exilic Judean rulers. The hope is expressed in terms that mirror Jer. 1:10. The second oracle pursues a line of thought similar to that of the core unit (cf. 31:22) but does so in terms of a different category, the "new covenant." Since the old one had not worked (cf. 2:22, 13:23), a new basis for the relationship between Yahweh and the people was necessary. What is new is the God-given ability to obey, an echo of which can be heard in 24:7 (see the Short Essay "Expressions of Hope in the Book of Jeremiah"). The third oracle (vv. 38–40) announces the restoration—for all time—of Jerusalem. Verses 35–37 comprise a poetic oracle assuring that Yahweh's relationship with the "descendants of Israel" (the context makes it unlikely that northern Israel alone is meant) will be perpetual. The same imagery is used in 33:19–26 with reference to the Davidic dynasty and levitical priesthood.

Expressions of Hope in the Book of Jeremiah

One of the problems encountered by interpreters of Jeremiah is the necessity of accounting for the inclusion of passages containing an element of hope in a collection attributed to a prophet whose message seems to have been perceived as consistently negative (cf. 20:7–8; 36:28–29; 38:1–4). In addition to the "book of consolation," there are over two dozen briefer passages of this type.

One may begin with the observation that the element of "hope" is included within the prophet's original commission: he was "to pluck up and break down, to destroy and to overthrow, to build and to plant" (1:10). Echoes of this theme recur in oracles later in the book (12:14–17; 24:4–7; 31:28; 32:41).

The expressions of hope are sometimes addressed to individuals or small groups (35:18–19; 39:15–18; 45:2–5), but most often to a whole people or to a larger group representative of them. Frequently, these are Judeans (24:4–7; 27:22; 29:10–14, 32; 32:14–15, 36–41, 42–44; 33:10–11), but in a surprising number of instances the reference is to northern Israel, either mentioned alone (3:12–14; 30:5–31:22) or together with Judah (3:15–18; 5:10; 12:14–17; 23:5–6; 30:3–4; 31:27, 31; 33:4–9, 14–16, 23–26; 50:4–5, 17–20). The oracles against foreign nations also contain occasional promises of a brighter future (46:26b; 48:47; 49:6, 11, 39).

Several themes recur in these passages. One notices first the prominent associations of hope with Jerusalem (33:9, 10–11), its Temple (31:12), and its royal dynasty (33:17–18, 19–22). Both Zion (3:14, 15–18; 31:6; 50:4–5) and the restored Davidic dynasty (23:5–6 = 33:14–16; 33:23–26) are important in the future of northern Israel, as well as of Judah. A second and closely related theme is the restoration of Judah to its land (24:4–7; 27:22; 29:10–14, 32; 32:14–15, 36–44; 33:12–13).

A third theme—dramatic, though less frequent—is that in the future Yahweh will make a "new covenant" with his people. Its fullest statement may be found in 31:31–34, which contains the following elements: (a) both northern Israel and Judah are to be included; (b) the new covenant will not be like the old (broken) Sinai covenant, in that (c) obedience will now be possible, because the law will no longer need to be taught but will be written upon the people's hearts; (d) Yahweh will again be their God, and they his people; (e) he will forgive their past sins; and (f) by implication (v. 34b) this new covenant will endure forever. Clearly, this covenant is not completely "new." It is, rather, a revision of the Sinai covenant, which depended upon the people's obedience to Yahweh's law, the covenant's stipulations. Jeremiah favored this view of the people's relationship to Yahweh and struggled against the attitudes fostered by confidence in the unconditional covenant that was the foundation stone of the royal ideology (see 7:1–15).

There are other passages, similar to 31:31–34, that suggest how this theme developed. Though the narrative about the faithfulness of the Rechabites (see chap. 35) does not use the term "covenant," it does end with the promise that, because of their obedience to the commands of their founder, the Rechabites will endure forever. Since the point is to contrast the actions of the Rechabites with those of the disobedient populace of Judah, the oracle of hope directed to this group (35:18–19) affirms that obedience is the true basis for an everlasting covenant.

The problem is, of course, that in the Jeremiah tradition the people are viewed as having been persistently and irredeemably disobedient (e.g., 2:22; 13:23; condemnations approximating 35:14–15 occur six times). Jer. 24:4–7, which dates from the period after 597 B.C., takes this into account: when he restores the exiles to their land, Yahweh will "give them a heart to know" him and will be their God—"new covenant" elements (c) and (d). Jer. 31:31–34, which one may presume to be exilic, states the theme fully, and 32:36–41 repeats its key elements, (c), (d), and (f)—specifically, now, an "everlasting covenant." Jer. 50:4–5 and 50:17–20 refer to both northern Israel and Judah (a); the first speaks of an "everlasting covenant" (f), and the second seems to imply (c)—no sin is found in them.

One passage seems to contradict this theme: 33:19–26 reasserts the unconditional covenant with David (2 Sam. 7:11–16). It is possible that this sentiment reflects an enthusiastic response to Evil-merodach's release of the captive king, Jehoiachin, from captivity ca. 560 B.C. (2 Kings 25:27–29).

These hopeful statements did not all originate in the same historical setting. Some evidently derive from Jeremiah's earliest period of activity (30:5-31:22). Jer. 32:14-15 is apparently related to an episode that occurred toward the end of the prophet's career, and many other statements are clearly exilic. They share the characteristic of assuming a disastrous past and, on the basis of theological reflection about current circumstances (e.g., Josiah's expansion to the north, the deportations of 597 and 587, the release of Jehoiachin), of projecting a future restoration.

How "realistic" were such hopes? Those related to Josiah's political program must have had a high degree of plausibility, at least in the short run. The others were tied to the traditional Judean worldview, now reformed in light of the lessons of history (as interpreted by prophets and Deuteronomists). They affirmed the people's heritage, and one must assume that they too would have seemed highly plausible. It was a plausibility that even apparent disconfirmation could not destroy. When Josiah's attempt at expansion failed, the oracles first directed to northern Israel were altered to include Judah. The oracles of hope are one part of a living tradition associated with the prophet Jeremiah.

Tales of Life Under Siege

Chaps. 32-35 display a loose thematic unity: the events they narrate all took place in Jerusalem during periods of siege by the Babylonians. Chaps. 32-34, set in 588 B.C., form a subunit in which the introduction (32:1-5) provides an abbreviated account of the final narrative (34:1-22). These three chapters are similar in content to chaps. 21, 24 and 37-38, but unlike them say a great deal about hope for the future. Chap. 35, set in 597, which speaks of the reason for the coming destruction of the nation but has nothing to say of hope, is the link that joins these siege passages to chap. 36.

Jer. 32:1-5 serves as an introduction to this little collection of narratives. It is 588, Jerusalem is under siege, and Zedekiah (cf. 37:15; 38:1-6) has imprisoned Jeremiah for prophesying, first, that Yahweh will deliver Jerusalem to Nebuchadnezzar; second, that Zedekiah will not escape but will be given into the hand of the king of Babylon, brought before him, and taken to Babylon, where he will remain until Yahweh "visits" him; and third, that fighting against the Babylonians will not be successful.

The reference in v. 5 to Yahweh "visiting" the captive king in Babylon is ambiguous. The term usually connotes punishment, either of the nation (e.g., 5:9) or of an individual (e.g., 25:12; 29:32; 36:31). Jer. 27:22 and 29:10, however, report that Yahweh will "visit" his people in exile for the purpose of restoring them to their land. Since the parallel passage (34:5) is unique in its prediction of relatively peaceful circumstances surrounding Zedekiah's death, and since being carried off into captivity would in itself constitute harsh punishment, one should probably see this reference to Yahweh's "visitation" as offering solace to the doomed king. Such optimism would be appropriate to these chapters.

Jer. 32:6-15 reports a symbolic action. The narrative begins with Yahweh announcing that Jeremiah's cousin Hanamel would soon arrive and offer the prophet an opportunity to redeem a field in Anathoth, which was part of the family land holdings (for the legal background, see Lev. 25:25). Hanamel arrived, the purchase was made (the act was deliberately public, v. 12), and Baruch was charged with preserving the deed. An interpretation of the act follows: a time is coming when real estate holdings will again be secure in Judah. There is hope for the land.

Symbolic actions such as this one served to enhance the power of a prophet's utterances (see the Short Essay "Jeremiah's Symbolic Actions"). It is also worth noting that when Hanamel arrived, Jeremiah invoked the criterion of fulfillment ("then I knew that this was the word of Yahweh," v. 8). During a siege, when his message of hope might not have seemed credible, he needed all the persuasive power he could muster.

The prayer (vv. 16-25) and Yahweh's answer (vv. 26-44), which follow the symbolic action, contain one of the largest concentrations of stereotypic language in the book—some of it shared with the Deuteronomists ("bring . . . out of the land of Egypt," "land flowing with milk and honey," "other gods," "provoke me to anger"). Both prayer and answer are heavily overlaid with interpretation. The basic prayer (vv. 16-17a, 24-25) highlights the siege and the symbolic action and takes the form of a lamentation (so the vocabulary: "Ah, Lord Yahweh," v. 17; cf. 1:6, 4:10; Josh. 7:7; Judg. 6:22; "Behold, thou seest," Jer. 32:24; cf. Lam. 3:59-60). Uttered in public and containing another evocation of the criterion of fulfillment, it adds rhetorical force to the prophet's speech. Verses 17b-23 contain a standard exilic period interpretation for the cause of exile.

The stereotypic language in Yahweh's answer occurs mainly in vv. 28-35, which repeat the idea that the city's fall in 597 was the result of the people's apostasy, committed despite persistent warnings by the prophets. Following the new heading in v. 36 one finds Yahweh's words of hope for a restoration from exile, addressed to the city of which Jeremiah had said "it is given" to the Babylonians. These words speak first of a renewal of the people's election (v. 38) and a new covenant relationship with Yahweh (vv. 39–41; cf. 31:31–34), and then return to the real estate theme of the symbolic action (vv. 42–44). The focus is on life in the Palestinian homeland.

Jer. 33:1 ties the next narrative unit to the date (588) already established in 32:2. The chapter contains a collection of prose oracles (note the new headings in vv. 4, 10, 12, 14, 19, and 23), and v. 3 provides the key to its intention: “Call on me and I will answer you and report to you great and inaccessible things you have not known.” What are these things? Clearly, they are not explanations of the causes of the nation’s collapse (vv. 4–5), since such were well known. The “great things,” rendered conceptually inaccessible by the disaster of 587, are rather Yahweh’s promise to cleanse his people of their past sins and to restore their fortunes (vv. 6–13). Because vv. 10 and 12 presuppose the destruction of Jerusalem and v. 3 echoes a way of thinking about the people’s future found also in Second Isaiah (cf. Isa. 48:6), one may assume that the compiler lived during the Exile. The question of the people’s future, still open, is here addressed in terms of restoration to the homeland.

Although 33:14–26 (absent in the LXX) continues to speak of restoration, the subject changes to the Davidic dynasty. Verses 14–16 parallel 23:5–6 but also mention Yahweh’s promise to Israel and Judah (presumably, that recorded in 2 Sam. 7:11–16) and emphasize the security of Judah and Jerusalem in those coming days. Verses 17–18 promise that there will always be both a descendant of David to sit upon the “throne of the house of Israel” and levitical priests offering sacrifices in the Temple, and vv. 19–22 expand upon this theme by likening the permanence of the “covenant” with David to that of the regular alternation of day and night (cf. 31:35–37) and by promising to multiply greatly descendants of David and the levitical priests. Connected historically with David’s priest, Abiathar, and Jeremiah’s home village of Anathoth (see 1 Kings 2:26–27), the Levites were of special interest to the Deuteronomists, another indication of the exilic provenience of this section (→ Levites). A final elaboration in vv. 23–26 employs both the regularities of nature and the idea of Yahweh’s election of his people to underscore the hope for future restoration.

At the beginning of chap. 34, Jerusalem is depicted as under siege and the surrounding Judean countryside as, for the most part, in the hands of the invading Babylonians, but Jeremiah is not yet in prison (vv. 1–2, 6–7). It is, therefore, chronologically prior to chaps. 32–33, though the oracle with which it begins (vv. 2–5) was adapted by the compiler as an introduction to these chapters (32:1–5). The version given in this chapter lacks the final note about the futility of fighting the Babylonians (32:5) and adds a reference to Zedekiah’s peaceful death in Babylon (cf. 52:11; 2 Kings 25:7 makes no mention of his death).

The bulk of the chapter (vv. 8–22) is devoted to a narrative about the treatment of Hebrew slaves, which is set during the temporary lifting of the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem (vv. 21–22; cf. 37:5). Verses 8–11 provide the background: after years of neglect (see v. 14b), owners had released their Hebrew slaves in accordance with the law (Deut. 15:1, 12–18). Their motives for doing so were perhaps a mixture of religious (repentance, v. 16; demonstrations of faithfulness to Yahweh’s law in a time when it was necessary to call upon him for assistance against attack by aliens) and practical considerations (during a siege it might be difficult to feed slaves, and there would be no agricultural work for them to do; it might also be assumed that free persons would fight harder in defense of their city). In the prose oracle that follows, one learns from the accusation (vv. 12–16) that subsequently (perhaps after the siege was lifted) the owners reneged on their agreement and reclaimed their former slaves. Because of this action, Yahweh would deliver them into the hands of their enemies, causing the Babylonians to return and destroy the city and countryside (vv. 17–22; cf. 21:7; 32:4).

Jer. 35:1 gives only a general date for the final narrative in this section (“the days of Jehoiakim”), but v. 11 allows us to locate the event more specifically in 597, during the siege preceding the first conquest of Jerusalem.

The chapter describes a symbolic action that begins with an account of Yahweh’s instructions to Jeremiah to take a group of Rechabites to the Temple and publicly offer them wine to drink and of the prophet’s compliance to act in this way. The response of the Rechabites is of central importance: they refuse to drink wine on the grounds that, since the days of “Jonadab the son of Rechab our father” (ca. 842 B.C.), they have faithfully kept the latter’s command that they not drink wine, build houses (they had to live in tents), or engage in farming.

Jeremiah’s interpretation of this action takes the form of an oracle of judgment (vv. 12–17). The accusation compares the Rechabites, who had been faithful to the commands given them, with the people, who had not obeyed Yahweh but had ignored the prophets and continued in apostasy. The announcement of judgment is quite general: Yahweh will bring “evil” upon Judah and Jerusalem (v. 17a).

The narrative closes with an oracle of salvation directed to the Rechabites (vv. 18–19). Because they have kept their father’s commands, their line will continue forever. The terminology (“never lack a man”; cf. 33:17–18) recalls the royal ideology, but in this context it is clear that permanence depends upon obedience. The passage thus agrees with and offers yet another statement of the prophetic and Deuteronomistic views of the people's history.

The identity of the Rechabites is unclear. Some have seen in them a guild of metalworkers and have interpreted the commands as guild restrictions and not indications of cultural conservatism (holding to a supposed "nomadic ideal"). In any case, Jeremiah points not to their social location, but to their faithfulness to religious tradition. The symbolic action in which they cooperated was a demonstration of the importance of faithfulness to commandments that were the basis of a group's existence.

The Beginnings of the Book of Jeremiah

Chap. 36 provides a narrative account of how, in 605 B.C. (v. 1), Jeremiah undertook to collect all the prophecies he had uttered from the beginning of his career and to bring them to the attention of his countrymen, especially their leaders. It seems likely that the prose sermon of 25:1–14 refers to the same events, focusing on the prophet's words. Both chapters make reference to a "scroll" (25:13; 36:2, 28), and there is general agreement by interpreters as to the content of the message (cf. 25:5–6, 8–11; 36:3, 29). The narrative is composed of three episodes with identical structure, but of differing length.

Verses 1–4 describe the way in which Jeremiah's prophecies were committed to writing. The prophet is instructed by Yahweh to write on a scroll all the words he has spoken to him about "Jerusalem [reading with the LXX] and Judah and all the nations" from the "days of Josiah" until the present. Jeremiah follows this instruction by dictating these words to his scribe, Baruch.

Verses 5–26 recount the public reading of these prophecies. Jeremiah instructed Baruch to go to the Temple on a fast day (vv. 5–6, 9; we are not told why the prophet could not go himself or what the specific occasion for fasting was) and there read the scroll aloud. The goal of this action was to stimulate a change in the people's behavior (v. 7). Verse 8 states in a general way that Baruch executed these instructions.

Verses 8–26 give a more detailed picture of what happened. Approximately one year after the scroll was dictated (vv. 9, 22), Baruch took it to the Temple, where it was read three times during the course of a day, twice by Baruch himself (to "all the people," v. 10, and "all the princes," v. 12) and once by Jehudi, a servant of the court (to King Jehoiakim and the assembled princes, v. 21). For each occasion the narrator records a response. The first reading caught the attention of the princes (vv. 11–12). The second aroused fear among the assembled princes (v. 16), who first established the authority of the scroll (by determining that it had in fact originated with Jeremiah, vv. 17–18) and then sent Baruch (and Jeremiah) into hiding (v. 19). The king's response was quite different (vv. 22–26): he showed no fear, but cut the scroll in strips, burned it in a warming fire, and ordered the arrest of Baruch and Jeremiah.

Finally, 36:27–32 tells that Jeremiah was instructed to write a second scroll, a command he again executed by dictating to Baruch. In addition to all the words that had been on the first one, the new scroll contained an oracle, which condemned Jehoiakim for burning the first scroll (vv. 29–31), and "many" additional prophecies (v. 32). The prediction of Jehoiakim's death (vv. 30–31) seems to agree roughly with 22:18–19 but not with 2 Kings 24:1–7.

There is a noticeable relationship between the account in 2 Kings of Josiah's response to the "scroll of the law" found in the Temple (2 Kings 22:3–23:24) and Jehoiakim's to the scroll containing Jeremiah's prophecies: Josiah tore his clothes, sought prophetic guidance (2 Kings 22:11–14), and burned the offending ritual objects; whereas Jehoiakim, showing no fear, tore and burned only the scroll (Jer. 36:22–26). And this was despite the fact that the menacing content of the two scrolls was essentially the same (2 Kings 22:14, 16; Jer. 36:3, 29). From the standpoint of Jeremiah and those in exile who agreed with him, this comparison is highly unfavorable to Jehoiakim. It is possible that the narrative of Jeremiah 36 is consciously patterned after the Deuteronomistic account of Josiah's reaction to the scroll.

Again, in this narrative, one finds the family of Shaphan singled out from among the princes as staunch supporters of Jeremiah. The first public reading of the scroll was at the chamber of Gemariah (v. 10), where Micaiah took an interest in it and reported what he heard to the princes (vv. 11–12). Gemariah was among those who urged King Jehoiakim to attend to the scroll's words (v. 25). Several years earlier, it was apparently the support and influence of another member of that family, Ahikam, which was crucial in saving the prophet's life (26:1, 24). The political dispute that divided the Judean leadership is clearly in evidence here (see Introduction).

37:1–44:30

The Fall of Judah and Its Aftermath in Palestine

The book of Jeremiah contains two accounts of the fall of Jerusalem. One (chap. 52) is virtually identical with 2 Kings 25 and does not mention the prophet at all. The other (chaps. 37–44) features Jeremiah as an important actor in these events and offers an explicit interpretation of their cause.

37:1-2, Zedekiah's Disobedience. The first two verses in chap. 37 set the stage for the entire narrative by stressing two aspects of the situation: Judah's king, Zedekiah, was a vassal of the Babylonian king, Nebuchadnezzar; and Zedekiah and the majority of Judeans did not respond positively to the words of Jeremiah. The descriptions that follow, of conflicts between Jeremiah and various opponents, can best be seen in the context of the struggle between parties that characterized Judah's last decades.

37:3-38:28, Zedekiah Consults Jeremiah. The events reported in these chapters occurred during the period 588-587 B.C. After a temporary lifting of the siege in either summer 588 or early winter 587 (vv. 5, 11), the Babylonian armies returned to Jerusalem, and the city fell in July 587. Three consultations between Zedekiah and Jeremiah provide the structure of the passage. These consultations are separated by accounts of confrontations between the prophet and the Judean princes.

In the first consultation (37:3-10), Zedekiah sent messengers to the prophet, requesting that he "pray for us." Presumably, the intention was to try to secure permanent deliverance for the city. Jeremiah's response was an oracle of doom against the city (vv. 7-8 explicitly contradicting the hope that must have arisen following the lifting of the siege). The episode is reminiscent of 21:1-7, which suggests another instance of the same occurrence being recorded in both prose sermon and biographical narrative forms (see chaps. 7 and 26; 25:1-14 and 36:1-32; 21:8-10 and 38:2-3). Verse 4 anticipates the reaction to this message: the imprisonment of the prophet.

Verses 11-15 reveal that during the interlude in hostilities Jeremiah tried to leave the city. The author does not report what motivated this action, though an errand in connection with a purchase of real estate (chap. 32) is a possibility. As he reached one of the city gates, he was arrested as a deserter. Though he protested to the contrary, the fact that he had given advice to others to desert (21:8-10; 38:2-3, 17-18) and that some Judeans had already done so (38:19) makes the charge seem reasonable. The princes punished him with a beating and imprisonment.

Verses 16-21 record the second consultation. This time Zedekiah himself sent for the prophet and, when he had been brought from prison, asked him, "Is there a word from Yahweh?" Jeremiah's response was a short oracle of doom against the king, followed by a protestation of his own innocence (v. 18 is reminiscent of 26:15) and a plea that he be transferred out of the control of the princes and placed under the king's own guard.

It is worth noting that, according to the narrative, Jeremiah used the criterion of fulfillment of prophecy against his opponents (v. 19). Apparently, it was a handy argument, when the circumstances permitted its use (contrast chap. 28; see the Short Essay "The Problem of 'False' Prophecy"): Jerusalem had already fallen once (597) and had again come under serious attack, so who now could believe in prophecies of peace? This point raises an interesting question. Jeremiah had been persecuted both because his message was unpopular and because for so long the doom he predicted did not come to pass (e.g., 17:14-18; 20:7-12). Then came the national disaster of 597 and the siege of 587, seemingly obvious fulfillments of his prophecies. Yet the present narrative shows that his status among important segments of his audience changed, if at all, only for the worse. In addition the activity of Hananiah a decade earlier (chap. 28) demonstrates, and 37:19 implies, that the "peace" prophets continued to be influential. Matching predictions with occurrences seems not to have been a very powerful tool for judging among prophets.

In the second conflict episode (38:1-13), the princes accuse Jeremiah of treason, saying that he has urged people to desert to the Babylonians, thereby weakening the city's defense. They demand his death, but when Zedekiah hands him over to them, they arrange the execution in a strange and ineffectual manner (vv. 5-6). Soon, with the king's blessing, he is rescued.

The third consultation (38:14-28) involved some curious negotiations between Zedekiah and the prophet. The king wished to ask a question, but the prophet was afraid of two things: that he would be put to death, and that what he said would not be heeded (v. 15). After receiving Zedekiah's assurances, Jeremiah delivered the message that only surrender to the Babylonians could now avert complete disaster. The king suggested that, if he wished to live, he should not let the princes know the content of this message. So when they asked, he lied, and was returned to prison until the city's fall.

This, then, is what the final stages of the party conflict in pre-exilic Judah had come to: counsels of desertion and imprisonment for the prophet who uttered them. Especially in the face of Jeremiah's obvious lack of success in gaining support for his position (37:2; 38:15), desertion can be seen as the logical extension of the "pro-Babylonian" party's foreign policy. What he sought was a way to remain in the land (see chap. 27; this idea seems to underlie the oracle in 38:17-20, and is evident in chaps. 39-43), though events brought this hope to nothing. It is probable that the exilic shapers of these narratives, who knew of this dashed hope, are responsible for the harsher tone of the oracle in 37:6-10.

This was a time when prophets were consulted, but not universally honored. Politically, they had taken sides, and it appears that the supporters of each were mainly his fellow partisans. Even the failure of prophecies to be fulfilled, supposing that it was recognized, did not shake the partisans' faith in their prophets (see 37:19). Jeremiah was consulted, but his words went unheeded.

Jer. 38:4 gives a clear indication of what the powerful elements in Judean society expected of their prophets: they should be upholders of the status quo (see 26:7-9). Jeremiah's activity was perceived to be detrimental to the national welfare, and so he was imprisoned. In the end he could no longer proclaim his words publicly lest he be killed (38:24-28). He took himself out of action: a prophet who does not operate publicly is no threat because he is no prophet.

39:1-43:13, Defeat, Exile, and Prophetic Response. Though these chapters tell a tale of destruction and exile, they continue to reveal the prophet's positive attitude toward the land of Palestine. Thus, after the fall of Jerusalem, Jeremiah chose to remain in the land rather than join the large community of Judeans in Babylon (39:11-14; 40:1-6). For a brief time the remnant in Palestine prospered (40:10-12), and even after the assassination of Gedaliah, the prophet counseled his companions to stay rather than flee to Egypt (42:10-12). This was Jeremiah's bias: he chose to stay. The narratives of chaps. 39-43 allow one to sense an element of hope that was dashed by events. Such hope is not present in the other account of Jerusalem's fall (Jer. 52 and 2 Kings 25).

Jer. 39:1-10 is a summary of Babylon's actions against Jerusalem and its inhabitants after the fall of the city and is essentially the same as that found in 52:4-16 and 2 Kings 25:1-12.

Jer. 39:11-14 contains the surprising claim that Jeremiah counted among his defenders in high places Nebuchadnezzar himself. At first glance this seems implausible. Yet he had tried to leave the city during a temporary lull in the siege (37:11-13), and he had a history of preaching submission to Nebuchadnezzar (chaps. 27-29; 38:17-23) and even of suggesting defection (21:8-10; 38:2-3). Since there were Jewish deserters among the Babylonians (38:19), it is not unreasonable to assume that Nebuchadnezzar had been made aware of all this. Furthermore, we can infer that Nebuchadnezzar had knowledge of local events from the fact that Gedaliah, whom he appointed governor of Judah (40:5; 2 Kings 25:22) and to whom Jeremiah was entrusted, was of the house of Shaphan, one of the mainstays of the "pro-Babylonian" party.

Verses 15-18, an oracle to Jeremiah's rescuer, Ebed-melech, was uttered during the siege (v. 15) and is out of place here.

The point of view of the narrative is clear in 40:1-6, an expanded account of Jeremiah's release. Here the prophet is given a choice about where he will reside. Moreover, the Babylonian officer in charge gives an interpretation of the causes of the city's fall—essentially irrelevant to the narrative—that reflects the sentiments of the Judean community in exile.

The Judeans who remained in Palestine rallied around Gedaliah, who as governor stood for a policy of obedience to Babylon, and prospered (40:9-12). But their prospects were undermined by his assassination (40:13-41:18). Especially because Babylonian soldiers were among those slain, this act had the appearance of a rebellion. It caused consternation among the survivors because of the reaction they expected from the Babylonians (40:15; 41:2-3, 17-18; 43:3).

What motivated the assassination? The perpetrator, Ishmael, was a member of the Judean royal house (41:1) and during the war had been a freedom fighter (head of a military unit, 40:7-8; 2 Kings 25:23; on "captain of the forces," see 2 Sam. 24:2; 1 Kings 15:20). Thus, it is possible that this act was a last gasp of the old party struggle. Given the magnitude of Judah's defeat in 587, this was less likely an attempt to actually assume leadership than an act of revenge. From one point of view, Gedaliah, like Jeremiah, could be considered a traitor.

Chap. 42 presents a textbook case of intercession. Inclined to flee Egypt (41:17-18) but uncertain about what they ought to do, the people and their leaders went to Jeremiah (as in divination, the initiative lay with them, not the prophet) and requested that he consult Yahweh on their behalf, swearing to obey whatever he might command. After a ten-day wait, Jeremiah received a message from Yahweh and transmitted it to them: they were to remain in the land. Furthermore, they had no need to fear Nebuchadnezzar, since Yahweh would cause him to be favorably disposed toward them (vv. 10-13). They were forbidden to go to Egypt, though their motivation for doing so (v. 14) seems quite reasonable.

Jer. 42:18-22 begins with a new formula (see v. 9) and contains a brief recapitulation of Jeremiah's message and the request that occasioned it. However, there is a new element here, the prophet's reference to his own history of being rejected by the people to whom he spoke (v. 21). The gloomy pessimism that results would have been appropriate for Jeremiah, but would also fit the views of exilic interpreters who knew what had happened and who must have understood the flight to Egypt as yet another in a series of self-destructive acts by those who had been left behind after the first deportation to Babylon.

The message was in fact unacceptable, and was branded a "lie" (43:1-3), the very charge that Jeremiah had leveled against his prophetic opponents (see the Short Essay "Jeremiah's Struggle Against 'Falsehood'"). The people quit the land and went to Egypt (vv. 4-7), carrying Jeremiah with them. There the prophet is said to have performed a symbolic action, predicting a Babylonian invasion of the land in which they had taken refuge (vv. 8-13; see the Short Essay "Jeremiah's Symbolic Actions"). These latter verses are probably the work of an exilic interpreter who knew of Nebuchadnezzar's campaign against Egypt in 568 B.C.

44:1-30, Jeremiah and Other Judeans in Egypt. Broadly speaking, the narrative of chap. 44 takes the form of a dialogue between Jeremiah and the Judeans who had come to Egypt. The prophet speaks twice, the people once. In each case the speech is prefaced by a historical review. The theme is the cause of the nation's misfortune and the lessons that are to be learned from it.

Jeremiah's first speech begins with a review of the 587 disaster, which he attributes to the people's failure, despite the warnings of the prophets, to cease worshipping other gods (44:2-6). This speech is followed by an oracle of judgment, which accuses his audience of having forgotten the lessons of their past wickedness (they have continued in Egypt to serve other gods and have not walked in Yahweh's "law" and "statutes," vv. 7-10) and threatens that Yahweh will, but for a few fugitives, utterly destroy them (vv. 11-14).

The people refuse to accept these words and respond with a historical retrospective of their own: in the past, when they freely worshipped the queen of heaven (the reference may be to the long and apparently prosperous reign of Manasseh; cf. 2 Kings 21:1-18), they prospered; only after stopping such worship (i.e., after the reform of Josiah in 621) did they fall on hard times (vv. 15-19). The description of idolatry focusing on the "queen of heaven" takes up a theme already encountered in 7:16-20, a passage that derives from the exilic community.

The content of Jeremiah's response to this argument essentially repeats his first review and oracle (vv. 20-30). In addition the criterion of fulfillment of prophecy is again mentioned (v. 28; cf. 37:19): the remnant that escapes Yahweh's destruction of the Judeans in Egypt will know that the prophet had been correct. And as a sign that this punishment is coming, Yahweh will give Pharaoh Hophra to his enemies as he had Zedekiah (vv. 29-30). One has the impression that the author of this passage knew of the death of Apries (Hophra) ca. 569 at the hands of a usurper, as well as of whatever misfortune overtook the Judeans in Egypt.

The chapter, then, accounts (yet again) for the fall of Judah and Jerusalem in 587 and also for the disappearance from the historical scene of the Judeans who had remained behind in the land after the second deportation. What hope remained for the Judeans must now rest solely with the community in Babylonia (see chaps. 24; 29). This assessment, the interpretive capstone of chaps. 37-44, must reflect the thinking of some within the exilic community.

45:1-5

An Oracle to Baruch

The opening verse of chap. 45 dates the oracle to 605 B.C. and connects it specifically to the narrative of chap. 36. The oracle of judgment against the nation (v. 4) reflects 1:10 and 36:29. The oracle of deliverance addressed to Baruch (v. 5) echoes 39:18 and is "fulfilled" by the event reported in 43:6.

Why should this short oracle have been placed here, out of chronological sequence and separated from the narrative to which it belongs? The answer may well be that here it served the needs of the exilic interpreters, whose reflections on the people's destiny can be discerned both in additions made to the traditions and in the order in which these traditions are arranged. Chaps. 37-44 in fact narrate how the prophecies compiled by Jeremiah in 605 were fulfilled. As they are enclosed by two chapters that speak of the collection and utterance of these prophecies (36 and 44), the reader can hardly miss the point. Yahweh had indeed been behind these events. The results had been painful, but at least they were intelligible.

Oracles Against the Nations

Oracles against foreign nations are a distinct and relatively common genre of prophetic literature. Collections like the one in these chapters may be found in Amos 1-2, Isaiah 13-23, and Ezekiel 25-32 (cf. also Nahum, Obadiah, Zeph. 2). That chaps. 46-51 of Jeremiah were collected and at first transmitted separately is indicated by the fact that their position in the MT differs from that in the LXX, where they follow 25:13. The latter position is more like that of the collections in Amos, Isaiah, and Ezekiel, but the position in the MT does provide a more dramatic ending for the book: an announcement of the destruction of Babylon, the enemy that had destroyed Judah and carried its inhabitants into exile.

Though we do not know exactly how oracles of this type were used, the genre appears to be quite old. Prophets at Mari spoke against foreign kings, and Jer. 28:8 indicates that Israelite prophets had performed in a similar fashion "from ancient times." It is possible that such oracles were directed against specific enemies in times of war.

In contrast to the oracles of judgment against Judah and the reflections on the people's fate so common in the rest of the book, this collection displays a certain kinship to chaps. 30-33: by announcing the downfall of their enemies, it sets the stage for a restoration of the people's fortunes. The defeat of the foreign nations is generally seen as Yahweh's doing, and sometimes it is specifically said that his motivation is vengeance for what they have done against his people (e.g., 46:10; 50:15, 28). In fact, it is possible to see a contradiction between Jeremiah's insistence that Judeans must submit to Nebuchadnezzar's rule (chaps. 27-29) and the announcements of Babylon's pending destruction (chaps. 50-51), texts that the editors present as contemporaneous (cf. 27:1; 28:1; 51:59). In the first, the Babylonian king is represented as Yahweh's "servant" (27:6), in the second as "monster" (51:34).

46:1

Heading

The heading in 46:1 clearly announces this new major section of the book as oracles against the nations.

46:2-28

Against Egypt

The chapter contains two oracles, each with a prose heading giving its date. The first, vv. 2-12, is set in 605 B.C. (v. 2). It looks back on Egypt's defeat at Carchemish (vv. 6, 12), which it interprets as an act of Yahweh's "vengeance" (v. 10)—presumably, for the death of Josiah at the hands of the pharaoh in 609. The term "vengeance" appears more frequently in Jeremiah than in other prophetic books. Sometimes it refers to Yahweh's actions against his own people (5:9, 29; 9:9) or against Jeremiah's enemies (11:20; 15:15; 20:12), but most often to those against Egypt or Babylon (46:10; 50:15, 28; 51:6, 11, 36).

Verses 13-24 are set in the time of Nebuchadnezzar's campaign against Egypt ca. 568 B.C. (v. 13). The Babylonian attack is in progress (vv. 16, 20-21, 22-24), and victory is anticipated (vv. 14, 19). Egypt's downfall is interpreted as Yahweh's "punishment" (vv. 21, 25; for similar statements against other nations, cf. 48:44; 49:8; 50:18, 27, 31; 51:18, 44, 47, 52). Though these verses are addressed to lower Egypt (v. 14, Memphis), the prose supplement to the oracle is directed to upper Egypt (vv. 25-26, Thebes). The oracle ends with a word of assurance to Israel (vv. 27-28 = 30:10-11), although v. 28b harks back to its own punishment, showing the double need of those in exile to understand the reason for their captivity and to see hope for the future.

Several stages of growth can be discerned in this section about Egypt. The first of the oracles is appropriate to the situation after Egypt's defeat at Carchemish in 605 (vv. 3-12), and the second (vv. 14-24) to the period around 568. Behind the latter we can imagine members of the exilic community gloating that Egypt, the failed ally of the old nationalist party, was itself now succumbing to the Babylonians (cf. 37:3-10). Verses 27-28 express a hope for restoration to the land, along with yet another statement about the meaning of the Exile. The entire collection, held together by a prose framework (vv. 2, 13, 25-26), probably comes from the late exilic period.

Against the Philistines

Though the prose introduction to chap. 47 specifies a date for this oracle (v. 1), a specific historical allusion is uncertain. The contents are quite general, but it is clear that from the author's perspective the disaster coming to the Philistines is Yahweh's doing (vv. 4b, 6-7).

48:1-47

Against Moab

The little collection in chap. 48 begins with four general oracles concerning Moab's destruction (vv. 1-9, 11-12, 14-20, 28-33), each of which is followed by a prose supplement expanding on the main theme of the preceding oracle (v. 10, warfare; vv. 12-13, vessels; vv. 21-25 and 34-36, cities under attack). Two of the prose passages are themselves expanded with statements to the effect that Yahweh is responsible for Moab's demise (vv. 26-27, 38-39). Though Yahweh is twice mentioned as speaker in the oracles (vv. 15, 30), his role in Moab's troubles is not specified (v. 33b may be an allusion to it).

The statement that, because of the defeat, the Moabite god, priests, and princes will be carried into exile (v. 7; cf. 11) is echoed in the following oracle against Ammon (49:3) and in Amos's oracles against the nations (Amos 1:5, 6, 15).

Verses 40-46 explain Moab's destruction as punishment for having "made himself great" against Yahweh (vv. 42, 44; cf. 46:13-24). Moab and Judah were traditional enemies, and there are no allusions that allow us to locate this accusation in a specific historical setting. It is possible, however, that the author had in mind the role of the Moabites as Babylon's allies prior to 597 (cf. 2 Kings 24:2). Finally, v. 47 speaks of a future restoration of Moab's fortunes (cf. 46:26b; 49:6, 39).

49:1–39

Against Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazor, and Elam

49:1–6, Ammon. The oracle against Ammon is quite general in content (on v. 3, see 48:7). Again, the destruction is interpreted as retaliation for oppression of Yahweh's people (vv. 1–2; for a possible historical setting, see 41:15 and commentary above on 48:40–46). It concludes with a promise of restoration (cf. 46:26b; 48:47; 49:39).

49:7–22, Edom. The poetic portions of the oracle (vv. 7–11, 14–16) interpret Edom's fate as Yahweh's punishment (v. 8), though the cause of his action is not specified. The prose of vv. 12–13 contains a confusing reference to drinking from a cup reminiscent of 25:15–29. Verses 17–22, also prose, are dominated by two images: Edom will become like Sodom and Gomorrah, and Yahweh will act like the devouring lion. The latter motif is repeated in the oracle against Babylon (50:44–46).

49:23–39, Damascus, Kedar, Hazor, and Elam. The last three oracles are quite general and do not speak of Yahweh's punishment or vengeance. The only link of the pronouncement against Damascus to Yahweh's action is the stereotypic formula in v. 27 (cf. Amos 1:4). The oracle concerning “Kedar and the kingdoms of Hazor” apparently refers to desert-dwellers in the region between Judah and Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar is identified as the destroyer in both the editorial introduction (v. 28a) and the body of the oracle (v. 30b, which may be a later addition). The introduction (v. 34) to the oracle against Elam, a kingdom to the east of Babylon, provides the date 597, and the two nations may have been in conflict about that time. Elam's destruction is attributed to Yahweh, but no motivation for it is mentioned. Again, there is a concluding promise of restoration (cf. 46:26b; 48:47; 49:6).

50:1–51:64

Against Babylon

The collection in chaps. 50 and 51 begins with a general oracle of destruction (50:2), followed by prose supplements that speak of an attack against Babylon by a nation from the north (vv. 3, 8–10; cf. 50:41–43), the restoration of Israel and Judah (vv. 4–5; see the Short Essay “Expressions of Hope in the Book of Jeremiah”), and yet another reflection on the cause of the Exile (vv. 6–7). Evidently, questions raised by the great national disaster of 587 could not be laid to rest once and for all, and explanations of it bore repeating (cf. 46:27–28).

In 50:11–16, a general oracle of destruction that specifies Yahweh's motivation as vengeance is followed by a prose elaboration that interprets the event as his restoration of Israel and Judah to their land (vv. 17–20). In the remainder of the chapter, oracles and prose alternate. The former speak of Yahweh's motivation (v. 24b) and interpret Babylon's downfall as punishment (v. 31). The latter elaborate these themes: the vengeance occurs because of the destruction of the Temple (v. 28) and because Babylon has magnified itself against Yahweh (vv. 28–30); Babylon's desolation will be like that of Sodom and Gomorrah (vv. 39–40; cf. 49:18); Yahweh will attack Babylon like a savage lion (vv. 44–46, mirroring 49:19–21). In a language reminiscent of Second Isaiah, vv. 33–34 speak of Yahweh as the redeemer of Israel and Judah.

The oracle of 50:41–43 speaks in vague terms about an attack by an enemy from the north (cf. vv. 3, 8–10; 51:48). Later, the enemy is specifically identified with the Medes (51:27–28). Such use of enemy language parallels earlier portions of the book, where Judah's northern enemy is first unspecified and then identified with the Babylonians (see commentary above on 25:1–14).

The passage 51:1–33, 38–44, depicts an attack on Babylon in which the countryside has already been taken (vv. 30–33, 38–43) and its captives are about to be liberated (v. 44). In the midst of this description comes Jerusalem's curse against Babylon and Yahweh's response that he will take vengeance upon Babylon (vv. 34–37). Verses 45–58 are general oracles proclaiming Yahweh's punishment of Babylon. Indeed, the theme of 51:1–58, including its two short prose elaborations (vv. 11b, 24), is that Babylon's destruction should be seen as Yahweh's retribution (vv. 5, 6, 10, 11, 24, 34–37, 44, 47–53, 56).

Jer. 51:59–64a reports a symbolic action (see the Short Essay “Jeremiah's Symbolic Actions”). Jeremiah sends a “book” of oracles against Babylon to Babylon with Baruch's brother in about 594. These are to be read publicly and then tied to a stone and cast into the Euphrates, symbolizing Babylon's fate. Taken at face value, this judgment would contradict the favorable interpretation of Babylonian hegemony that Jeremiah espoused during the reign of Zedekiah (see chaps. 27–29). It has been suggested that the original intention of Jeremiah's action was to rebut the prophecies of Ahab and Zedekiah to the effect that the Exile would be short (see 29:4–9, 20–23). On this interpretation, reading and then destroying a set of anti-Babylonian prophecies would have the effect of stressing Jeremiah's rejection of this optimistic view. The editors who placed this story at the end of the oracles against Babylon had a different purpose in mind, however. With it they claimed that Jeremiah had uttered these prophecies and even delivered them to Babylon long before the events to which they allude.

The short notice in v. 64b marks the end of the book of Jeremiah proper.

Historical Appendix

The narrative of chap. 52 is a close parallel to 2 Kings 24:18-25:30. The only major differences between the two are that this chapter omits the story of Gedaliah (2 Kings 25:22-26; but this story is told in detail in Jer. 40-41) and adds an accounting of the number of persons exiled on the three separate occasions when the Babylonians carried away Judean captives (vv. 28-30). The latter element is absent in the LXX of Jeremiah 52.

LAMENTATIONS

NORMAN K. GOTTFELD

Literary Analysis

Lamentations consists of five closely structured poetic compositions on the topic of the destruction of Jerusalem, poems that both evoke the scenes of catastrophe and articulate the psychic and religious trauma of the survivors. It shares a pervasive lament idiom with Psalms, Job, and the prophetic books of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Second Isaiah (Isaiah 40–55).

All of the laments use an acrostic contrivance that distributes the entire Hebrew alphabet of twenty-two letters in sequence throughout each of the first four chapters and then, in the final chapter, echoes this device through the use of exactly twenty-two short verses. In chaps. 1 and 2, each three-line strophe opens with a word starting with one of the letters in alphabetic sequence, yielding sixty-six lines in all. Chap. 3, also sixty-six lines long, achieves a denser acrostic form by beginning every line with an acrostic word. Chap. 4 reverts to a single use of each acrostic letter, but differs in having only two-line strophes, yielding forty-four lines. The combined line count of sixty-six in the last two laments equals the length of each of the first three laments.

The acrostic structure constrains vocabulary and word order and also breaks the flow of Lamentations 1; 2; 4; and 5 into twenty-two subunits. Hence, Lamentations presents discrete laments, brief cameos of description and terseness of speech. This conciseness is augmented by the decision to give each strophe only three (or two) lines (Ps. 119 devotes eight lines to each acrostic letter). Compactness of form channels and reinforces strongly expressed emotions while guarding against bombast and mawkishness.

Aptness of expression in the first four poems is enhanced by the disproportion in length between the two parts that form each line or sentence; the second part is generally shorter than the first. Such imbalance produces a falling rhythm that is said to "limp," "choke," or "sob" in sympathy with the mournful contents. The final lament, by contrast, maintains an even length between the two sentence elements.

The tendency for the acrostic artifice to break the compositions into fragments is countered by skillful shifts in speaker and point of view, creating continuities of description, feeling, and thought that span several acrostic strophes in pleasingly varied ways. The shifts in speaking voice correspond closely to the conventions of the funeral song, the individual lament, and the communal lament.

Influence of the funeral song (cf. 2 Sam. 1:17–27) shapes the speeches by the poet in 1:1–11, 17; 2:1–12; 3:48–51; and 4:1–6, in which he bewails the fall of Fair Zion (or Daughter of My People) as a personified city. No typical funeral is in view, however. Although likened to a widow and bereaved mother, Zion's "husband" is not dead (only remote and hostile), nor are all her "children" dead since some have survived to remember and ponder what has happened by composing and reciting these very laments. The speech of the poet takes on a dialogic character and addresses Fair Zion in chiding and consolatory manner, inciting her to cry out to Yahweh for deliverance (2:13–18). This same voice declaims a prophetic oracle announcing punishment on Edom and the end of guilt and exile for Judah (4:21–22).

Contours of the individual lament are adopted when personified Jerusalem speaks as a suffering woman (1:12–16, 18–22; 2:20–22). "Mother" Zion incorporates all the pain and anger of her Judahite "children," confessing their collective sins and calling upon God to mitigate or terminate the horrible and extreme suffering. We are made acutely aware that this woman is an imaginative figure who both embodies and stands off from particular Judahites whose condition she reports and bewails. This personification admirably succeeds in infusing mass suffering with the personal meaning that only a specific human sufferer can give it.

The individual laments of chap. 3 are not framed or marked as personifications; they derive their collective reference in part by association with surrounding chapters and more directly from their juxtaposition with an enclosed communal lament (vv. 40–47). Read by themselves, the cries of the unnamed "man" (vv. 1–24) and a subsequent "I" speaker without specified gender (vv. 52–66) are typical individual laments of anonymous sufferers so plentiful in the Psalms. In context, the elusive and ambiguous identity of the speakers in chap. 3 may be entirely purposeful.

Chap. 5 stands apart as a communal lament without the separate speaking voice of the poet or any personification of city or people. Judah speaks in a united voice that erases many earlier ambiguities and brings dramatic closure to the troubled book.

Composition

Lamentations was almost certainly written in the sixth century B.C. to commemorate the destruction of Jerusalem by the Neo-Babylonians in 587. The stock of lament language was, by this time, already richly developed in Israelite religion. Moreover, the genre of lament over a destroyed city probably owes much to ancient Mesopotamian tradition and practice that continued unabated until late biblical times.

The first four laments share vocabulary and stylistic devices, modulation of speaking voice, formal features, and the acrostic scheme. These similarities imply, if not a single author, at least a group or "school" of lament traditionists. On the other hand, each lament is self-contained, displaying marked individuality. Since there are no conspicuous signs that the laments were written "from scratch" as parts of a single work, one may argue for their independent composition, followed by later redaction (compilation). It is possible that the redactor was author of one or more of the laments (chap. 5?) and that minor modifications were made in the text during the course of the book's composition.

The separate laments were created for recitation at annual fast days observed at the site of the ruined Temple during the Exile (Zech. 7:1-7; 8:19). Apparently some form of ritual practice continued at the Temple site throughout the Exile (Jer. 41:5). Other communal laments suitable for these commemorative fasts are Psalms 44, 60, 74, 79, 83, 123, 137. By comparison with the latter, Lamentations displays a high level of artistic complexity, subtlety, and cohesion.

The aim of the acrostic-building poet(s) seems to have been to foster a comprehensive catharsis of grief and confession linked to an inculcation of faith and hope, to be accomplished literally by covering the subject "from A to Z." This explanation of the acrostic form is more satisfying than other theories about the magical power of letters, instructional techniques for scribes, or aids to memory. The impulse to explore the trauma until the topic is "exhausted" is both realized and held in check by the acrostic principle that imposes economy of expression on otherwise boundless grief and shock.

Collection of the individual laments may have been occasioned by a notable event such as the release from exile and anticipation of rebuilding the Temple. This notion has been questioned by some interpreters because there are no traces of release from exile or Temple rebuilding in Lamentations. Nevertheless, the Mesopotamian practice of using just such bleak laments on the occasion of cleansing and rebuilding a temple site suggests that the somberness and restrained hope of the exilic compositions might have been retained as a deliberate reminder of dark days, even after the redactor was aware that the situation had changed for the better.

Amid the rich details of the five laments in their final form, the strongest statement of faith and hope, underscored by the triple acrostic and even by repetitions of the same acrostic word (note the threefold "good" as the acrostic term in 3:25-27), is positioned at the center of the work. By contrast, some scholars have argued for the presence of chiasmic structure, namely, for the correspondence of chaps. 1 and 5 (general "distanced" descriptions) and chaps. 2 and 4 (detailed "emotionally involved" descriptions). However, this pairing of the laments oversimplifies the evidence, since chaps. 1 and 2 form the closest pair in terms of the speaking voices and chaps. 4 and 5 are most similar in their inventories of population groups. While there is no unequivocal progression of thought in the compilation, readers may discern Judah's increasingly profound understanding of its traumatic situation.

Function as Scripture

It is likely that, by the time of Second Isaiah (Isaiah 40-55), the idioms and concepts of the Lamentations "school of thought" had reached Babylonian Jews (cf. Isa. 47; 51:17-23; 54:1-8). The notion of the "satisfaction" of Judah's sin and guilt through prolonged exile is shared by Lam. 4:22 and Isa. 40:2. Moreover, Second Isaiah's use of liturgical genres to communicate his message may owe something to the proven appeal and endurance of communal lament practice based in exilic Jerusalem and demonstrated in Lamentations. Familiarity with Lamentations is also evident in Third Isaiah (Isa. 56-66), 2 Chronicles, Sirach, and Baruch, the latter modeled in part on Lamentations itself.

Following the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. the reading of Lamentations on the ninth of the month of Ab became part of the festal calendar of postbiblical Judaism. Lamentations Rabbah, a Jewish midrash redacted at the end of the fifth century A.D., interprets the biblical text verse by verse and contains a large collection of sayings, stories, and homilies.

The tradition of Jeremian authorship for the book, aided by an erroneous understanding of 2 Chron. 35:25, has contributed to a popular view of Jeremiah as the weeping or sorrowful prophet. Christian liturgies have included Lamentations in readings for Holy Week, thereby referring its descriptions to the sufferings of Christ. Over the centuries, Lamentations often has been set to music, from Gregorian chants through the work of major composers beginning with the Renaissance. Its subject has frequently been applied to later national calamities (e.g., in Polish history and the Jewish Holocaust) and to the fall of other great cities (e.g., Constantinople).

In the Hebrew Bible, Lamentations is reckoned as one of the five Megilloth, or "Scrolls," read at major festivals (the others are Song of Songs, Ruth, Ecclesiastes, and Esther). English versions, following the Septuagint and the Vulgate, place Lamentations after Jeremiah.

In its original setting, Lamentations performed a basic task of historical "grief work." It bridged the gap between primal grief and outrage at the fall of Jerusalem and the ethics and theology by which Jews interpreted the events and oriented their lives. By linking the idioms and concepts of lament to a major historical crisis, Lamentations provided a paradigm according to which Jews and Christians might struggle with the meanings of calamity and work out strategies for living through world-shaking catastrophes, reaching to the wars and massacres of the twentieth century.

Authorship and Setting

To what traditions and to which spokespersons in Judah can we attribute Lamentations? In past interpretation, there has been an overly simple search for a single source. In place of the claim for Jeremian authorship, now almost universally dismissed, scholars have sought to identify sources for the book in the following streams of tradition: prophecy, Deuteronomistic thought, kingship (Davidic-Zion) traditions, priestly theology, or wisdom teaching. In truth, no one such tradition adequately accounts for the book, since, in the riptide of national collapse, the streams were mingling and forcing new channels of thought and action.

Lamentations shares with prophetic and Deuteronomistic thought the firm belief that Judah's "sins" precipitated the catastrophe. This belief is dressed out in the prophetic image of the people as a faithless defiled woman (1:8–9, 17–18, 20; 4:6). In accord with critical prophets, Lamentations condemns the superficial assurances of "false" patriotic prophets who also joined corrupt priests in murdering innocents (2:14; 4:13). The prophetic belief in judgment on the nations as well as on Judah is firmly attested in Lamentations (1:21–22; 4:21–22, cf. 3:58–66), as is the necessity of contrite confession and wholehearted conversion (1:18, 20; 3:39–42; 5:7, 16, 21).

Wisdom affinities with Lamentations show up prominently in 3:25–39, a text in which the transcendent mystery of God is declared, suffering is seen as disciplinary as well as retribu-tive, the long-range justice of God is affirmed, and patient waiting on and hope in God is inculcated.

Royal traditions, namely, those associated with the Davidic line and with Zion, are most evident in the astonished outcries of passersby who thought Jerusalem to be impregnable (2:15–16; 4:12) and in the communal lament of those who trusted totally in their king as "the anointed of Yahweh" (4:20). The poet joins the personified Zion in expressing shocked disbelief at the enemy's violation of the sacred Temple (1:10; 2:6–7, 20). These texts suggest that all the special privileges of David and Zion, which depended on the faithfulness of Judah, have now been justly canceled. It is true that Judah's political leaders are not unambiguously condemned. Nevertheless, the censure of priestly and prophetic complicity with civil rulers presupposes censure of the latter. Moreover, "our fathers sinned and are not" (5:7; cf. 2:9), may refer to the political leadership swept away by death and exile. The focus of Lamentations on faulty religious leadership may be due to the postdestruction reality in which the political leadership is no longer in power. In addition, "old-style" priests and prophets may still be vying for control of the reconstituted religious life in Jerusalem and, thus, threatening the status and credibility of the Lamentations traditionists.

In sum, anyone adhering rigidly to the conventions of a single theological tradition could hardly have woven the web of poetic argument in Lamentations. Strict prophetic and Deuteronomistic adherents viewed the covenant with God as irrevocably broken. Followers of traditional wisdom tenets had little precedent for grappling with the sociopolitical and religious ramifications of the city's fall. Ardent Davidic-Zion loyalists could not abide the breach of the unconditional promises to the holy city, its Temple, and king. Those who thought that Judah's regime and society were just (or at least) as good or better than those of other nations would not have understood or sympathized with the notion that "sins" explained Judah's sad end.

The ritual setting for Lamentations was the ruined Temple site at which place fasting, prayer, and sacrifice were carried on with the apparent permission of the Babylonian overlords. The poets of Lamentations were "priests" in the sense that they were religious personnel. Since, however, the priestly establishment had been shattered with the city's fall, these postdestruction religious leaders may have been former prophets, scribes, political or private laity, or even lower order or non-Jerusalemite priests; their positions were probably without stipend.

Lamentations, in its final form, exhibits a striking and innovative amalgam of prophetic, Deuteronomistic, and wisdom notions that subordinates and neutralizes Davidic-Zion traditions without rejecting them outright. This theology of active engagement with national crisis is the work of poets and pastoral leaders who communicated directly and concretely with the demoralized survivors of 586 B.C.

1:1-22, First Lament of Poet and Zion.

The chapter is divided equally between a lament of the poet (vv. 1-11) and a lament of the personified city, Fair Zion, who, as the object of suffering, becomes through her speaking an independent character (vv. 12-22). The two laments are bound together in a pattern of anticipation and recall by introducing two short cries of Zion into the poet's speech (vv. 9c; 11c) and by inserting a comment by the poet within Zion's speech (v. 17). Verse 7 is overloaded with four lines (NEB gives a likely correction, as also in 2:19).

The note struck by the poet and confirmed by Zion is that the city is bereft of comfort from any source. Her plight is described in lurid fashion: subjection to conquerors and betrayal by former allies, contempt and gloating by her enemies, decimation of her populace by death and exile, profanation of the Temple by the enemy and cessation of festivals, and a dire shortage of food.

Zion takes up her lament by voicing the incomparability of her pain and picturing the angry assault of Yahweh in the metaphors of individual lament. An ironic disintegration of established religious language occurs when God's murder of his people is called "a festival" and a grape-treading harvest (v. 15). Although confessing fully her rebellion, Zion cites mitigating factors in her punishment that merit Yahweh's reconsideration, at least in providing for punishment of Zion's destroyers (vv. 21-22) as well. Uniquely in the OT, Lamentations identifies a past event with the Day of Yahweh as the time of his judgment (v. 12), and Zion pleads that this recently enacted Day of Yahweh be extended to fall upon the arrogant enemy (by inference Babylonia, whose ally Edom is named in 4:21-22).

2:1-22, Second Lament of Poet and Zion.

When compared to chap. 1, the proportions and contents of the speeches by poet and Zion in chap. 2 undergo considerable change. While Zion has much less to say, the poet grows more articulate and reflective, directly addressing Zion and struggling with her to grasp the enormity of the events she has experienced. Again, the Day of Yahweh as judgment is stressed, though this time as a demonic festival at the Temple site, a place at which praise of deity is reversed by God's terrible destruction of his own religious center (vv. 5-7, 22).

The poet moves into close emotional and ideological sympathy with Zion. In line with Zion's speech in chap. 1, he depicts Yahweh as the direct destroyer of the city's fortifications, palaces, and Temple by using a variety of descriptive statements and personifying metaphors. He is overcome by the sight of famished infants dying in their mothers' laps (vv. 11-12). Moreover, consistent with Zion's very first words (1:12), the poet's initial words to Zion bemoan the incomparability and boundlessness of her plight, "for great as the sea is your ruin" (2:13). He deplores the fact that Zion was misled by prophets who gave "slick" oracles of cheap optimism that were out of touch with reality (v. 14). To be sure, Yahweh's decree of judgment remains defensible; nonetheless, the means chosen to punish are bitter and hard for the poet to accept, especially the abrasive taunts of the enemy and the death of children by famine (vv. 17-19).

In her brief lament, Zion enlarges on the poet's disgust and outrage at the gross extremities of the punishment (vv. 20-22). Unlike her speech in chap. 1, she mentions neither her own sins nor the sins of the enemy deserving punishment. Her stress is on the utter unnaturalness of women cannibalizing their own children and of priests and prophets cut down in the sacred Temple precincts. Zion's outcries are grief-stricken and horror-driven reflexes: Look at what you have done, Yahweh! Look at those to whom you have done it, the dying children!

3:1-66, An Individual Laments. The central lament of the collection uses different literary conventions. However, the central theological problem is implicit in the raging grief, guilt, and horror of chaps. 1-2, namely, how are we to understand and live with a merited punishment that has produced such shocking and excessive results, one that creates new injustices?

The stark and solemn intonation of the initial verse, "I am the man who has seen affliction by the rod of his wrath," breaks sharply with the previous personification of Fair Zion. Nonetheless, this new language operates on a similar "wavelength" in expressing the enervating burden of suffering at God's hand.

The major difficulty in interpreting this chapter is the veiled identity of the speakers. This problem may not have existed when the lament was recited in worship, since intonations in delivery, explanatory rubrics, even different speaking voices, may have clarified the issue. The shift to a written text created a new context of meaning, less immediate and more dependent on the eye and experience of the reader. The readactor may have left the speakers in anonymity as an artifice to deepen readers' involvement in the engagement with suffering: what do we learn about national suffering when we see it through the lens of individual sufferers who have attained hope and meaning amid all their adversities?

The precise identity of speakers may not be as crucial for understanding the argument as commentators have usually thought. Nevertheless, any careful reading of this chapter requires some tentative conclusions about who speaks to whom and with what import. Many options have been proposed, yielding a rich variety of nuances to the function of chap. 3 within the book.

Is the "man" of vv. 1-24 Jeremiah, the poet, an anonymous sufferer, or a masculine personification of the people? Second Isaiah uses both the feminine Zion and masculine Servant personifications for the people. Traces of the same practice occur in the Jacob references of Lam. 1:17; 2:2-3. And who declaims the lofty theological truths of 3:25-39? Is this still the voice of the "man" who has now found answer to his lament? Or is this the voice of the poet, expounding and enlarging on the more tentative "hope" of the "man" in vv. 21-24? Lastly, whose is the "I" voice (or voices) of vv. 48-66? Verses 48-51 read like an interjection of the agitated poet. However, is the speaker once again the "man," or is it Fair Zion (cf. v. 48), or yet another voice, or even, as some have thought, the solo voice of the liturgical leader in a communal lament?

In the midst of these speeches by individuals, an unmistakable communal lament, which seems at first wholly out of place (vv. 40-47), breaks forth. It lacks both the confident insight and faith that precedes it and the certainty of hearing and deliverance that follows. While this national lament is premised on complete sincerity ("Let us lift up our hearts, not our hands, to God in the heavens!" v. 41), it is otherwise "stuck" at a level of frustrated religious traditionalism in which faith and hope are not yet internalized and integrated with grief and contrition.

By enfolding the frustrated communal lament within faith-affirming and hope-engendering individual laments and meditations, the author (confirmed in his intent by the redactor) points toward a life-giving way that has been found by sufferers whose discoveries increasingly inform the outlook of the people on their road to new life.

4:1-22, Third Lament of Poet and City.

This lament, teeming with vivid scenes of hardship and disgrace among the survivors in Jerusalem, is divided, like chaps. 1 and 2, between two speakers. Striking, however, is the minimal presence of Fair Zion (only in vv. 3, 6, with a trace in v. 10), until she emerges in prophetic proclamation at the end (vv. 21-22). In place of the Fair Zion speeches in chaps. 1 and 2, the city expresses itself in a communal lament (vv. 17-20). The individualized presentation of Judah's suffering, characteristic of chaps. 1-3, gives way here and in chap. 5 to overt communal discourse by the collective body of sufferers.

The lament as a whole lays bare the physical, sociopolitical, and moral fragility of the upper classes. Political and religious leaders failed equally. Perfidious prophets and priests are rejected as though they are lepers (vv. 13-16). The lamenting people acknowledge their misplaced trust in allies and in their own king (vv. 17-19). The prophetic announcement of the end to Zion's punishment vindicates the hope expressed in chap. 3 and is to be read not as jingoism, but as Judah's renunciation of all false hopes.

5:1-22, The Community Laments. In this communal lament, the author introduces perspectives of economic hardship, social disorder, and political restrictions among the inhabitants of the Babylonian subprovince of Judah. Such a description of Judah's reproachful situation is designed to elicit divine intervention.

Significantly, the lament holds to the paradox disclosed in chap. 3 and sustained by the poet in chap. 4, namely, that Judah has both sinned and been sinned against. This time, however, the insight is internalized and expressed by the whole community. Judah's ambivalence and schizophrenia about the tension between deserved and undeserved suffering is resolved. The people are now enabled to own up to their sins (vv. 7, 16) at the very same time they appeal for their disgrace and oppression to be relieved (vv. 1, 17-20). The lament focuses on this new maturity. In a closing appeal to Yahweh, the people seek a restored relationship with their God (v. 21).

There is a critical caveat, however, expressed in the final troubled question, "Or have you utterly rejected us? Are you angry with us beyond recall?" (v. 22). Has Judah learned her lesson too late? Does God still honor a covenant with the Judahites or has he broken off his relationship with them irrevocably? The unclouded confidence of 3:25-39, 52-66 is not yet firmly within the people's collective grasp. Even so, the overarching sense of the book is that the enduring trust situated at the center of the collection in chap. 3 will in time prevail among those who mourn Jerusalem by praying to Yahweh.

EZEKIEL

ROBERT R. WILSON

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Ezekiel has always been difficult to understand. Since antiquity ordinary readers have found the book's language, images, and theology puzzling, while scholars have often been embarrassed both by the contents of the book and by their own inability to produce an adequate commentary on it. In the history of Christian biblical scholarship, the interpretive difficulties associated with the book were already apparent as early as Jerome (ca. A.D. 340–420), whose commentaries are filled with apologies for his inability to clarify obscure passages. Other early Church Fathers resorted to numerological interpretation to squeeze theological meaning from the text, and their more modern counterparts have sometimes employed textual emendation or radical surgery to solve the book's problems.

In Jewish tradition the interpretation of Ezekiel has been particularly difficult because some of the legal material contained in chaps. 40–48 contradicts the laws of the Torah. The Babylonian Talmud reports that this fact caused some rabbis to advocate withdrawing the book from circulation, a fate that was avoided only through the extraordinary efforts of Hananiah son of Hezekiah, who successfully reconciled the contradictions (b. Šabb. 13b; b. Hag. 13a; b. Menah. 45a). Equally troublesome to the rabbis was the vision of God's glory described in Ezekiel 1, a passage that they feared might lead to dangerous mystical speculations or even destroy the interpreter who probed too deeply into its mysteries. According to the Talmud, Hananiah son of Hezekiah was again able to persuade his colleagues not to withdraw Ezekiel, although Jerome reports that some rabbis prohibited the reading of the beginning and end of the book by anyone under the age of thirty (b. Hag. 13a).

In spite of the interpretive problems associated with Ezekiel and the occasional efforts to withdraw it from circulation, there is no indication that early Jewish or Christian interpreters ever questioned the canonicity or divine inspiration of the book. In most biblical manuscripts it appears after the books of Isaiah and Jeremiah as the third of the major prophets, an order that more or less accurately reflects the historical sequence in which the books were composed. However, the Babylonian Talmud (b. B. Bat. 14b) also knows of a tradition that places Ezekiel after Jeremiah but before Isaiah. This arrangement is based on the contents of the books rather than on the chronology of their creation and is reflected in some biblical manuscripts.

Even a brief survey of the history of the study of the book of Ezekiel suggests that scholars are not ever likely to agree on a definitive interpretation of this complex and puzzling book. However, many of the difficulties associated with understanding the book can be minimized by bearing in mind the historical, sociological, and religious settings in which the book was produced and by cultivating a sensitivity to the book's structure and peculiar literary style.

The Prophet and His Times

Unlike many of the prophetic books, which are difficult to date precisely and which contain oracles that have been lifted from their original historical contexts, the book of Ezekiel often assigns very precise dates to the oracles and visions that it contains and to the events that it records (1:1–3; 3:16; 8:1; 20:1; 24:1; 26:1; 29:1; 17; 30:20; 31:1; 32:1, 17; 33:21; 40:1). These dates root the book in a specific historical context and suggest that an understanding of that context is necessary for a proper understanding of Ezekiel's prophecies.

The Exile and Its Theological Implications. The book's own chronology places Ezekiel's prophetic call in Babylon during the fifth year of the Exile of King Jehoiachin of Judah (1:2), and the latest dated oracle in the book is assigned to the twenty-seventh year of the Exile (29:17). The prophet was thus active at least between July 593 B.C. and April 571 B.C., although the bulk of his oracles are dated to the relatively brief period between his call and the arrival of the first Jewish exiles in Babylon (January 585 B.C.), not long after the Babylonians destroyed Jerusalem (33:21). Ezekiel's prophetic activities thus partially overlapped those of Jeremiah and must be seen against the chaotic background of the last years of the Judean state.

The Political Situation. The political crisis that led to the fall of Jerusalem had been developing for a number of years before Ezekiel began to prophesy. After the death of the Assyrian king Ashurbanipal (669 B.C.), the widespread empire that he had ruled began to break apart. With this political instability came a rebirth of nationalism on the periphery of the empire, especially in Babylon, Egypt, and Palestine. In Judah King Josiah was able to establish a kingdom that was relatively free from Assyrian control, and he moved to reclaim Assyrian territory that had historically been part of the Northern Kingdom, Israel. In connection with his political expansion, he also instituted a religious reform that restored the worship of Yahweh to the land (2 Kings 22–23; 2 Chron. 34–35). However, this period of Judean independence was relatively brief. Even as Josiah was rebuilding his state, Egypt and Babylon were beginning to struggle with each other for control of the old Assyrian Empire. During this struggle Josiah was killed when he tried to prevent Pharaoh Neco II from coming to the aid of the Assyrians in their fight with the Babylonians and the Medes (609 B.C.). At Josiah's death, his son Jehoahaz became king, but after only three months Pharaoh Neco returned to Judah, deposed Jehoahaz, and installed another son of Josiah, Jehoiakim, as king. Judah became an Egyptian vassal, and Jehoiakim levied heavy taxes on the people in order to pay the required tribute (2 Kings 23:31–35). This move caused great dissatisfaction in the land and encouraged some political groups to oppose the king's pro-Egyptian policy. During this period of unrest, the power of Babylon gradually grew, and by 603 B.C. Jehoiakim was forced to become subject to the Babylonians. This shift of allegiance gave rise to further political disputes in Judah, with some factions advocating a pro-Babylonian foreign policy, others counseling a return to reliance on Egypt, and still others arguing for the restoration of a politically independent Judean state.

Thinking that the power of the Babylonian king, Nebuchadnezzar II, was declining, Jehoiakim rebelled in 601 B.C. and again threw in his lot with Egypt. This was a serious miscalculation, which the Babylonian king eventually punished. Late in 598 B.C., the Babylonian army moved against Judah and laid siege to Jerusalem. Sometime during this period Jehoiakim died or was killed, and his son, Jehoiachin, was placed on the throne. In March 597 B.C., the new king surrendered Jerusalem to the Babylonians. Jehoiachin was deported to Babylon, along with a number of palace and Temple officials and craftsmen, including the prophet Ezekiel (2 Kings 24:14–16; Ezek. 1:1–3). The Temple and royal treasuries were drained, and some of the Temple vessels were either destroyed (2 Kings 24:13) or taken to Babylon (Jer. 27).

For Ezekiel and his fellow exiles, the events of 597 marked the beginning of the Exile. However, for those left in Jerusalem, life continued on its normal course. Nebuchadnezzar installed Jehoiachin's uncle, Zedekiah, on the throne but continued to use the title "king" to refer to the exiled Jehoiachin. This move added to Judah's instability by encouraging disputes over the legitimacy of Zedekiah. Many people left in Judah apparently accepted his authority (2 Kings 24:18–20; Jer. 22:24–30), while at least some of the exiles continued to recognize Jehoiachin as king (Ezek. 1:2). Nevertheless, during the first years of his reign, Zedekiah managed to maintain a stable foreign policy and remained a faithful vassal of Babylon, in spite of the continued presence of groups advocating pro-Egyptian and nationalistic positions. However, in the end he was unable to resist his pro-Egyptian advisers, and he joined with other nearby rulers in an attempt to break away from Babylonian control (Jer. 27–28). This conspiracy, which was probably encouraged by Pharaoh Psammetichus II, was not successful, and Zedekiah was forced to reaffirm his loyalty to Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 29:3; 51:59).

In spite of the inability of Zedekiah and his fellow rulers to remove the Babylonian yoke, popular pressure for revolt continued in Judah. Although Zedekiah apparently had some misgivings about further provoking Babylon (Jer. 21:1–7; 37:3–10, 17; 38:14–23), he eventually gave in to pressure from some of his own advisers and rebelled, probably with assurances of aid from Pharaoh Hophra, Psammetichus' successor. This time Nebuchadnezzar acted more quickly and decisively. In 588 B.C. he invaded Judah, destroying a number of cities, and laid siege to Jerusalem. The city finally fell in the summer of 586 B.C. (Some scholars date the fall to the summer of 587.) Zedekiah and some of the royal court attempted to flee the country but were captured by the Babylonians. The king's sons were killed, and he himself was blinded and taken captive to Babylon. Jerusalem was destroyed, most of its inhabitants were deported to Babylon, and the Temple was burned. Nebuchadnezzar attempted to restore some political stability by appointing a Judean noble, Gedaliah, to be governor over the "poor of the land" who still remained in Judah. However, Gedaliah was soon murdered, and the land again became politically unstable. The Babylonian response to these events probably included another deportation (582 B.C.) and the incorporation of Judah into the Babylonian province of Samaria, but the available historical sources provide no further information.

The Religious Situation. The political chaos that eventually led to the fall of Jerusalem triggered a number of theological problems, both for the exiles in Babylon and for the people who remained in Judah. These problems began with the first deportation (597 B.C.), when Israel's religious leadership was split between Jerusalem and Babylon. Both groups naturally attempted to provide theological interpretations of the events that had just occurred, but these interpretations did not always agree, and the result was a growing religious controversy that reached crisis proportions after the final destruction of the city and the Temple. Several important theological issues were involved. First, there were debates over the meaning of the first deportation. Some Israelite religious leaders, principally the authors of the books of Kings and the prophet Jeremiah, had for some time been warning the people that the sins of Judah and its kings would eventually be punished by God (2 Kings 21:8-9, 14-15; 23:26-27, 32, 37; 24:1-9; Jer. 14:1-15:4; 36). Therefore, when the first deportation occurred, there was general agreement, even among the exiles, that the prophecies of judgment had come true. However, there were disputes about the completeness of the judgment. Did God's exile of Jehoiachin and his officials represent a final word of divine judgment, or were the people who remained in Jerusalem still in danger of additional punishment if they did not change their ways?

Second, there were debates about the length of the Exile and the possibility of return to the land. These debates initially arose after the first deportation and intensified after the second one. Jeremiah and the writers of Kings sometimes speak as if the deportations represent God's complete and final rejection of Israel (2 Kings 21:10-15; 24:3; Jer. 14:1-15:14; 17:1-4). But Jeremiah's ultimate word on the subject was to prophesy a return after a long but limited exile. Other prophets, however, disagreed and soon after the first deportation began to speak of a rapid return of the exiles and a restoration of normal worship in the Temple (Jer. 27-32).

Third, there were debates about the status of the exiles in Babylon after the first deportation. Did the fact that they had been removed from God's chosen city mean that they had been rejected and were no longer part of the true Israel? This issue was obviously of great concern to the exiles, who were anxious to clarify their religious status (Ezek. 11:14-21). Furthermore, the theological status of those in exile had a direct bearing upon their religious life in Babylon. Did the fact that the exiles were separated from the land of Israel mean that they could no longer worship God? If they were free to worship, then what form should that worship take? These questions took on new urgency after the second deportation, when Israel was geographically scattered in Babylon, Israel, and Egypt. Disputes over the identity of the true Israel continued to be a feature of religious life until the issue was finally resolved in favor of the Babylonian exiles.

Fourth, between 597 B.C. and 586 B.C. there were increasingly heated debates among prophets reflecting differing points of view. These debates can be seen most clearly in the book of Jeremiah, where Jeremiah is often portrayed in conflict with his fellow prophets. While he warned of the imminent destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, other prophets were confidently predicting that the city would be spared (Jer. 6:14-15; 14:13-14; 23:13-40). While Jeremiah was speaking of a long exile, the prophet Hananiah was telling Jerusalemites that the Exile was almost over (Jer. 27-28). While Jeremiah was advocating surrender to the Babylonians, exiled Judean prophets in Babylon were counseling revolt (Jer. 29:15-32). Although it is easy in retrospect to determine which prophets were speaking truly and which were not, the people who lived at the time had a great deal of difficulty adjudicating these conflicting prophetic claims. People finally came to be suspicious of all prophets, and even major prophets like Jeremiah and Ezekiel had to defend their prophetic authority at every turn. The words of Ezekiel were particularly open to question because he prophesied in Babylon, and many Israelites apparently doubted that true prophecy could exist outside the land of Israel.

Finally, the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple in 586 B.C. provoked intense debate about the nature of God's relationship to the city. An important element of the royal theology of Jerusalem was the belief that God had elected David and his descendants to be the eternal rulers of Israel (2 Sam. 7). Furthermore, at the same time God had elected the city as the divine dwelling place forever. Once Solomon built the Temple, God took up residence there and was enthroned above the cherubim in the Holy of Holies. Because of God's eternal presence in the Temple, both the city and the Temple were inviolable. This belief in the eternal election and invulnerability of Jerusalem was celebrated in Israel's worship (Pss. 2, 42, 46, 78, 110, 132) and was accepted, at least in modified form, by some of Israel's prophets. Isaiah, for example, held that God might punish the city but would not finally destroy it. There would always be a remnant after the judgment, and a Davidic king would always remain on the throne (Isa. 7:10-25; 8:1-10; 28:1-22; 29:1-24; 30:15-28; 33:1-24). Even during the last days of the siege the prophetic opponents of Jeremiah continued to proclaim that the city was inviolable because of God's eternal dwelling in it.

However, when the city finally fell, serious questions had to be raised about this theology. Did the destruction of the city and the Temple mean that God had broken the divine promise and rejected Jerusalem and David's line? Or, even worse, had God lacked the power to defend the city against the Babylonians? These questions had a particular urgency for the Babylonian exiles, most of whom, like Ezekiel, were former officials in Jerusalem and participants in rituals that celebrated God's eternal presence. Clearly it was necessary for the exiles to find some satisfactory theological explanation for the situation in which they found themselves if they were to retain their ancestral faith.

The Person of the Prophet. Unlike Jeremiah, whose book contains a number of biographical narratives, Ezekiel is a dark and enigmatic figure in the history of prophecy. Very little is known of his personal life. He was the son of Buzi, who is otherwise unknown, and came from a priestly family. Presumably Ezekiel functioned as a priest himself until his deportation to Babylon in 597 B.C. (1:3). There he was settled near Nippur at Tel-abib (3:15), a site whose name suggests that it was an ancient ruin pressed into service as a settlement for the exiles. He was married, although his wife suddenly died just before the fall of Jerusalem (24:15–18). Nothing is known of his fate after his last dated oracle. Postbiblical sources do supply accounts of his death, but these are usually considered unreliable.

Even though the book of Ezekiel contains little biographical information, it does shed a great deal of light on the prophet's behavior, much of which appears bizarre to modern readers. As a prophet he was the recipient of elaborate visions (chaps. 1–3, 8–11, 40–48) in which he was sometimes transported from one place to another. He is said to have performed strange symbolic acts (chaps. 4–5), some of which appear to be physically impossible. In some of his oracles (e.g., chap. 7), his words appear irrational, and he seems to have lost all self-control. When God commands the prophet to act, he seems unable to do so until he has been energized by the spirit (2:2). Finally, from his call until the fall of Jerusalem he claims to have been bound, confined to his house, and struck dumb (3:22–27; 33:21–22).

To many modern commentators, Ezekiel's strange behavior appears pathological, and there have been a number of attempts to discover the specific psychological and physiological diseases from which he suffered. Such procedures are always risky when ancient texts are involved and, in addition, overlook the probability that the entire book is a literary creation. However, to say this is not to imply that the book is a work of fiction. It is likely that the behavior and experiences described had a basis in reality. But it is also likely that they have been elaborated in writing for the benefit of the exilic audience. If so, then the narratives might yield information about the prophet's actual behavior, but they are better interpreted literarily for the light that they might shed on his overall message, the communication of which was the prophet's goal from the beginning. The descriptions of bizarre behavior may well have been part of the message that Ezekiel wished to convey.

The Original Audience. The book provides overwhelming evidence that Ezekiel prophesied only in Babylon, where his audience would have consisted of his fellow exiles. He presumably also had a small band of disciples that accepted his prophetic authority, revered his message, and preserved his words for later generations. His primary audience would therefore have been the former elite of Jerusalem, including a number of government officials, scribes, and priests. This would have been a relatively well educated audience and one well versed in the religious traditions of Jerusalem.

The fact that Ezekiel sometimes directs his oracles to the people in Jerusalem rather than to the Babylonian exiles has led some scholars to argue that he, in fact, traveled back and forth between the two locations. To support this line of reasoning they point to the prophet's detailed knowledge of events in the Temple (chaps. 8–11) and to the resemblances between his oracles and those of his Jerusalemite contemporary, Jeremiah. However, prophets often address oracles to people who are not present, and there is no reason to suppose that Ezekiel felt constrained to be in the actual presence of the people to whom he was speaking. As for his knowledge of events in Jerusalem, including the oracles of Jeremiah, the book of Jeremiah itself indicates that there was a lively exchange of correspondence between the community in Jerusalem and the exiles. Jeremiah wrote letters to some of the exiles, and in turn exiled religious leaders wrote to Jerusalem to complain about Jeremiah's prophecies, of which they obviously knew (Jer. 29). There is therefore no reason to suppose that Ezekiel ever prophesied outside of Babylon. He returned to Jerusalem only in his visions, but he very likely kept in touch with events in Jerusalem, about which he and all the rest of the exiles would have been greatly concerned.

Ezekiel as a Literary Work

Many of the interpretive problems connected with the book of Ezekiel stem from its unusual character as a literary composition. On the one hand, the book gives an overall impression of structural unity. On the other hand, the individual oracles are quite unlike those in earlier prophetic books. Where the oracles of earlier prophets are usually relatively brief and coherent, those of Ezekiel are often long, highly ornamented, repetitious, convoluted, and sometimes obscure. An understanding of the book's message must be based on a thorough understanding of how the book came to be in its present literary form.

Structure and Contents. Three major structural devices are used to give coherent shape to the book of Ezekiel. First, the book makes extensive use of dates to mark important events and oracles, and these dates indicate that the book is organized chronologically. The book opens with the earliest event (ca. 593 B.C.), the prophet's call (1:1–3; 3:16). The next dated event (592 B.C.) is the great Temple vision, which definitively explains to the prophet the fate of Jerusalem (8:1). The prophet's important account of the history of Israel's sin (chap. 20) is dated to 591 B.C. The beginning of Jerusalem's siege (24:1) is dated in 588 B.C., while the various oracles against foreign nations (chaps. 25–32) bear dates between 587 and 585. News of Jerusalem's fall (33:21) is said to have reached Babylon in 585, and the eschatological vision of the restored Temple (chaps. 40–48) is assigned a date of 573. This neat chronological arrangement is disturbed only by the later revision of an oracle against Tyre (29:17), which bears the date of 571.

The chronological ordering of material in the book is reinforced by a second structuring device, the arrangement of oracles and visions according to content. Thus chaps. 1–24 contain primarily words of judgment against Judah and Jerusalem, while chaps. 34–48 record primarily words of promise to the exiles. This last section is immediately preceded by the pivotal chap. 33, which repeats the prophet's call and records the news of Jerusalem's fall. Between these two large units containing words of doom and salvation respectively, the prophet has inserted a collection of oracles against foreign nations (chaps. 25–32). These chapters serve as a transition between the oracles of judgment (chaps. 1–24) and the oracles of promise (chaps. 34–48) by sharing the character of both their neighbors. On the one hand, the oracles against foreign nations contain words of judgment directed at Israel's enemies just as the preceding chapters speak of judgment against Israel. On the other hand, the announcement of disaster to Israel's foes functions obliquely as a promise to Israel, just as the following chapters contain explicit promises to Israel.

This organization of the book according to content is not perfect. There are a few words of promise mixed in with the oracles of judgment in the first part of the book (11:14–21; 16:60–62; 17:22–24), and this section also contains calls for the people to repent (14:6; 18:30–32). Similarly, the words of promise in the latter part of the book are occasionally mixed with references to judgment (e.g., 34:1–10; 36:16–32). Nevertheless, readers are left with the overall impression that, up to the time of the fall of Jerusalem, Ezekiel spoke mainly words of judgment and that after the fall he switched to words of promise. The organization of the book thus reinforces two of the most prominent themes found in the individual oracles. First, Jerusalem is destined to be destroyed for its sin, and nothing can be done to save it. There can be no talk of salvation until after the judgment has occurred. Second, after Israel has been punished, God will be faithful to the promises made to David and will restore Jerusalem's status as the eternal divine dwelling place. In spite of their severe punishment, both the people and the city remain God's elect.

Finally, a measure of literary structure is achieved in the book through the use of repetitive images and words. This device is used on many levels, but the most obvious example is the verbatim repetition of part of the prophet's call narrative (3:16–21; 33:1–9), the second occurrence of which marks a crucial shift in the prophet's message. Connected with this example are the narratives of the onset and removal of the prophet's dumbness (3:22–27; 33:21–22), which are also correlated with the two reports of the prophet's call and with the fall of Jerusalem. Equally important from a theological standpoint are the three long vision reports, which are closely linked linguistically and thematically. The first vision describes the appearance of God's glory in Babylon and provides the occasion for the prophet's call (chaps. 1–3). The second vision graphically portrays the judgment on Jerusalem and the Temple and the movement of the divine glory out of the sinful city (chaps. 8–11). This vision serves as the introduction to the longest and most complex of Ezekiel's oracles of judgment. Finally, the third vision (chaps. 40–48) summarizes the oracles of promise and describes the return of the divine glory to a rebuilt and reconsecrated Temple.

The various literary devices that have been used to structure the book reinforce each other, so that readers' overall impression is one of unity. The book has been carefully organized at some stage of its compositional history, and that organization itself conveys part of the prophet's message.

Process of Composition. Given the overall impression of unity that the book of Ezekiel makes on readers, it is not surprising that since antiquity interpreters have treated the book as the work of a single author. Even with the rise of modern critical scholarship in the middle of the nineteenth century, the book managed to escape scholarly dissection. When critics gradually came to believe that Israelite prophets originally gave their oracles orally and that oral prophecies were by necessity brief and compact, it was clear that Ezekiel did not fit this typical pattern. Scholars therefore concluded that Ezekiel must have composed his oracles originally in writing, intending them to be read and studied rather than heard. To be sure, some scholars believed that the present Masoretic Text (MT) of Ezekiel had been corrupted during the process of transmission, and they therefore sought to restore the original text, usually on the basis of the Septuagint (LXX). However, they did not challenge the basic consensus that Ezekiel was the product of a single authorial mind.

When the challenge finally came, it came not on literary grounds but on religious grounds. Some scholars began to believe that ecstasy was a basic part of the prophetic experience and that literature created while the prophet was in an ecstatic state must necessarily be poetic. This romantic notion led scholars to be suspicious of prosaic passages in prophetic books and encouraged the elimination of such passages as later additions. When these critics looked at Ezekiel in this light, they saw clear signs of ecstasy coupled with long, repetitious, and very unpoetic oracles. The conclusion to be drawn was clear. The prosaic passages in the book must be the work of the prophet's disciples or later editors, and an attempt must be made to remove these editorial layers to recapture Ezekiel's original words. With some variations, this approach to the book has dominated biblical scholarship in the twentieth century and is best represented in the mammoth commentary of Walther Zimmerli (see Bibliography below).

However, there are several problems with this sort of approach to the book. First, the various applications of this form of research have produced little agreement on what in the book is original to the prophet and what is the work of the disciples. While this fact in and of itself does not invalidate the method of research being used, it does prompt the interpreter to despair of ever achieving definitive results. Second, the theory that the book consists of a collection of original oracles augmented sporadically by later editors conflicts with the book's rather cohesive literary structure. On the whole, the book does not appear to be the product of random editing. Finally, there are no good reasons for thinking that the oracles in the book were originally in oral form and at least three good reasons for suspecting that Ezekiel was a written composition from the beginning.

The first reason for treating Ezekiel as an original written composition is that while the prophet is often told to deliver oracles to the people, he is rarely portrayed as doing so. Instead he is pictured sitting in his house and restricting his activities among the people. This point cannot be pressed too far, but the description of the prophet may be indicative of a shift away from earlier modes of prophetic activity. Second, the assumption that Ezekiel was written from the beginning can easily account for the complex oracles and symbolic acts that the book contains. While complex prophecies are difficult to deliver orally and hard for hearers to understand, written prophecies are easily elaborated and invite careful and repeated study. Finally, the physical limitations that the exile placed on prophets like Ezekiel and Second Isaiah (Isa. 40–55) would have encouraged the production of written prophecy. Before the Exile, prophets could go to the nation's capital or to a major shrine and deliver oral prophecies addressed to the whole nation. With the Exile, however, Israel was scattered throughout Israel, Egypt, and Babylon. Communication would have been impossible or at least severely hampered without writing. The geographic dispersion of Israel would probably have encouraged prophets to write down their oracles and distribute them to the widely separated Israelite communities rather than try to rely on traditional oral methods of delivery.

Considerations such as these have led some scholars in recent years to revive the older theory that Ezekiel was first composed by the prophet in writing during the period indicated by the dates in the book. This approach has been applied most successfully in the commentary of Moshe Greenberg (see Bibliography below) and will be adopted in the commentary that follows. It will be assumed that Ezekiel initially created his prophecies in written form, although he or his disciples may have subsequently revised them in the light of changing conditions or later revelations. For the most part such later editorial activity is difficult to detect, and no systematic attempt will be made to treat any but the most obvious cases. The period of composition is assumed to be that delineated by the book itself, although there are a few examples of much later material.

Literary Style: Prophecy in Search of Form. It is not clear precisely when the transition took place in Israel between prophecy that was originally oral and prophecy that was originally written. Early prophetic books, such as Amos, still show signs of oral composition, while the latest ones, such as Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, were clearly produced first in writing. Precisely where Ezekiel fits in this spectrum is uncertain, but it is likely that he was a major transitional figure. As the first exilic prophet, he had to come to grips with both the limitations and the possibilities that writing offers. On the negative side, writing makes prophecy less malleable and less able to respond quickly to new situations and new audiences. After a certain point, written prophecies tend not to be altered but rather to be interpreted. On the positive side, writing permits a more detailed elaboration of the material and opens up the possibility of creating new literary forms. The result is a powerful and effective means of communicating the prophet's message.

As one of the first to produce written prophecy, Ezekiel had few models to guide him in his search for forms appropriate to the new medium. To be sure, there were the traditional patterns that prophets had followed in creating spoken oracles, and he could and did develop those. But he also experimented with new forms, some of which influenced later prophetic writings and some of which left little trace in later literature.

Autobiographical Narrative. Among the biblical prophets who left books, Amos was the first to try to communicate the divine word by recounting his own experiences with God. In the prophet's vision reports (Amos 7–9), he described to his hearers his encounters with God and embedded his oracles in this narrative context. Similarly, Hosea used an account of his marriage to portray to his audience the relationship between Israel and God (Hos. 3:1–5), and Jeremiah used autobiography to report his reactions to his prophetic task (e.g., Jer. 11:18–12:13). However, in all three of these cases biographical narratives are also employed, and in the case of Jeremiah they dominate a large portion of the book (Amos 7:10–15; Hos. 1:2–11; Jer. 20–52). However, Ezekiel develops the autobiographical approach in a massive way. With the exception of 1:2–3, the entire book takes the form of a first-person narrative. No one else talks about the prophet; rather, he tells his own story. Furthermore, in his extensive vision reports, he leads his readers through the vision as he himself experienced it. Even though he may understand in retrospect the significance of what he saw, he resists the temptation to summarize or interpret for members of his audience. Rather, he allows an awareness to dawn on them just as it had dawned on him. By using this method, the prophet is better able to convince his readers of the truth of his message.

In addition to using the autobiographical narrative literally, Ezekiel sometimes uses it symbolically. His life and behavior become signs that his readers must interpret just as they must interpret his words. This phenomenon is particularly noticeable in his prophetic actions (e.g., chaps. 4–5), where everything that the prophet does takes on a larger significance. These acts are sometimes highly developed literarily, with the result that Ezekiel describes his actions as if he were a character in a surrealistic drama. Even the prophet's "normal" behavior at times has a symbolic quality to it that invites study and analysis.

Older Prophetic Traditions. Ezekiel was, of course, heir to Israel's prophetic traditions and drew from them literary and thematic material, which he then transformed. His prophetic roots are particularly clear at the literary level. Thus, for example, he introduces his oracles with a standard prophetic formula, modified slightly to fit his autobiographical format: "Thus said the Lord [to me]." He adopts from earlier prophecy the divine oath ("as I live said/says the Lord") and often uses it to reinforce the truth of a prophecy. Ezekiel takes over the vision report, which was employed sparingly in earlier prophetic traditions, and uses it to compose a major part of his book (chaps. 1–3; 8–11; 40–48). In chaps. 8–11 and 40–48 he also introduces the figure of a heavenly guide who leads the prophet through the vision and supplies necessary interpretation. Such guides eventually became a routine part of vision reports, appearing in Zechariah, Daniel, and a number of postbiblical apocalypses. Ezekiel makes considerable use of accounts of symbolic prophetic acts. Such acts had appeared occasionally in earlier prophecy, but Ezekiel's descriptions are much more highly elaborated than those of his predecessors (cf. chaps. 4–5). Finally, he continues to use the old prophetic literary pattern usually called "the announcement of judgment to the individual." Oracles of this sort usually begin with a description of the addressee's crime, often using verbs in participial form, and then move on to an announcement of the penalty, typically introduced by the messenger formula ("thus said/says the Lord"). Lying behind some of the prophet's most complex oracles is this simple pattern, which was a basic part of prophetic speech at least as early as Amos.

In addition to developing older prophetic speech patterns, Ezekiel also drew on the prophetic traditions themselves. One of the models that shaped his work was certainly the prophetic story, a number of which may be found in the books of Samuel and Kings. The fact that these stories were already in written form when Ezekiel used them made their appropriation relatively simple, and as a result there are numerous thematic and linguistic links between Ezekiel and the earlier prophetic narratives. Similarly Ezekiel seems to have known of the work of Hosea and Jeremiah, two prophets outside of Ezekiel's own theological tradition. From them, as well as from the books of Samuel and Kings, he drew their characteristic emphasis on the covenant, as well as the notion that God's promises to Jerusalem were contingent on the behavior of the people.

New Literary Forms. In addition to elaborating older prophetic literary forms, Ezekiel also developed new ones. Earlier prophets had used a number of vivid literary images and figures of speech to help communicate their messages, but Ezekiel enormously extended the range and complexity of the images that he used. He created a highly metaphorical type of discourse that closely resembles what modern readers would recognize as allegory (e.g., chaps. 16–17). These “allegories” are so complex that they are sometimes difficult to interpret, and the situation is not helped by the prophet’s tendency to lose control of his images by allowing the underlying historical reality or the prophet’s own theological perspective to skew them beyond recognition. Yet even though the prophet seems not to have completely mastered this new form, his work influenced later biblical writings (e.g., Dan. 2, 7–12).

Ezekiel also seems to have been the originator of the “disputation oracle.” Such oracles usually begin with the quotation of a saying current in the community that the prophet is addressing. The common wisdom expressed in the saying is then vigorously refuted, sometimes by the citation of cases expressed in legal form (e.g., Ezek. 12:21–28; 18:1–32; 33:10–20).

One of the most characteristic inventions of Ezekiel is the “proof-saying,” the components of which he took from older traditions and applied to prophetic oracles. The proof-saying is marked by the use of the formula “and you will know that I am Yahweh,” which is attached to God’s first-person account of a divine action. It is employed frequently in judgment oracles, where God concludes the announcement of judgment by announcing that the promised disaster will reveal God to the people. The people are assured that they will encounter God in judgment, which cannot be interpreted as the result of impersonal natural forces.

Priestly Tradition. Because of his priestly background, Ezekiel was thoroughly familiar with ritual language and with priestly law, so it is not surprising that he used this language in formulating his oracles. In addition, many members of his original audience must have originally had connections with the Temple, so the prophet’s use of priestly terminology would have been a particularly effective means of communication. Priestly vocabulary abounds in the book, and there are particularly close ties with the priestly law code known as the “Holiness Code” (Lev. 18–26). The links here are so strong that some scholars have suggested that Ezekiel was actually the author of the code. However, it is more likely that both the prophet and the code have been strongly influenced by ancient priestly legal traditions.

Literary Elaboration. Throughout this discussion of Ezekiel’s literary style it has often been noted that he tended to elaborate any literary form that he used. This elaboration is so characteristic of the prophet that it deserves comment in its own right. Ezekiel’s writing is baroque. It is thoroughly ornamented, filled with detail, convoluted, and often repetitious. His arguments, descriptions, and allegories are easily diverted from their course, with the result that they sometimes appear to ramble and to be logically inconsistent. These characteristics have often been traced to crude editorial work by Ezekiel’s disciples or to textual corruptions introduced by later scribes. However, it is more likely that the text simply reflects the way that the prophet wrote. His peculiar, ornate style must always be kept in mind whenever an attempt is made to interpret his oracles.

The Text of the Book. The Hebrew text of Ezekiel is often thought to be poorly preserved, although this judgment is usually made without taking into account the prophet’s peculiar literary style. The Greek translation (LXX) is often more compact than the MT and frequently omits duplicated material and ornamentation. In the LXX the prophet’s arguments are often clearer, and apparent inconsistencies are removed. This fact has led many scholars to assume that the LXX is based on a Hebrew text that lacked the corruptions of the present MT, and they have therefore used the Greek to reconstruct the original Hebrew.

However, it is also possible that the translators of the LXX were simply doing the best that they could with a difficult Hebrew text. The differences between the two versions may simply reflect the efforts of later communities to present a coherent translation. In short, the LXX may represent an attempt at communication and interpretation rather than a more original text. It is not currently possible to decide between these two alternatives, and for this reason the commentary that follows uses the MT as its base. Only in a few cases will alternative readings be suggested on the basis of the ancient versions.

Ezekiel’s Message and the Exilic Crisis

Despite the complexity of the book of Ezekiel, the prophet’s message is relatively simple and can be easily summarized. The city of Jerusalem and the people of Judah would inevitably be punished because of their sins, which were both religious and social. Not only was the current generation sinful and deserving of punishment, but the entire history of Israel had been a history of disobedience and rebellion against God (chap. 20). Repentance might still save individuals who led a righteous life (chap. 18), but the righteous few, if they existed at all, could not save the rest of the nation. This message applied both to the deportees of 597 B.C. and to the people who remained in the land.

Yet, in spite of this unequivocal message of doom, Ezekiel also prophesied that after the city had been destroyed and the people punished, God would bring the exiles back to the land, and the Temple would be restored according to a divine plan (chaps. 40-48). However, the return will be a pure act of grace. God will bring the people back in order not to profane the divine name (36:16-32). In contrast to Jeremiah, who believed that the Exile would cause Israel to recognize its sins and repent and that because of this repentance God would restore the people to the land (Jer. 31:16-22), Ezekiel was pessimistic about the long-range religious effects of the Exile. Although there might be a few, including some in the prophet's own community, who might remain righteous, the bulk of the exiles did not pay attention to the prophet's message. Therefore, in Ezekiel's scenario for the return, God will first restore the people to the land to preserve the holiness of the divine name. The people will then realize what God has done. They will repent and live faithfully in the land, newly purified from their sin.

Ezekiel's general message also contains some explicit answers to the practical theological questions that were raised by the fall of Jerusalem and the Exile. First, the fall of the city did not mean that God was powerless to defend it. Rather, God had deliberately deserted the Temple so that it could be captured by the Babylonians (chaps. 8-11). Ultimately this disaster was the direct act of God and not simply the result of shifting political fortunes in the ancient Near East. At the same time, God's fidelity to Jerusalem had not been diminished. The departure of the divine glory from the city was only temporary, and God would in due time take up residence in a rebuilt and resanctified Temple.

Second, from Ezekiel's perspective the people in Babylonian exile are the true Israel, and they will be the ones to return to the land and rebuild the nation (11:14-21). Other Israelites in exile and those left in the land after the fall have been cut off from the community of faith and have no role to play in the future. This narrow view of the identity of the true Israel will be shared by many of the exiles who finally do return and will be one of the sources of the theological debates of the postexilic period.

Finally, in the face of conflicting prophetic words immediately before the fall of the city, Ezekiel lays claim to absolute prophetic authority. Throughout the book a number of literary devices are employed to support the notion that Ezekiel always speaks with divine authority. His word is in fact the direct word of God, which is delivered to his audience without human interference or interpretation. Ezekiel's prophecies are therefore a safe guide for surviving the Exile. When the exiles hear an oracle from Ezekiel, they truly know that a prophet has been among them (33:33).

Introduction to the Prophet and Prophecy

The introduction to the book of Ezekiel places the prophet in his historical context (1:1-3) and describes in extraordinary detail his initial call to prophesy (1:4-3:27). However, both the contents and literary structure of these verses also introduce some of the major themes of the prophet's message, so the call narrative can be seen as an introduction to the book as well as to the personal experiences of the prophet.

Because of the unusual length, complexity, and apparent repetitiousness of this introductory material, scholars have often seen the book's first three chapters as the work of several editors and have tried by various methods to reconstruct Ezekiel's original account of his experiences. In particular, the watchman's call (3:16-21) and the story of the prophet's dumbness (3:22-27) are usually thought to be editorial additions because material from these verses is repeated, sometimes verbatim, in chap. 33. However, there is no scholarly agreement on the original form of these chapters, and Ezekiel's normally complex and repetitious literary style should caution readers against performing radical surgery on the text. It is also likely that even clear editorial additions have a role to play in shaping the overall message of the text.

The Superscription

The book of Ezekiel begins with a brief autobiographical statement (v. 1) followed by an editorial comment (vv. 2-3). Together they describe the background of the prophet and the date and location of his activities. He dates his initial call to "the thirtieth year," although the precise meaning of this date is obscure. Some scholars have suggested that it refers to the age of the prophet when he received his call, although the Hebrew idiom used here is not the standard one for expressing age. Others have suggested that, like the other dates in the book, "the thirtieth year" refers to the year of King Jehoiachin's exile. If so, then it would contradict the explanation of the date given in v. 2. Furthermore, the date in v. 1 would represent the latest date in the book rather than the earliest and would place the prophet's call after his other dated oracles. This odd situation can be avoided by assuming that "the thirtieth year" refers to the date of the book's composition rather than to the prophet's call, but such an interpretation is not in harmony with the text, which clearly connects the date to the prophet's initial vision.

The Targum (a translation of the Hebrew text into Aramaic, often with accompanying interpretation) was the first to suggest that Ezekiel's call occurred thirty years after Josiah's religious reform (2 Kings 22:3). While this calculation is accurate if the explanation of v. 2 is accepted, there is no biblical evidence to suggest that Josiah's reform was used by other authors for dating important religious events. Whatever the meaning of "the thirtieth year," an editorial comment equates it with the fifth year of Jehoiachin's exile and thus places the prophet's call in July 593 B.C.

Ezekiel is identified as one of the officials exiled to Babylon during the first deportation (597 B.C.). He was a priest, presumably of Zadokite descent, and would probably have served in the Temple before his exile. His initial vision occurred beside the Chebar Canal, near the Babylonian city of Nippur, in the vicinity of which some of the exiles had been settled. The prophet further specifies the location as Tel-abib ("mound [deserted since the time] of the flood"), a site that also must have been in the neighborhood of Nippur (3:15). By the fifth century B.C. there was at Nippur a flourishing Jewish community that traced its origins to the exiles of Ezekiel's time.

The bank of a stream may have been a traditional place of worship and divine revelation during the latter part of the Exile (cf. Dan. 10:4; Ps. 137:1), but in Ezekiel's time some Israelites doubted that genuine prophecy could occur outside of Israel. Ezekiel is therefore careful to stress a theme that will recur throughout the book. His vision was clearly of divine origin and took place when God seized or possessed him. God's "hand" came upon the prophet and exercised divine control over him (cf. 1 Kings 18:46). Elsewhere in Ezekiel God's hand or Spirit will energize the prophet and leave no doubt that his words and deeds are not his own but come directly from God (Ezek. 3:22; 8:1; 37:1; 40:1). Ezekiel is a human agent, who is compelled to do God's will.

The Call of the Prophet

Israelite prophets did not always record their initial encounter with God, and when they did do so they tended to be relatively brief (cf. Amos 7:14-15; Isa. 6:1-13; Jer. 1:1-10). In contrast, Ezekiel devotes the better part of three chapters to describing his call. Although some of this extensive description may be the result of later reflection and elaboration on the meaning of his initial experience, challenges to the prophet's authority may also have prompted him to give an unusually detailed account. Ezekiel's words would have lacked credibility not only because he was prophesying on foreign soil, but also because his prophetic message challenged many of the fundamental beliefs of his audience.

Ezekiel's call seems to have taken place in two stages. During the first stage the prophet saw his initial vision (1:4-28), was commissioned to be a prophet to Israel, and was given an indication of the contents of his message (2:1-3:15). In the second stage, which followed the first by seven days, he was called to be a watchman for the house of Israel (3:16-21).

1:4-28, The Throne Vision. The MT of the prophet's initial vision is occasionally repetitious and contains what appear to be dislocated phrases. For this reason, most scholars assume that the account has been secondarily elaborated, either by Ezekiel himself or by later editors. However, there is no scholarly agreement about the nature or even the location of these elaborations, so it is best simply to follow the text as it now stands. In spite of occasional roughness in the MT, the general outline of the vision is clear, and there can be no doubt about what the prophet saw. In the vision he came face to face with God's glory, the overwhelming radiance that surrounds the Deity (→ Glory).

As he does in his other major visions (cf. 8:2-11:25; 40:1-48:35), Ezekiel here recreates the experience as it occurred rather than first summarizing or interpreting it. He thus forces the reader to repeat the prophetic experience and to share the prophet's growing comprehension of the vision's significance.

At first the prophet saw only a glowing storm cloud being blown by a strong north wind. As the cloud drew nearer, however, he realized that the glow was in fact a cloud of fire, in the midst of which he gradually perceived four strange creatures. Each of them had a vaguely human form, but they each also had four wings and four different faces. Their feet were bovine, and they had human hands under their wings. They were arranged in a square, with their wing tips touching, and as a result they could face all of the cardinal points at the same time and could move in any direction without turning. In the midst of the creatures was an awesome brightness that flashed like lightning. Beneath the creatures were sparkling wheels that touched the earth. Each wheel contained all-seeing eyes and was composed of a "wheel within a wheel," either two different-sized wheels in the same plane like the hub and rim of a wagon wheel or, more likely, two identical wheels at right-angles to each other to facilitate movement in all directions. As the creatures drew nearer, Ezekiel was able for the first time to hear the roar of their wings and to see above them a crystalline expanse on which rested the likeness of a throne (→ Firmament; Throne). On the throne was the glowing likeness of a human form, and the prophet then knew that he was seeing "the appearance of the likeness of the glory of God." When Ezekiel realized what he was seeing, he fell on his face to the ground.

Scholars have made a number of attempts to probe beyond the prophet's description to uncover its underlying reality. Some have claimed that he saw only an electrical storm and then elaborated what he saw with his own imaginative details. Other scholars have pointed to artistic representations of fantastic animals and chariots that bore the images of some ancient Near Eastern deities. More specifically, scholars have argued that Ezekiel had in mind the Temple cherubim, the winged creatures flanking the Ark above which God was enthroned (cf. 1 Sam. 4:4; 2 Sam. 6:2; 1 Kings 6:27; Pss. 80:1; 99:1) (→ Ark; Cherub).

To be sure, Ezekiel's vision was shaped by motifs from Israelite tradition and was deeply rooted in his own priestly background. Fire, storm, and wind are often said to accompany God's appearance (cf. Exod. 19; Deut. 33:2; Judg. 5:4-5; Pss. 18:7-15; 68:7-10), and the prophet's knowledge of the Temple cherubim helped him to recognize what he was seeing in his vision. However, the description in the vision cannot be taken too literally, for the prophet constantly reminds his readers that the images used to describe the vision only approximate what he actually saw. He often uses the terms "appearance" and "likeness" to remind his audience that his description is not exact, and he employs in his description a number of evocative but incorporeal words having to do with brightness and fire. Like his Jerusalemite predecessor Isaiah, who saw the Temple cherubim transformed into flaming seraphim (Isa. 6), Ezekiel sees natural objects that have taken on supernatural dimensions. The visionary combination of vague, evocative images with concrete but fantastic objects helps the prophet to describe the divine reality that he saw but that cannot ultimately be described.

The theological significance of the vision is not elaborated until Ezekiel's later vision of Jerusalem's destruction (Ezek. 8-11). However, Ezekiel's original readers could not have failed to recognize that he had seen God's divine throne, normally located in Jerusalem, come to rest on Babylonian soil. For a Zadokite priest, who believed in God's eternal presence in Jerusalem, this would have been a shocking idea and one that would require additional explanation. However, at this point in the book it is not clear whether God's appearance has positive or negative implications for the exiles. That question will ultimately be answered only as the book progresses, but a partial answer is given in the divine word that follows the initial vision.

2:1-3:15, The Prophet's Commission. After Ezekiel recognizes the significance of his vision, he hears God's voice for the first time (1:28-2:1). Having fallen to the earth at the conclusion of the vision, the prophet is now commanded to rise. He is addressed, as he is throughout the book, with a title often translated literally "son of man." In Ezekiel's time this title had none of the theological overtones it was later to acquire and simply means "one who is a member of the human species." The address thus emphasizes the contrast between the human prophet and the divine glory. However, in spite of the divine command to rise, Ezekiel is unable to do so until the Spirit sets him on his feet (2:2). The motif of the enabling Spirit is found throughout the book and gives rise to the curious picture of a prophet who seems incapable of carrying out his prophetic tasks without divine aid. He speaks only the divine word that is put in his mouth and does only what the Spirit enables him to do (cf. 3:27). By portraying Ezekiel in this way, the book underlines the point that he has no control over his prophetic activities. Everything that he does or says comes directly from God, and the prophet does not interfere with the divine message in any way. Unlike the illegitimate prophets of whom Jeremiah speaks (Jer. 23:30), Ezekiel cannot be accused of stealing other prophets' words or giving his own interpretation of what God said. Ezekiel's readers know from the beginning of the book that they are reading only the word of God.

The content of the divine message is clear as soon as the prophet receives his commission. After being told to prophesy to the rebellious house of Israel, both to the people in exile and to those who remain in the land, the prophet is commanded to eat a scroll, which is filled with words of mourning, lamentation, and woe. He does so and reports that the scroll tastes sweet, in spite of its devastating contents (2:10-3:3). This striking episode seems to be the literary reflection of a statement made by Jeremiah in one of his complaints: "Your words were found, and I ate them, and your words became to me a joy and the delight of my heart" (Jer. 15:16). While Jeremiah's original statement expressed his own prophetic experience and explained why he was willing to continue to act as God's prophet (Jer. 15:15, 17-18), Ezekiel's literary development of the statement has an entirely different function. By speaking of eating the scroll, Ezekiel again indicates that his announcements of coming disaster are not his own but are dictated by God, who has literally put the divine words into the prophet. Because the divine word is in written form, the image also implies that the entirety of the writing of Ezekiel, that is, the whole book, is of divine origin. Just as Jeremiah delivered a scroll of his oracles to the king of Judah to see whether God's word would be accepted or rejected (Jer. 36), so also Ezekiel delivers to the exiles and to other Israelite communities a prophetic book to which they must respond.

The remainder of the commissioning narrative in fact concentrates not on the dismal contents of the prophet's message but on the people's reaction to it. God's initial address to the prophet characterizes as rebels the people who will read or hear his words, and this description is repeated throughout the remainder of the narrative. The phrase "for they are a rebellious house" echoes like a refrain in these verses (Ezek. 2:5, 7; 3:9) and clearly implies that the success of Ezekiel's work is in doubt. God is giving the people one more chance to hear the announcement of certain destruction and to save themselves by repenting, but God also has little hope that the people will listen. Instead, it is likely that the people will actively oppose Ezekiel and will thereby seal their own fate, making divine judgment inevitable. For this reason God warns the prophet to resist popular opposition and promises to strengthen and protect him during the ordeal that lies ahead.

The reasons for opposition to Ezekiel's message of judgment are easily understood, for he addressed his words both to his fellow exiles in Babylon and to the people who remained in Jerusalem. The former group may well have felt that it had already experienced God's judgment and should now be forgiven and brought back to the land (cf. 18:1-32). The latter group agreed that the exiles had been punished but also felt that the people left in the land had been spared and could now claim special status as God's elect (cf. 11:15). In contrast to these two views, Ezekiel prophesied that both groups were still rebels, and both were required to repent to save themselves. The ultimate failure of the prophet's mission thus seems to have been assured from the start.

ond call is redundant after the initial call vision (1:4-3:15). In addition, these verses are repeated in a more elaborate and sometimes clearer form in 33:1-9, where they seem to mark a new phase in the prophet's career following the fall of Jerusalem. For this reason scholars tend to see the watchman's call as a secondary addition based on material found in chaps. 18 and 33. However, even if these verses are accepted as a later editorial expansion, it is still necessary to try to understand why they were inserted in their present location and how they modify the narrative that they follow.

According to the book's own chronology, Ezekiel was overwhelmed by his initial vision for a period of seven days (3:15). At the end of that time, God again spoke to the prophet and appointed him to be a watchman for the house of Israel. The image of the watchman is used elsewhere of the prophetic office (Jer. 6:16-21), and its meaning in such contexts is clear. Like a watchman on a city wall, the prophet is to warn the people of an approaching enemy (2 Sam. 18:24-27; 2 Kings 9:17-20). However, a curious feature of the use of the image in Ezekiel is that God is both the one who appoints the protective watchman and the one against whom the people must be protected.

This unusual situation immediately becomes apparent when God gives Ezekiel examples of a prophetic watchman at work. These examples are framed in legal language, presumably drawn from Ezekiel's priestly tradition, and describe the various situations that might occur when God pronounces a formal death sentence against an individual. Four cases are considered: first, the wicked person who does not repent because the prophet has not issued a warning; second, the wicked person who does not repent even though the prophet has issued a warning; third, the righteous person who turns away from righteousness and does not repent because the prophet has not issued a warning; and fourth, the righteous person who remains righteous because the prophet has issued a warning. The case of the wicked person who repents after hearing the watchman's warning is omitted, possibly an indication that Ezekiel did not really expect this case to occur.

These cases are unusual in that they do not emphasize the watchman's success or failure in bringing about repentance. Rather they are concerned with whether or not the watchman actually issues a prophetic warning. The prophet who issues such a warning saves his own life, while the prophet who does not issue a warning bears the responsibility for the death of the wicked. The call narrative thus sharply emphasizes the warnings against prophetic rebellion that were present in the initial call vision (2:8) and underlines the importance of the prophet's persistence in his task, even though he sees no apparent results. In this way the narrative further stresses the initial call vision's doubts about the effectiveness of the prophet's mission. As chap. 4 makes clear, God has issued a sentence of death against the city of Jerusalem, and Ezekiel must warn the people of the danger. However, there seems to be little hope of saving the city.

The Prophet's Dumbness

Of all of the difficult passages in Ezekiel, the narratives of the onset and removal of the prophet's dumbness have provoked the widest range of interpretations, none of which is totally satisfactory. The sources of the difficulty are readily apparent. According to Ezekiel's own account, immediately after his second call he was possessed by God and told to go to "the valley." There the divine glory appeared to the prophet, as it had in chap. 1, and he responded in his typical fashion by falling stunned to the ground. After being raised by the Spirit (cf. 1:28-2:2), Ezekiel was commanded to shut himself up in his house. He was then told that he would be bound so that he could not go out among the people and that he would be struck dumb so that he could not act as a "reprover" to them. However, God promised that Ezekiel's mouth would be opened when there was a divine word to be given to the people (3:22-27). According to the book's own chronology, this dumbness lasted until the fall of Jerusalem, a period of more than seven years. The removal of the dumbness is narrated in the context of a repetition of the prophet's call to be a watchman, so that both the call and the opening of the prophet's mouth are clearly correlated with the city's destruction (33:21-22; cf. 24:26-27).

The immediate literary context makes it difficult to understand the dumbness literally, for in chap. 4 the prophet begins a series of oracles against the people and against Jerusalem, reproving both for their sins. Later in the book he issues calls to repent (14:6; 18:21, 30-32; 33:11), a fact that indicates that his speech consisted of more than the delivery of announcements of doom. This has led many scholars to assume that the dumbness was somehow symbolic or that it lasted only a few hours or days, perhaps being brought on by the sudden death of the prophet's wife and the traumatic events surrounding Jerusalem's fall (24:15-27). Others have suggested that Ezekiel actually suffered from some physiological or psychological malady. However, none of these explanations helps to interpret the narrative in its present location in chap. 3.

Like other problematic passages in Ezekiel, this one is perhaps best interpreted as a literary expression of a prophetic experience that caused the prophet to have a new understanding of his call. The prophet's confinement to his house may reflect the fact that he did not deliver his oracles orally in public as did earlier prophets but produced them first in writing (cf. 8:1; 14:1; 20:1). The dumbness may indicate that from his call until the fall of Jerusalem Ezekiel spoke only words of judgment against the city and reserved his calls to repent for the exiles. This interpretation would generally be in keeping with the present literary organization of the book, which places most of the judgment oracles before the narrative of the fall of Jerusalem in chap. 33 and locates most of the oracles of promise after this point. In addition, the dumbness may indicate that, for this period of time, the prophet did not exercise one of his normal prophetic functions, perhaps that of interceding on behalf of the city and the people. Later in the book he is explicitly forbidden to intercede for the people (14:3-5; 20:3), and they are again allowed to approach God through the prophet only after the city falls (36:37).

Prophecies of Judgment Against Judah and Jerusalem

After the introduction of the prophet and his message, the next section of the book concentrates on announcements of the disasters that are about to happen to Jerusalem, to the rest of the people in Judah, and to the people already in exile. Although there are occasional promises in these chapters, there is a pervasive feeling of impending doom. From the beginning it is clear that the destruction of Jerusalem is inevitable, and nothing that the people can do will alter this situation.

4:1-5:17

Symbolic Acts of Judgment

The announcement of Jerusalem's fate is introduced by narratives of several symbolic actions that were performed by the prophet. However, unlike the symbolic acts of earlier prophets, which were brief, pointed, and designed to have an immediate impact on the audience (cf. Isa. 20:1-6; Jer. 13:1-11; 19:1-13; 27:1-11), Ezekiel's symbolic acts are literary representations of the originals. As literary representations, they tend to be highly complex and well developed. They are meant to be read and studied, and the point they make is not always immediately clear. Their complexity also invites later reinterpretation by the prophet, his disciples, and later generations of readers.

4:1-17, Symbols of Siege and Exile. The major theme, Ezekiel's announcement of judgment, is clearly stated by his first symbolic act, which portrays in miniature the coming siege against Jerusalem (4:1-3). From this point, he repeatedly assures his readers that the city and its inhabitants can in no way escape the wrath of the Babylonians. As a Babylonian architect or military commander might do, the prophet draws the city on a sun-dried brick and then sketches in mounds, ramps, and battering rams—the military installations and machines designed to seal off the city from outside relief and eventually to breach its walls (→ Battering ram; Siege). The symbolism of the act then shifts as the prophet is told to take a more personal role and to act out the enemy attack against the city. He is to place an iron plate between himself and the city and to press the siege against it. The plate is a symbol of separation and in this instance represents a barrier that exists between God and the people in Jerusalem. The inhabitants of the doomed city are to be cut off from God until the destruction is complete. The prophet's direct participation in the siege also implies that God is actively involved in the attack on the city.

In 4:4-8 Ezekiel is made to bear symbolically the punishment that is to be laid on the people. First he is commanded to lie on his left side for 390 days to represent the number of years that the house of Israel, namely, the Northern Kingdom, must be punished (vv. 4-5). The interpretation of these verses is problematic, and the number has puzzled interpreters since antiquity. The sudden use of the name "Israel" in its narrow sense as a reference to the Northern Kingdom, destroyed by the Assyrians in 722-721 B.C., is unexpected, since the remainder of the unit concentrates on the imminent siege and exile of the Southern Kingdom of Judah. The period of 390 years is not susceptible to any satisfactory interpretation. The LXX contains entirely different figures. Their significance is easier to understand, but they are suspect for that very reason, and it is likely that the numbers in the MT are original, whatever their meaning. If 390 years are calculated backwards from the prophet's own time, then the period of punishment would have begun about the time the Temple was built by Solomon. Thus the whole history of the north would have to be seen as a period of punishment, a proposition that makes no sense. If the 390 years are calculated from the fall of Samaria in 722/721 B.C., then the prophet would be indicating a period of punishment that would end much later than the one projected for Judah. However, he explicitly rejects this interpretation elsewhere and predicts that Ephraim and Judah will be restored to the land at the same time (cf. 37:15-23).

Easier to understand is the second part of the act, which involves the prophet's lying on his right side for forty days to portray forty years of punishment and exile for Judah (vv. 6-17). This figure differs from Jeremiah's prediction of a seventy-year exile (Jer. 25:11; 29:10) but at least gives the act a plausible interpretation. The prophet is to persist in his odd and lengthy action without deviation, just as he was bound at his call to speak only the word that God gave him (cf. Ezek. 3:25-26).

In 4:9-16 Ezekiel adds additional details to his portrayal of a people suffering a siege. During his symbolic act he is to eat bread composed of a mixture of grains, there being no single grain available in sufficient quantity to make up a loaf. The prophet may drink each day only a measured quantity of water, about two-thirds of a quart. While the scarcity of food and water refers particularly to conditions in Jerusalem during the expected siege, the symbolic action has been broadened to include references to the lives of the exiles, both those who will be driven from the city and those who are already in Babylon. They are to eat ritually unclean food outside of the land. The prophet's resistance to eating bread baked on human dung was apparently a futile effort, for he was still required to eat unclean food to demonstrate the conditions of exile, something that would have been a particular violation of priestly regulations.

5:1-17, Symbols of Jerusalem's Fate.

Ezekiel's symbolic description of the fate of Jerusalem continues in a complex action (5:1-4), which is then interpreted at length for readers (5:5-17). The prophet is to cut off his hair, an act that itself represents the loss of personal identity associated with exile (cf. Isa. 7:20), and then is to divide the hair into three portions. A third he is to burn in the midst of the city that he has portrayed on the brick (4:1-2), a third he is to strike with a sword, and a third he is to scatter to the wind. From the latter portion he is to take a few hairs—presumably representing an exiled remnant such as the members of the prophet's own community—and is to preserve them, although even some of these will be burned. The interpretation of the act is clear. The treatment of the hair represents the fate of the people in the besieged city (v. 5). Because the people have rebelled against God, there will be a divine judgment against them. The city will endure the horrors of a protracted siege (v. 10), and God will this time have no pity on the people (v. 11). A third of them will die by fire during the siege, and a third will be killed by the sword. The remainder will be scattered in exile. Even there they will have no rest, for God will make them desolate and a reproach among the nations. The destructive divine fire will reach even to the remnant, which will continue to be punished as God harries the exiles with famine, disease, and bloodshed. Of the remnant of the city driven into exile, only a smaller remnant will survive (vv. 3, 13-17). However, there may be a slight hint in the passage that the fire that burns the remnant is redemptive for the rest of Israel (v. 4).

6:1-7:27

Oracles Against Land and People

From symbolic representations of Judah's coming destruction, Ezekiel turns to prophetic words directed against the land, the people, and the city. Like the earlier prophetic actions, these words help to actualize the events of which they speak.

6:1-14, Prophecy Against the Mountains.

Up to this point, the prophet has concentrated on the fate of Jerusalem and the exiles already on foreign soil. Now he is commanded to set his face toward the mountains of Israel and thus to focus his attention on the entire country—the mountains, hills, ravines, and valleys. The message for the rest of the land is identical to that delivered to Jerusalem, and the people outside the city will not be able to escape from the coming judgment. Ezekiel is to prophesy that all of the land of Israel will be devastated, a prophecy that was in fact fulfilled as the Babylonian armies advanced on Jerusalem in 587-586 B.C.

It is noteworthy that the prophet does not elaborate on the destruction of the cities themselves but concentrates instead on the destruction of the illegitimate religious installations that are the symbols of Israel's sin. He particularly singles out the platforms or high places, which were often located on hills near towns and which perhaps were used for the worship of underworld deities and deified ancestors (→ High Place). The people who in life worshiped other gods at incense altars will now be slain before those same altars, and their bones will defile Israel's illegitimate places of worship. The people have not been willing to know God through appropriate worship in the Temple or through obedience in response to God's great acts of deliverance (cf. Exod. 7:5; 14:4, 18). Therefore the people are condemned to know God only through divine punishment and destruction. God is known through the revelation of the divine name, but that revelation now leads to judgment rather than salvation (Ezek. 6:1-7; cf. Exod. 3:13-22; 20:2) (→ Knowledge).

However, just as there will be refugees from Jerusalem, so there will also be a few who survive the devastation of the land. In exile they will understand what they have done and will witness to future generations that God does indeed punish rebellion (Ezek. 6:8-10). For their benefit Ezekiel is to portray God's delight in destroying sinful Israel and the abominable ritual practices that the people have instituted (6:11-14).

7:1-27, Prophecy of the End. Ezekiel's announcement of judgment to the mountains of Israel is followed by a horrifying oracle directed at all of the inhabitants of the land. The literary structure of the oracle vividly reproduces the words of a prophet so thoroughly possessed by the divine spirit that he no longer has any control over his words or actions. He is obsessed by the judgment that he must announce. The oracle regains a degree of rationality briefly in v. 23, when God gives the reason for the destruction of the people. However, the remainder of the oracle generates its impact through the seemingly endless repetition of key words and images. The piling up of phrases gives the oracle a breathless quality as it rushes toward its crushing climax. Over and over the prophet repeats his devastating message until his words pound the reader like a hammer. Disaster approaches. An end has come upon the land. Doom is near. God will not spare any of the people and will not pity them. The people are helpless against the approaching enemy. Prophets, priests, elders, and king are terrified and can do nothing. God will be known to Israel only in the irreversible judgment that will repay the people for their sins.

The passage has roots in a number of prophetic traditions, particularly those dealing with the "Day of the Lord," the time when God would appear to confront Israel for good or ill. This concept seems to have been well known as early as the eighth century B.C., but the prophet Amos first gave it the strongly negative overtones that it retains in most of the prophetic literature (Amos 5:18-20; 8:1-14). The disciples of Isaiah further developed the idea (Isa. 13), and the work of both prophets may have influenced Ezekiel's choice of words and images. For Ezekiel the Day of the Lord certainly refers to the imminent Babylonian attack on Jerusalem and not to some more distant eschatological appearance of God (→ Eschatology; Judgment, Day of).

Vision of Jerusalem

In September of 592 B.C. Ezekiel traveled through visionary transport to Jerusalem, where he witnessed activities in the Temple. More important, he also saw how God and the other inhabitants of the heavenly world were reacting to human events there. The vision thus becomes an ominous portent of the judgment that is to come on the city and the Temple and demonstrates that behind historical events is a spiritual reality that gives them theological significance. The prophet here dramatizes for his readers God's direct involvement in Jerusalem's destruction and forestalls any interpretation of this event that would simply ascribe it to the shifting winds of ancient Near Eastern politics.

The Temple vision is closely related to the prophet's initial call vision, both literarily and theologically. The Temple vision picks up and elaborates the description of the divine glory in chap. 1 and also provides a theological explanation for the glory's presence in Babylon. The general sequence of events in the Temple vision is relatively clear, although some of its elements seem obscure or out of place. This is particularly true for the progress of the cherubim and the glory out of the Temple, and it is possible that at some points the prophet or his disciples have added material or elaborated the original text in the light of later events and traditions. However, it is also important to remember that the Temple vision, like the call vision, has a dreamlike quality to it. Objects and events sometimes blur and do not always have the sharp outlines that would be expected in the ordinary world. Ezekiel preserves this dreamlike quality, leading his readers through the vision as he himself experienced it. He provides minimal interpretation of what he saw and expects his readers to understand the significance of what is being described.

8:1-18, The Abominations in the Temple.

The Temple vision begins with a description of Ezekiel sitting in his house in Babylon (cf. 3:24). The elders of Judah are sitting in front of him, although the purpose of their visit is not clear. Presumably these leaders of the exilic community have come to seek a prophetic oracle concerning Jerusalem's fate. They may also have hoped that the prophet would intercede with God on their behalf in order to prevent the city's destruction. If so, the prophet's response was quite different from what they expected. As in similar situations later in the book (14:1; 20:1), Ezekiel does not provide the oracle that the elders seek but instead describes a visionary trip to Jerusalem that underlines the hopelessness of the city's plight.

Ezekiel reports that, as the elders were waiting for a response, he was possessed by God. When the prophet went into trance, he saw a fiery humanoid figure resembling the one he had seen at the conclusion of his call vision (cf. 1:26-28). The figure is clearly intended to represent God's glory; and God, through the agency of the Spirit, lifts the prophet into the heavenly realm and transports him to Jerusalem, where he is placed at an entrance to the Temple (8:1-4; for a diagram of the Temple, → Temple, The). From this point on God continues to speak to Ezekiel and to guide him through the Temple, but God in the form of the divine glory is also a visible participant in the events that the prophet describes.

The visionary tour of the Temple begins at the northern entrance to the inner court, where the people had set up a statue, perhaps a representation of the Canaanite goddess Asherah but in any case an image that had no rightful place in orthodox Israelite worship (vv. 5-6). To continue the tour, the prophet burrowed through a wall to enter a secret inner room, the walls of which were decorated with carvings of fantastic animals that were probably connected with a non-Israelite cult. There he saw seventy representative elders of Israel conducting some sort of priestly rite. Among them was one Jaazaniah, who is otherwise unknown but who is, ironically, said to have been a son of Shaphan, the scribe who was intimately involved with Josiah's religious reform (2 Kings 22) and whose family protected Jeremiah during the final chaotic days of the siege (Jer. 26:1-24; 36:1-32). Clearly religious corruption had reached to the highest levels, and now representatives of the most important and faithful families in the land were secretly performing illegitimate rituals, thus destroying the sanctity of God's house (Ezek. 8:7-13).

This picture of aberrant worship is reinforced when the prophet is shown women participating in mourning rites for Tammuz, the ancient dying and rising fertility god of Mesopotamia, whose yearly trip to the underworld was the occasion for wailing among his devotees. Elsewhere Ezekiel is shown men symbolically turning their backs on the Temple so that they could face the east to worship the sun (vv. 14-16).

Up to this point in the vision, God has concentrated on showing Ezekiel aspects of Israel's religious sins, something that surely would have been a major concern for the prophet, who functioned as a priest before his deportation. However, the first part of the vision ends with God pointing out that the people have compounded their ritual sins by filling the land with violence. Violations of the social order are also an important part of Israel's sin, even though Ezekiel tends not to emphasize them as much as did his contemporary, Jeremiah. Both Israel's religious and social abuses are a direct insult to God and provide the motivation for the divine destruction of the people. In the very heart of the Temple, where God was supposed to be the most accessible, the prophet is told that God will not pity the people and will not hear them when they beg for mercy. The Temple has ceased to be a place where God and Israel can meet and communicate, and in this sense the Temple has lost its appropriate function (vv. 17-18).

Interpreters sometimes feel that Ezekiel's description of abominations in the Temple is exaggerated, given the fact that Josiah had recently purified Judah's religion and removed from the Temple a number of pagan ritual objects, including some belonging to religious activities described by Ezekiel (2 Kings 23:4-14). However, it is worth noting that Hezekiah had also reformed Temple worship, only to have the same aberrant practices reintroduced by his successor Manasseh (2 Kings 18:4-8; 21:1-16). It is probably safe to conclude that Israel's appetite for Canaanite and Mesopotamian rituals was stronger than its interest in sustaining religious reform and that Josiah's reforms were therefore short-lived.

9:1-11, The Slaughter of the Idolaters. After hearing God's final word of judgment against the city, the prophet is shown the beginning of the judgment itself. Although there is no doubt in Ezekiel's mind that the Temple will actually be destroyed by the Babylonian army, the vision makes clear that God is the real destroyer of the Temple and the people. Once God has acted, all hope for the city is gone.

The divine judgment begins when God summons six armed executioners of the city, who approach the Temple from the north, the traditional invasion route of enemy armies and the direction from which divine judgment was usually thought to come (Jer. 1:13-16; 4:5-31; 5:15-17; 6:1-5, 22-26). They are accompanied by a scribe clothed in linen, the traditional garb of priests (Exod. 28:29-42) and angels (Dan. 10:5; 12:6-13). The seven appear to be a contingent from an enemy army, but in fact are God's agents, members of the heavenly court (cf. 1 Kings 22:19-23). As they approach, the divine glory, since the time of Solomon enthroned above the cherubim-flanked Ark (1 Kings 8), begins its slow journey out of the Temple. God instructs the scribe to mark with the Hebrew letter taw the foreheads of those in the city who have grieved over the religious and social abominations committed in it and then commands the executioners to slay the rest, sparing no one and beginning with the elders before the Temple. As the slaughter is carried out, the prophet is shocked by its completeness. Apparently few, if any, were worthy of bearing the mark, a situation that goads the prophet into making an objection, one of the few personal responses that he makes in the book. The Temple, a traditional place of sanctuary, has not provided protection for people in the city. The prophet therefore wants to know if there is any salvation from the divine wrath (v. 8). God's response indicates that the sin of Jerusalem is so great that no escape is possible, but this statement does not comment on the fate of those already in exile.

10:1-22, The Departure of God's Glory. The religious abominations and social injustices described in chap. 8 have defiled the Temple and robbed it of its sanctity so that it could no longer serve as a place of sanctuary. As a result, the Temple could not protect the people from God's wrath, and in chap. 9 the prophet witnessed God's further desecration of the sanctuary through the slaughter of the elders. In chap. 10 Ezekiel describes the completion of a process already begun (9:3). Because the Temple has been desecrated, it is no longer a fit dwelling place for the Holy One of Israel, and the prophet traces the slow departure of the divine glory as it leaves the Temple and the city. As Ezekiel watches, the Ark and the Temple cherubim are transformed into the divine throne borne by the heavenly cherubim, and God's glory leaves the Holy of Holies, the inner sanctum of the Temple, and migrates to the threshold of the house (vv. 1, 3-5). God then commands the scribe to take coals from beneath the cherubim and to scatter them over the city to destroy it (v. 2). Before he can do so, however, one of the cherubim hands him the coals, and God thus directly provides the supernatural fire that will destroy the city (vv. 6-8).

It is at this point in the vision that the prophet recognizes the connection between what he is seeing and what he saw in Babylon during his call vision. He therefore describes the divine throne and the attendant cherubim in great detail, repeating much of what was said in chap. 1, but varying a few details. At the end of this description he describes the further movement of the glory to the east gate of the Temple (vv. 9-22).

11:1-25, Oracles of Judgment and Hope. As the prophet accompanies the divine glory out of the city, he sees twenty-five men at the east gate. These men are sometimes identified with the twenty-five sun worshippers of 8:16, although in that passage no specific names are mentioned. In any case, in chap. 11 they are indicted by God, and the prophet is told to deliver a judgment oracle against them. The precise nature of their crimes is unclear. They are accused of devising iniquity and giving wicked counsel to the city, a charge that may be related to the conflicting political advice being given to King Zedekiah by his advisers. They are then quoted as saying that there is no need to build houses, because "it [the city] is the pot and we are the flesh" (v. 3). The latter part of this statement is a reference to Jerusalem under siege, and Ezekiel develops the image in great detail in 24:1-14. The meaning of the first part of the statement is uncertain, but it may be that the accused were advising pouring all of the city's resources into defense rather than into building homes for those dispossessed by the previous Babylonian invasion. Ironically, the need for strengthening the city's defenses may be due to these same advisers' misguided foreign policy.

The judgment oracle that the prophet delivers to the men elaborates somewhat on their crimes and prescribes a very specific punishment (11:5-12). They are accused of increasing the number of those slain in the city, a possible reference to the results of the men's political advice or to the results of their defense-centered economic policies. They have acted out of fear of foreign attack, and their judgment will therefore take the form of making that fear into a reality. They will be taken out of the city and slain by foreigners at the border of Israel. This specific description of the judgment is sometimes thought to be a reference to the capture and killing of members of the royal court who fled from Jerusalem as the Babylonians captured it in 586 B.C. (2 Kings 25:4-7). Such an interpretation is possible but cannot be considered certain. A foretaste of the judgment occurs immediately when one of the men, Pelatiah, dies as Ezekiel is prophesying, thus provoking another of the prophet's anguished objections (Ezek. 9:8). Pelatiah's sudden death indicates the truth of the prophecy and suggests that the remainder of the men will be killed in due time (11:13).

Following the judgment oracle against the twenty-five men, God levels a charge against all of the inhabitants of Jerusalem (vv. 14-21). Those who were left in the city after the first deportation (597 B.C.) had apparently interpreted that event as divine judgment on the deportees and concluded that they had now been totally cut off from God and from the nation of Israel. Those who remained in the city therefore not only felt that they were the rightful heirs to the positions of leadership that had been vacated by the exiles but also claimed to be the heirs to the land of Israel and to the special divine promises that went with it. In short, those still in the land claimed to be the true Israel and sought to exclude the exiles from the religious community.

God's judgment oracle against the inhabitants of Jerusalem rejects this claim both obliquely and directly. In telling Ezekiel what the Jerusalemites are saying, God refers to the exiles as "your brothers . . . the whole house of Israel" (v. 15). By referring to the prophet's companions in this way God implies that the exiles are in fact the true Israel and not those left in Jerusalem. This notion is made explicit in the judgment oracle itself, in which God admits to having scattered the exiles but at the same time claims to have been a "small sanctuary" to them in the nations where they now live (v. 16). When this statement is set in the context of what Ezekiel has seen earlier in his vision, its meaning becomes clear. God has rejected Jerusalem and the Temple, thus dooming the people who still dwell there, and is even now in the process of leaving the city. At the same time, the divine glory is present among the exiles in Babylon. Where God dwells, there is the true Israel, and the exiles have access to God, even though they live on foreign soil. This is the significance of Ezekiel's initial vision. God has temporarily taken up residence among the exiles and has rejected the Temple and the city.

At the same time, God's presence in Babylon is only a pale copy of the divine presence that formerly dwelled in Jerusalem, and that presence must be restored if the people are to live as the true Israel. The judgment oracle against the inhabitants of Jerusalem is therefore followed by a promise to the exiles (vv. 17-21), one of the few that Ezekiel will give before the fall of the city (chap. 33). God promises to return the exiles to the land of Israel and to give them that land as a possession. There the former exiles will remove the abominable religious objects that were left in Jerusalem when it was destroyed, and God will institute a new social and religious order to ensure that the sins of the past will not be repeated. The people will be given a new heart and spirit so that their loyalty will no longer be divided among various gods but will be single-mindedly devoted to God (cf. Jer. 32:39). The stony hearts that made the people insensitive to God's word will be removed and replaced with human hearts that will enable Israel to follow God's laws. Then the covenant relationship between God and the people will be restored to its original state.

Following the giving of this promise, Ezekiel reports that the divine glory with its attendant cherubim left Jerusalem, pausing briefly on the mountain east of the city. The Spirit then transported the prophet back to Babylon, where he reported his vision to the exiles (Ezek. 11:22-25).

Ezekiel's Temple vision would have had a major theological impact on his exilic audience, which was composed primarily of Jerusalemite officials, people who believed in the eternal election of Jerusalem and the Davidic house, the eternal presence of God in the Temple, and the inviolability of the city. To them the prophet's message would have come as a shock. God had in fact rejected the elect city and had migrated temporarily to Babylon. The removal of the divine presence allowed the city to be destroyed by the Babylonians, but God had already begun the process of destruction by pouring divine fire over the city and its inhabitants. However, God would ultimately return to Jerusalem to create a new Israel that would be totally responsive to the divine word. Ezekiel thus left most of the old Jerusalemite royal theology intact, but transformed it in a way that would have made it difficult for his readers to accept. God's eternal election of the city became in a sense contingent on the obedience of the people, a notion that cut at the very heart of the theology of Ezekiel's readers.

12:1-20

Symbols and Oracles of Exile

The first part of chap. 12 contains accounts of two symbolic actions by the prophet, together with their interpretations. Unlike the prophetic actions in chaps. 4-5, the ones here are relatively simple and easily interpreted.

In the first account (12:1-16), the prophet is told to prepare during the day an exile's pack, which probably would have consisted of essential clothing and household goods that could have been gathered quickly and carried easily. Then at night the prophet is to dig through the wall, as a would-be exile might do to escape from a besieged city. The departure would be under cover of darkness in order to mask the escapee's actions, and the unexpected exit through the wall could perhaps be interpreted as an attempt to avoid being seen by the enemy, who would have been watching the gates. The prophet is then to shoulder his pack and go into exile while covering his face so that he cannot see the land. The point of this last act is not clear, but it may be intended to dramatize the exile's grief at leaving the land.

Although the general symbolism of this act seems quite straightforward, God repeatedly warns the prophet that the people are rebellious and will deliberately refuse to understand the significance of what the prophet is doing (vv. 1-6). This warning about the rebelliousness of the people echoes the warning given at the prophet's call (2:1-3:15) and prepares him for the failure of his mission.

After Ezekiel performs his symbolic act (12:7), God tells the prophet that his audience has refused to understand what is happening and that an interpretation must be supplied. The obvious meaning of the act is that the people in the besieged city of Jerusalem will be forced to go into exile, a fate that Ezekiel's audience may have hoped could be avoided. However, when the interpretation is actually given (vv. 10-16), it is much more specific. The Exile is associated with the prince, Zedekiah, who together with his court will be forced to abandon Jerusalem by night. (Ezekiel uses the title "prince" to refer to Zedekiah and reserves the title "king" for the exiled Jehoia-chin.) The prince will have to carry his own baggage and dig through the wall in an attempt to escape. However, God will trap the prince and his retinue and bring him to Babylon, but he will not see the land. His courtiers will be scattered, although a few will escape to testify to the abominations committed in Jerusalem.

The interpretation's description of the fate of the prince closely resembles the actual events connected with Jerusalem's fall in 586 B.C. When the Babylonians breached the walls of the city, Zedekiah tried to escape with his court by leaving the city through a gate near the king's garden. The escape was not successful. The Babylonians captured Zedekiah on the plains of Jericho and brought him to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah. There Zedekiah's sons were slain, and he himself was blinded before being taken to Babylon in chains (2 Kings 25:4-7; Jer. 52:4-11). The close correspondence of these events with Ezekiel's prediction concerning the fate of the prince has led many scholars to assume that the interpretation in 12:10-16 is in fact "prophecy after the fact." While this is certainly a possibility, it is worth noting that Ezekiel's prince and the historical Zedekiah escaped from the city in slightly different ways. Furthermore, Ezekiel's description contains a number of motifs commonly found in narratives dealing with exile. It is therefore likely that Ezekiel's original description of the fate of the prince was a bit more general than it is in the present text and that the actual historical events of the siege have influenced the shaping of the narrative after the fact. However, the extent of that shaping cannot be determined.

The second symbolic act (12:17-20) is much more direct than the first. Ezekiel is told to tremble while eating bread and drinking water. This display of fear is immediately interpreted as a reference to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, who continually live in fear, knowing that they are about to be punished for the violence that they have committed in the land. Destruction will soon come upon them and cannot be escaped.

Oracles on Prophets and Prophecy

The events leading up to the fall of Jerusalem were accompanied by a major crisis in the prophetic office. As frequently is the case in chaotic times, prophets responded to events by giving conflicting messages concerning the way people should react and by predicting different courses for future events (cf. Jer. 23; 27-29). In times of prophetic conflict, people are likely to question prophetic authority, and prophets often respond to this situation by undergirding their own authority in various ways and by undermining the authority of their prophetic rivals. An interest in strengthening Ezekiel's prophetic authority played a major role in shaping the accounts of his call, and in Ezek. 12:21-14:11 additional attention is given to problems connected with the prophet's own oracles and to the activities of other prophets.

12:21-28, The Fulfillment of Prophecy. The end of chap. 12 contains two oracles dealing with the same theme: the apparent nonfulfillment of prophecies of judgment. Both oracles have the same basic form. A saying of the people is quoted, and God then responds by showing the falsity of the people's words. In the first case (vv. 21-25), God complains that people are saying that prophecies concerning the land of Israel have been so long delayed that they have lost their validity. In this period such an attitude would cause people to ignore not only the judgment oracles of Ezekiel but also those of his contemporary Jeremiah, who was likewise predicting Jerusalem's destruction. In response to this proverb God assures both Ezekiel and the exiles that the fulfillment of the judgment oracles is at hand. The prophets predicting salvation will no longer have any credibility, for God will bring about the predicted disaster during the lifetime of Ezekiel's audience (cf. Jer. 23:9-32).

In the second oracle (Ezek. 12:26-28), the people are apparently willing to believe that the prophetic announcement of disaster will become a reality, but they are saying that judgment will take place only in the distant future. Again God assures Ezekiel and the people that the judgment will no longer be delayed but will take place immediately.

13:1-23, Condemnation of False Prophets and Diviners.

Having dealt with the problems associated with judgment oracles, Ezekiel now records two oracles directed against prophets of salvation (13:1-16) and against diviners (13:17-23). Both of these oracles have roughly the same form, that of the classic prophetic announcement of disaster. They begin with an instruction to Ezekiel to prophesy (vv. 2, 17) and then move on to a woe oracle describing the crimes that the addressees have committed (vv. 3-7, 18-19). This description leads logically to an announcement of disaster, introduced with the formula "thus says the Lord" and sometimes containing additional references to the reasons for the judgment (vv. 8-16, 20-23).

The first judgment oracle is aimed at prophets in Jerusalem, who are predicting that the city will miraculously escape destruction, as it did in Hezekiah's time (2 Kings 19:35-37). Because of this misleading advice, the people in the city do not realize that they are in danger and therefore do nothing to save themselves. The activities of these prophets are well known from the book of Jeremiah, where they are portrayed as a persistent hindrance to Jeremiah's activities (Jer. 6:14; 8:11; 14:13-16). Although their point of view is deeply rooted in orthodox Jerusalemite theology, Jeremiah feels that their message during the final days of the siege is simply wrong, and he accuses them of lying and misrepresenting God's word (Jer. 23:9-32). This indictment of the peace prophets contains a number of phrases and motifs that are also present in Ezek. 13:1-16, and it is likely that the latter passage has been influenced by Jeremiah's at some stage in its formation. There is also some evidence of editing after the fall of Jerusalem, especially in 13:9, where the focus of the oracle suddenly shifts from Jerusalemite prophets to prophets in exile, who will not be allowed to reenter the land of Israel along with the rest of the returnees. This later editorial activity may also help to account for some of the repetitions in the passage, although it must always be remembered that Ezekiel's literary style is normally convoluted and highly ornamented.

The oracle against the peace prophets begins when God indicts them for inventing their prophetic message (13:1-7). They are accused of prophesying from their own minds (lit., "hearts") and then introducing these fabrications with formulas identifying them as divine oracles. Like jackals they inhabit ruins and feed on the dying and the dead. Furthermore, they have not built a wall to protect the people against their enemies and have not climbed high on the wall to fill the breaches made by the enemy battering rams (v. 5). The building of the wall refers to the prophet's responsibility to warn the people of approaching danger so that they may repent and save their lives. Unlike Ezekiel, who was specifically commissioned as a prophetic watchman to warn Israel to repent (3:16-21), the peace prophets speak of no danger, issue no warning, and thus leave the people unprotected. In addition, these prophets neglect a genuine prophet's second major duty, that of protecting the people by interceding with God on their behalf. This intercessory function of the prophet is elsewhere traced to Moses, who in the wilderness stood in the breach and protected Israel from God's wrath (Ps. 106:23).

Because of the damage that the peace prophets have done to Israel, God's hand will now be upon them, not as a sign that they are genuine prophets but as a sign of judgment (Ezek. 13:9). The prophets have misled the people and built for them a wall held together with whitewash rather than mortar, a wall that appears to be solid but that will crumble in the face of God's stormy judgment (vv. 10-11). The divine judgment will now destroy the wall, the people, and the prophets who mislead them by building the insubstantial wall based on false hopes of peace (vv. 12-16).

The oracle against the prophetesses (13:17-23) condemns them too for inventing prophetic words and attributing them to God, but it concentrates on the prophetesses' work as diviners. The precise nature of their activities is unclear, but they apparently involved the making of articles of clothing to serve as amulets or to aid in divination (→ Amulet; Magic and divination). The prophetesses may have also used barley as a means of divination, although the reference to grain and bread in v. 19 may be to the form of payment for their services rather than to the materials used in the process. Divinatory activities of this sort were condemned by Israelite law (Deut. 18:9-14), and God therefore accuses the diviners of profaning the divine name and destroying the people. Because of their crimes the diviners' paraphernalia will be destroyed and their perverted oracles will no longer be allowed to ensnare the innocent.

14:1-11, A Warning to God's Prophets.

Although Ezekiel's primary concern in these chapters is with false prophets and false interpretation of prophecy, he is reminded sharply in 14:1-11 that even God's genuine prophets must constantly be on guard against violating the divine will. At his call Ezekiel was warned not to rebel against the divine word that he would be given (2:8), and he is now cautioned against being overly influenced by the people in his audience.

The warning is triggered by a visit from some of the exiled elders (14:1). The purpose of their visit is not made clear, however, until God reacts to their presence by denouncing their reason for coming (v. 3). They have come to inquire of God. Inquiries of this sort required the prophet to serve as an intermediary between the human and divine worlds. The people would come to the prophet and present questions and requests directed to the Deity. The prophet would mediate those requests to God and then would return to the people the divine response. Such a procedure was a normal part of religious life and was the preferred method of communicating with God. In Israel the prophet, rather than the diviner, was thought to be the proper method of determining God's will.

God's angry response therefore comes as a shock. These people have worshiped idols, and their sins now make God unwilling to listen to their requests (v. 4). Instead God will respond to them directly in judgment and destroy them from the midst of Israel (vv. 4-5, 7-8). The prophet is not to mediate their requests but is allowed only to urge them to repent and reject their idols (v. 6). Furthermore, any prophet who is deceived by the people and who, as a result, presents their requests to God will share the fate of the sinners. Both will be cut off from the land and destroyed. In this way God will purge the evil that exists in Israel (vv. 9-11). The right to approach God through the prophet is not absolute but depends on the obedience of the people. When they deliberately sin, access to God can be denied as part of the divine judgment.

Individual Salvation and God's Justice

Up to this point the book of Ezekiel has given the clear impression that no one in Jerusalem is without sin and that this fact will make the judgment on the city total and inevitable. Ezekiel has also spoken of the Israelites already in exile as rebels and prophesied that they too will be subject to further destruction. There have been a few references to a remnant that will return to the land (5:3-4; 11:14-21), but for the most part the fate of the exiles is bleak. However, even the brief references to a remnant would have raised a question in the minds of Ezekiel's audience about the mechanisms through which one might survive the Exile and become part of the restored community. A partial answer to this question can be deduced from 14:12-23, although the main point of the passage lies elsewhere.

Ezek. 14:12-23 consists of four hypothetical cases (vv. 12-20) and an application of these cases to the situation of Jerusalem (vv. 21-23). The four cases are given in typical legal form and deal with God's reaction to a hypothetical nation's sin, specifically the sin of trespass, an offense against something holy or the violation of a sacred oath (cf. Lev. 6:2-3). In each of the four cases, God sends a different punishment on the land: famine (Ezek. 14:13), devastation by wild beasts (v. 15), slaughter by the sword (v. 17), and pestilence (v. 19). The same point is then made in all four cases. God punishes everyone who is guilty. Even if three legendary examples of virtue, Noah, Daniel, and Job, lived in the land, their righteousness would save only their own lives and could not be transferred to their children in order to save them (vv. 14, 16, 18, 20).

The three examples mentioned are traditional, ancient Near Eastern wisdom figures who were renowned for their patience and goodness. Noah was, of course, the hero of the Flood story, who survived because in his generation he alone was righteous (Gen. 6:9). In this case he was even able to save his family. Job's patience and faithfulness were proverbial even in antiquity, and the old folktale of Job's trials became the starting point for the biblical book of Job (Job 1). Daniel cannot be the hero of the book of Daniel (the names are spelled differently in Hebrew) but is probably the legendary king Dan'el, the good and wise ruler who is the subject of the Ugaritic tale of Aqhat. The fact that Ezekiel uses three non-Israelite examples of righteousness to illustrate the principle that personal righteousness leads to individual salvation may hint that he considered this principle to be a universal one. He certainly develops it in great detail in chap. 18, where he applies it to the exilic community. However, the point of the examples in 14:12-20 is not to develop a doctrine of individual salvation but to illustrate God's absolute justice. Because the guilty are destroyed; only the righteous are saved.

That this is the proper interpretation of vv. 12-20 becomes clear when Ezekiel applies the examples to Jerusalem (vv. 21-23). In keeping with what has been said in the book up to this point, the sin of Jerusalem is assumed, and the city is visited with all four of the previously mentioned acts of judgment: sword, famine, evil beasts, and pestilence. Technically speaking, no one in the city is delivered, as the righteous were in the hypothetical examples. The word "deliver" is not used in the application. Nevertheless, some people in the city, perhaps including some of the children of Ezekiel's exilic audience, do escape. However, their survival is not intended to indicate that they are righteous. Rather they have been allowed to escape so that they can be living examples of the evil that provoked God to destroy the city. When Ezekiel's audience sees the evil in their own children, then the exiles will recognize that God acted justly in judging Jerusalem (vv. 22-23).

Meditation on the Vine

Ezekiel's oracle of the vine can be broken easily into two parts. The first part consists of a series of rhetorical questions concerning the vine (vv. 1-5), and the second part compares the vine to Israel (vv. 6-8). The meaning of the first question is uncertain but probably has to do with the ultimate uses of the vine when compared with the other trees of the forest. Assuming that, in a poor land like Israel, everything that is given living space must in some way be utilitarian, God asks whether anything useful can be made from the vine. The answer is obviously no, since the vine contains too little usable wood, and its fibers are so flexible that it cannot even be made into an efficient peg (v. 3). Therefore the vine can only be used as a fuel. After it has been charred and partially burned, it is even less useful than it was originally. It is now only fit for further use as fuel, and it will therefore be consigned to the flames again (vv. 4-5).

The comparison between the uses of the vine and the fate of Jerusalem is clear. Like the vine, Jerusalem is worthless for any purpose except burning. God will therefore give up the city to destruction. If some escape the burning, as did the people who were left in the city after the first deportation of 597 B.C., they will be burned again until the city is totally consumed (vv. 6-8).

Allegory of the Adulterous Wife

Ezekiel's long oracle comparing Israel to an adulterous wife is composed of three major parts: an extended metaphor of Jerusalem as an adulteress (vv. 1-43a), an uncomplimentary comparison between Judah and her sisters Samaria and Sodom (vv. 43b-58), and a promise of God's fidelity (vv. 59-63). The whole oracle is held together by the image of the adulterous wife, but there is no logical progression from one part to another.

16:1-43a, Jerusalem as Adulteress. The bulk of the oracle is devoted to developing an extended metaphor of Jerusalem as an adulterous wife. The idea of comparing Israel's relationship with God to the relationship between a faithless wife and her husband seems to have originated with Hosea, whose broken marriage became a symbol of the estrangement between God and Israel (Hos. 1-3). The image was further developed by Jeremiah, who compared the worship of other gods and the making of foreign alliances to adultery (Jer. 2-3). Ezekiel develops both of these themes but sets them in the context of Israel's earlier history by giving a biography of God's eventual bride.

Throughout the metaphor the language of sexuality is explicit, and at times it appears crude to modern readers. Even in antiquity, the images were shocking, intended to make an instant impression on the prophet's readers. The images were also dangerous, for they were closely related to the themes of the fertility cults and were easily open to misinterpretation by Ezekiel's audience. Although the image of the adulterous wife is highly developed, the underlying historical reality is never completely hidden and sometimes intrudes into the metaphor, warping it slightly.

The extended metaphor is set within the classic prophetic form of an announcement of judgment to an individual. The faithless wife is confronted with a detailed indictment describing her crimes (Ezek. 16:1-34), and then judgment upon her is announced (vv. 35-43). The indictment begins with a reminder of Jerusalem's origins: her father was an Amorite and her mother a Hittite (v. 3). This statement reflects the actual background of the city. Before David captured it and made it his capital, Jerusalem was a Jebusite city closely related to the Hittites, and before that it was in Amorite hands. However, in the metaphor the young woman who is Jerusalem represents not only the pagan city that became Israel's religious and political center, but she also represents the nation of Israel as a whole. When the prophet begins to describe the young woman's life, it is the history of Israel that underlies the metaphor, not the actual history of the city. The actual history of the city does not concern Ezekiel again until vv. 40–42, when the reality of the impending siege of Jerusalem intrudes into the metaphor.

The young woman was rejected by her parents, and the proper birth rituals were not performed for her. Like many unwanted children in antiquity, she was left in an open field to die. However, God saw her in this pitiful condition and ordered her to live. When she grew to sexual maturity, God married her and made a covenant with her (v. 8), a reference to the covenant at Sinai where God and Israel entered into a special relationship (→ Covenant). As an attentive husband, God then gave to Israel all of the things that had been denied by her parents. She was bathed, anointed with oil, and clothed with fine garments, with the result that she became famous for her beauty (vv. 9–14). Lying behind this description may be a remembrance of the glorious days of the old Solomonic empire, but it is equally likely that Ezekiel here refers to no particular historical period.

Jerusalem was both the religious and the political capital of Israel, and Ezekiel therefore appropriately describes Israel's sins in both of these areas, tying the two together with images of prostitution and harlotry. The prophet apparently has no particular period of Israelite history in mind, for he elsewhere portrays Israel as sinful from the very beginning of its life as a nation (chap. 20).

Turning first to Israel's religious sins, God accuses the nation of committing adultery with other gods. The clothes that God had given her she used to make tent-shrines. Like the Israelites at Sinai, who melted down their jewelry to make an idolatrous golden calf (Exod. 32:1–10), so later Israel used God's gold and silver to make forbidden images in human form and then worshiped them with the clothing and food that God had provided (Ezek. 16:15–19). Included in the offerings were the children that Israel had born to God (vv. 20–21), a reference to a religious practice that existed in monarchical times outside of Jerusalem in the Valley of Hinnom, where children were sacrificed by fire to the underworld deity Molech (→ Molech).

However, Israel's sins were not only religious. She also committed adultery by making political covenants and treaties with other nations, thus violating her covenant with God and showing a lack of trust in God as Israel's sole protector and defender. These political arrangements were usually unfavorable to Israel, often resulting in the loss of Israelite territory (v. 27), but the nation continued to engage in them, even during the final years of its existence, when King Zedekiah vacillated between pro-Babylonian and pro-Egyptian foreign policies. Concluding treaties with foreign nations inevitably involved Israel's paying heavy tribute in return for political stability, a practice that Ezekiel sarcastically likens to a prostitute paying her customers in her eagerness to commit adultery with them (vv. 23–34).

The judgment that God announces upon Israel is appropriate for the crime (vv. 35–43). In Israelite law adultery was punished by stoning the offenders (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:23–29), a punishment in which the whole community participated to restore wholeness to the society. In this case, the agents of divine punishment will be the other nations, the very lovers whom Israel had desired. Specifically, the Babylonians will destroy Jerusalem, tearing down its altars, burning its houses, and slaughtering its inhabitants.

16:43b–58, Jerusalem and Her Sisters. Returning to his original image of Jerusalem as the child of pagan parents (v. 3), Ezekiel compares the city's conduct to that of her mother (vv. 43b–45). Just as Jerusalem's mother had neglected and rejected her, so Jerusalem has rejected her children by offering them as sacrifices to other deities (vv. 20–22). Furthermore, when compared to her "sisters," Samaria, the capital of the Northern Kingdom, Israel, and Sodom, the notoriously sinful city of antiquity, Jerusalem's sin appears even more blatant. Samaria and Sodom had both neglected the poor and committed all sorts of religious abominations (Gen. 18–19; 2 Kings 17), and God had therefore destroyed them. But the terrible sins of Jerusalem make these two proverbial sinners appear righteous. The conclusion to be drawn from the comparison is obvious. God destroyed Samaria and Sodom because of their sins, and Jerusalem's even greater sins will surely provoke a similar punishment (Ezek. 16:46–52).

After announcing judgment on Jerusalem, God unexpectedly promises that the city will be restored (vv. 53–58). However, the reinstated capital will not enjoy a preeminent status among the other nations (cf. Isa. 2:2–4). Rather it will be restored only after Sodom and Samaria have been restored. Like her sisters, Jerusalem has become a proverbially wicked city, and she will continue to be compared with them even after the fortunes of all three have been changed. This comparison will shame Jerusalem, which will continue to be disgraced for what she has done.

16:59–63, God's Fidelity. The long and convoluted oracle of judgment ends with a surprising word of promise. Given the sharply negative tone of the first thirty-three chapters of Ezekiel, this promise seems out of place, and most scholars consider it a later addition. However, although the promise is at odds with the book's final literary shape, there is no reason to conclude that Ezekiel could not have delivered occasional promises before the fall of the city.

Even though Jerusalem/Israel has been unfaithful to the marriage agreement with God and has committed adultery, God remains faithful to the covenant with Israel. This covenant is eternal, in spite of historical evidence to the contrary. Reversing the situation described in vv. 53-58, God now promises to forgive Jerusalem and restore its former pre-eminent status. Israel will truly know God in this act of grace and will never again rebel.

17:1-24

Allegory of the Eagles

Ezekiel's tale of the two eagles is called both a riddle (chidah) and an allegory (mashal). The former term refers to an enigmatic saying that requires interpretation, while the latter refers to a comparison between two things. In the allegory, the kings of Judah are being compared to cedars and vines, and the kings of Babylon and Egypt are being compared to eagles. To understand the riddle, it is necessary to have some knowledge of political events in Jerusalem between the first deportation in 597 B.C. and the fall of the city in 586 B.C. (see "Introduction" above for historical details).

17:1-10, The Allegory. Although at first glance the tale of the eagles seems to resemble a fable in which animals or plants engage in actions appropriate to humans (cf. Judg. 9:7-15), the opening of the story indicates that it operates on a more symbolic level. A large eagle, traditionally considered a royal bird of great power, takes the top of a Lebanese cedar and plants it in a "land of trade." The cedars of Lebanon were famous in antiquity because of their size and strength, and, consequently, were used throughout the ancient Near East as a building material, particularly in monumental royal construction projects. When Solomon built his royal residence and the Temple in Jerusalem, he imported large quantities of Lebanese cedar, and indeed one of his buildings contained so much of this wood that it was called "The House of the Forest of Lebanon" (1 Kings 7:2). Jerusalem, which is located on a mountain, is therefore appropriately symbolized in the allegory by Lebanon and the Davidic king by the cedar. The identity of the "land of trade" and the "city of merchants" (Ezek. 17:4) is ambiguous at this point in the allegory. The reference becomes intelligible only against the historical background of the first deportation. After planting the cedar shoot in the foreign land, the eagle takes some of the "seed of the land," presumably the seed of "Lebanon," and plants it in fertile soil, where it flourishes. However, the cedar vine, for no apparent reason, reaches out toward another eagle, which transplants it to equally fertile soil (vv. 3-8).

At the end of the tale, God addresses Ezekiel in a new oracle, asking whether or not the vine will survive (vv. 9-10). The answer to this question is not obvious unless the reader already understands the meaning of the allegory. Moreover, the divine replies that follow are equally puzzling. God supplies a negative answer to the initial question, suggesting that the first eagle will pull up the vine without much effort (v. 9). In addition, the cedar is not deeply rooted enough to withstand the east wind, a natural force elsewhere associated with God's powerful acts in the world (Exod. 10:13; 14:21).

17:11-21, The Interpretation. Although Ezekiel's original audience would have immediately understood the allegory, God nevertheless provides an oracular interpretation of it. The first eagle is Nebuchadnezzar, who deported the Israelite king Jehoiachin and Ezekiel's fellow exiles to Babylon in 597 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar then placed the Davidide Zedekiah on the throne in Jerusalem and made a treaty with him, thus providing all the conditions necessary for political stability in the land. However, Zedekiah rebelled and sought military support for his revolt against the Egyptian pharaoh Psammetichus II, the second eagle of the allegory. Ezekiel, like Jeremiah (Jer. 27:4-15), considered this move not only a political blunder but also a violation of God's will. Therefore the judgment will take place on two levels. On the human level, Nebuchadnezzar will besiege Jerusalem and deport Zedekiah to Babylon, where he will die. On the divine level, God will trap Zedekiah and judge him by taking him to Babylon, destroying his army in the process (Ezek. 11:11-21).

The interpretation of the allegory is straightforward and, for the most part, does not appear to have been crafted after the fall of Jerusalem. In fact Nebuchadnezzar was not able to capture Jerusalem easily (cf. v. 9), and the description of Zedekiah's fate (vv. 16, 17-21) does not seem to know of the actual events surrounding the fall of the city. Only in v. 17 has a later editor reinterpreted v. 9 as a reference to the fact that the Egyptian pharaoh did not come to the aid of the besieged Jerusalem.

17:22-24, An Oracle of Restoration. After the description of the certainty of judgment in the preceding verses, the announcement of restoration (vv. 22-24) comes as a surprise. God promises to select a Davidide from among the Babylonian exiles and restore him to the throne in Jerusalem. The monarchy will again flourish after the fall of the city. This oracle is not an interpretation of anything in the earlier allegory and is related to it only through the use of the same literary images. It is therefore likely that the promise was added to Ezekiel's original oracle after the fall of the city.

Questions About God's Justice

Like 12:21-28 and 33:10-20, 18:1-32 is essentially a disputation oracle that states a popular saying and then argues against it. The overall unit is composed of three parts: first, the statement of a proverb concerning intergenerational retribution and the arguments against it (vv. 1-20); second, the application of the principle lying behind the refutation to the stages of an individual's life (vv. 21-29); and third, a call to repent (vv. 30-32).

18:1-20, Intergenerational Sin and Punishment.

The disputation oracle begins by quoting a proverb that was current in Jerusalem and probably also among the exiles: "Fathers have eaten unripe grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge." The meaning of the proverb is clear. One generation is suffering the consequences of a prior generation's actions. In the context of Ezekiel's historical situation, just after the first deportation, the use of the proverb implies that the exiles are being punished for the sins of their ancestors. This point of view was widely accepted by people in the prophet's own time and is represented to some degree by the book of Kings, which attributes the Exile primarily to the evils committed during the reign of Manasseh rather than solely to the deeds of the people living at the time of the fall of Jerusalem (2 Kings 21). Jeremiah also accepted this explanation, at least in part, and prophesied that the proverb will cease to be true only after God has brought the exiles back from Babylon (Jer. 31:29). In Ezekiel's oracle, however, God orders the people to stop using the proverb immediately. As the one who controls the lives of all humans, God decrees that children shall not die for their parents' sin. Only the individual who sins shall die (Ezek. 18:4).

This principle by which God actually assigns punishment is then illustrated by three cases stated in legal form. In the first case (vv. 5-9), a righteous father lives because he has not committed iniquity, even though he may have a son who is not righteous. In the second case (vv. 10-13), the wicked son of a righteous father dies and bears the legal responsibility for his own death. The righteousness of the father cannot benefit the son. In the third case (vv. 14-18), the son of a wicked father sees the sins of his father and avoids them. The son lives and is not made to suffer for his father's sins.

In each of these three cases Ezekiel defines righteous or unrighteous conduct by citing specific examples of righteousness or wickedness.

As one might expect, Ezekiel's priestly background leads him to choose examples from the priestly laws, particularly from the Holiness Code (Lev. 17-26). Thus, the righteous person is one who does what is just and right, does not participate in ritual meals at mountain sanctuaries, does not worship idols (Lev. 19:4), does not commit adultery (Exod. 20:14), does not approach a menstruous woman (Lev. 18:19), does not violate the laws governing business practices (Exod. 22:25; Lev. 6:2, 4; 19:13; 25:14, 17, 36-37), feeds the hungry, clothes the naked, and judges justly (Lev. 19:35). Conversely, the unrighteous person violates these prescriptions.

After giving specific examples, God summarizes the basic principle again. When the people ask why the righteous son did not die for the sins of his father, God replies that the son did what was right, and because of this he lived. Only the person who sins shall die (Ezek. 18:19-20).

Ezekiel did not create the principle of retribution illustrated in these verses. Deut. 24:16 already enunciates it clearly. Parents are not to be put to death for the crimes of their children, nor are children to be punished for the crimes of their parents. This law was intended to counter the practice of punishing all of the members of a criminal's family, even if they had no part in the crime (cf. Exod. 20:5; Deut. 5:9; Josh. 7:24-25; 1 Sam. 22:19; 2 Kings 10:1-11; 25:7). However, Ezekiel stresses a direct correspondence between sin and punishment more strongly than did his predecessors, and he does so for a very specific reason. Ezekiel seeks to emphasize the notion that the exiles and those who remain in the land are suffering for their own sins and not for the sins of prior generations. The people using the proverb imply that they are being punished without cause and that their present state is due to someone else's actions. Therefore the proverb must be rejected, and the exiles must admit their guilt.

18:21-29, Individual Sin and Punishment.

After arguing against the popular proverb on the grounds that only the individual that sins shall die, Ezekiel extends the principle to successive stages in the life of a single individual. In this case two examples cast in legal form are provided. In the first case, a wicked person repents and thereafter lives a righteous life. As a result, his past sins are not remembered, and he lives (vv. 21-23). In contrast, the righteous person who commits iniquity dies for his sins, and none of his previous righteous deeds have any bearing on his fate (v. 24).

In contrast to the wicked people who are questioning divine justice, God in fact distributes rewards and punishments according to a clear and just principle. Only the righteous are rewarded, and only the wicked are punished.

18:30-32, A Call to Repent. In spite of the gloom that pervades most of the book of Ezekiel, the prophet's oracles on individual reward and punishment imply that some of the exiles may in fact escape destruction and may even live to return to the land. However, this goal can only be achieved by individual repentance and persistence in the righteous life. The oracle therefore ends with a call for the people to repent. Even though God is determined to punish the guilty, there is no divine pleasure in the death of the wicked. God sincerely desires repentance, even though the possibility of its occurring is remote (vv. 30-32).

Laments over the Monarchy

Ezekiel's lament over the monarchy is divided into two parts. In the first part (vv. 1-9), he develops an allegory concerning a lioness and compares the fates of two of her cubs (vv. 1-4, 5-9). In the second part of the lament (vv. 10-14), the prophet shifts the images in the allegory and speaks of the fate of a maternal vine and her offshoots. Both parts make use of the poetic structure that is typical of Hebrew dirges. Each pair of lines in the dirge consists of a triply accented line followed by a shorter, doubly accented line. Dirges are normally addressed to the person or thing being lamented, and they usually emphasize the contrast between the addressee's present pitiful state and former glory.

19:1-9, Allegory of the Lioness. In the first allegory, a lioness raises a cub and teaches it to hunt, but when the young lion grows strong, it becomes a man-eater. The surrounding nations are alarmed and capture the young lion, taking it in shackles to Egypt (vv. 1-4). When the lioness sees that the cub will not return, she raises another cub. This one too becomes a man-eater, making cities desolate and terrifying their populations. Again the nations trap the young lion, and this time bring it in shackles and neckstock to Babylon so that it can never return to its land (vv. 5-9).

The historical reality lying behind the allegory is far from clear. Scholars agree that the first cub must refer to King Jehoahaz of Judah, who was the son of Josiah and Hamutal. After Josiah's sudden death, Jehoahaz reigned briefly until he was deposed by Pharaoh Neco and deported to Egypt, where he died (2 Kings 23:30-34). Even so, Jehoahaz was far from being the international threat pictured in the allegory, and it must be assumed that Ezekiel has inflated the power of the Judean monarchy for dramatic effect. The second cub could allude to either Jehoiachin, who had in fact already been deported to Babylon when Ezekiel wrote, or Zedekiah, the reigning monarch. The latter interpretation is attractive because he too was a son of Josiah and Hamutal (2 Kings 24:18), a fact that would allow the dirge to be read narrowly as a comparison between the two sons of Hamutal who later became kings. Hamutal herself would then be the lioness of the allegory, and the dirge would have to be read as an anticipation of the deportation of Zedekiah to Babylon in 586 B.C. However, this narrow interpretation is undercut by the second allegory (Ezek. 19:10-14), where the mother seems to represent a corporate entity such as Jerusalem or the nation as a whole rather than a specific individual. It is therefore preferable to identify the lioness as Jerusalem, the royal house, the nation of Israel, or the tribe of Judah. Of these possibilities, the last has the advantage accounting for the major images used in the allegory. The tribe of Judah was traditionally symbolized by a lion (Gen. 49:9) and was the tribe from which the Davidic dynasty came.

19:10-14, Allegory of the Vine. In the second allegory the mother is compared to a vine that grew luxuriantly because of its favorable surroundings. Its strongest branches became scepters for rulers, and its height made it clearly visible from a distance. Then the vine was uprooted, and the east wind made it wither. The vine was burned and transplanted to a wilderness, where it will die in drought. Nothing will be left from which to make a ruler's staff.

The language of the allegory closely resembles that of chap. 17, and it is likely that the general subject matter is the same. However, the allegory is very general, and it is difficult to identify any of the symbols with certainty. The maternal vine is presumably Jerusalem, the royal house, or the tribe of Judah (as in vv. 1-9), and the strong branches represent the various great kings that arose during Israel's history, although no specific king can be readily identified. Rather the allegory concentrates on the vine as a whole and deals with the fate of the Davidic royal house. In the allegory the vine is destroyed many times over, and it is likely that here, as elsewhere, Ezekiel's description has been colored by the traumatic events surrounding the siege of Jerusalem. Nevertheless, the main point of the allegory is clear. The Davidic dynasty can no longer flourish and will be utterly destroyed. Verse 14 seems to imply that after its destruction, the Davidic line will not be restored, an idea that Ezekiel elsewhere rejects (37:24-28).

20:1-44

The History of Rebellious Israel

Ezekiel's judgmental account of Israel's history is highly complex and full of interpretive difficulties. The first part of the account follows a regular pattern (vv. 1-26), but later there are breaks in literary continuity that lead many scholars to suspect that Ezekiel or his disciples have elaborated the original text and introduced some confusion into the overall argument. At the same time, there is no scholarly agreement concerning the location of these editorial additions.

The whole chapter contains an uncharacteristically large amount of Deuteronomistic language and theology, a fact that seems to indicate that the prophet knew of and was influenced by the Deuteronomistic tradition. At the same time, the basic theology of the chapter is peculiar to Ezekiel. The same is true of some of the historical events that are mentioned. In such cases, it is necessary to conclude either that Ezekiel has remembered events that have left no other traces in the biblical record or that he is presenting a history that is already deeply colored by his own theological interpretation of Israel's past. Of these two possibilities, the latter is more likely.

20:1-4, Inquiring of God. The oracle is dated to August of 591 B.C. As in 8:1 and 14:1, the entire unit is presented as God's response to exilic elders who have approached Ezekiel to inquire of God. The subject of their inquiry is not specified, although it presumably had to do with the city of Jerusalem and its fate. However, as in 14:1, their attempts to communicate with God are cut short. Their sins have made such communication impossible, and God refuses to listen to their requests. Instead, Ezekiel is commanded to present an account of their past crimes, a task that he performs by giving his own version of Israel's early history.

20:5-26, From Egypt to Exile. Ezekiel's primary account of Israel's history consists of three episodes, all of which have the same basic structure. In each case God acts graciously toward Israel, but Israel responds by disobeying God's laws and by worshiping other gods. Because of the people's sins, God is determined to destroy them but does not do so in order to protect the sanctity of the divine name.

Following this pattern, Ezekiel begins his account with the Israelites in Egypt before the Exodus (vv. 5-9). In Egypt God revealed the divine name to Israel and swore to bring the people out of Egypt and to give them a glorious land (cf. Exod. 6:2-8). In return, God required that the people reject the idols that they had worshiped, a requirement that is not recorded in the Exodus narratives in their present form (but note Josh. 24:14). However, the people did not listen but continued to worship other gods. God therefore contemplated destroying them in Egypt but finally did not do so in order not to profane the divine name. Such a decision is not recorded in the existing biblical accounts of the Exodus, but the stories of Israel in the wilderness do tell of two occasions when Moses saved the people by appealing to the necessity of preserving the sanctity of the divine name. After Israel created and worshiped the golden calf (Exod. 32:1-6) and after the people rejected the land that God had given them (Num. 14:13-19; Deut. 9:28), God threatened to destroy Israel but was prevented from doing so by Moses, who successfully argued that such an act would dishonor the divine name by making it appear to the nations that God was unable to fulfill the promise of deliverance that had been made to Israel in Egypt. Ezekiel has apparently taken this motif and applied it throughout Israel's early history.

After the Exodus, the same basic pattern is repeated during the time of the first wilderness generation (Ezek. 20:10-17). From Egypt God led the people to Sinai, where they were given life-giving laws, including the distinctive law of the Sabbath (Exod. 20-40). However, Israel again rebelled and refused to obey the laws, violating the Sabbath and worshiping other gods (cf. Exod. 16; 32). God again considered destroying the people in the wilderness, but did not do so in order to preserve the sanctity of the divine name. In this case too Ezekiel has generalized on isolated incidents that occurred during Israel's wilderness wanderings but has overlooked the main historical point. God did in fact condemn to death all of the wilderness generation because of their refusal to accept the land (Num. 14:13-19).

God then turned to the children of the wilderness generation (Ezek. 20:18-26) and warned them not to follow in the ways of their ancestors. The second wilderness generation, however, was just as wicked as the first. God therefore determined to destroy them in the wilderness but did not do so to protect the sanctity of the divine name. Instead God swore to scatter the people among the nations (v. 23). Thus, according to Ezekiel, the Exile was decreed as punishment for Israel's sins even before the people entered the land (cf. Ps. 106:26-27). However, at the same time the prophet indicates that the Exile is not to be equated with the destruction of Israel. This refusal to interpret the Exile as the equivalent of the destruction of the nation provides an oblique note of hope in an otherwise dismal oracle.

This third example of Israel's rebellion is noteworthy not only because it was the occasion on which God decided to exile the people, but also because after this event God made it virtually impossible for Israel to improve its conduct. As punishment for their sins, God gave the people bad laws that would lead them to defile themselves by offering their children as sacrifices (Ezek. 20:26). The reference here is to the law requiring the dedication of firstborn children to God (Exod. 22:29), a law whose ambiguity was later clarified by stipulations allowing firstborn children to be redeemed through animal sacrifice (Exod. 13:11-13; 34:20). It is likely that in Ezekiel's day people appealed to this law to justify their participation in the cult of Molech in the Valley of Hinnom outside of Jerusalem, where children were sacrificed to the deities of the underworld.

20:27-29, Israel in the Land. Ezekiel's treatment of Israel's life after it entered the land is strikingly brief and appears to be an intrusion into the flow of the argument. The prophet summarizes the people's behavior by saying that they worshiped other gods as their ancestors had done. This comment is anticlimactic after the preceding history leading from Egypt to the promise of exile.

20:30-44, Implications for the Future. At the end of his history of Israel's apostasy, Ezekiel is told to address the elders again concerning both the present and the future. Speaking to the present, God repeats the point of vv. 1-4. The elders have repeated the sins of their ancestors and therefore may not inquire of God through the prophet (vv. 30-31). At the same time, this refusal of the elders' inquiry does not mean that exilic Israel is doomed to a future without God. The people will not become like the rest of the nations, which worship idols (v. 32). Instead, God promises the people a new exodus, which will involve a purifying return to the wilderness (vv. 33-38). In the future the exiles will be gathered from the places where they have been scattered, and they will be led into a wilderness where God will impose divine kingship on them. Like a shepherd who counts sheep for sacrifice by making them pass under a rod, so God will examine the individual exiles and remove the rebels from them. The new wilderness will be a time of judgment, and the survivors will be obliged to obey the covenant (v. 37). Even though the exiles continue to rebel, they cannot cease to be God's people, and God will not finally reject them.

After this involuntary period of judgment and purification, God promises to bring the remnant back to the land and to reestablish worship. No longer will God refuse the people's request for an audience, but their offerings will again be accepted. The divine presence will return to the land, and the proper relationship between God and people will be restored. When the people witness these events, they will know God through acts of restoration rather than through acts of judgment, and then they will recognize their sins. In the end God will restore the people for the sake of the divine name and will not give them what they actually deserve (vv. 40-44).

Oracles of the Sword

In this section Ezekiel or his disciples have woven together several oracles that may have originally been written on different occasions. The collection opens with an allegory against the southern forests (20:45-49). This initial unit is then linked to an oracle concerning the divine sword; this second oracle is presented as the interpretation of the opening allegory (21:1-7). The reference to the sword is the occasion for including two additional oracles dealing with swords: the song of the sword (21:8-17), and a description of the sword of the king of Babylon (21:18-32). By use of these thematic links the entire section coheres.

20:45-49, Allegory of the Forest. In this oracle Ezekiel is told to prophesy against the southern forests, specifically the forest of the Negeb. The divine message is that all of the trees of the forest, the green ones as well as the dry ones, are to be burned. The total burning will be a sign to everyone that God is the agent of the destruction.

The symbolism of the allegory is unclear. Presumably the fire represents God's judgment, as it does elsewhere in Ezekiel, but the identity of the area to be burned is obscure. It is impossible to understand the oracle literally, since the Negeb was a dry, desolate area of southern Judah that contained little vegetation of any sort and certainly no forests (→ Negeb, The). It is likely, therefore, that the prophet here refers simply to Judah as a whole. The designation "southern" is appropriate if Judah is compared with the old Northern Kingdom, Israel. This old division of the land may lie behind the allegory.

The vagueness of the allegory also impressed the prophet, who apparently did not understand what was being communicated. He therefore complained that his audience was accusing him of speaking only in incomprehensible riddles and allegories. Apparently in response to this complaint, God then provided the interpretation contained in the following oracle.

21:1-7, Unsheathing God's Sword. The interpretation supplied for the preceding allegory clearly identifies the object of God's wrath as Jerusalem and its sanctuaries. However, in the interpretation the prophet changes the agent of destruction from fire to sword. The reason for this shift is not clear, since both images are appropriate in descriptions of the Babylonian conquest of the city. As is true throughout Ezekiel, it is clear here that God is the actual destroyer of Jerusalem. It is a divine sword that will rage through the city, destroying both the righteous and the wicked together (vv. 1-5).

To dramatize the devastation foretold in the oracle, Ezekiel is commanded again to become a sign for the exiles (cf. 12:1-7, 17-20). He is to wail and mourn to indicate the seriousness of the loss of the city and the destruction of its inhabitants. When people ask the reason for his behavior, he is to respond by describing the terror that will inevitably come on the Jerusalemites as they anticipate their destruction (21:6-7).

21:8-17, The Song of the Sword. In the poem describing God's sword, the prophet communicates his dreadful message by using repetition and by piling up evocative images (cf. chap. 7). The result is a passionate, urgent song that fully captures Ezekiel's horror as he watches the divine sword do its deadly work. The poem begins with an ominous description of the sword's construction. It is sharpened and polished so that it can be an efficient instrument of destruction (21:8-11). With the preparation of the sword completed, the prophet's attention is drawn to the sword's purpose: the slaughter of God's people. The prophet is told to cry and wail when he realizes that Jerusalem cannot escape destruction. God will no longer use the sword simply to test the city's willingness to obey but will use the blade only for slaughter (vv. 12-13).

After seeing the use to which the sword will be put, the prophet is himself drawn into the action. He is to clap his hands, and that act will make the sword fall on the people. God then joins the prophet's action whereupon it becomes clear that the real agent of Jerusalem's destruction is God acting through the prophet (vv. 14-17).

21:18-32, The Sword of the King of Babylon. From the divine agent of Israel's destruction Ezekiel turns to the human agent, the king of Babylon. Just as the prophet was earlier told to dramatize the siege by drawing Jerusalem surrounded by the enemy (4:1-3), so now he is commanded to sketch the invasion route by which Nebuchadnezzar will come to Jerusalem. Ezekiel dramatically draws a fork in the road leading from Babylon. One of the road's branches leads to Jerusalem, while the other leads to Rabbah, the capital of the Ammonites. The oracle then graphically describes the Babylonian king standing at the fork in the road and consulting various types of omens to determine which road to take. The omens point to the road to Jerusalem, and the city's fate is sealed (21:18-23).

The significance of Ezekiel's oracle is immediately made clear. God has not forgotten Israel's sins. Therefore Jerusalem will be destroyed, and Zedekiah will be stripped of his royal robes and removed from the throne (vv. 24-27).

As an afterthought, Ezekiel or his disciples have added an oracle against the Ammonites (vv. 28-32). Although Ammon originally escaped when the Babylonian oracles directed the king toward Jerusalem, the Ammonites too will feel God's wrath. Against them will be turned the divine sword that had been prepared for use on Jerusalem.

22:1-31 Oracles Against the Uncleaness of Jerusalem

In this section Ezekiel or his disciples have assembled three oracles dealing with the impurity of Jerusalem and its inhabitants. The individual units may well have originated at different times, and the prophet has made no effort to weave them together into a larger literary unit.

22:1-16, A City of Blood. The first oracle in the section fits the standard prophetic pattern of an announcement of judgment. The unit begins with a general indictment of Jerusalem for its crimes. The offenses of the city are of two general sorts: bloodshed and idolatry, that is, crimes against people and crimes against God. Both types of crimes have made Jerusalem notorious among the nations and brought it to the brink of judgment (vv. 1-5).

The general indictment of the city and its inhabitants is then made specific by citing a representative list of sins (vv. 6-12). Some of these crimes are included in indictments elsewhere in Ezekiel (see esp. chap. 18). Many of the offenses are violations of priestly law as set out in the Holiness Code (Lev. 17-26). Included are mistreatment of parents (Exod. 21:17; Lev. 20:9); oppression of aliens, widows, and orphans (Exod. 22:21-22; Deut. 14:29); desecration of holy things and Sabbaths (Lev. 19:30); slander (Lev. 19:16); eating ritual meals at pagan shrines; a variety of sexual offenses (Lev. 18; 20); and improper business practices.

On the basis of this indictment, God announces a judgment (Ezek. 22:13-16). Israel will be scattered in exile among the nations, and everything in Jerusalem that is impure will be destroyed.

22:17-22, The Smelting of the City. The image of God refining Jerusalem to remove its impurities is already present in Isa. 1:22, 25. Ezekiel here may be giving his own interpretation of Isaiah's earlier oracle. Both prophets refer to the ancient process by which silver was extracted from the ore in which it was embedded. During the first stage of refining silver, minerals were added to the silver ore, and the whole mixture was heated in a smelting furnace. The intense heat melted the ore and caused the metals mixed with the silver to form sulfides. At this point the smelters removed the metal sulfides (dross or slag) and discarded them. Then the silver, still mixed with some lead, was further refined.

In Isaiah's original oracle, the smelting image was used to describe the process by which God would purify the city until all of the wicked (the dross) were collected and discarded and only the remnant (the silver) remained. As is frequently the case, however, Ezekiel changed Isaiah's image dramatically. In Ezekiel's oracle, God begins by announcing in advance the results of the smelting process. Before the work even begins, God tells the prophet that all of Israel has become dross, which is fit only to be discarded. The people have become the bronze, tin, iron, and lead that are removed as slag. There is no silver, no one worth saving, among them (Ezek. 22:17-18; cf. Jer. 6:27-30). Because God has reached this conclusion, the prophet is to announce the people's punishment, which will take the form of burning them in the smelting furnace of Jerusalem. However, because there is no silver in this ore, nothing good comes from the smelting process. The furnace of God's wrath only melts the dross, which is then discarded (Ezek. 22:19-22).

22:23-31, An Indictment of Jerusalem's Inhabitants. In the last oracle in this section, the prophet addresses Jerusalem and condemns various leaders who should have tried to prevent the city's destruction but did not. It is important to remember that Ezekiel's audience in Babylon also contained some of Jerusalem's leaders, so the oracle pertains to them as well. Because of the actions of the leaders, Jerusalem remains impure. The leaders have taken treasure and destroyed people in the city. The priests, who should have been concerned with the purity of the city, have violated God's law, desecrated holy objects, and failed to distinguish the holy and the unholy, the clean and the unclean. The princes, who should have guaranteed justice, have murdered for unjust gain. The prophets speaking in God's name have lied to the people. The landowners ("people of the land") have committed robbery and extortion against the poor. When God looked for a prophet to protect the people from the divine wrath, no one could be found (cf. chap. 13). Therefore God has already poured out judgment on the leaders.

The way in which Ezekiel refers to the judgment as already having taken place (22:31) suggests that he is referring here to the judgment that occurred in 597 B.C., when the leaders in Ezekiel's audience were deported to Babylon. In this case the message is intended for the exiles, even though the oracle itself is addressed to Jerusalem. Alternatively, it is possible to interpret the entire oracle as a retrospective statement of the reasons for Jerusalem's fall. In this case the oracle would have been written after 586 B.C. by Ezekiel or his disciples.

Allegory of the Two Sisters

Chap. 23 contains an expanded allegory dealing with two adulterous sisters, Jerusalem and Samaria. Ezekiel first used this literary image in 16:43-63, and it is likely that chaps. 23 and 16 have influenced each other at various points in their compositional history. In addition, chap. 23 has undergone several later expansions at the hands of Ezekiel or his disciples, with the result that there are breaks in the continuity of the argument during the latter part of the chapter (vv. 35-49).

As he did in chap. 16, Ezekiel bases the allegory in chap. 23 on Hosea's image of God and Israel related to each other as husband and wife (cf. Jer. 2-3). Again Ezekiel develops this image in great detail, using graphic, crude, and explicit sexual language to portray Israel's adulteries. As in chap. 16, the prophet's intent is to shock his readers into realizing how drastically they have violated their covenant relationship with God.

23:1-34, The Judgment of the Sisters. In chap. 16 Ezekiel compared Jerusalem with her "sisters," the proverbially wicked cities of Samaria and Sodom, to dramatize Jerusalem's depravity. In chap. 23 the prophet uses the image in a more strictly historical way. He first tells allegorically the story of Samaria, the capital of the Northern Kingdom (Israel) after the political division of Ephraim and Judah following the death of Solomon. Samaria's history, which culminated in the city's destruction at the hands of the Assyrians, should have been an object lesson for Jerusalem, the capital of the Southern Kingdom (Judah), but Jerusalem did not learn from her "older" sister (cf. Jer. 3:6-10). Therefore Jerusalem is condemned to share the same fate as Samaria.

In developing the allegory, Ezekiel sometimes distorts or emphasizes too strongly the actual events of Israel's history, but in general the course of the allegory can easily be followed. The tale begins with two sisters who were the daughters of the same mother, a reflection of the fact that, until Solomon's death, Judah and Israel were both part of the larger nation of Israel. Ezekiel assigns the names Oholah and Oholibah to Samaria and Jerusalem respectively, although the specific meaning of these names is not clear. Both are based on the Hebrew word meaning “tent,” and the prophet may intend the names to evoke the pre-conquest period, when Israel lived in tents, or to refer to the tent of meeting, the portable shrine that housed God’s presence until a permanent Temple was built by Solomon (→ Tabernacle). Some scholars have suggested more specific meanings for the names, although there is still much debate on this issue. It is possible that the prophet simply wanted to use two different names that resembled each other.

According to the allegory, the adulteries of the two sisters began in Egypt, though it is not clear in this case what the prophet means by “adultery.” Knowing that they were adulteresses, God nevertheless married them and had children by them (vv. 1–4). This picture of Israel’s early relations with God closely follows the symbolic actions in Hosea 1 and 3 and may reflect the fact that Israel rebelled against God even before the covenant (“marriage”) was made at Sinai (Exod. 14:10–18; 15:19–26; 16:1–36; 17:1–16).

After this brief introduction to the history of the sisters while they were still together in Egypt, Ezekiel jumps to the time of the division of the Northern and Southern kingdoms and traces their separate stories. In both stories he uses the adultery image primarily to refer to the practice of making political alliances with other nations, a practice that he viewed as the equivalent of rejecting God’s sovereignty (cf. 16:23–34; Hos. 8:9–10; Isa. 7:1–9). Thus Oholah played the harlot with the Assyrians, a reference to the Northern Kingdom’s various treaties with Assyrian kings (2 Kings 15:19–22; 17:1–6). As a punishment for this crime, God gave Israel into the power of the Assyrians, her former lovers (Ezek. 23:5–10; cf. 16:35–42). Samaria was destroyed, and the Northern Kingdom ceased to exist (722/721 B.C.).

The story of Oholah/Samaria should have been a warning to Oholibah/Jerusalem and should have led her to change her ways, but this was not the case. She too committed adultery with the Assyrians and compounded that sin by inviting the Babylonians to commit adultery with her (23:11–21). Lying behind this indictment is Judah’s long history of political alliances with Assyria (2 Kings 16:7–9; 18:1–36) and later with Babylon (2 Kings 20:12–21). This history continued up to Ezekiel’s own time and culminated in Zedekiah’s vacillating foreign policy that included leagues with both Babylon and Egypt (see “Introduction” above).

The description of Jerusalem’s crimes leads directly to a graphic picture of her punishment (Ezek. 23:22–31). God will punish the adulteress by leaving her to the mercy of her former lovers, the Babylonians and all of their allies (v. 23; cf. 16:35–42). Now rejected by God, the adulterous wife is no longer under the protection of God’s law, which mandated death by stoning as the penalty for adultery (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:22–24). The laws of other nations were not so kind. The Babylonians will mutilate the adulteress, strip her, and leave her to the mercy of her enemies. Her children will be killed and burned. Jerusalem will be exposed to the horrors of siege, capture, and exile. She will drink from the same cup as her sister, Samaria, and will share the same fate.

The reference to the two sisters sharing the same cup (Ezek. 23:31) provides the occasion for the inclusion of a brief song that develops this image (vv. 32–34). The song, which may have been part of the original oracle or may have been added later, reinforces the point that Jerusalem will have to suffer all of the torments that Samaria suffered.

23:35–49, Supplementary Indictments.

The remainder of chap. 23 contains several new indictments and announcements of judgment against Jerusalem. Much of this material seems to have been influenced by the contents of chap. 16 and may have been added to chap. 23 after the initial allegory was composed. The additional charges amplify the earlier oracle but do so in a way that is anticlimactic after the allegory’s horrifying description of judgment.

After a summary of the preceding oracle (v. 35), the prophet includes a new indictment of both sisters (vv. 36–42). Again the charge is adultery, but this time the adultery image clearly refers to the worship of other gods rather than to the making of foreign alliances (cf. 16:15–22). The people have profaned God’s sanctuary and Sabbaths and have offered their children as sacrifices to the underworld deities (see commentary above on 16:15–22; 20:26). They have invited foreign lovers to the Temple, presumably a reference to the introduction of foreign practices into Israelite worship (cf. 8:5–18; 13:17–23).

The importation of other gods is the equivalent of adultery (23:43–44). Therefore the sisters will be judged by “righteous men,” who will impose the penalty for adultery (v. 45). The identity of these righteous people is uncertain. If the reference is to the Babylonians as the agents of God’s punishment, which is the case in the rest of the chapter, then the prophet is clearly being ironic or else implying that the Babylonians are righteous when contrasted with Jerusalem. On the other hand, the reference may be to those in exile who have been able to repent and keep themselves righteous (cf. 18:14–17). If so, then the prophet envisions a situation in which the righteous remnant of the exiles will participate in the judgment of the rest of Israel.

The penalty for adultery is referred to explicitly in 23:46–49, where God commands the prophet to call up the enemy army that will punish Israel. As is true elsewhere in Ezekiel's allegories, the literary image is invaded by the historical reality of the siege of Jerusalem. The adulterous Jerusalem will be stoned and killed by the sword. The survivors will be killed and the houses of the city torn down. The fate of Jerusalem will serve as a warning to the rest of the nations, and in the judgment Israel will come to know God.

Allegory of the Pot

Ezekiel's allegory of the pot takes the form of a brief song about preparing a pot and its contents for cooking (vv. 3–5). The allegory is then extended and obliquely interpreted (vv. 9–14), and this interpretation has in turn been expanded by a later addition (vv. 6–8). The result is an image that contains some inconsistencies, but the overall meaning of the allegory remains clear.

At the beginning of the allegory, God tells Ezekiel to record in writing the precise day on which the oracle is given. It is January 588, the beginning of the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem (vv. 1–2). The exiles, of course, will not receive word of the siege until later, and when they do they will then be able to recognize the truth of the prophet's earlier oracle.

Following the instructions concerning the date, God gives the allegory that the prophet is to utter. It is in the form of a song, instructing someone to fill a pot with water and fill it with pieces of prime meat and bones. The pot is then to be put on the fire and the meat cooked. Taken by itself, the song is innocuous, and if it were to be heard in isolation from its present context it might even be understood as a positive image of the preparation of a bountiful feast. However, the introductory note on the date of the allegory forces readers to give the image a more negative interpretation. It must now be connected with the Jerusalemites' earlier statement about Jerusalem: "This city is the caldron, and we are the flesh" (11:3).

The first of the two expansions and interpretations of the allegory immediately develops this negative note (vv. 6–8). However, instead of focusing on the contents of the pot, as one might expect, this interpretation focuses on the pot itself. The bloody city of Jerusalem is likened to a corroded kettle, which contaminates everything in it. The contamination of the city stems from innocent blood that has been spilled within its walls, a reference perhaps to the oppression of the poor or to the deaths caused by the kings' foreign policies. No attempt has been made to atone for the blood or cover it, so God will now expose the blood and make atonement impossible. The pot will be emptied and purified (v. 6). If this reference is to be interpreted as part of the allegory, it may refer to the exiles of 597 B.C., who were removed from the city before its burning and purification in 587–586.

After this reflection on Jerusalem's sin, which appears to be a digression, there is a second interpretation that better fits the original allegory (vv. 9–14). The bloody city of Jerusalem and its inhabitants will be burned until people (the contents of the pot) are thoroughly cooked and charred. Then the city itself (the pot) will be burned until its impurities are removed. God will not spare the city again but will burn it until it is pure.

The Death of Ezekiel's Wife

In 24:15–27 the prophet is again told to act as a sign for the exiles to dramatize for them what their own future will be. As is often the case, Ezekiel reports the sign as he experienced it and does not supply an interpretation until the meaning of the sign is actually revealed to him.

The symbolic act begins when God tells the prophet that "the delight of [his] eyes" will be taken away from him with a single stroke. In response to this event the prophet is not to weep, sigh aloud, or wear the clothes of mourners. He is to do nothing to make his grief public. This prophecy is immediately reported to the exiles, but its meaning is not immediately clear. To what does the phrase "delight of your eyes" (v. 16) refer? Is it a human being? If so, who is it? In the context of the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem, does it perhaps refer to the city itself? The ambiguity is not resolved until Ezekiel's wife dies on the evening of the day that the prophecy was reported to the people. Then the prophet responds as he was directed (vv. 17–18).

When the exiles inquired about Ezekiel's peculiar response to his wife's death, he interprets the sign for them (vv. 19–24). In this interpretation, the phrase "delight of your eyes" is given a double meaning. It refers to the Temple, which symbolizes God's presence in Jerusalem, and it also refers to the children whom the exiles were forced to leave behind in the city when they were deported in 597. God will desecrate the Temple, and the sons and daughters of the exiles will be slaughtered (v. 21). In response to these two events, the exiles are not to mourn publicly, presumably because the destruction was deserved in both cases.

At the end of the symbolic act Ezekiel receives an additional divine word concerning the fatal day of the Temple's destruction. When the judgment actually takes place, a fugitive from the city will report the news, and the prophet's dumbness will then be removed (vv. 25-27). This prophecy is finally fulfilled in 33:21-22.

25:1-32:32

Oracles Against Foreign Nations

After the last of the major judgment oracles against Jerusalem and Judah, Ezekiel has inserted a collection of judgment oracles against foreign nations. Similar collections appear in other prophetic books as well (Amos 1-2; Isa. 13-23; Jer. 46-51), and it may be that certain types of Israelite prophets were expected to deliver such prophecies as a form of protection or retaliation against the nation's enemies. For this reason judgment oracles against foreign nations are often considered the equivalent of promise oracles for Israel. By destroying Israel's enemies, God is in fact bringing salvation to Israel. While this view of the oracles may help to explain why Ezekiel placed them between oracles of judgment against Israel (chaps. 1-24) and oracles of promise (chaps. 34-48), it does not explain the purpose of the oracles. If the oracles were intended simply to predict divine vengeance against Israel's enemies and to reassure the besieged Jerusalemites, then one would certainly expect Ezekiel to have included oracles against Babylon in the collection. However, anti-Babylonian oracles do not appear. Rather all of the nations condemned in the oracles either played some role in the events surrounding the destruction of Jerusalem or were active in trying to prevent Babylonian rule from being established in Palestine. Throughout the book Ezekiel's theological view of Babylon is that God, who is the true ruler of all nations, has chosen Nebuchadnezzar as a divine instrument to punish Israel for its sins. Therefore anyone who interferes with Nebuchadnezzar's actions is opposing the will of God and deserves to be punished.

The oracles in the collection contain an unusually large number of specific dates, although the arrangement of the oracles is not strictly chronological. The dates serve two functions. First, they anchor most of the prophecies in the period between the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem and its completion. The siege was a time of intense political activity in Israel, and many of the nations condemned in the oracles were involved in this activity in various ways. Their interaction with Jerusalem probably prompted the oracles dealing with their fate. Second, the dates are designed to guarantee the truth of the oracles by showing that they were actually delivered before the events they describe.

Although oracles against foreign nations are sometimes thought to be the work of exilic or postexilic disciples of the prophets, there is no reason to doubt that Ezekiel composed the oracles contained in chaps. 25-32. However, some of the oracles appear to have been heavily edited, either by Ezekiel himself or by his disciples.

Oracles Against Israel's Neighbors

The collection of prophecies against foreign nations opens with a set of oracles against four of Israel's nearest neighbors: Ammon (vv. 1-7), Moab (vv. 8-11), Edom (vv. 12-14), and the Philistines (vv. 15-17). All of these nations had a long history of contentious relations with Judah, but most of the indictments are rather general in character. When specific charges are made against a particular nation, they usually reflect events occurring after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. Although the indictments are not dated, the references to Jerusalem's fall suggest that most, if not all, of the oracles were produced after the city was destroyed.

All of the oracles follow the same general literary pattern, that of the classic prophetic announcement of judgment. The indictment of the nation is introduced with the word "because," and the description of the crime is followed by an announcement of punishment, introduced by the word "therefore," often followed by the formula "thus says the Lord."

25:1-7, Against Ammon. Ezekiel records two oracles against Ammon. In the first (vv. 2-5), the Ammonites are condemned because they mocked Judah when the Temple was destroyed by the Babylonians. For this reason, Ammon is to be invaded by an unnamed people from the east, presumably the Babylonians or their successors. In the second oracle (vv. 6-7), Ammon is accused of rejoicing over Israel's destruction. As a punishment, Ammon will have to share Israel's fate.

25:8-11, Against Moab. Although there were longstanding political tensions between Judah and Moab, the Moabites are charged only with denying the special religious status of Judah and comparing the Judahites to the rest of the nations. Because Moab did not recognize Judah's privileged position as God's elect, Moabite cities will be invaded and given into the power of people from the east (cf. v. 4).

25:12-14, Against Edom. In contrast to the two preceding oracles, which treat theological themes, the oracle against Edom is purely political. Relations between Judah and Edom had been acrimonious for years before Jerusalem fell, but the Edomites earned the undying hatred of the late biblical writers by invading southern Judah after the Babylonians had destroyed Jerusalem (cf. Jer. 49:7-22; Obad. 1-14). It is not surprising that Ezekiel condemns the Edomites for this vengeful, opportunistic act. Because of their crime, God will completely destroy them and leave the country a wasteland.

25:15-17, Against the Philistines. The indictment against the Philistines is also politically oriented. Like the Edomites, they too are charged with taking vengeance on Judah, although the precise events to which the prophet refers are unknown. It is possible that Nebuchadnezzar gave Judahite territory to the Philistines. Because of their crimes the Philistines will be destroyed by God.

26:1-28:26

Oracles Against Phoenicia

Ezekiel's oracles against Phoenicia focus on the island city-state of Tyre, which, along with Egypt, Babylon, and Assyria, was one of the major political powers in the ancient world. The island location of the city provided good protection from outside attack and allowed Tyre to participate in Near Eastern political intrigues with relatively little risk. At various points in its history Tyre paid tribute to Assyria and Babylon, but the Tyrian homeland was not successfully invaded until the time of Alexander the Great. Tyre's economy was always oriented toward the sea, and the city became immensely wealthy through an extensive network of trading relationships. In Ezekiel's own time Tyre was one of the nations that joined with Judah in an attempt to stop the Babylonian advance to the west (Jer. 27).

Ezekiel's opposition to Tyre is presumably grounded in its anti-Babylonian policies. Because he saw Babylon as God's chosen agent for the punishment of Jerusalem, the prophet interpreted Tyre's anti-Babylonian activities as a violation of God's will. In addition, Ezekiel may have traced some of the abominable religious practices in the Temple to Tyrian influence.

26:1-21, The Destruction of Tyre. Ezekiel's first oracle against Tyre is dated in March/April of 587/586 B.C. The actual date is uncertain because of textual variants, but the oracle is probably to be related to Nebuchadnezzar's siege of Tyre, which began shortly after the fall of Jerusalem. The siege lasted thirteen years and finally ended with the negotiation of a treaty between the two parties.

The oracle as a whole consists of four sections. In the first section (vv. 1-6), God condemns the city for exulting over the additional trade that it will enjoy by virtue of Jerusalem's destruction. Because of Tyre's heartless reaction to Judah's suffering, the island kingdom will be engulfed by the surrounding nations, which will obliterate all signs of Tyrian occupation and reduce the island to bare rock.

In the second section of the oracle (vv. 7-14), the general threat of punishment by the nations (v. 3) is made much more specific by describing in graphic detail the successful siege, which Nebuchadnezzar will mount against Tyre. This amplification of the earlier judgment oracle (vv. 1-6) was probably inspired by the beginning of the actual Babylonian siege, although vv. 7-14 must have been added to the chapter before the end of the siege, since Ezekiel's prediction of the Babylonian destruction of the city was never realized.

In the third section of the oracle (vv. 15-18), Ezekiel anticipates the reaction of the surrounding nations to Tyre's dramatic fall. Addressing the city directly, the prophet describes the way in which its death cries will shake the entire Palestinian coast and terrify the kings who were once Tyre's trading partners. They will put on mourning garments and lament the vanquished city. As in all laments (cf. chap. 19), the dirge of Tyre's neighbors contrasts the city's former glory with its present miserable state. The powerful, renowned city that once terrorized the entire coast has now disappeared entirely (26:17-18).

The final section of the oracle (vv. 19-21) expresses the significance of Tyre's destruction in theological terms. Although Nebuchadnezzar may be the direct cause of the city's demise, God is actually the one who causes Tyre to be engulfed in the waters of the cosmic sea, the primeval deep that lies beneath the earth. God will then consign the city to the underworld, the realm of the dead, where all life ceases. Ezekiel uses the image of a descent into the underworld elsewhere in his oracles against foreign nations (cf. 28:8; 31:14-18), and it is extraordinarily well developed in his oracles against Egypt (32:17-32). The latter passage in particular has probably influenced his description of Tyre's fate.

27:1-36, A Lament for the Ship of Tyre.

In this long and beautifully crafted oracle, Ezekiel laments the anticipated destruction of Tyre at the hands of the Babylonians. Like his other laments (cf. chap. 19), this one describes first the previous glorious state of Tyre (vv. 3b-25a) and then its present grievous condition (vv. 25b-36). However, rather than describing the city's downfall literally, the prophet does so allegorically. Quoting Tyre's boast of its perfect beauty, Ezekiel compares the proud island to a beautiful, stately ship.

The prophet first describes the beauty of the ship's construction (vv. 3b-7). The materials in the ship, like the wealth of Tyre itself, came from countries throughout the Mediterranean Basin and represented the finest quality that the ancient world had to offer: fir from Senir, cedar from Lebanon, oaks from Bashan, pines from Cyprus, linen from Egypt, and purple goods from Cyprus (Elishah). The crew that operated the ship and made possible Tyre's extensive trading activities likewise came from a wide variety of locations (vv. 8-11).

After dealing with the ship and its crew, Ezekiel turns to the merchandise that the ship carried. Tyre derived its income from transporting cargo from one city to another along the Mediterranean coast, so the prophet provides a detailed account of the sorts of goods that would be loaded at each port (vv. 12-25a).

At the end of its rounds, the heavily loaded ship headed into deep water, where it met disaster. A strong east wind wrecked the ship, and all its crew and cargo sank into the sea (vv. 25b-27). The wind in this case probably represents the Babylonian army, which Ezekiel had already predicted would destroy Tyre (26:7-14).

All of Tyre's trading partners then mourn for the destroyed ship (27:28-31) and raise their own lament (v. 32). They describe Tyre's former trading activities that enriched both the city and the entire region (v. 33), and then they record their horror at Tyre's disappearance (vv. 34-36).

28:1-19, Oracles Against the Rulers of Tyre. In chap. 28 Ezekiel records two prophecies against the rulers of Tyre (vv. 1-10, 11-19). Both of these oracles share a similar theme, although they are quite different in form. In both cases the prophet condemns the ruler for his pride and speaks of his downfall in mythological terms. Because of this mythological dimension, many scholars see behind the oracles a Mesopotamian or Canaanite myth in which a primeval figure, who lived in a fruitful garden on a cosmic mountain, was deposed and sent into the underworld as punishment for a sin that he had committed. Traces of such a myth are alleged to exist in Genesis 2-3 and Isa. 14:12-20, but to date no myth resembling the scholarly reconstruction has been found in extrabiblical sources.

In the first prophecy (Ezek. 28:1-10), Ezekiel delivers a standard announcement of judgment against the prince of Tyre. In the initial indictment (vv. 2-5), the prophet amplifies a prominent theme of chap. 27, Tyre's pride in its immense wealth and power. Ezekiel accuses the prince of actually claiming to be God or at least of claiming divine wisdom. Like the legendary Dan'el (see commentary above on 14:12-23), the prince was indeed wise and used his wisdom to amass enormous wealth, but his wisdom also led him to claim equality with God. Because of the ruler's pride, he will be the target of divine judgment (vv. 6-10). God will bring strangers (presumably the Babylonians) against him and will destroy his wealth and power. They will kill him, forcing him into the underworld, the realm of the dead. There the once proud prince will become vividly aware that he is only human.

In the second prophecy (vv. 11-19), Ezekiel raises a lament over the ruler of Tyre and describes his downfall in mythological terms. The prince was once perfect in wisdom and beauty and lived in Eden, the garden of God (cf. Gen. 2-3). In the garden the ruler was dressed in garments covered with precious stones and was accompanied by a guardian cherub. The ruler was in fact perfect, until he committed an unnamed sin. Because of this sin, God cast the ruler from his mountain abode, and the cherub drove him from the garden. The ruler will be exposed before the nations and consumed by divine fire because he defiled his sanctuaries (Ezek. 28:18); all people will be appalled because of his dreadful fate.

Although it is certainly possible to interpret the oracle as it stands as a description of the anticipated destruction of Tyre at the hands of the Babylonians, there are several features of the prophecy that suggest Ezekiel may be likening the fate of the prince to the fate of the Zadokite high priest in Jerusalem, who in Ezekiel's view, defiled the sanctuary there (cf. chap. 8). In 28:13, the list of precious stones that adorned the Tyrian prince is identical to the list of stones on the breastplate of the Israelite high priest (Exod. 28:17-20; 39:10-13). In Ezek. 28:14, the cherub is reminiscent of the cherubs that flanked the Ark in the Holy of Holies of the Jerusalem Temple, while the fire stones may recall the glowing coals on the Temple altar. The cherub's expulsion of the ruler resembles Ezekiel's description of the cherub that provides the fire to destroy Jerusalem (10:1-8). Finally, the description of the ruler's fate resembles the descriptions that Ezekiel provides throughout the book when he describes Israel in exile. If these references to Israel in 28:11-19 are intentional, then the oracle may have a dual function. In its present context it is certainly a condemnation of the pride and power of Tyre and expresses the prophet's hope for that city's destruction. But Ezekiel's readers could hardly have missed seeing in the oracle reminders of their own sin, which led to their expulsion from Jerusalem. In reading this oracle they were confronted again with the prophet's sharp message of judgment. They were in exile because of their own crimes and were no better in that respect than their pagan neighbor.

28:20-23, Oracle Against Sidon. To the collection of Tyrian oracles, Ezekiel has appended a short oracle against Sidon, another Phoenician coastal city that depended on trade for its livelihood. The judgment is described in very general terms, and no reason for God's anger is given. In Ezekiel's day Sidon had ceased to be a major political power and was probably already under Babylonian control. The city regained some of its former importance from about 586 to 573 B.C., and it is possible that the oracle is a late addition.

28:24-26, A Promise to Israel. At the end of this large collection of judgment oracles against Israel's neighbors, Ezekiel has added a promise oracle to Israel. At first this oracle appears to be out of place, but it must be remembered that prophecies of judgment against Israel's enemies can also be considered oracles of reassurance to Israel. This interpretation of the preceding collection has apparently prompted the prophet to make the implied reassurance explicit. The oracle proclaims that in the future Israel's neighbors will be able to do no harm to God's people. Israel will be gathered from exile and brought back to dwell securely in the land. God will be faithful to the divine promises to Jerusalem, and when the nations see this faithfulness, both Israel and the other nations will recognize God's power.

29:1-32:32

Oracles Against Egypt

Ezekiel's seven oracles against Egypt make up the book's largest collection of prophecies against foreign nations. The reason for the prophet's extraordinary concern with Egypt is clear. Egypt was normally viewed as Israel's traditional enemy, the nation that had originally enslaved the Israelites, thus prompting God's great act of deliverance in the Exodus (cf. 20:5-7). After the Exodus, the two nations continued to interact politically, and on a number of occasions Israel and Judah looked to Egypt for help in resisting the power of the Assyrians and the Babylonians. However, this sort of reliance on Egypt almost always turned out badly for Israel. In Ezekiel's own time Egypt's promise of aid had led Zedekiah to rebel against Nebuchadnezzar, an act that the prophet predicted would lead to Jerusalem's destruction (chap. 17). In fact Pharaoh Hophra did make an attempt to relieve the city during the Babylonian siege, but he was not successful. Thus in Ezekiel's eyes Egypt was not only a traditional enemy and an unreliable ally but was also the nation most fully devoted to opposing God's plan to use Nebuchadnezzar to punish Jerusalem. For all these reasons, the prophet's anti-Egyptian oracles are particularly harsh.

29:1-16, Oracle Against the Pharaoh. Ezekiel's first oracle against Egypt is dated January 587 B.C., and was probably prompted by Pharaoh Hophra's unsuccessful attempt to raise the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem. The oracle consists of three parts. In the first part (vv. 3-6a), the pharaoh is compared to a sea monster dwelling in the Nile. God, however, will subdue the monster, catching it with a hook as one catches a fish and throwing it into the desert as food for scavengers.

This initial image of judgment is expanded in the second part of the oracle (vv. 6b-9a), which also gives the reasons for the pharaoh's punishment. Egypt has been an unreliable ally, a weak reed that breaks and injures anyone who leans on it for support (cf. Isa. 36:6). For this reason God will completely destroy Egypt with the sword and will make the country a wasteland.

The final portion of the oracle (Ezek. 29:9b-16) amplifies the judgment still further and describes Egypt's fate in terms that closely resemble those that the prophet used earlier to describe the judgment on Judah (cf. 4:4-8; 20:32-38). God will desolate Egypt from one end to the other so that the land cannot be inhabited for forty years. The people will be scattered in exile among the nations, but at the end of forty years God will gather the Egyptians again and return them to their land. However, the restored Egypt will have only a shadow of its former power.

29:17-21, The Substitution of Egypt for Tyre.

This oracle, the latest dated oracle in the book, is set in April of 571 B.C., shortly after the end of Nebuchadnezzar's unsuccessful siege of Tyre. The prophet or his disciples were apparently worried that the earlier prophecies against Tyre had not been fulfilled. To explain this situation, God tells Ezekiel that Egypt is to be given to Nebuchadnezzar as compensation for the effort he expended trying to capture Tyre. When Babylon finally plunders Egypt, Israel's own monarchy will be restored (v. 21). As later events developed, Ezekiel's substitute prophecy against Egypt was not fulfilled either. Nebuchadnezzar apparently did campaign in Egypt and may have even exacted tribute from the pharaoh, but the country was not destroyed in the way that the prophet predicted.

30:1-19, Prophecies Against Egypt.

This collection of oracles contains three undated prophecies against Egypt. The first (vv. 2-9), predicts the coming of the day of God's judgment on Egypt. The precise nature of the judgment is unclear, but the evocative language used to describe it is reminiscent of that used in earlier prophecy to describe God's judgment of Israel (cf. Amos 5:18-20; Ezek. 7:10-13). The second oracle (vv. 10-12) makes the agent of judgment clear. Nebuchadnezzar will ravage Egypt just as he destroyed Israel. The Nile, Egypt's reliable source of life-giving water, will dry up, and the land will become desolate. The third oracle (vv. 13–19), elaborates further on the extent of the destruction by mentioning specific cities (mostly in the delta) that are to be destroyed.

30:20–26, The Pharaoh's Broken Arm. In April of 587 B.C., shortly before Jerusalem's fall, Ezekiel received an oracle in which God claimed to have already broken the arm of the pharaoh so that he could no longer wield a sword. The oracle is repetitious, but its point is clear. God will strengthen the power of Nebuchadnezzar against Egypt, and the Egyptians will not be able to defend themselves. As a result they will be scattered in exile among the nations.

31:1–18, Allegory of the Cedar. This allegory comparing the pharaoh to a Lebanese cedar came to Ezekiel in June of 587 B.C. In it God likens the Egyptian to a great cedar, which in fact is the mythological world tree. Its top reaches the clouds and its roots grow down into the underworld, where the subterranean waters of the great deep nourish the tree so that it flourishes and provides shade and shelter for animals and nations. Even the trees in the garden of Eden are not its equal (vv. 1–9).

In the interpretation of the allegory (vv. 10–14), the great height of the tree, which seems to be a positive image in the allegory, is interpreted negatively as a symbol of the pharaoh's pride in his great power. Because of his pride, he will be cut down like a tree and be sent into the underworld. There the pharaoh, who, like all Egyptian rulers, claimed to be divine, will discover that he is mortal like all humans. When the pharaonic tree is felled and sent to Sheol, the realm of the dead, the other trees that depended on the great tree will also be cast down into the netherworld. Egypt's allies will share its fate when the nation falls (vv. 15–18).

32:1–16, Lament over the Pharaoh. In March of 585 B.C. (MT) or 586 (LXX), after the fall of Jerusalem, Ezekiel was commanded to deliver a lament over the pharaoh. However, the lament departs from the usual pattern in a significant way. While a lament normally contrasts the addressee's former glory and present ignominious condition (cf. chap. 19), here the description of the pharaoh's present condition is replaced by an announcement of coming judgment. The lament is anticipatory and looks forward to what can be said of the pharaoh when God finally punishes Egypt for its pride. The account of the coming judgment is given in very general terms, some of which recall earlier anti-Egyptian oracles. The pharaoh, who considers himself a proud and powerful lion, is in fact a sea monster

(cf. 29:3–5), which God will capture and expose as carrion in the open field. When Egypt is destroyed, the heavens themselves will grow dark, just as they did when God plagued Egypt before the Exodus (32:2–8; cf. Exod. 10:21–23).

The general images used in the lament are made specific when God reveals that the cause of the pharaoh's downfall will be the king of Babylon, through whom God will act to destroy Egypt (Ezek. 32:9–16). Other nations will be appalled at Egypt's degradation. All of its people will be slaughtered, and the land will be uninhabited.

32:17–32, Egypt in the Underworld. In April 586 B.C. or 585 B.C. Ezekiel was again told to utter a lament against all the people of Egypt. This time the dirge takes the unusual form of a trip through the underworld. The Egyptians, who once boasted of their power and beauty, are made to share the fate of those who are murdered and thus die unnaturally. They go down into Sheol, where they meet other murderers, who were themselves slain. Assyria, Elam, Meshech, Tubal, Edom, and Sidon all preceded Egypt into the underworld, but the anticipatory lament is also an assurance that Egypt will soon join them and share their common fate.

The Fall of Jerusalem

In chap. 33 the long anticipated report of the fall of Jerusalem marks the turning point of the book (vv. 21–22). After this climactic event, Ezekiel turns from announcing Israel's judgment to delivering oracles of salvation. Before making this shift, however, the prophet inserts several prophecies that seem simply to repeat earlier material in the book. It is important to recognize that these repetitions are not redundant but are an important part of Ezekiel's message at this crucial point in Israel's history.

33:1–9, The Watchman's Call. The account of the fall of Jerusalem is prefaced by a repetition of Ezekiel's call to be a prophetic watchman (vv. 1–9). The description of the watchman's task is first given in general terms (vv. 2–6) and then Ezekiel is again commissioned (vv. 7–9). The prophet's call repeats virtually verbatim much of the call narrative in 3:17–21, and the basic point of the address is the same (see commentary above on 3:17–21). God cautions the prophet that he must issue the prophetic warning to the people or forfeit his own life. Although the fall of Jerusalem is a turning point in the history of Israel, the prophet's task remains the same after the fall as it was before. The destruction of the city has done nothing to change the fact that the people are still sinful. They must therefore be given the prophetic warning if even greater judgment is to be prevented from occurring in the future.

33:10-20, Individual Punishment and Reward. After recommissioning Ezekiel, God repeats the message of 18:21-32 as an indication of what the prophet must say to the people (see commentary above on 18:21-32). The people who survive the destruction of Jerusalem, whether they live in Judah or in Babylon, are not to interpret their survival as a sign of their righteousness. They are still rebels, and the basic principle of chap. 18 still applies to them. If they repent of their wicked ways and remain righteous, they will live. This is what God intends (v. 11). However, if they refuse to repent or if they turn away from righteousness, then they will die for their sins.

33:21-22, The Fall of Jerusalem. Given the way in which Ezekiel has caused his readers to anticipate the fall of Jerusalem, the actual account of the event is surprisingly brief. Word of the city's defeat arrived in Babylon in January of 585 B.C., roughly six months after the actual event. At this moment the prophet's dumbness was removed, and he entered a new phase of his work (see commentary above on 3:22-27).

33:23-29, The Fate of the Survivors. Immediately after the fall of Jerusalem, Ezekiel delivered an oracle to survivors of the siege who were still living in Judah. They had apparently interpreted their survival as an indication of God's favor and were now laying claim to the land and were thus also claiming to be the true Israel (v. 24; cf. 11:14-21). In the oracle God emphatically rejects the refugees' claim, pointing out that they still worship idols and commit all sorts of social abuses. God indicates that they too will be destroyed, with the result that the land will be uninhabited. When this devastation occurs, the only hope for Israel's restoration will lie with the exiles in Babylon.

33:30-33, Israel in Babylon. Although Israel's last hope consists of the exilic community in Babylon, the chapter closes on an ominous note. The Babylonian exiles can live and be restored to the land only if they admit their sins and heed the prophetic warning to repent (vv. 10-20). However, God reminds Ezekiel that the people do not understand what he is saying. They come for oracles, but to them his words are no more than songs that entertain rather than edify. If this situation continues, an additional judgment on the exiles cannot be avoided.

Oracles of Hope and Restoration

After the fall of Jerusalem, Ezekiel was again free to concentrate on delivering words of salvation to Israel, although these words are sometimes still associated with judgment. As a class, the prophecies of salvation do not have the consistency of theme that pervaded the judgment oracles in the first part of the book, and it is likely that the prophet's views on the future went through several stages of development in the early years of the Exile.

34:1-31

Israel and Its Leaders

In chap. 34 Ezekiel has collected several oracles dealing with Israel's leaders. He expresses their relationship to Israel by using the image of the shepherd, an old Near Eastern image that was usually used to describe the role of the king but that could be employed to characterize other leaders as well.

34:1-10, Against the Shepherds. Like Jeremiah (Jer. 2:8; 10:21; 22:22; 23:1-8; 25:34-37; 50:6), Ezekiel believed that many of Israel's problems could be traced to the fact that the people had been misled by their leaders, particularly by their kings. In Ezek. 34:1-10 God presents an indictment against Israel's shepherds, who have destroyed sheep for their own gain and have not taken proper care of the weak and sick. As a result, the sheep have been scattered (vv. 2-6). This indictment seems to attribute the Exile to the failings of Israel's leaders, rather than to the sins of individual Israelites, and is thus a slightly different perspective on the Exile than the one that the prophet usually gives. Speaking not only to the past but also to the present leaders of the exilic community, God warns that the leaders will be held directly responsible for the people in their charge (vv. 7-10).

34:11-16, God as Israel's Shepherd. In place of the corrupt shepherds, God promises to take personal responsibility for the exiles in the future. As the shepherd who will gather the sheep that have been scattered, God will reassemble the exiles and restore them to the land of Israel, where God will care for the sick and the weak.

34:17-24, Judgment of the Sheep. From oracles against Israel's leaders, Ezekiel turns to the people themselves. Continuing to use the image of sheep and shepherd, God warns that there are sheep that are taking all of the good pasture and even fouling the drinking water so that the rest of the sheep cannot drink (vv. 17-19). These fat sheep, which push the weaker sheep away from water and food, will be separated from the flock, although the precise nature of their fate is unclear. God will then give the remaining sheep a new shepherd, David, who will again rule over them.

The precise meaning of this allegory is not clear, although it certainly implies that some of the exiles are making it difficult for the rest to survive. Ezekiel may be identifying the leaders of the exilic community as the fat sheep, or he may be thinking of the wicked who have refused to heed the prophetic warning to repent. In any case, the oracle suggests that there were conflicts among groups of exiles and that only some of the exiles, perhaps the members of the prophet's own community, would be brought back to the land, where the Davidic monarchy would be restored.

34:25-31, The Covenant of Peace. When the weak sheep have been restored to the land and the Davidic dynasty reestablished, God promises to make a new covenant with Israel (cf. Jer. 31:31-34). This covenant will be a covenant of peace, which will restore proper and harmonious relationships of all sorts in the land. Israel will again know God not in acts of judgment but in an act of restoration. The people's shame will be removed, and they will be made to dwell securely in their own land. As a symbol of this renewed relationship with God, the land itself will no longer be an enemy of its inhabitants but will willingly yield its fruit to sustain them (cf. Gen. 3:17-19).

Edom and Israel

Returning to the theme of 25:12-14, Ezekiel delivers a sharp oracle of judgment against Mount Seir, the home of the Edomites (35:1-15). This oracle and the one that follows it (36:1-15) are somewhat convoluted and appear to have been subject to several editorial expansions, an indication of the hatred that later writers continued to have for Edom. Lying behind the oracles are the Edomite attempts to occupy Judahite territory after the fall of Jerusalem, and it is even possible that Edom aided the Babylonians in the final battle against the city.

In the indictment against Mount Seir, God recalls the long history of enmity between Edom and Israel and alludes to Edom's unreliability as an ally (35:5). Because of this, Mount Seir will be made a wasteland, and its inhabitants will be held responsible for the Israelite blood that they have shed (vv. 3-4, 6-9). Referring to Edom's boast that it could now take Judahite territory unhindered (vv. 10, 12), God swears to desolate Mount Seir and to destroy Edom for its anger and envy (vv. 14-15).

After delivering an announcement of judgment to Mount Seir, God turns to announce restoration to the mountains of Israel (36:1-15). Although in the past God had decreed judgment against these same mountains (chap. 6), they will now be reinhabited. Furthermore, God supplies a reason for giving this promise to Israel, something that is fairly unusual in biblical prophecy, which rarely mentions God's motives for bringing salvation. Because the Edomites have laid claim to God's land and have helped to destroy the mountains of Israel, which have become an object of reproach among the nations, God will make the mountains fruitful again and will repopulate them with the returned exiles. The mountains will now sustain the Israelites and will no longer be an object of reproach.

The Vindication of God's Holiness

After the prophecy of the restoration of the mountains of Israel, Ezekiel has inserted a remarkable oracle that signals a radical shift in his views on salvation. Up to this point the prophet has stressed the necessity for the exiles to repent and to remain righteous if they were to return to the land (chaps. 18, 33). However, in this oracle God reveals that the exiles will be brought back even though they are still wicked.

The oracle begins with a brief introduction (36:16-21), which rehearses Israel's history and the reasons for the Exile. When the people were still in the land, they defiled it by worshiping idols and committing crimes against each other. Therefore God sent Israel into exile (cf. chaps. 16, 20, 23). However, even in exile they profaned the divine name because their presence implied that God was not capable of maintaining them in the land as a holy people (see commentary above on chap. 20).

To protect the divine name, which in this oracle almost assumes the status of an independent entity (cf. Deut. 12), God promises to gather the Israelites from exile and bring them back to the land. There God will purify them and remove the idols that they continue to worship. God will give the people a new heart of flesh so that they will again be sensitive to the divine word (cf. Ezek. 11:19; Jer. 31:31-34). Filled with God's spirit, Israel will now be able to observe the laws that they could not obey previously. Because of God's gracious acts, the people will finally recognize their sinful past and will remain obedient with the help of the Spirit (Ezek. 36:22-32).

At the conclusion of the oracle, the general promises of vv. 22-32 are made specific. The deserted cities of Israel will be repopulated, and the land will again be tilled. When the land again becomes fruitful, the surrounding nations will recognize God's hand at work (vv. 33-36). The nation will prosper and increase, and God will again be responsive to Israel's requests. The divine-human relationship that had been broken before the Exile will finally be restored (vv. 37-38).

37:1-28

Israel's Restoration

Further details concerning Israel's restoration are presented in chap. 37, which consists of an allegorical vision (37:1-14) and an oracle on the nature of the restored community (37:15-28).

37:1-14, The Valley of Dry Bones. Ezekiel's dramatic vision of the valley filled with dry bones is undated, but it must have been received after the Exile had been under way long enough for the people to have lost their hope of ever returning to the land. Unlike the prophet's earlier visions (1:1-3:15; chaps. 8-11), this one is allegorical. However, the prophet still follows his usual practice of leading his readers through the vision as he experienced it (37:1-10). Only after the vision has been described in all of its complexity does he provide an interpretation (vv. 11-14).

The vision begins when God transports the prophet by means of the Spirit (cf. 3:12-15; 8:3) and brings him to a valley or plain, presumably the same plain where Ezekiel saw his initial vision of God's presence in Babylon (1:1-3:15). The valley is full of bones, which have lain on the ground long enough for them to have been stripped of their flesh and dried by the sun. God leads the prophet on a tour through the valley, and he is impressed by the number and dry condition of the bones. God then asks the prophet if the bones can be made to live again. The prophet seems genuinely surprised at the question, since the reanimation of such old bones seems out of the question, and he replies that only God can answer that question. By way of response to the prophet, God invites Ezekiel to participate directly in the vision rather than simply observing it. He is to prophesy to the bones and command them to reassemble themselves and clothe themselves with flesh. When the prophet does what God commands, the bones begin to arrange themselves in their proper order with a noise that shakes the valley, and then they array themselves with flesh. The prophet is then ordered to prophesy to the Spirit, which enters the bones and reanimates them (vv. 1-10; cf. Gen. 2:7). Just as in an earlier vision Ezekiel's prophetic word began the judgment and death of the people (Ezek. 11:13), so now his word helps to restore the nation. In the history of Israel, God speaking through the prophet is the one who kills and the one who gives life.

Scholars have sometimes assumed that Ezekiel's striking image of the dry bones was drawn from his actual observation of battlefields, but the real source of the image is to be found in the interpretation of the allegory (37:11-14). The exiles, who feel that they have been cut off from God, have been lamenting that their bones have dried up and their hope for restoration destroyed (cf. Ps. 31:10; Prov. 17:22). Without God's presence they consider themselves virtually dead. However, God promises to open the graves of the exiles, to reanimate them with the divine Spirit, and to return them to their land.

Although the interpretation in Ezek. 37:11-14 seems to have originally understood the opening of Israel's graves as yet another literary image describing God's restoration of the exiles, later Jewish and Christian interpreters understood the image literally and saw in the passage a reference to the actual resurrection of the dead. The language of vv. 12-13 is vague enough to support both interpretations, and the more literal interpretation may even have been in the mind of Ezekiel and his disciples (see commentary below on 37:15-28).

37:15-28, Oracle of the Two Sticks.

Immediately after Ezekiel's great vision of restoration, he is told to perform a symbolic action for the exiles. He is to take two pieces of wood, symbolic perhaps of royal scepters, and to inscribe on them the names "Joseph" and "Judah," the names given to the Northern and Southern kingdoms of Israel and Judah. The prophet is then to hold these two pieces of wood together in his hand (vv. 15-17). When the exiles ask the meaning of this act, Ezekiel is to deliver to them an oracle in which God promises to reunite the Northern and Southern kingdoms, which shall again become one nation (vv. 18-19). In additional elaborations of the sign, Ezekiel prophesies the gathering of the exiles and their purification in the land of Israel (vv. 20-23). Furthermore, God promises to restore the Davidic dynasty to rule the reunited Israel. God's covenant with Israel and the Davidic house is indeed eternal, and the people are not to conclude from the Exile that God has rejected them (cf. 16:60; Isa. 55:3; 61:8). God will again take up residence in Jerusalem and will dwell eternally in the Temple (Ezek. 37:24-28).

Ezekiel's prophecy of restoration for Ephraim and Judah involves considerably more than a return of the exiles currently living in Babylon. The Northern Kingdom, destroyed by the Assyrians in 722-721 B.C., had not existed for many years, and its restoration would require radical divine activity (cf. 4:4-8). Ezekiel's placement of this oracle between his vision of the dry bones and the account of the apocalyptic battle between God and Gog (chaps. 38-39) may indicate that the prophet himself expected a literal resurrection of dead Israelites (37:12-13) and that he looked for this salvation to be accomplished as a result of divine activity on a cosmic scale.

Oracles Against Gog

Ezekiel's oracles against Gog and his allies seem to have had a long and complex literary history. Many of the images and motifs in the prophecies are drawn from Jeremiah's ominous predictions of the coming of an unnamed foe from the north (Jer. 1:14; 4:6; 6:1, 22; 10:22; 13:20), while the notion of defeating God's enemies on the mountains of Israel appears to have been inspired by Isaiah's oracles against Assyria (Isa. 14:24–25; 17:12–14; 31:8–9). The name Gog itself may refer to Gyges, who ruled Lydia in the seventh century B.C., and the names associated with Gog (Magog, Meshech, Tubal, Gomer, Beth-togarmah [38:2, 6; 39:1]) appear in Gen. 10:2–5 as peoples and nations in Asia Minor. All of this suggests that Ezekiel's original oracle was directed against a foe from Anatolia to whom the prophet assigned the name Gog. After Israel's return to the land, Ezekiel apparently expected an attack by this northern enemy and his allies, but the prophet also believed that God would defeat the enemy and allow Israel to continue to dwell securely in its own land. However, not long after the original oracle was recorded, perhaps even during Ezekiel's own lifetime, Gog began to be interpreted as a symbol of all of Israel's enemies, and God's defeat of Gog was increasingly seen as a cosmic battle at the end of time. When these shifts in interpretation occurred, explanatory additions were made to the original oracle, thus making it convoluted and difficult to follow.

38:1–13, Prophecy Against Gog. The initial prophecy against Gog begins with an announcement of God's judgment. God will lead Gog and his allied hordes from the north and bring them against the mountains of Israel, where the returned exiles are dwelling securely (vv. 2–9). Gog will not be aware of this divine leadership and will assume that he is following his own desires to attack the defenseless Israelites and seize their possessions (vv. 10–13).

38:14–23, Elaboration of the Judgment. The first section of this second prophecy against Gog summarizes the beginning of the first prophecy (38:2–9). At some indefinite future time, after Israel has returned to its land, Gog will gather his allies and attack Israel (vv. 14–16). God then makes the real purpose of the attack clear. Gog is the enemy of whom the earlier prophets Jeremiah and Isaiah had spoken, and God will now destroy Gog in a cosmic battle that will shake the very foundations of the earth.

God has in fact led Gog to Israel for this very purpose. When the nations see God's victory, then they will recognize the divine power at work on Israel's behalf (vv. 17–29).

39:1–16, The Results of the Battle. Ezekiel's third oracle against Gog repeats again the basic scenario of God's victory. God will bring Gog from the north to attack Israel, but he and his allies will be defeated through God's direct intervention (vv. 1–6). This victory will demonstrate the holiness of the divine name to all the nations (vv. 7–8).

After describing God's victory, Ezekiel turns to the very practical matter of purifying the land after the battle. The purity of the land was an important issue for the Zadokite priesthood of which Ezekiel was a part, and he wanted to be sure that the dead bodies of Gog and his hoard would not contaminate Jerusalem and render it unfit for ritual purposes. The Israelites are to collect the enemy weapons and burn them, a process that will last for seven years. Then for seven months the people will bury the bodies in the Valley of Hinnom (the Valley of the "Travelers," [v. 11], the Valley of Those Who Have "Passed On"), and that famous place of pagan worship will be appropriately renamed "Valley of Gog's Hoard" (v. 15). At the conclusion of all of this work, the land will finally be purified (vv. 11–16).

39:17–29, The Eschatological Feast. If it is assumed that chap. 39 is arranged in some sort of historical sequence, then vv. 17–29 are clearly out of place, since Gog was killed and buried in the third oracle and cannot now appear as the main course in the eschatological banquet. It is therefore best to understand 39:17–29 as a prediction of events that were to occur as part of the judgment described earlier and not as a sequel to Gog's burial.

As part of the judgment against Gog, God will summon the birds and beasts of the land to feast on the sacrificial meal that God has prepared from the remains of Gog and his hoard (vv. 17–20). This dramatic end to Gog will demonstrate to the nations God's glory (vv. 21–22).

At the end of the prophecies against Gog, Ezekiel has inserted a summary of the divine plan for Israel's salvation (vv. 25–29). God will restore the people to preserve the sanctity of the divine name. When Israel has returned to its land, then the people will recognize their past sin and will repent, living a righteous life with the help of the Spirit.

The apocalyptic motifs that have entered chaps. 38–39 suggest that Israelites in exile began to fear that the promises in chaps. 34–37 were not going to be realized (→ Apocalyptic Literature). As Ezekiel and his disciples continued to read these prophecies, they increasingly began to see them being fulfilled only at the end of time as part of a great cosmic act of divine salvation. The present placement of chaps. 38-39 in the overall structure of the book encourages an apocalyptic reading of the promise oracles and also suggests that the following material, the great concluding Temple vision, is also to be read eschatologically, as an event that will occur only at the end of time.

40:1-48:35

Vision of the Restored Jerusalem

In April or October 573 B.C., Ezekiel received a vision of the restored Temple in Jerusalem. The vision contains explicit details of the Temple complex and the laws that are to govern it. As a result, it is likely that the prophet intended his words to be a blueprint to be followed by the returned exiles. Where his vision differs from analogous laws in the Pentateuch, it can probably be assumed that he wanted to reform existing priestly practice. The Temple plan was likely to have been the most important part of the book for the prophet and his community, for it dealt with the building and resanctification of the Temple that were necessary before God could return to the city and before sacrifices could again resume. Ezekiel's temple was not, however, the model actually used by the returning exiles, and this fact encouraged the prophet's disciples to interpret the vision eschatologically. This interpretive shift was encouraged by the present position of chaps. 38-39 and caused the temple plans finally to be interpreted as a temple that God would cause to be built at the end of time. It is likely that this shift in interpretation also encouraged additions to be made to Ezekiel's original work, although the prophet's normal lack of stylistic uniformity makes such additions difficult to detect.

40:1-43:12, Vision of the Restored Temple.

Ezekiel's vision began when God transported him in visions to the Temple mount in Jerusalem, now exalted greatly as Isaiah had predicted (Isa. 2:2). A heavenly intermediary then guided Ezekiel through the Temple precincts, moving generally from the perimeter toward the interior and taking specific measurements as they went (Ezek. 40:1-4). After giving the details of the outside wall, they moved to the exterior gatehouse and rooms, the outer court, the gatehouses of the inner court, the porch, the sanctuary (nave), the Holy of Holies of the Temple proper, and the side chambers to be used by the priests (40:5-42:14). The prophet and his companion then returned to the outer wall. The concern throughout the tour is to mark the boundaries that will separate the sacred from the profane and thus to protect God's holiness from contamination. Once this has been done, God can return to the Temple, and in fact in 43:1-12 Ezekiel describes the return of the divine glory, whose departure the prophet had witnessed in chaps. 8-11.

43:13-46:24, Regulations Governing Temple Activity.

With the boundaries between the sacred and the profane established and the divine glory once again in the Holy of Holies, it is possible for Temple worship to begin again. Ezekiel therefore turns to a description of the altar of burnt offerings, which is to be properly purified by the Levites and Zadokite priests before it is used (43:13-27). After the altar is in place, the prophet deals with the laws governing access and worship. Non-Israelites are not to be permitted to enter, as they were previously, and the sanctity of the Temple is to be guarded by the Levites, who are to act as gatekeepers. However, because of the Levites' past sins, only the Zadokite priests are actually allowed to perform sacrifices. The Zadokites themselves are to be subject to stringent ritual laws (44:1-31). The sanctity of the city of Jerusalem is to be protected by surrounding it with land taken from the allotments of the various tribes, and the scope of the prince's participation in Temple worship is strictly defined (45:1-17).

The prophet then turns to the subject of worship and describes the religious calendar. First the provisions for the annual sacrifices are given (45:18-25), and these are followed by the regulations for repeated sacrifices (46:1-15). Additional restrictions on the prince are set in place, and additional provisions are made for isolating the offerings because of their holiness (46:16-24).

47:1-12, The Stream of Life-giving Water.

After discussing religious regulations, the heavenly intermediary leads the prophet back to the door of the Temple, where the prophet observes water flowing from the sanctuary. The water becomes deeper as it moves away from its source and gives life to the plants near it, eventually sweetening the salty water of the Dead Sea. The water may possibly represent the cosmic river that flows from the Temple, here conceived as the center of the world. At the very least the river is a vivid symbol of the life-giving powers of the Temple.

47:13-48:35, The Allocation of the Land.

Now that the Temple has been constructed and staffed and sacrifices have begun, the land may again be inhabited. Ezekiel therefore turns to an account of tribal boundaries. In general the borders follow those described in Num. 34:2-12, but all of the tribes are given equal allotments. As in Ezek. 37:15-28, Ezekiel assumes that all of the twelve original tribes will be reconstituted. In addition, land is set aside for God, and within this holy sector special allotments are given to the Zadokite priests, the Levites, and the Temple. What is left within the sacred portion of land is given to the prince (47:13-48:29). Finally, the prophet describes Jerusalem and its gates, one gate being assigned to each of the tribes (48:30-34). With all of the boundaries properly drawn and the country reinhabited, life will return to an ideal state. God's continuing faithfulness to Jerusalem will be symbolized by the new name that will be given to the city: Yahweh is there.

DANIEL

W. SIBLEY TOWNER

INTRODUCTION

Daniel was a figure well known in biblical and extrabiblical tradition long before the book of Daniel itself was composed. In the Canaanite texts of the fourteenth century B.C. found at the ancient Syrian coastal city of Ugarit (modern Ras-Shamra), mention is made of a righteous hero, Dnīl, who was noted for his fairness as a judge. In Ezek. 14:14, 20, this Daniel is mentioned alongside two non-Jewish heroes of the OT, Noah and Job, as one of the most righteous men in memory. The Canaanite past of Daniel is reinforced by another reference (Ezek. 28:3) in which Daniel and the king of Tyre are compared at the point of wisdom. This prehistory devolves upon the book of Daniel to the extent that Daniel continues to be notably wise, notably righteous, and, because of these virtues, a man capable of receiving divine communication through the intermediation of angels regarding the future destiny of the world.

Structure and Content

The structure of the book of Daniel can be schematized as follows:

- 1:1–6:28, The public history: Tales about Daniel and his three friends
  - 1:1–21, Four Jewish heroes do well in Babylon
  - 2:1–49, Daniel, the dream interpreter
  - 3:1–30, The three young men in the fiery furnace
  - 4:1–37, Daniel, spiritual counselor to a mad king
  - 5:1–31, The handwriting on the wall
  - 6:1–28, Daniel's passion in the lions' den
- 7:1–12:13, The private history: Dreams and visions recounted by Daniel
  - 7:1–28, The vision of "one like a son of man"
  - 8:1–27, The vision of the ram and the he-goat
  - 9:1–27, The meaning of the seventy years
  - 10:1–12:13, The great apocalypse of Daniel

The dates given internally suggest that the two parts of the book overlap. The entire story is said to begin in 606 B.C., the third year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah (1:1), and to conclude seventy years later in 536, "in the third year of Cyrus, king of Persia" (10:1). Such a span of time would imply that Daniel, who was taken as a lad to serve in the Babylonian court, completed his career at a ripe age of more than eighty years.

The Crucible of Composition

The first six chapters of Daniel surely have roots in the wisdom tradition of Israel. They present Daniel and his friends as wise men, dream interpreters, and ideal courtiers who, though observant Jews and unwilling to compromise with idolatry, were nonetheless able to win their way in the foreign courts of Babylon and Persia. The function of these stories is pedagogical. It is to provide role models for the people of the chasidim (Heb., "devout ones") who wrote the book of Daniel. The second half of Daniel, on the other hand, has as its basic function the foretelling of the future, a function that we often associate with OT prophecy. This section of the book deals with the crisis of history's culmination. Such concern descends from the earlier tradition of prophetic eschatology. Beginning with Amos, the prophets had spoken of the Day of Yahweh as a day of crisis initiating the onset of a new age. Their vision had remained this-worldly, however. Even as late as Isa. 65:17–25 (probably written in the early postexilic era), the renewed and perfected world beyond the day of crisis was still the familiar world of houses and vineyards, wolves and lambs. Apocalyptic eschatology, by contrast, comes to view the Day of the Lord as a great divide, a point of radical disjunction between this world and the fundamentally altered world of the new age. The scope is cosmic. Themes of creation myth—divine struggle against evil, world catastrophe, new Eden and new Adam—all appear in the apocalyptic vision of the new age. The new world that lies beyond history is a recapitulation of the Eden that lay before it. Although the apocalyptic scheme is not yet fully visible in Daniel, the book stands in a trajectory that links the realistic eschatology of the prophets with the mature, cosmic apocalyptic eschatology of Enoch, 2 Esdras, and the NT book of Revelation.

Students of Daniel inevitably question where author and audience would have been situated to draw upon such diverse strands of tradition and to weave together the complex book that stands before us. In The Dawn of Apocalyptic, Paul D. Hanson looks back early in the postexilic period to find conflict between the remnants of the prophetic movement and the triumphant priestly rulers. With Persian sponsorship of priestly restoration and the reconstruction of the Temple in 520–515 B.C., a stable order emerged that sought to guarantee a right relationship between God and God's people, Israel. Central to this right relationship was the Temple itself, with its order of sacrifices and its priestly staff. These priestly circles extended the divine covenant of order out into every aspect of Israelite life, including worship, relations with foreign peoples, ritual cleanliness, and even diet.

Arrayed against this stable and dominant group, in the opinion of Hanson, were visionaries who, because of the eschatological promises of the prophets (particularly Isaiah of the Exile, Isa. 40–55), had expected more from this age of restoration than they found to be possible under the aegis of the priests. In their disaffection with the unshakable status quo, they began to express their hope for a better order in increasingly radical, even sectarian terms. This dissident apocalyptic tradition never enjoyed public success through the centuries of the Persian Empire, but it achieved a kind of fruition under the impact of persecution by the Hellenistic tyrant Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–163 B.C.). In that era, the devout and steadfast chasidim, or saints, who are both the authors and the audience, make public through the book of Daniel the visionary hope for the future cherished through the centuries by those who claimed the prophets as their ancestors. In it they also reveal their willingness to draw upon the legendary traditions of their people to set forth the heroes of the faith in all of their integrity.

Language

From Dan. 2:4b through the end of chap. 7, Daniel is written in Aramaic, found elsewhere in the OT, primarily in Ezra 4:8–6:18 and 7:2–26. Elsewhere the book is written in Hebrew. No one knows why this is the case. Were one of the two languages neatly confined to the narrative section of Daniel, chaps. 1–6, and the other to the apocalyptic vision, chaps. 7–12, one could simply postulate dual authorship. But as is obvious, the Aramaic portion of Daniel overlaps the narrative and the apocalyptic portions of the book. That its present bilingual character goes back to its beginnings is attested by the fact that in the fragments of the text of Daniel found at Qumran, written not much more than a century after the book itself, the same transition points between Hebrew and Aramaic occur. Perhaps the most widely accepted explanation for the bilingualism of the book is that Daniel was originally written in Aramaic and that the beginning and the end of the book were later translated into late biblical Hebrew (rife with Aramaisms) to make the book more acceptable to the devout and observant Jewish audience that treasured it. By the time Daniel was written, Aramaic might have been the more likely language of choice of the author, since Aramaic had long since become the lingua franca of the Middle East, and had largely displaced Hebrew as the language of Palestine. At the same time, the issue that confronted the authors of the book most dramatically was how to survive as Jews and how to maintain Jewish lore and tradition at the necessary high level of consciousness. To these ends, the use of at least some Hebrew might have been signally important.

Date

Daniel is one of the few OT books that can be given a fairly firm date. In the form in which we have it (perhaps without the additions of 12:11, 12), the book must have been given its final form some time in the years 167–164 B.C. This dating is based upon two assumptions: first, that the authors lived at the latter end of the historical surveys that characterize Daniel 7–12; and second, that prophecy is accurate only when it is given after the fact, whereas predictions about the future tend to run astray. Based upon these assumptions, the references to the desecration of the Temple and the “abomination that makes desolate” in 8:9–13; 9:27; and 11:31 must refer to events known to the author. The best candidates for the historical referents of these events are the desecration of the Temple in Jerusalem and the erection in it of a pagan altar in the autumn of 167 B.C. by Antiochus IV Epiphanes. The inaccurate description of the end of Antiochus' reign and his death in 11:40–45, on the other hand, suggests that the author did not know of those events, which occurred late in 164 or early in 163 B.C. The roots of the hagiographa (idealizing stories) about Daniel and his friends in chaps. 1–6 may date to an earlier time, but the entire work was given its final shape in 164 B.C.

Significance in the Biblical Tradition

In our English Bibles, Daniel is placed among the Major Prophets, following the tradition of the Greek OT. In the Hebrew Bible, Daniel stands in the third part of the canon, among the so-called Writings or wisdom books. The difference is clear, that between seer and sage. In

Four Jewish Heroes Do Well in Babylon

The first story of the book of Daniel is set in the court of Nebuchadnezzar, a great Neo-Babylonian monarch who ruled 605-562 B.C. Twice in his early years—once in 597 and again in 587—this king had to besiege and capture Jerusalem to put down revolts by his Judean vassals. However, neither of these incursions occurred in the third year of Jehoiakim's reign (606 B.C.; cf. Dan. 1:1). In fact, as the more contemporary and therefore more accurate account in 2 Kings 24:1-16 shows, the Judean king who was besieged in Jerusalem was Jehoiachin, not his father Jehoiakim. Evidently such details mattered little to the storyteller: the point was to place the four noble and unblemished Jewish captives Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, who were renamed Belteshazzar, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego respectively (v. 7), in the royal household in Babylon, at the very epicenter of the action.

The ensuing narrative unfolds in three parts. In vv. 1-7 the Jewish lads are put into a three-year instructional program in the curriculum of courtly wisdom (v. 4) under the tutelage of Ashpenaz, the "chief eunuch" (an administrative title rather than a clinical diagnosis). Not only are they to learn the "literature and language of the Babylonians" (v. 4) so that they would be competent to serve as courtiers, but they were to enjoy daily rations of the "king's delicacies and wine from his own stock" (v. 5).

To modern readers the terms sound reasonable enough, but not to the narrator and the audience of that time. The next episode of the story, vv. 8-16, makes clear that although the food and wine may have been fit for a king, they were not appropriate for devout Jewish youths who are being presented as role models. Were the food and drink bad because they were mixed with categories of foods forbidden in the Torah—blood (Gen. 9:4; Deut. 12:23), the flesh of the unclean animals such as swine (Deut. 14:3-20), an animal that had died of itself (Deut. 14:21), or wine or meat originally offered to idols (Exod. 34:15)? Were they unacceptable because they had not been prepared according to the dietary practices that came to be hallmarks of later Pharisaic Judaism? Or was Daniel simply afraid of moral defilement, of owing the king too much? The text does not the Greek-speaking Jewish community and in the Christian tradition generally, Daniel was seen primarily as a prophet whose chief function was to lay out the outlines of the future. However, in the Palestinian community that produced the Hebrew Bible, Daniel was understood fundamentally to be a wise man and dream interpreter.

Moreover, the ancient writers knew more about Daniel than canonical Scripture preserves. A number of Aramaic texts found among the Dead Sea Scrolls either allude to Daniel or, in the case of the so-called Prayer of Nabonidus (1QP<sup>n</sup>Nab), tell a previously unknown story of a Babylonian king healed by a Jewish exorcist (see Dan. 4). In two texts the book of Daniel is amplified with the story of Susanna and the Elders, the story of Bel and the Dragon, and additions to chap. 3 called "The Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Youths." One text is Theodotion, the more literal Greek translation of Daniel (ca. A.D. 180). The second text is the Septuagint (LXX), the older Greek translation (ca. 100 B.C.). In the case of Daniel, it is the Theodotion text that appears in the Greek Bible; in this one instance alone, the LXX is not the text normally found in the Greek OT. The latter reports what the three Jewish heroes said while they were strolling in the fiery furnace; the other two stories present additional material about Daniel, stressing his ability to act as a wise judge in the case of Susanna and, in Bel and the Dragon, his power over the pagan deities of Babylon. Of course, Daniel is known by the NT writers and forms a significant part of the background of the NT apocalypse (cf., e.g., Dan. 7 and Rev. 20).

Beyond this literary evidence of the book's vitality in stimulating the imagination of the late biblical writers, Daniel has had an enduring theological impact. The stories of the saints in chaps. 1-6 have contributed to the determination of Jews and Christians to lead personal lives of courage and collective lives of obedience, trusting that the cause of justice will prevail in the end. Even though it fails, as all efforts of this kind do fail, to name correctly the day and the hour of the turning of the ages, the vision of the overthrow of the little horn on the terrible fourth beast (7:8-12) has been an abiding inspiration to those who have had to face the power of tyrants while remaining confident that God supports the endurance and survival of the righteous. And finally, the gift of the kingdoms of the earth to "one like a son of man" (7:13)—identified with the people who wrote the book of Daniel in the first place, the saints of the Most High (7:18)—has encouraged believers to hope that the kingdoms of the world would one day become the kingdom of God and of God's people.

say; all we know is that Daniel declines to accept the dishes from the royal table for fear of defilement. Even though the captive Judean King Jehoiachin is pictured in 2 Kings as readily accepting rations from the same source (2 Kings 25:29-30), Daniel and his friends challenge their captors to feed them nothing but vegetables and water (Dan. 1:12). If at the end of ten days their condition is deemed to be worse than that of the noble non-Jewish youths in the royal academy of wisdom, they will be willing to accept the consequences. The challenge is accepted and the lads win the right to eat only the nondefiling food.

The final scene of the story (vv. 17-21) shows Nebuchadnezzar's great satisfaction with the four Jewish youths, not on account of their healthy appearance (apparently he knew nothing of the dietary crisis and its happy resolution), but because of their superior exposition of "every matter of wisdom and insight which the king elicited from them" (v. 20). Readers learn that this superior wisdom was a gift of God (v. 17).

Ritual defilement and kosher cooking remain ambiguous aspects of the story, but this much of its moral seems clear: God can be trusted. With the gifts of good health and outstanding skill spread on record, the original audience of the book of Daniel could rest assured that God gives power to those who dare to live vigorously in the world even while they dare to maintain their sharp identity as followers of the one true God.

Daniel, the Dream Interpreter

In the second tale of the book, Daniel and his three friends continue to demonstrate the vitality of lives that are lived in the trust that God will vindicate courage and righteousness in the coming culmination. Classified by commentators as "a court tale of contest," this story pits Daniel against the second-rate astrologers and wizards of the Babylonian court with predictable results. After all, the latter learned their charms and tricks from their guild; in contrast, as was demonstrated in chap. 1, Daniel got his skill from God. He is a new Joseph, dream interpreter to a foreign king.

The first scene, vv. 1-16, establishes the problem of the story and the plot quickly thickens. In Hebrew Nebuchadnezzar cries, "I had a dream" (v. 3); in Aramaic his staff reply, "Tell your servants the dream and we will make [its] import known." But their confidence fades, for, as it turns out, the king has forgotten the dream. They are being commanded—on pain of death, v. 5—to produce an interpretation of something that they must first reproduce! Miserably they admit defeat, and the enraged king orders a purge of all the wise men of Babylon. When Daniel and his friends also are threatened with the mass slaughter, Daniel takes the risk of asking for an appointment with the king "in order that he might make known the import [of the dream] to the king" (v. 16).

In this second scene of the story, Daniel and the friends huddle together in prayer to God in the hope that their lives might be spared. Their prayer is answered; the "mystery" (vv. 18-19, 27-30, 47; 4:9) is revealed. The Aramaic term raz, which underlies the English word "mystery," signifies the eschatological secrets the meaning of which God alone can reveal. And God does solve this mystery for Daniel, who proceeds to describe to Nebuchadnezzar the king's own dream: he saw before him a shining colossus with body parts arranged in descending order of value: a golden head, followed by a silver chest, bronze belly and thighs, and legs of iron with feet mixed with clay. This four-part statue is suddenly struck by a stone that "detached itself without the aid of any hand and struck the statue at its feet of iron and ceramic and pulverized them" (v. 34; see Lacocque, p. 45).

As was the case with Pharaoh's dreams, the meaning of the dream as now set forth by the Jewish sage (vv. 36-49) is favorable to the king and yet not without its ambiguities. The dream of the colossus proves to be an allegory of world history; it was a literary device well known to ancient readers and also one that anticipates the first apocalypse in Daniel (7:2-8). It is a history of imperialism in continuous decline. It culminates in human disaster. For his part, however, Nebuchadnezzar is safe. He is, as Daniel assures him, the golden head. Which empires are represented by the other three parts of the colossus is not made crystal clear by Daniel's interpretation. If the silver chest is the historically insignificant "Median Empire," then the bronze torso would be the Persian Empire that eventually succeeded it, and the legs of iron with feet mixed with ceramic would be the Macedonian Empire in the Middle East beginning with Alexander the Great (who completed his conquest of the Middle East in 331 B.C.), and, after his death in 323, the four successor kingdoms ruled by Alexander's generals. Of particular interest to the readers of Daniel would be the Ptolemaic kingdom in Egypt and the Seleucid dynasty of Antioch in Syria, which took turns in dominating Judah during the ensuing centuries. These, the interpretation suggests, will find themselves on shaky footings. If the dream interpretation is written from a perspective later than 252 B.C., when an abortive marriage between the Egyptian and Antiochene ruling houses qualified as "iron mixed with ceramic made from clay" (v. 43; see Lacocque, p. 46) the message to readers would be clear: when these things take place you are near the time when "the God of heaven will establish his kingdom which will never be destroyed, and the rule of which will never be left to another people" (v. 44). Then they, the wretched of the earth, the persecuted chassidim, which include the writer and the readers, will inherit the earth.

The chapter concludes with the remarkable dignification of all parties. Nebuchadnezzar accepts with grace the judgment of Daniel upon his dream and renders a brief but devout prayer to the "God of gods and Lord of kings" (v. 47). Daniel and his friends also receive new authority and stature. Above all, God is dignified by Jew and Gentile alike. Perhaps this theme comes closest to the central affirmation of the chapter—that through the faithfulness of his Jewish servants, God will one day be universally praised as the sole sovereign of the world.

The Three Young Men in the Fiery Furnace

The Nebuchadnezzar who was so benign and positive at the end of chap. 2 becomes in chap. 3 a tyrant in the classic sense. He is also a fool, for in the first scene of the story (vv. 1-7), he sets up a golden image (perhaps of himself) and orders everyone to worship it whenever the maestro strikes up the band (v. 5). When nearly the entire population show themselves pleased to prostrate themselves in such manner, the stage is set for conflict with the one group that is not likely to heed such demands, the obedient, God-fearing Jews.

Those who hung around the court as enforcers learn about the recalcitrance of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego (Daniel does not appear in this story), and they inform on the Jews to the king (vv. 8-12). Nebuchadnezzar, in a rage, calls the lads before him, threatens them with death in a crematorium, and puts to them the burning if rhetorical question (v. 15): "Who is the God who can deliver you from my hand?"

The RSV rather obscures the daring reply of the three Jews by its recourse to the indefinite phrase, "If it be so . . ." Perhaps the translators were nervous about the implications of the Aramaic, which may be translated literally: "If the God whom we serve is able to save us from the burning fiery furnace and from your hand, O king, he will do so; but even if he doesn't, let it be known to you, O king, that we will not serve your gods" (vv. 17-18). The Jews' reply suggests that they were more certain of God's absolute opposition to idolatry than they were of God's power to snatch them from the oven. But they were still willing to put fidelity to God's law ahead of their own salvation from the fire. The kind of faith that sent the early Christian martyrs to the lions in the arena, that sustained the Jewish heroes of the Spanish Inquisition, that drove the Puritans across the sea and enabled the Quakers to stand straight with their hats on before the magistrate is prefigured in the consistency of these three lads.

In the next episode of the story (vv. 19-25) the three young men are thrown into a fire so hot that it slays the very men who cast them into it. But they get up and walk around in the company of a fourth man, whose appearance was "like a son of the gods" (v. 25). This enigmatic fourth figure was understood by early Christian interpreters to be none other than the second person of the Trinity and is depicted as such in early and medieval Christian paintings. Actually, this "one like a son of the gods" is an angelic figure, for angels play an important role in the book of Daniel, even to the point of appearing with proper names for the first time. They are never very far away from the earthly career of the saints, who in chap. 7 are after all known as "the saints of the Most High ones" (7:18).

The climax of the miracle story and the royal testimony follow in 3:26-30. Nebuchadnezzar summons the three young men out of the fiery hell in which they should surely have died (v. 26). At that climactic moment they emerge and are inspected by all the functionaries who had gathered around to watch. They are found not only to be unharmed but to lack even any smell of fire upon them. The vindication of the God of Israel is completed in the words of the pagan king Nebuchadnezzar, who in a final edict acknowledges that "there is no other god who is able to rescue like this." At the very least, this story enshrines the hope of the authors that the religion of the Jews would be tolerated in the context of foreign domination, including that of Antiochus IV Epiphanes. At the most, this story anticipates the day when God's authority will be universally accepted, even by the kings of hated enemy empires.

A Mad King and His Spiritual Adviser

The next story is another court tale, but hardly one of contest between Daniel and the failed wise men of Babylon (vv. 6-7). Daniel is recognized as competent to a degree beyond all others at the court. Nebuchadnezzar terms Daniel the one "in whom is the spirit of the holy gods" (vv. 8, 9) and the one "for whom no mystery (raz) is difficult." But Daniel's role is really minimal in this story. This is a story of two kings, one surrounded by earthly pomp and power, the other invisible but possessing the true heavenly power. As vv. 17, 25, and 32 show, earthly power is derivative and is simply awarded by God to those whom God chooses. In this story of two kings, the role of Daniel is to give significance to the entire experience. After his initial hymn of praise to God (vv. 1-3), Nebuchadnezzar reports to Daniel a strange dream (vv. 4-18). With some trepidation, appropriate to one who brings evil tidings to the mightiest monarch of the world (v. 19), Daniel announces the bad news and the good news that goes with it (vv. 19-27). Readers are not surprised when the entire drama of the dream comes to pass (vv. 28-33).

The king's dream begins with a picture of a marvelous tree in the midst of the earth, the world tree, which provides food for all flesh (a motif well known in ancient literature and found elsewhere in the OT; see Ezek. 17:22-24; 31:1-9; →Tree of Life, The). This signally important tree is hewn down by the order of a "watcher." To cut down the world tree is an obvious world disaster, for it eliminates the sources of nourishment and order in the midst of the earth. And yet the focus remains on the tree itself, which appears as a banded stump and suddenly turns into a man whose mind has become that of a beast (vv. 15-16). For seven times, doubtless seven years, this tragic state is to persist.

Daniel, the interpreter of the "mystery," simply identifies the great tree with Nebuchadnezzar in his flourishing heyday and the stump and the beastly minded man with the Nebuchadnezzar of the future. This terrible judgment against the king can be eased, he says, by works of righteousness. By showing mercy to the oppressed, the king is promised "a lengthening of [his] tranquility" (v. 27).

Everything happens as Daniel predicts. Nebuchadnezzar, the earthly king, affirms his sovereignty in a reasonably mild exclamation: "Is this not the great Babylon which I built for a seat of government by my mighty power and for my majestic glory?" The heavenly voice announces that this arrogation of glory has triggered the sentence of God, whereupon Nebuchadnezzar becomes the pitiful grass-eating and claw-bearing beast (v. 33) that the dream had anticipated. At the end of the seven-year period predicted, Nebuchadnezzar reverses his own self-glorification, lifts up his eyes, and, in the first flash of reason following his madness, affirms the sovereignty of the most high God (vv. 34-35) and is restored to a glory even greater than what he formerly possessed.

Readers are left with an impression that the final line of the story provides a moral: God's ways are just, and "those who walk in arrogance he is able to bring down." However, this theme is nuanced by a note sounded in the dream itself: "The Most High rules the kingdom of men, and gives it to whom he will, and sets over it the lowliest of men" (v. 17, RSV; see also v. 25). How is Nebuchadnezzar an illustration of that point, since his lowliness is only a temporary phenomenon? Perhaps we hear in these phrases the voice of the author and the author's community, those lowly saints of the Most High (7:18) who look with eager anticipation to the coming eschatological age of righteousness in which they will bear rule. Perhaps this voice intends to sound the oft-repeated theme of Scripture that God "has put down the mighty from their thrones, and exalted those of low degree; he has filled the hungry with good things, and the rich he has sent empty away" (Luke 1:52-53, RSV).

The Handwriting on the Wall

The contest between Daniel and the wise men of Babylon resumes with unabated vigor in the book's fifth tale. Once again cryptic symbols and their proper interpretation are at issue; and once again only Daniel, in whom—as King Belshazzar himself acknowledges—"the spirit of the holy gods" (v. 14) resides, can interpret the symbols. The stakes are high this time too, for, as it happens, the king is brought under judgment of death by the mysterious text written upon the wall by the ghostly hand (v. 30).

The scene is set by vv. 1-4, which introduce the bawdy Belshazzar, arrogant with his thousand lords, his wives, and his concubines. To the horror of the readers, he orders his servants to bring out the sacred vessels stolen by Nebuchadnezzar "his father" from the Temple in Jerusalem; with them he and his lords toast the diverse idols of Babylon (v. 4; →Belshazzar).

The plot of the story begins to develop in vv. 5-9, when "the fingers of a man's hand appeared" and began to write mysterious graffiti on the wall. The terrified king summons his incompetent sages to help interpret the puzzle and in the process "the queen" is introduced. Because of her long memory (v. 11), one feels that she is supposed to be Belshazzar's mother or grandmother and possibly the widow of Nebuchadnezzar, rather than Belshazzar's own wife. In any case, this queen's knowledge of Daniel's interpretive skills leads to his warm welcome by the king.

Daniel unfavorably contrasts Belshazzar's arrogance and idolatry with Nebuchadnezzar's hard-won acknowledgment of the sovereignty of God (vv. 17-23), and then proceeds to threaten his very existence by reading and interpreting the four words on the wall (vv. 24-31). Modern scholars tend to see the mysterious Aramaic words as a series of coins whose relative values are determined by weight (mene = mena, value: 60; tekell = shekel, value: 1; parsin = half mena, value: 30). Some even push beyond this interpretation to find in the series an evaluation of the Neo-Babylonian monarchs after Nebuchadnezzar. But all of this is background; in the foreground of his interpretation (vv. 25-28) Daniel resorts to wordplay. He treats the three different words as passive verbs related to the following verbs: m-n-h, "numbered"; t-q-l, "weighed"; and p-r-s, "divided"; the final word is illumined by even a further pun, paras, "Persia." Under Daniel's terrible, light touch, the mystery of the divine sentence is disclosed. In the reading of the inscription and in the events that follow, the faith of the writer of Daniel and his community is driven home once again: God's sovereignty over all arrogant, human sovereignties is absolute and unchallenged. God can use lowly but faithful captives among the Jewish people to assist in the overthrow of the mightiest monarchs.

Daniel's Passion in the Lions' Den

The culminating tale of the first half of the book of Daniel involves not only a conflict between the ideal Jew of the Diaspora and his rivals and enemies at the court, but also a contest between principles—the irrevocable "law of the Medes and the Persians" (vv. 8, 15) and the law of God. The story culminates in the usual way with the pagan king acknowledging the universal sovereignty of the God of Israel as if in anticipation of the universal rule of the kingdom of heaven at the end of history. Since history records no "Darius the Mede," the story may refer to Darius I Hystaspes (522-486 B.C.), the Persian king who is said by the historians Herodotus and Josephus to have divided his empire into satrapies (see Dan. 6:1-2).

This tale exhibits a "chiastic" or X-like structure in which the second part reverses the order of the first. This outline may be schematized as follows:

Daniel prospers over other satraps, vv. 1-3.

His jealous enemies set a trap, vv. 4-9.

Darius makes a tragic decree, vv. 10-15.

Daniel imprisoned in lions' den, vv. 16-18.

Daniel delivered, vv. 19-22.

Daniel released, v. 23.

Darius traps the accusers, v. 24.

Darius makes a decree for good, vv. 25-27.

Daniel prospers, v. 28.

The story unfolds inexorably. Daniel's piety proves to be both his danger (v. 5) and his salvation (v. 23). Rival officials swarm in to the king with a single idea in mind: to create an intolerable conflict of interest for Daniel, who can neither disobey the law of his God nor escape the inexorable law of the royal decree of the king of the Medes and the Persians. They persuade the king—who appears here as a doddering victim of their manipulations—to make a decree that no one may beseech favor from any god or any person for thirty days except himself, Darius. And, as they anticipated, Daniel continues to pray to the God of Israel (vv. 10-13). Against his better judgment, but trapped by his own edict, the king is obliged to sentence Daniel to death by lions (v. 16).

In many respects the conclusion of this story can be described as a passion narrative hauntingly similar to the great passion account of Jesus in the synoptic Gospels. The king, like Pilate, is uneasy about condemning this man to death because he is blameless (v. 22). However, the crowd of learned doctors and important people demands that the law of the empire be followed, and the hero is condemned to death. Nonetheless, the king's conscience remains guilty about the matter. Daniel is put in the place of death, and then after a time (in his case one day, not three) he emerges alive from the pit of death because he trusted God (v. 23). A major difference, of course, is that Daniel did not die because "God sent his angel and shut the lions' mouths" (v. 22, RSV).

Dreams and Visions Recounted by Daniel

7:1-28

The Vision of "One Like a Son of Man"

7:1-8, Four Beasts from the Sea. No reader can fail to sense the radical shift that takes place as one moves from the six edifying tales of righteous Jews at work to the dream-visions of the end of history that make up the second half of the book of Daniel. Chap. 7 itself marks the move from the third-person narrations of the external history of Daniel to the first-person account of Daniel's inner life as visionary and seer. It is the most important chapter of the entire book, the fulcrum on which all the rest balances. Here the long-awaited link between the obedient behavior of the saints exemplified in the first six chapters of the book and the destiny of the faithful ones in the coming kingdom of heaven on earth is made clear.

The structure of chap. 7 may be easily recognized. Verses 1-8 contain a dream-vision of four beasts that emerge out of the sea (v. 3). This vision culminates in the appearance of an eleventh horn on the head of the fourth beast. Then, the second portion of the chapter, vv. 9-14, depicts the Day of Judgment itself and identifies the parties found wanting at this great assembly as well as those who will inherit the kingdom that shall not be destroyed (v. 14). The final scene includes an interpretation of the initial vision presented to the seer Daniel by an angel (vv. 15-28).

The dream of four great beasts arising from the sea may have its roots in cosmogonic myth; think of the chaos monsters Rahab (Job 26:12-13; Ps. 89:9-11; Isa. 51:9-10) and Leviathan (Ps. 74:13-17; Isa. 27:1). But myth has faded from its purest form here, because the beasts are historicized in Daniel's vision. The angel makes this clear in Dan. 7:17, "these four great beasts are four kings who shall arise out of the earth" (RSV). The sequence is very reminiscent of Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the statue in chap. 2, except that the beasts are arranged in order of relative danger rather than in order of intrinsic worth. Both in ancient and modern times, commentators have understood this sequence to be as follows: the lion with eagle's wings (v. 4) represents the Babylonian Empire; the bear with three ribs in its mouth (v. 5) represents the "Median Empire"; the leopard with the wings of a bird and four heads (v. 6) is Persia; and finally, the dreadful beast with no name but with great iron teeth and ten horns is the Hellenistic kingdom of Alexander the Great. Among the ten horns, an eleventh springs up that destroys others; it has eyes like those of a man and a mouth speaking "enormities" (see Lacocque, p. 135). This figure is taken by many modern commentators to be Antiochus IV Epiphanes, 175-163 B.C., the king during whose reign, in the view of the community of Daniel, the culmination of history would take place.

Early on, Jewish and Christian interpreters read the sequence as follows: the lion is Babylon; the bear is Persia; the leopard with four heads is the Hellenistic empire of Alexander and its four successor kingdoms; the dreadful beast with iron teeth is Rome. The community that brought the book of Daniel into the canon of the Hebrew Scriptures may already have made this fundamental shift in their interpretation of the animal allegory, for they surely would have known that the end of the age had failed to materialize during the reign of Antiochus IV Epiphanes. Certainly by NT times the shift had been made, for the beast in Revelation 13 is clearly a composite portrait of the four animals of Daniel 7 and its wounded head probably signified the emperor Nero (Rev. 13:3). Contemporary Jewish application of the fourth beast to the Roman Empire was known as well, as 2 Esdras 11:39-46 and 12:10-34 make clear. In his late fourth-century A.D. commentary on Daniel, Jerome argues for Rome as the fearsome fourth beast and pours opposition and hostility on the opposing view of the Neo-platonist philosopher Porphyry, whose views on Daniel are identical with those of modern commentators.

Two things are at stake in this issue. First, if the fourth beast is Rome, then it might be possible for an interpreter to identify its various horns as kings and archfiends throughout the history of the Roman Empire and its successors, even down to modern times. One might make the eleventh horn into Charles Stuart, as his seventeenth-century English Puritan opponents did, or Adolf Hitler, or some yet unborn dictator of our own time. Second, if the fourth beast represents Rome, then the writer of Daniel 7 was truly attempting to be a prophet for the long range, for he and his community could not yet have known Rome as a real power in the Middle East of the second century B.C. (much less the sixth century B.C.!). The events of the ensuing verses in the chapter would then become events of the distant future and not events that lie close at hand, within three and a half years (v. 25) of the time of the writing of the book. The book of Daniel would then cease to be an interpretation of a current crisis as well as a call for courage in the face of an existing persecution and would be disconnected from real history. The current scholarly consensus holds that such an approach is fundamentally atypical of biblical writers, and that, whether prophets or apocalypticists, their primary task was always to try to make sense of the events facing them during their own time. Subsequent interpreters may loosen the knot that binds the text to the history in the midst of which it was written, but the writers of Daniel intended to give readers some way of making sense of the oppression and the tragedy of their own period.

7:9-14, The Judgment Scene. This passage lies at the very heart of the book of Daniel, and is probably the most important scene in the entire work in terms of its impact upon subsequent Jewish and Christian thought. In his vision, Daniel watches as "one that was ancient of days" takes his place on a throne of judgment. The throne itself is apparently a chariot with burning wheels that looked like God's earthly throne, the Ark of the covenant, seen by Ezekiel in his inaugural vision (Ezek. 1:15-28). The great heavenly books are opened and the four beasts are judged. The fourth beast, including the little horn, is slain, and the rest are held in captivity after having been stripped of their dominion. The vision of judgment concludes with an introduction of the ruler of the new age: "Behold, with clouds of heaven there came one like a son of man" (Dan. 7:13, RSV). The two Greek versions of Daniel differ on how to understand the preposition "with." As the LXX seems to understand it, the one like a son of man descends from heaven on the clouds, as if he were an angelic figure borne down from the heavenly realm to assume rule in the world. On the other hand, Theodotion translates the phrase as if the one like a son of man were coming together with the clouds, the implication being that he is a human being who rides up from the earth as clouds rise up from the horizon. The issue dividing these two translations is whether this king of the new age will be a deity ruling a community of deities or whether he and other humans will be exalted to play a role in the divine economy. A similar ambiguity lingers around the son of man figure elsewhere in Jewish tradition. Perhaps his distant ancestor is the Canaanite figure of young Baal who rides on the storm clouds (→ Baal). A distinctly preexistent and evidently well-known heavenly son of man is a striking character in the Jewish apocalypses 1 Enoch (see particularly 46:1–8; 48:1–10; 62:9–14) and 2 Esdras (see 11:39–40, 43–46; 12:10–11, 31–34; 13:1–3). Indeed, this preexistent heavenly figure of Jewish tradition may be the one of whom Jesus speaks in such passages as Matt. 10:23; 16:27–28; Mark 8:38; and 13:26, in which he seems to be referring to some heavenly figure who will come on clouds as the judge of the Last Day (→ Son of Man).

7:15–28, The Angelic Interpretation of the Vision. Whatever the history of the “one like the son of man” as an independent heavenly figure of Jewish apocalyptic expectation, it seems clear here that the one to whom “was given dominion and glory and kingdom . . . and his kingdom one that shall not be destroyed” (Dan. 7:14, RSV) is a human being. Indeed, he is a collective human being, namely, the saints of the Most High (vv. 18, 22, 27). That identification emerges in the exposition of the dream that Daniel receives from one of the heavenly court. Though some interpreters prefer to view the “saints” or “holy ones” as members of a category of angels called the “most high ones,” a more likely identification is with a human community, namely, the community that wrote and preserved this book of Daniel. The interpreter assures this community through the writer of the book of Daniel that in a very short time—a time, two times, and half a time (v. 25)—the dominion would be taken from the hands of the tyrant and given to the saints to rule forever and ever. In short, these people are the wave of the future, and that future is at hand.

8:1–27

The Vision of the Ram and the He-Goat

The second eschatological vision (not a dream in this case) in the book of Daniel is dated two years after the first; it transports the seer to Susa, the capital of Elam, now the province of Khuzis-tan in Iran. There Daniel sees a wild, irresistibly powerful two-horned ram charging about (vv. 3–4) until it is bested by a unicornlike he-goat (vv. 5–7). The great horn of this triumphant he-goat is broken off (v. 8) but replaced by four horns and then a fifth. The latter horn, though initially small, grows up to the “host of heaven” (vv. 9–10)—possibly the stars, or even toward the angelic army. The “prince of the host” (v. 11) is accosted by the arrogant horn and loses the worship due to him, his sanctuary, and even his “host” (v. 12). The desecration of the sanctuary, accompanied by a dread event called “the transgression that makes desolate” (v. 13, RSV), must endure for 2300 evenings and mornings, i.e., 1150 days (v. 14).

In vv. 15–27, the meaning of all this is made clear to Daniel by the angel Gabriel. His speech, given at the command of a disembodied voice (v. 16) and bracketed by severe but understandable emotional reactions on Daniel’s part (vv. 17, 27), is the first anywhere in the Bible to be communicated to a mortal by an angel with a proper name of his own. Interest in angels becomes a hallmark of Jewish apocalyptic literature in its later development (see, e.g., 1 Enoch 6–9); it is perhaps surprising that of named angels we hear in Daniel only of Gabriel (here and in 9:21) and Michael (10:13; 12:1), though hosts of heavenly beings adorn the visionary scenes, and other divine interlocutors revealed truth to Daniel as well (see, e.g., all of chap. 10). Nevertheless, the appearance of angels here as independent figures marks a considerable development beyond those earlier “angels” who spoke with Moses (Exod. 3:1–6), Gideon (Judg. 6:1–24), and the parents of Samson (Judg. 13:1–20)—all of whom proved to be God himself, intervening directly in human affairs (→ Angel).

In the interpretive portion of this vision account (Dan. 8:19–26), the angel makes specific identifications. Again, the beasts become an allegory of world history—the two-horned ram is Media-Persia, and the he-goat is Alexander the Great (v. 21). The imagery of swiftness and power attests to Alexander’s conquest of the Near East. From the siege and conquest of Tyre in 332 B.C. to Alexander’s death in 323, only a decade passed. And, even though more than a century and a half passed from the death of Alexander (v. 8) to the persecution of the Jews by Antiochus IV Epiphanes, known cryptically as the little horn (v. 9) and the “one who understands riddles” (v. 23), the angel leaps over the years to the time that really matters. That time is the 1150 days, which is the three-plus years (vv. 14, 26) through which Daniel and his community were passing.

The Temple is the central focus of the abominations of “the time of the end” (v. 17); the king who pits himself against God’s house and God’s truth will "by no human hand . . . be broken." Antiochus did, of course, die, possibly late in 164 B.C., certainly by early 163 B.C. while campaigning in Persia (see 1 Macc. 6:1-16, 2 Macc. 9:1-28, both of which understand the death to be at least an indirect act of God). And the "sanctuary was restored to its rightful state" (v. 14) almost right on the 1150-day schedule. True, the ultimate solution to the evil of history did not occur, and the saints did not receive the kingdom. But a profound faith is kindled here that has always drawn Jews and Christians into the future: God will make a full end to tyranny.

The Meaning of the Seventy Years

Almost an extension of chap. 8, the dialogue between Daniel and Gabriel about the meaning of the passage of the years—now interlaced with an interpretation of the seventy years of the "desolations of Jerusalem" foreseen by the prophet Jeremiah (v. 2)—continues. But the dialogue must wait until Daniel has uttered a great prose prayer of penitence on behalf of his people (vv. 13-19).

This prayer, with its elements of ascription, confession, and petition, most closely resembles three other long prose prayers, Ezra 9:6-15; Neh. 1:5-11; and 9:6-37. As a group, these three may reflect the practice of penitential prayer in the Jewish community late in the OT period. The formulas of such prayers are familiar from as early as Solomon's great prayer at the dedication of the Temple (1 Kings 8:22-53). In desperate straits, the people beseech God to forgive their sins for the sake of God's own name and loving-kindness. A prophetic-like voice speaks (Dan. 9:11), identifying the tragic circumstances of the age as nothing other than the curse, the punishment for national covenant breaking (cf. Lev. 26:14-45; Deut. 28:15-68; 29:18-28). Babylonian captivity or Antiochene persecution are thus interpreted as divine retribution for sin (Dan. 9:12-13). And the people have failed to take the obvious and necessary next step: "We have not mollified the Lord." However, the means of that mollification are at hand. They are precisely such prayers of penitence. And the great Deuteronomistic tradition of restoration and renewal following repentance (see 1 Kings 8:46-53) assures that God will show mercy upon the desolate sanctuary (Dan. 9:17), especially for the sake of God's own name (v. 19; → Deuteronomist).

But now a pressing theological question asserts itself. Does the writer of Daniel think God's purpose in bringing history to its end can be changed merely by uttering human prayers? The text before us would seem to disconnect the penitential prayer from the angel's announcement of the desolator's ultimate end (v. 27), because the God-given word of interpretation went forth at the beginning of Daniel's supplication (v. 23). In no way does the divine word respond to the issues raised by the prayer. Perhaps the prayer should be viewed not as an effort to change God's mind and to hasten the divine intervention that will bring history to its climactic end, but more simply as an act of piety done for its own sake, like a sacrifice in the Temple. Perhaps the prayer relies on the faith that, as in times past, present trouble and future renewal alike are manifestations of the free but righteous will of Yahweh.

The angel Gabriel, the first angel in the Bible to be described as arriving by wings (v. 21), effortlessly expands Jeremiah's 70 years of captivity (Jer. 25:11-14) to 70 weeks of years or  $70 \times 70 = 490$  years. The angel subdivides the 490 years to make this passage of history—which otherwise would, from an apocalyptic point of view, have been essentially meaningless—into a significant periodization of time. The 7-week or 49-year period of v. 25 refers, quite accurately, to the Babylonian exile of the Jews (587-538 B.C.). Perhaps the "anointed one" alluded to in v. 25 is Zerubbabel, the last legitimate descendant of the Davidic house (see Hag. 1:1-14; Zech. 6:9-14). Then, 62 weeks of Dan. 9:26 represent the 434 years of the Persian and Hellenistic periods. At the end of this period is a final week of 7 years. Verse 26 describes the beginning of that week with the cutting off of the last anointed one—a reference to Antiochus' deposition of the legitimate high priest Onias III in favor of his brother Jason in 175 B.C. (2 Macc. 4:8). The desolator of Dan. 9:27 is surely Antiochus, who, in Jewish eyes, "destroyed the city and the sanctuary" by profaning them. The final three and a half years of history are marked by the dominance of "the one who makes desolate," but for that one the end comes on schedule at the end of the second half of the last week. Does this mean that the writer of chap. 9 knew about the cleansing of the Temple on Kislev 25, 164 B.C. (1 Macc. 4:52-58), an event which occurred just a little more than three years after its desolation on Kislev 15, 167? Does he know about Antiochus' death shortly after that event? Perhaps so. Perhaps this standard three-and-a-half-year sequence is only a visionary guess. History may have proved to be more complicated than the writer of Daniel 9 thought. But, for the writer, Daniel's posture is the right one, nonetheless. Penitence, courage, and trust in God's ability to complete the divine purpose of redemption are the themes of the great penitential prayer of Daniel 9 through which the prophet demonstrates how to think and speak while the periods of the ages roll round.

10:1–12:13*The Great Apocalypse of Daniel

10:1–11:1, The Onset of the Vision. The location and length of this final vision in the book of Daniel, together with the lengthy preparations and ecstatic experiences that take up all of chap. 10, suggest that it is intended to be the climactic experience of the book. The scope of the vision is cosmic, including even the heavenly realm in which angels carry on their own combat (10:13, 20). The vast historical sweep in this vision comprises a history that, in the view of the writer, is not a meaningless ebb and flow of events but is a great drama of good and evil played out according to a script written in advance by God in the divine book of destiny (10:21). This ancient and, for us, difficult notion of the predetermination of history is reiterated throughout this final vision (10:14; 11:27, 35, 39). Such a concept does not seem very useful for us today who know that history is a clash of conflicting pressures and forces and includes totally unexpected developments; however, it underscores the profound conviction that God has the power to complete the divine redemptive purpose in the world and that the end of history is firmly in God's hands.

11:2–39, A Visionary Review of History.

The history that the angel now recounts to Daniel, as a means of assuring him that God will not be mocked, mentions no personal names; yet, up to a certain point, it faithfully parallels certain events that transpired. The first part of the vision takes Daniel from the beginning of the Persian Empire (v. 2) up through the appearance of Alexander the Great in the east (v. 3) and his death in 323 B.C. and the division of the empire into four Hellenistic dynasties (11:4). The focus quickly falls on the Ptolemies of Egypt, known here as the kings of the south, and the Seleucids of Antioch in Syria, known as the kings of the north; and it culminates in an account of the reign of Antiochus III the Great (vv. 10–19). The second part of the review of history, vv. 20–39, is devoted entirely to the reign of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, 175–163 B.C. The command of detail in this portion of the vision underscores general scholarly agreement that the author lived during these years. The writer acknowledges the initial successes of Antiochus (v. 22) and goes on to describe his two campaigns against Egypt. The first campaign (vv. 25–28; cf. 1 Macc. 1:16–19) led, according to 2 Macc. 5:5–21, to the looting of the Temple. Perhaps this event accounts for the remark in Dan. 11:28, “but his disposition toward the holy covenant will be hostile.” The second campaign is described in Dan. 11:29–39. Not only did it fail in its objective of Egyptian conquest, it led to full-scale political repression of Jewish religion and ethnic identity (cf. 1 Macc. 1:30–32). Other sources suggest that Antiochus installed a Syrian garrison in Jerusalem at this time, 167 B.C. Such action in turn led directly to the reconstitution of Jerusalem as a Greco-Syrian city and the use of the Temple as a place for worship of Baal Shamen, “lord of heaven,” known in his polite guise as “the Olympian Zeus” (2 Macc. 6:2). This horrible development is described in Dan. 11:31, embedded in which is the cryptic allusion to the “abomination that makes desolate” (see also Dan. 8:13; 9:27; 12:11; 1 Macc. 1:54)—perhaps an altar devoted to the sacrifice of swine, the animal most pleasing to Baal. The text goes on to acknowledge that some resistance by “the people who know their God” developed (Dan. 11:32). This “people” is surely the community for and by whom the book of Daniel was written. They are presented here as pious and wise but also as victims of sword and flame, captivity and plunder (v. 33). The writer acknowledges that these saints “receive a little help” (v. 34). This cryptic allusion has occasioned much debate. Many hold the opinion that the “little help” refers to the heroes of 1 and 2 Maccabees, the freedom fighters led by Judah the Maccabee (in Gk. Judas Maccabeus) and his brothers. And, if the “Hasideans, mighty warriors of Israel, every one who offered himself willingly for the law” (1 Macc. 2:42), are the same observant community whose members wrote and read the book of Daniel, then they are perceived as sober allies by the zealous rebels. For their part, the chasidim must have viewed the political activists as champions of the right. And yet they remain only “a little help,” perhaps because they went too far in their efforts to usher in a new order of justice and equity, one only God could bring about.

This section of the great vision concludes in Dan. 11:36–39 with a simple portrait of a tyrant, possibly even a mad one, willing and able to work his designs without being challenged even by the gods (v. 37) and yet unaware that his ultimate doom has been sealed in secret by the God who is the master of all of history and whose word is the last as well as the first.

11:40–12:4, A Prophecy of the Future.

Up to this point, everything has taken place as “predicted”; readers therefore have confidence that the balance of the vision will also transpire. In fact, however, it does not. Verses 40–45 present Antiochus as meeting his final doom in the aftermath of a historically unknown victory over Egypt. He is pictured as dying between Jerusalem, “the glorious holy mountain” (v. 45), and the sea, when, in fact, extrabiblical records attest that Antiochus died while campaigning in Persia. We can assume, therefore, that the writer was actually living between vv. 39 and 40, namely, after the desolation of the Temple on Kislev 15, 167 B.C. but before its restoration on Kislev 25, 164 B.C., and before the death of Antiochus, which must have taken place somewhat after that latter event, hence early in 163 B.C. As is always the case, the prophecy of the end was in error, its timing considerably off. But the Jewish and Christian communities acknowledged that fact when they admitted the book of Daniel to their canon of sacred Scripture. The canonizers knew that the end had not come on time, but they allowed the vision to remain as testimony to what they held to be fundamentally and perpetually true, namely, that God is the victor in the struggle of history.

In this process, they preserved the most important innovation contained in the book of Daniel, the notion of resurrection in 12:1-3: "and many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt" (12:2, RSV). Isa. 26:19 may allude to the possibility of the resurrection of the dead, but if so, it is the only other instance of the concept in the OT. "Those who are wise" (Dan. 12:3) may well refer to the chasidim of which the writer of Daniel is a part. Whether they pass over into the realm of the holy ones of God, the host of angels, is not entirely clear, though the notion that they will shine "like the stars forever and ever" might support the idea. In any case, the writer of Daniel has dared here to go further than any theological predecessor in Israel since he suggests that beyond the culmination of human history and God's victory on behalf of righteousness is a world populated by the saints themselves.

12:5-13, Conclusion. The great vision of the culmination of history is over, but the persistent question remains: "How long?" (v. 6). The traditional answer is given: "A time, two times, and half a time" (see 7:25, 9:27; the three years, two-and-a-third months [by lunar reckoning] of 8:14 is a deviation from this stereotypical response). This oblique sequence allows the author to say that by the time the Temple is desolated, the end is imminent. No more need be said (v. 9). In the meantime, those who are righteous have an interim task, to "purify themselves and make themselves white and be refined" (v. 10).

The book concludes with what may well be two additions composed by the writer himself or by some later editor. These glosses (vv. 11-12) lengthen the time before the culmination to 1290 days and 1335 days, respectively. Perhaps they display an anxious adjustment by someone who did not experience the end on its proper timetable. Had the writer lived through the expected three-and-a-half-year period, we might assume that he would have known about the cleansing of the Temple on Kislev 25, 164 B.C. (1 Macc. 4:52) because that event would have occurred in just a little over three years from the time of its profanation. He might even have known about the death of Antiochus, which must have occurred soon after the latter date. It is odd that he made no mention of these great events! Perhaps the writer realized that the ultimate culmination of God's saving purpose, including the glorious resurrection of the righteous dead, did not belong to the simple turning of political fortune, but that it, in time and significance, lay well beyond the vicissitudes of Jewish history during the second century B.C.

HOSEA

GENE M. TUCKER

INTRODUCTION

The book of Hosea is one of the most appealing and most difficult books of the Hebrew Bible. Its powerful language, rich in evocative images and metaphors, has grasped the attention of readers from the earliest times to the present. In compelling ways the prophet employs the language and the realities of family life—husband and wife, parents and children—to communicate an understanding of the relationships past, present, and future between Yahweh and the people of Israel. Christian commentators of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, in particular, considered Hosea's thought one of the high points of the OT, noting especially his stress on the love of God and the deep connections he drew between faithfulness to God and morality.

But as readers begin to explore this book, it becomes clear that understanding Hosea requires serious work. Among its difficulties are problems of text and language that occasionally make the received text virtually unreadable. The style of speech or writing sometimes appears erratic, including shifts of speaker and addressee without introduction as well as abrupt changes of mood, tone, and subject matter. Clear markers between individual units are, in most cases, absent. It is not even clear if Hosea's speeches generally were short, like those in Amos, or long, like those in Jeremiah. Some of the units are doubtless dialogues between the prophet and his addressees and, in some cases, he must be quoting the words of the people or other individuals, but in such instances one determines the speaker only with difficulty, if at all.

Nevertheless, neither the translator, the commentator, nor serious readers have the luxury of perpetually withholding judgment on the meaning of difficult lines. They need to be read and interpreted. Examination of the prophet's historical and cultural context, the literary characteristics of the book, and its message will provide a framework for addressing most of the book's difficulties.

Historical and Cultural Context

Both the general period of the prophet's activity and a number of his speeches can be dated with relative certainty. The book's superscrip-tion (1:1) locates Hosea in the reigns of certain kings of the eighth century B.C. Moreover, the book contains allusions to international affairs, some of which can be identified with events known from external sources. Other such allusions remain obscure because the names of kings are not given in these cases. Hosea clearly began his work while the dynasty of Jehu was still on the throne, that is, before the death of Jeroboam II (786–746 B.C.). Consequently, he emerged about 750 B.C. and was active right up to the fall of Samaria in 721 B.C. What seems to be one of his latest speeches (13:16) anticipates but does not attest to the fall of the city at the hands of an Assyrian army.

Other possible historical allusions include 8:4, which mentions a succession of kings; 7:3–7, which seems to refer to the assassination of an Israelite monarch; 5:8–14, which probably alludes to the Syro-Ephraimite war of 735–733 B.C.; and 13:10–11, in which the prophet attacks the way in which one king gained the throne.

Hosea was active, then, during the last, turbulent decades of the Northern Kingdom, Israel. During this period, the little state lived under the constant threat of invasion by Assyria and of conflicts with its neighbors, including Judah, the Southern Kingdom. Internally, the situation was chaotic. Following the long and relatively prosperous reign of Jeroboam II, there were constant struggles for the throne. In three decades (750–721 B.C.), Hosea would have seen no less than seven monarchs come and go.

The cultural context is just as important as the political history for understanding Hosea. He was a prophet of the Northern Kingdom, the only one whose words have come down to us in a separate book. In contrast to Judah, with its relatively stable Davidic dynasty, Israel's traditions concerning kingship involved designation by Yahweh's spirit, not just hereditary descent, and even allowed for revolt in the name of Yahweh. Moreover, geography influenced culture. Judah in the south was relatively isolated; Israel was more open to foreign trade and other contacts and thus more cosmopolitan. Israel's land was more fertile than the hill country of Judah, supporting an economy based mainly on agriculture.

In such an environment, the cults of the Canaanite gods thrived. The earlier northern prophets, Elijah and Elisha, opposed the prophets and priests of Baal. At the heart of the conflict were two questions: Who makes the land fertile, Yahweh or Baal? Is it possible to give allegiance to more than one deity? On these questions the earlier prophets had been unambiguous, insisting on singleness of devotion to Yahweh, who alone makes the land fertile. In spite of the apparent victory of those earlier prophets, Canaanite religion was alive in both subtle and explicit ways in Israel a century later, constituting one of the main problems that Hosea addressed.

Literary Characteristics

On the surface, the book of Hosea consists of two quite distinct parts, accounts and speeches concerning the family life of the prophet (chaps. 1–3) and a series of prophetic speeches (chaps. 4–14). The chapters concerning the prophet's family, though related to one another, are quite distinct. Chap. 1 is a third-person report of the Lord's command to Hosea to take a "wife of harlotry" and have "children of harlotry" (RSV) and of the prophet's fulfillment of the command. Chap. 2, which is connected to chap. 1 by the names of the children, provides a poetic version of a lawsuit against an unfaithful wife. Chap. 3 is the prophet's first-person account of the Lord's command to love a promiscuous woman.

The speeches in chaps. 4–6 are primarily indictments or sentences directed against the people of Israel or specific groups (such as the priests), although there are some prophecies of salvation as well. In most of these speeches, Hosea, like the other OT prophets, communicates the word of the Lord, either in direct or indirect address. More than one principle of composition seems to have been at work in the organization of this collection. On the one hand, there is a rough chronological order and, on the other hand, a theological scheme. First in chaps. 4–11 and then in chaps. 12–14 there is a move from indictment to prophecy of judgment and then to announcement of salvation.

History of Composition

The words of Hosea have come down to us as literature, in the form of written word and in a self-contained book, but they doubtless did not originate that way. Hosea, like all the other early prophets of Israel, proclaimed his message orally on a series of occasions over a period of years. Others, first disciples or supporters who had heard him and then members of later generations, committed the oral words to writing and passed them on. During this process, particularly as God's word announced by Hosea was applied to later situations, other words were added. There is not sufficient evidence to determine whether Hosea himself was involved in the process of recording what he had said, like, for example, Jeremiah, who dictated his speeches to Baruch the scribe (Jer. 36). In fact, compared with other prophetic books, Hosea provides relatively little evidence for reconstructing the stages of its history of transmission and composition.

An earlier critical view resolved some of the complexities of the book by relegating all of the positive announcements and expectations to later authors or editors. That view has by and large been rejected, but some concerns about the history of the book's composition can be resolved by appeals to diverse authorship. Certainly the first and last verses of the book were not written by Hosea; both 1:1 and 14:9 presume the existence of a written work and would have been added long after the time of Hosea. Likewise the third-person report about the prophet (1:2–9), although representing authentic tradition, does not present itself as a composition written by Hosea. There are a few other additions, including some reflecting Judean perspectives (e.g., 1:7), but most of the book stems from an early tradition about the words of Hosea.

The initial stages in the composition of the book took place amid the troubled circumstances leading to the fall of Israel. After this time, the Hosea tradition would have been transmitted in Judah. Some of the difficulties that beset readers probably stem from the differences in dialect between the Hebrew of the north and that of the south. Thus, it is not only modern interpreters who cannot understand Hosea's language fully but possibly even early Judeans as well.

Message and Significance

Finally, however, the book of Hosea is complex essentially because of the subtlety, depth, and passion of the prophet's thought. He is so deeply involved in his message that his style often lacks restraint. Unlike Amos, whose message is the almost unqualified proclamation of judgment, Hosea hears the Lord promising both disaster and salvation and even having a change of heart (11:8–9).

At the heart of Hosea's message stands his concern with the relationship between Yahweh and Israel. Depending heavily on the ancient traditions of Israel's salvation and election through the Exodus, he recalls the Lord's past and present faithfulness to the chosen people. He accuses and indicts the people not so much for specific sins, though those are noted, but for unfaithfulness. The specific form of this breach of faith is apostasy, the acceptance of other gods. From this sin all others follow, including ritual, political, and social abuses.

The unfaithfulness of Israel justifies the announcement of judgment in the form of military defeat and destruction. Although that judgment is in accord with the law and seems absolute, Yahweh struggles within himself and then renounces the punishment of Israel (11:5-9). At points the punishment seems designed to correct Israel's ways, to reestablish the relationship with Yahweh. In this context, whether before, during, or after the punishment is renounced, Hosea proclaims Yahweh's courtship of unfaithful Israel and announces salvation. The book's last word is one of salvation. But even if this would have been the prophet's last word, it is a mistake to hear that message apart from the others of accusation, judgment, and divine struggle.

The book of Hosea is significant, first, as the only literary product of a prophet from the Northern Kingdom, Israel. It thus provides one of the major sources for understanding that nation's theology and religion. Second, both the traditions Hosea assumes and the ideas he expresses influenced later Israelite thought in decisive ways. Specifically, Hosea stands in a line that leads to the Deuteronomic thinkers responsible for the book of Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomic History work (Deuteronomy through 2 Kings). Jeremiah is another successor to Hosea. Specific themes linking these two prophets include the emphasis on the covenant relationship between Yahweh and Israel and on the love of God. With respect to his emphasis on the love of God, it is remarkable that Hosea, though attacking Canaanite religion, introduced into biblical thought some of its language and symbolism. Through his own book and through the just-mentioned lines of tradition, Hosea has left the imagery of a God who is like a faithful husband to a people who are like a prostitute, a God who struggles over that people's future like a parent agonizing over a wayward child.

1:1-3:5

Wife and Children as Signs

In addition to the book's superscription (1:1), these chapters contain five relatively distinct units, recognizable in terms of both form and content. The first (1:2-9) and last (3:1-5) are narratives; the others are speeches of Yahweh or of the prophet on Yahweh's behalf. The central discourse (2:2-15) follows the pattern of a husband's legal case against an unfaithful wife.

Much in these chapters concerns Hosea's family life, but the fundamental message concerns the relationship between Yahweh and his unfaithful people.

In large measure because of the initial report that Yahweh commanded Hosea to "take a wife of harlotry and have children of harlotry" (1:2, RSV), these chapters have presented serious problems for interpreters and have evoked a wide range of explanations. Some early Christian and Jewish commentators took the references to Hosea's marriage and family as allegorical, thus avoiding the embarrassment that God would actually command an immoral act. Others argued that Hosea merely reports a dream or vision. Neither interpretation seems reasonable, because the accounts are written as direct reports of events.

Many modern commentators view all three chapters as biographical or autobiographical, namely, the account of how the prophet learned the love of God through his own painful marriage. "Wife of harlotry" (1:2) is taken to mean that Gomer was not a whore when Hosea married her but had such tendencies. Eventually she took a lover or lovers, but the prophet found her and bought her back (3:1-5). This reconstruction assumes that the woman of chap. 3 is the Gomer of chap. 1 and that the order of the chapters corresponds to the chronology of Hosea's life. Such may be the case, but the text itself is not so explicit.

These chapters, more likely, contain reports of symbolic actions by the prophet, actual events performed to bring the word of God to life. If one takes Hosea 1:2 seriously, the prophet knew the word of God before his marriage and before he gave his children their symbolic names. Reports of symbolic actions by prophets are quite common (2 Kings 13:14-19; Isa. 7:14; 8:1-4; Jer. 19: 32).

Hosea's marriage and family life result from his understanding of God's word and do not provide experiences that taught him what to believe or say. Gomer, as a "wife of harlotry," represented unfaithful Israel and, like most other Israelites, had participated in the Canaanite fertility cult. Hosea's message is not that his wife and family are so unusual, but, to the contrary, all Israel has prostituted itself to false gods.

The order of the narratives and speeches in these chapters suggests but does not actually specify a theological as well as a chronological sequence. Thematically, the movement is from sin and accusation, to indictment and announcement of judgment, to renewal through purchase and purging, to announcement of salvation. That progression expressed the theology of the final editors of the section; whether Hosea himself saw history unfolding in such an order is unclear.

1:1, Superscription. Like the initial verses of most other prophetic books, this one serves several purposes. It identifies the prophet and locates him in a particular time, thus stressing the historical concreteness of God's word. The title of the book, "the word of the Lord that came to Hosea," makes a theological claim on behalf of the written work, namely, that it has the authority of divine revelation.

1:2–9, Wife and Children. This third-person narrative reports Yahweh's command to Hosea and the prophet's fulfillment of it. The general prescription (v. 2) includes a reason, "for the land commits great harlotry by forsaking the Lord" (RSV). The account of the command's execution occurs in three parts corresponding to the births of the three children, each of whom is given a symbolic name. Although the birth and naming of each child presents a complete message, the unit as a whole develops from accusation and threat of punishment (vv. 4–5), to the Lord's withdrawal of forgiveness (v. 6), then to the radical proclamation that the ancient covenant between Yahweh and Israel is terminated (vv. 8–9). Except for the relatively early Judean editorial addition in v. 7, the passage announces unqualified punishment upon Israel.

1:10–2:1, From Judgment to Salvation. This unit has no clear beginning or conclusion. It provides comment on the previous one, mentioning or alluding to the names of all three children and turning them from signs of judgment to symbols of hope (cf. 2:21–23). The anticipated future includes a great population in Israel (v. 10a), renewal and recognition of the covenant with Yahweh (v. 10b), the reunification of Israel and Judah under a single ruler (v. 11a), possession of the land (v. 11b), and the Lord's compassion for the people (2:1). Though standing in sharp contrast to the mood and message of 1:2–9, this unit does not deny the announcement of judgment but looks beyond it.

Certainly Hosea was capable of such a message, but it remains possible that the passage is a later addition. Hos. 1:10–2:1 presumes the completion of 1:2–9; its impersonal style is unlike what is found elsewhere in the book; and the expectations are similar to those found in exilic texts.

2:2–15, Yahweh's Wife on Trial. Thematically as well as verbally, this passage is directly related to 1:2–9. On the surface, and especially at the outset, the prophet accuses his wife of unfaithfulness. Generally, the unit follows the pattern of the legal process, moving from indictment (vv. 2, 4b–5; cf. also vv. 8, 13) to announcement of the punishment (vv. 6–13). In this process the children are called upon to argue the case (v. 2). However, the prophet in court against his wife comprises a thinly disguised metaphor for Yahweh's trial against Israel, paralleling the symbolic actions of 1:2–9. That such is the case becomes more obvious toward the end, as the "wife" is said to use her wealth for Baal (v. 8), as the accuser threatens to turn her land from rich farmland to a barren waste (v. 12), and as the hoped-for renewal of the relationship is likened to the time of the Exodus (v. 15). By v. 13 ("says the Lord"), the voice of the prophet has clearly become the voice of Yahweh.

The wife Israel is accused literally and figuratively of prostitution (vv. 2, 4, 7, 10, 13) and, more specifically, unfaithfulness to Yahweh by participating in the cult of Baal (vv. 8, 12–13) and forgetting Yahweh (v. 13). This prostitution included the failure to "know" that it was Yahweh who provided all good things (vv. 5, 8, 12). The punishment includes public ridicule (vv. 3, 10), the end of all religious practices and celebrations (v. 11), the withdrawal of grain, wine, wool, and flax (v. 9), and the destruction of vineyards and orchards (v. 12).

Nevertheless, the unit concludes on a strong note of hope, for Yahweh vows to court Israel as in the early days of their relationship (vv. 14–15). Using the warmest language of affection and alluding to the Exodus traditions, Yahweh promises to take her into the wilderness again and make a new beginning so that Israel will be responsive as she was at the first.

2:16–23, A New Covenant. Each of the two parts of this section is introduced by the same formula, "And in that day, says the Lord" (vv. 16, 21). The prophet speaks throughout on behalf of Yahweh, sometimes directly to Israel and elsewhere referring to Israel in the third person. Both parts express the unqualified good news of a renewal of God's covenant with Israel. Yahweh himself takes the initiative, and no prerequisites for the relationship are stated.

In the first unit (vv. 16–20), the prophet employs the intimate metaphor of betrothal and marriage to characterize the covenant. It is quite remarkable for the prophet to refer to the Lord as the "husband" of Israel, resorting to human experience as a way of describing the depth and intimacy of the love between God and people. But such language also includes polemic: Israel will call Yahweh "my husband" ('ishi) and not "My Baal" (ba'li), which also can mean "my husband." Obviously the prophet rejects the latter expression because it may also be read as the name of the Canaanite deity. This new covenant will include all living things, thought by many of Hosea's contemporaries to be under the control of fertility deities.

Prophecies of Judgment and Salvation

The relationship between God and people will be characterized by depth of righteousness, justice, steadfast love, mercy, and faithfulness and will endure forever. The expression that Israel "shall know the Lord" (v. 20) sums up the relationship between God and Israel.

In the second unit (vv. 21-23), Hosea again refers to the natural order to describe the mutual responsiveness in the renewed relationship between Yahweh and people. However, the names of children (1:2-9) provide the dominant metaphors. Each name is, in turn, reversed from its initial meaning as announcement of judgment to proclamation of salvation. Just as the name of the third child, "Not my people," had entailed an abrogation of the covenant, so the covenant will be renewed by using formulas of mutual loyalty, "You are my people . . . you are my God" (v. 23).

Virtually all the material in these chapters is presented as the written form of prophetic speeches. Some, such as 4:1-3, are short and self-contained, probably corresponding, more or less, to their original oral delivery. Other units, such as 4:4-19 and 5:8-7:16, seem to have been created by those who collected and edited the words of Hosea, as they sometimes combined individual sayings into small collections or longer discourses. These chapters are by no means randomly ordered, however. First chaps. 4-11 and then chaps. 12-14 proceed from accusation and announcement of judgment to announcement of salvation.

3:1-5, Yahweh's Forgiving Love. This complete and self-contained unit—only the "again" of v. 1 integrates it into the sequence of chaps. 1-3—is a prophetic, symbolic action report written in the first person. Put another way, the story of Hosea's purchase of an adulteress is not autobiography but prophetic proclamation. Generally, it proceeds according to the traditional three movements of such reports: divine instructions for the action (v. 1), fulfillment of the instructions (vv. 2-3), and interpretation of the action's meaning (vv. 4-5). However, the pattern is not followed rigidly, for the instructions already give an initial interpretation of the deed ("just as Yahweh loves the people of Israel"). Moreover, the action goes further than the divine command, for once Hosea purchases the woman he places her in isolation from all sexual contact. The interpretation (vv. 4-5) develops this particular point by arguing that the Lord will deprive the people of leaders and religious practices so that they will eventually return to their God.

4:1-3, Yahweh's Lawsuit. This passage, with its summons to hear and its comprehensive indictment of Israel, provides a fitting introduction to the collection of speeches in Hosea 4-14. Even more concretely than in the lawsuit against the unfaithful wife in chap. 2, this section follows the pattern of a trial. The word translated "controversy" (v. 1, RSV) is a technical term for a lawsuit. Whether the prophet is following a ritual pattern for a trial against those who break the covenant or simply using the language of ordinary courtroom procedure is not certain. After the summons, the prophet presents first a general (v. 1b) and then a specific (v. 2) indictment. The general indictment states Israel's failures; there is no "faithfulness," "kindness," or "knowledge of God," characteristics of the future covenant announced in 2:19-20. The specific indictment lists five crimes that correspond to half of the commandments in the Decalogue (Exod. 20:2-17; Deut. 5:6-21). Though there is exact verbal correspondence to the Decalogue in only the last three violations, it is clear that behind this list stands a tradition of law and covenant known to both Hosea and his Israelite audience.

Because of the ambiguity inherent in the Hebrew verb tenses, v. 3 can be read either as referring to the future, "the land shall dry up" or to the present, "the land dries up." If one accepts the former option, the speech concludes with an announcement of judgment; if the latter, the prophet is describing the effects of the people's sins. In either case, failure of the covenant relationship (v. 1b) leads to crimes against persons (v. 2), which in turn lead to the destruction and suffering of the natural order itself, including land, air, and sea and their inhabitants (v. 3).

4:4-10, Against Unfaithful Priests. This passage is the first in a series of speeches (4:4-

The woman is not named. She may or may not be the Gomer of 1:3. Hosea 3:1-5 could be a parallel account of the initial marriage or a later event in Hosea's troubled life with his "wife of harlotry." The meaning of the symbolic action report, however, though subtle, is clear and concrete. Although Israel acts unfaithfully, Yahweh continues to love her so much that he will buy her away from her other lovers. God's love includes discipline, for he will withdraw government and religion, in effect removing the structures of civilization from the land. As a result, Israel will eventually return and seek its God directly. The concluding lines concerning "David their king" (v. 5b) probably stem from a later Judean editor.

19) on the theme of corrupt worship and its effects. The language of the courtroom continues ("contend," v. 4), but now Yahweh, through the prophet, turns from the inhabitants of the land to address the priests. Such a shift of address indicates the beginning of a new unit.

Yahweh acts as both plaintiff or prosecutor and judge, moving back and forth from accusations to announcements of judgment. The priests have failed in one of their central responsibilities, teaching the law to the laity (v. 6), thus they bear responsibility for the destruction of the people. "Knowledge," a major theological term for Hosea (cf. 2:20; 4:1; 6:3), in this context refers to teaching and learning the content of the law. That the priests "feed on the sin [or sin offering] of my people" (v. 8) means they are using the corrupt sacrificial worship to satisfy themselves. In short, the priests are guilty of prostitution, namely, forsaking Yahweh (v. 10). Their punishment will fit their crimes (v. 9), including rejection by Yahweh (v. 6), destruction of their families (vv. 5b, 6b, 10a), and shame (v. 7).

4:11-14, Corrupt Worship. There is a "spirit of prostitution" (v. 12) in Israel. It is not, however, simply a matter of belief or feeling or even apathy toward God but entails certain specific actions. So, "inquire" (v. 12) is a technical term for acts of divination, the consultation of idols or other pagan cult objects to discover the future. The people sacrifice at places usually identified with Canaanite gods such as Baal (v. 13), and they participate in cultic prostitution (v. 14). Most of the passage details such sins, but it concludes with the announcement of judgment using proverbial language (v. 14b).

"Harlotry" and "to play the harlot," common terms here and throughout Hosea, do not refer to ordinary prostitution, the sale of sexual favors. Rather, they symbolize Israel's apostasy (v. 12). Verse 14 refers quite specifically to cultic prostitution, sexual acts performed as a part of the fertility cult and, therefore, constituting one form of apostasy. Cultic prostitution, like other forms of Canaanite worship, must have been a real alternative for Hosea's contemporaries. According to Deut. 23:17-18, cultic prostitution was illegal, and money earned by such prostitutes was not allowed in the Temple.

4:15-19, Shameful Worship. As the indictments of Israelite worship continue, the prophet urges Judah not to follow the example of the Northern Kingdom (v. 15). Israelites have taken up pagan practices at Canaanite places of worship (v. 13) and have corrupted rituals at the major Yahwistic centers such as Gilgal and Beth-aven (v. 15; cf. Amos 5:5). Although vv. 18-19 present major textual problems, they appear to link drunkenness with prostitution, and both with false worship.

5:1-7, Against the Leaders. This section could very well result from the combination of two originally independent prophetic addresses, vv. 1-2 and 3-7. The first part begins with Yahweh's threefold call to hear, addressed to the priests, the house of Israel—probably a group of leaders—and the king. Then comes a threefold statement of reasons for punishment, each using a hunting metaphor (vv. 1b-2a), followed by a general announcement of judgment (2b).

Verses 3-7 likewise move from accusation or reasons for punishment (vv. 3-5) to the announcement of punishment (vv. 6-7), addressed to the nation as a whole. The speaker must be the prophet, for he refers to Yahweh in the third person throughout. The reasons are the familiar indictment that Israel is guilty of prostitution and does not know Yahweh, who knows her. "To know" (vv. 3, 4) involves more than cognition; this verb characterizes the covenant relationship between God and people. Consequently, when the people do decide to seek Yahweh, they will find that he has withdrawn from them, in effect abrogating the covenant and leaving only disaster.

5:8-6:6, The Folly of War Between Israel and Judah. The historical background of this passage, which alludes to border conflicts between Israel and Judah as well as alliances with Assyria, probably is the Syro-Ephraimite war of 734 B.C. (cf. Isa. 7:1-2; 2 Kings 15:27-30). As the Assyrian army under Tiglath-pileser III began to move into Syro-Palestine, Israel and other states in the region formed an alliance against the invaders, but Judah refused to join. Israel then mounted a campaign to force Judah to join the revolt, and Judah successfully resisted.

Hosea is critical of both Judah and Israel, announcing judgment on both houses in the form of military defeat. The address begins with cries of alarm followed by an announcement of disaster against the Northern Kingdom (5:8-9). As the prophecy of punishment continues against Israel and Judah (5:10-14), Hosea alludes to the crimes of each nation: Judah's is the appropriation of Israelite territory (5:10a), and Israel's is its entangling alliances (5:13).

In 5:15 the Lord's speech continues, but now as a declaration that he will withdraw and wait for the people to turn to him in penitence. The penitential song of the people (6:1-3) uses the imagery of judgment in 5:11-14, and then, in 6:4-6, Yahweh speaks again, responding to the song. Is the people's repentance and approach to Yahweh sincere, or shallow? If one allows 6:4-6 to interpret the song of the people, it appears that their repentance is superficial, "like the dew that disappears early" (v. 4). The key to the passage, and to the question of true repentance, is 6:6. It is not in acts of worship ("sacrifice" and "burnt offerings") that true faith is recognized but in "steadfast love" and "the knowledge of God."

6:7-7:7, Sin Throughout the Land and in High Places. In this section, which probably comes from the same era as the previous one, Yahweh speaks to accuse and indict first the nation in general, including its priests (6:7-7:2), and then its leadership in particular (7:3-7). There is no prophecy of punishment as such. Except for the allegation of murder (6:9), the accusations against the people are quite general and are organized geographically by a listing of major Israelite cities ("Adam" in 6:7 is a location, not a person). Although the accusations against the leaders do not include the pronouncement of judgment, there is a description of the disasters that accompany political treachery. Hosea implies, but does not state, that the monarchy is doomed. The most fundamental sin is that, although kings fall, not one of them cries to the Lord (7:7).

7:8-16, Rebellious Israel. The first of these addresses (vv. 8-13) continues one of the themes of 5:8-6:6, the foolishness of Israel's reliance on foreign alliances instead of on Yahweh, who waits in vain for acts of loyalty and repentance so that he can "redeem" them (v. 13). The expressions "return," "seek," "call," and "cry" refer not only to a change of heart or feeling toward the Lord but also to specific actions, including public worship, prayer, and formal inquiry concerning the will of God. Because Israel turns in the wrong direction—to foreign nations rather than to Yahweh—destruction will come. According to 7:14-16, the rebellion includes relying on other gods and participating in the bloody rituals of the fertility cult (v. 14; cf. 1 Kings 18; Deut. 14:1; Lev. 19:28).

8:1-14, Israel Rejects the Good and Pays the Price. Although this chapter is probably an edited collection of originally independent units, it presents a clear and coherent summary of Hosea's accusations against Israel. It begins and ends with general and comprehensive statements of Israel's sins. The nation has broken the covenant and violated the law (v. 1). Certainly the prophet has in view the tradition of the covenant at Sinai and the laws accepted by Israel, to which he alludes frequently (cf. 2:18, 23; 4:2; 12:9; 13:4). That Israel has forgotten its maker (v. 14) is another way of saying the people have broken the covenant. This rebellion involves both political and religious activity. Israel set up kings and princes without Yahweh's approval (vv. 4a, 10b; cf. 7:3, 7; 8:10; 9:15; 10:3, 7, 15; 13:10) and tried to buy security with foreign alliances (vv. 9-10a). Religious violations include making idols (v. 4b), including the golden calf in Samaria (vv. 5-6; cf. 1 Kings 12:26-33 on such images in Dan and Bethel). Altars and sacrifices are scorned (Hos. 8:11, 13), either because the worship itself is corrupt or because the people rely on ritual instead of covenant faithfulness. Such activities can lead only to disaster, stated here both as predictable effects in the worlds of nature and of international affairs (vv. 7-8) and as God's direct intervention to destroy (vv. 5, 6, 10, 13-14).

9:1-9, Judgment on Festivals. The presence of direct address and references to specific rituals in vv. 1-6 suggest that Hosea delivered this speech to people assembled for a particular religious festival. Such a joyful festival would have involved thanksgiving and celebration of the renewal of life. There is no reason to think that the songs, prayers, libations, and sacrifices were not directed to Yahweh. Hosea, however, begins by prohibiting the celebration, accusing the people of harlotry, of forsaking their God (v. 1), and of self-serving ceremonies (v. 4). He then brings the bitter news that all such celebrations will end and Israel will go into exile to Egypt (vv. 2-3, 6).

It is not surprising that the bearer of such words encountered "great hatred" (v. 7), not only from the people in general, but also from the religious leaders (v. 8). "The prophet is a fool, the man of the spirit is mad" is probably a quotation of Hosea's opponents. Like other prophets he was able to endure such animosity because he saw himself as a "watchman" (cf. Jer. 6:17; Ezek. 3:16-21; 33:7-9) called by God to sound the necessary warnings.

9:10-17, A Sinful Past and a Barren Future. The discourse shifts from prophetic address to a speech of Yahweh that recalls the history of Israel's unfaithfulness and announces harsh judgment. Although Yahweh cared for the people in the wilderness, even there, at Baal-peor (Num. 25:1-8), they dedicated themselves to Baal. Because they turned to this fertility god, all fertility and progeny will, ironically, be taken away (Hos. 9:11-14, 16). The reference to evil in Gilgal (v. 15) may recall the importance of that place during the period of the settlement (Josh. 5:9-10), but more likely it is a condemnation of monarchy, for Saul's kingship began there (1 Sam. 11:14-15). Consequently, Yahweh will abandon Israel and turn it out of the land (Hos. 9:17).

10:1-8, Kingship and Idolatry. The passage is a summary of Israel's past, present, and future in which the sin of idolatry is linked to the monarchy (cf. 8:4-14). Mistaking the source of its prosperity, Israel expanded and depended upon its corrupt cult (10:1, 5). Even if the people reject the monarchy and profess to rely upon Yahweh, they cannot be trusted (vv. 3-4). Therefore the Lord will destroy all the places and fixtures of worship, and the king will die.

10:9-12, A Call to Repent. This is one of the few speeches in which Hosea explicitly calls for Israel to change its ways so that the people may be saved from destruction. He accuses the nation of a history of sin (v. 9), announces punishment as a means to discipline the wayward people (vv. 10-11), and appeals for acts of righteousness and repentance that will lead to salvation (v. 12).

10:13-15, Trust in Weapons Leads to War. Commencing with proverbial sayings on the inevitability of cause and effect, the prophet announces that horrible warfare will come because the people relied upon weapons, rather than, presumably, Yahweh.

11:1-11, "I Am God, Not a Human Being." In one of the most remarkable passages in all of Scripture, Yahweh meditates on his relationship to Israel and arrives at an astounding conclusion. Except for v. 10, a secondary addition, Yahweh is the speaker throughout. Although the soliloquy contains dramatic shifts in mood, tone, and contents, it is a single speech. God is pictured as ambivalent, undecided about what to do.

Beginning with the compelling metaphor of God as parent and Israel as son, vv. 1-7 proceed as a prophecy of punishment. Yahweh recalls the history of his relationship with Israel, establishing the grounds for judgment by contrasting his loving care for the people (vv. 1, 2-3) with their unfaithfulness (v. 2). Then follows the expected announcement of punishment (vv. 5-7) in the form of military defeat, exile to Egypt and Assyria, and slavery.

However, the metaphors of parent and son at the beginning have already established the basis for a different outcome. In vv. 8-9 Yahweh is heard to express doubts, to question his decision, and even to have a change of heart, deciding not to act on the basis of his legitimate anger. Yahweh's care for Israel has always been like that of a parent for a child, and his compassion goes beyond even that. Verse 9 is the heart of the soliloquy and the center of the prophet's thought. Hosea takes human metaphors for God's love as far as they will go and then stresses that the difference between God and human beings involves his capacity for radical, forgiving love.

Once the decision against judgment has been made, the announcement of salvation in vv. 10-11 appears almost anticlimactic. Verse 10 seems to be a comment on v. 11, which proclaims the return of God's people from Egypt and Assyria, reversing the announcement of v. 5.

11:12-12:14, Israel's Treachery. With accusations of betrayal and announcements of punishment, this section proceeds as if the words of chap. 11 had never been spoken. The passage is not a single speech but a collection of sayings on the themes of Israel's deceptive behavior from the beginning of its existence and the authority of the prophetic word. The accusations are argued in some detail; the announcements of judgment are quite general.

Ephraim, a designation for the Northern Kingdom deriving from the name of a prominent Israelite tribe, is accused of lies and deceit, specifically by establishing alliances with Assyria and Egypt (11:12-12:1). The concluding lines of 11:12 probably come from a Judean editor. As in 4:1-3 and 4:4-10, Yahweh initiates a lawsuit against his people (12:2-6). The indictment reaches into antiquity, citing the traditions about Israel's ancestor, Jacob. Hosea presumes that his hearers know the story of the birth of Jacob and his brother Esau (Gen. 25:21-26), his nocturnal struggle with God at the Jabbok, at which time he received the name Israel (Gen. 32:22-32), and his dream at Bethel (Gen. 28:11-17). Surprisingly, the lawsuit includes admonitions to return to God (Hos. 11:6). Verses 7-9 accuse Israel of two violations, crooked business practices and arrogance. Yahweh recalls the Exodus and threatens to return Israel to its status before it occupied the land (v. 9).

If Yahweh speaks to defend the authority of the prophetic word (vv. 10-14), Hosea's audience must have questioned it. Yahweh, not human opinion, stands behind the prophetic word and vision; even Moses was a prophet by whom the Lord brought Israel out of Egypt (v. 13). Consequently, harsh prophetic accusations against false worship cannot be challenged.

13:1-16, Death Sentence for Israel. In four loosely connected discourses, Hosea announces the end of the history of salvation because of Israel's rebellion against Yahweh. The first (vv. 1-3), a clearly structured prophecy of punishment, gives idolatry as the reason for judgment (vv. 1-2), a judgment graphically described as Israel's disappearance like a "mist" or smoke (v. 3). The second (vv. 4-8), another prophecy of punishment, indicts Israel by contrasting Yahweh's graceful care with the people's failure to remember (vv. 4-6). In a single verse (v. 4), the Lord reminds Israel of the Exodus, the covenant, and the law. The judgment will be brutal, for the same Lord who is like a husband or a parent will fall on Israel like a wild animal (vv. 7-8). The third discourse (vv. 9-11), a disputation between Yahweh and the people, attacks the institution of kingship. The final unit (vv. 12–16) is the harshest announcement of punishment in the book. Hosea provides allusions only to those sins that have led to such a divine intervention (vv. 12–13, 16a), and Yahweh questions whether or not he should turn the people over to the power of death (v. 14). But this divine deliberation does not end like the one in 11:8–9. Rejecting compassion, Yahweh proclaims the end of Israel through military catastrophe, including the death of little children and pregnant women.

14:1–8, A Call to Return and a Promise of Renewal. Mood and message shift dramatically in the book's final prophetic speeches. There are two distinct addresses, their contents and their juxtaposition reminiscent of a penitential liturgy. First the prophet himself speaks, calling Israel to return to its God (vv. 1–3). The prayer he teaches them to speak includes petitions for forgiveness, confessions of sin, and vows to reject foreign alliances and handmade gods. It concludes with an affirmation of confidence in God. Second, Yahweh himself speaks (vv. 4–8), just as the priest in such liturgies conveyed the oracle of salvation. Yahweh promises to heal the people with love and to ensure that they prosper and flourish. The concluding verse (v. 8) is a reminder that Yahweh is the one who cares for Israel.

14:9, Postscript. The style and point of view of this scribal addition to the book are similar to those of the book of Proverbs and other wisdom literature. A pious scribe recommends study of the book of Hosea to all those who are wise and would learn "the ways of the Lord." By the time this verse was added, the influence of the book of Hosea had reached far beyond eighth-century Israel.

INTRODUCTION

Form

The Book of Joel poses a question for interpreters. Is it a prophetic liturgy secondarily expanded into an apocalyptic work? Is it a liturgy rooted in the mythic pattern of the ancient Near Eastern New Year festival? Or is it a self-conscious literary composition with a striking symmetry and unity? Most recent interpreters have argued for the unity of Joel in its canonical shape, though recognizing that special tensions exist between its historical and eschatological aspects. In particular, the entangled lines of connection between past and future are difficult to separate. What, for example, is the relationship between the past event of the locust plague and the future event of the Day of the Lord?

The superscription characterizes the work as "the word of Yahweh" (1:1), but that designation makes a claim simply for divine origin, that its message comes from God, and says nothing about the form of the book. The opening pair of imperatives ("hear . . . give ear," 1:2a), which are but the first in a series of commands (1:2-3, 5a, 8, 11, 13, 14; 2:1, 12-13, 15-17), offers the chief clue to the form of the first half of Joel: it consists principally of various sorts of calls to the community, calls centered in narration, complaint, repentance, and petition.

After the opening call to attention (1:2a), which is linked with a command to tell the news of an unprecedented event to future generations (1:2b-4), a series of calls follows: first, a call for communal complaint occasioned by a devastating locust plague (1:5-14); second, a call to sound the alarm (2:1) coupled with a description of the Day of Yahweh (2:1b-11) and concluding with a call for repentance (2:12-14); and third, an expanded summary, which ends with a climactic petition (2:15-17).

The book's decisive turning point comes in the narrative description of Yahweh's positive response to Israel's cry for help (2:18, 19a), a report that corresponds formally to the terse description of the plague of locusts (1:4). This second report introduces two series of oracles that serve as an answer to the communal complaint, not only announcing immediate relief from the plague (2:19b-27) but disclosing the constitutive events connected with the Day of Yahweh, events that affect the destiny of Israel and the nations (2:28-3:21).

The two major parts of the book are unified by the two narrative pieces (1:4 and 2:18, 19a). These brief reports serve as linchpins for the book, holding together the series of calls (1:5-2:17), on the one hand, and the serialized oracles (2:18-3:21), on the other. Within the latter oracular announcements, two formulas of recognition are found: Israel shall know Yahweh as exclusive and unrivaled God in its midst (2:27 and 3:17). Strategically located at the end of each series of oracles, they form both climax and bridge within the oracular movement, thus offering further evidence of symmetry and unity.

Finally, impressive evidence of a unifying perspective emerges in the way the book speaks about time, a rhetoric vividly displayed in the opening call to attention, which demands a comparison of the locust plague with past events ("Has such a thing happened in your days, or in the days of your fathers?" 1:2b, RSV) and then commands the transmission of this news to future generations ("tell your children of it, and let your children tell their children, and their children another generation," 1:3, RSV). This call gives a clue to the form of the whole book: it will be a "hear and tell" show that unveils a brilliant panorama of time's imperious movement from the immediate past to the distant future. The rhetoric of temporality appears throughout the book, beginning with this opening call for evaluation of the past and transmission to the future (1:2b-3; cf. 2:2b), then centering in the announcements of the imminent Day of the Lord (1:15, 2:1b) and the consequent call for repentance in the present time ("Yet even now . . ." 2:12-14), and continuing with a series of eschatological formulas that thrust the tale into the future ("it shall come to pass afterward," 2:28a; see also 3:1a, 18a).

The Problem of Composition and the Literary and Religious Significance

The very features that unify the book efface and blur the traces of compositional history. The theory once dominant among biblical scholars of two stages of composition, which argued that a prophetic response to a locust plague was later expanded by apocalyptic editors, is now passé. Most would still allow for a complex history of the book's composition, but interpreters are increasingly content to posit a postexilic date for the final form of the book without delineating clear-cut stages of development. Even the evidence for dating is entirely circumstantial: there is no sign of a king, and the leadership is in the hands of elders; Israel is scattered among the nations (3:2); the Temple, with its priesthood and ritual, are at the center of the community's life (1:9, 13; 2:14); the community is apparently small (2:16); Phoenicians and Greeks, not Assyrians and Babylonians, are active in slave trading (3:6). All such clues point to a probable postexilic date (ca. 500–350 B.C.).

Though the exact historical context of Joel remains hidden, the religious and social settings may be sought in those circles that emphasized the prophet's role within the religious establishment. Joel appears to be a prophet who serves as a kind of director, claiming divine authority to give orders and oracles to the assembled community, including the priests. But the most profound intention of the book is to show how the prophetic poetry of the past (Joel's vital engagement with the prior prophetic tradition has long been noted, Isa. 13:6 in Joel 1:15; Amos 1:2 in Joel 3:16; Obad. 17 in Joel 2:32) illumines a new crisis—a locust plague—that is a horrifying harbinger of the Day of the Lord. The call to tell the news to future generations (1:2–3) is the watchword for a group that felt itself to be living on the eve of a new epoch. Its members possibly formed a “literary opposition” party that, in contrast to the priestly leaders, expected “new acts of Yahweh” (see Wolff).

Perhaps in the end it is the passion for understanding time that is the touchstone for the religious significance of Joel. Yet, ironically, the kind of temporality that animates Joel undercuts attempts to reconstruct the book's historical and religious context. Fragments of tradition and text become recomposed into a larger field of vision whose poetic movement, though bound by time, nonetheless restructures past, present, and future. The composition uses realistic and surrealistic images, creating a macabre montage that transfigures the unprecedented day of the locusts into the cataclysmic Day of the Lord. Ordinary time is thereby transformed and transcended.

1:1

Superscription

Composed of a formula typical for beginning a prophetic book, this verse is noteworthy for its extreme brevity (cf. Hos. 1:1; Mic. 1:1; Zeph. 1:1; Jon. 1:1). It does not record names of reigning kings or places or dates, but only the prophet's name and the name of his father. This very brevity highlights the divine origin of the prophet's message.

1:2–4

Introduction

The prophecy begins with a traditional call to attention (cf. Isa. 1:2; 28:23; Prov. 4:1), coupled with a didactic question and a command to tell later generations (1:2–3). This opening sets the fundamental tone and tempo for the whole book by anticipating a narrative mode that appears immediately in the account of different stages in a locust plague (1:4). The introduction engages the attention of the audience, ensures remembrance of the message by its repeated communication to future generations, and dramatizes the major topic, a plague of locusts, that prefigures the Day of Yahweh.

1:5–2:17

Prophetic Directions to the Community to Engage in a Complaint Ceremony

Poetic parallelism, in which new elements are added incrementally, unifies the various units that make up 1:5–2:17 (→ Poetry). Its pattern of repetition and amplification intensifies the movement and builds to a climax (see esp. 2:15–17).

1:5–20, From Convocation to Complaint.

This unit offers a stellar instance of a call for communal complaint, a well-attested genre in ancient Israel (1:5–14; cf. 2 Sam. 3:31; Isa. 23:1–14). The prophet presents an elaborate, imploring address to three specific groups most vitally affected by the locust plague (drunkards, farmers, and priests) as well as an appeal for the community to lament like a virgin bereft of her bridegroom. The sequence moves in ascending order within the communal hierarchy, beginning with drunkards and ending with priests, the last named providing the most crucial link between community and Yahweh. Such convocations in the face of national emergency were typical in Israel, but here the threat outstrips usual calamities, because the locust plague foreshadows the Day of Yahweh (1:15). The cry of woe before the “Day” forms the centerpiece, since the call to lament leads to it and the complaint (1:16–20) follows from it.

2:1–14, From Command to Sound the Alarm to Call for Repentance. Another call uses a traditional cry of alarm before an enemy attack (2:1; cf. Hos. 5:8; 8:1; Jer. 4:5; 6:1). The locusts of chap. 1, likened already to "a nation, powerful and without number" (1:6), now appear as a vast army, mounting a full-scale attack on Jerusalem (2:2b-9). Though there are differences between the depictions in chaps. 1 and 2, the interlocking themes and images suggest continuity, though probably not identity, between the events portrayed in these two texts. What is past in chap. 1 moves ineluctably into a futuristic key in chap. 2. The temporal perspective shifts, but the interplay and tension between past and future, between the day of the locusts and the Day of the Lord, is maintained and even emphasized. The nearness of the Day of the Lord (1:15; 2:1b) closes the gap between past and future, making the present into a narrow ledge that juts out from the concrete reality of the past plague and then drops off into the yawning darkness of the imminent Day of Yahweh.

The prophet now makes explicit Yahweh's implicit involvement with the disaster: the same God who commands sounding the alarm (2:1a) before the invading hordes identifies himself as the commander of the army (2:11). And it is the same God who then calls for repentance in the hour of crisis ("Yet even now, return to me with all your heart," 2:12). The call to repentance includes two components: the first delineates the mode of repentance (2:12,13a); the second presents the motivation for repentance (2:13b). The question, "Who knows whether he will return and repent and leave a blessing behind him?" (2:14a; cf. Jon. 3:9; 2 Sam. 12:22), is linked to the call by a play on the word "return." This "who" question, counterposed to the "Who can endure it?" of 2:11, maintains dramatic tension by highlighting the uncertainty about whether one could expect automatically a beneficent response from Yahweh.

The interrogative mood expressed by these two questions intensifies the existential dread. Israel stands isolated and vulnerable, by turns horror-stricken and hopeful; its sole resource is the covenant God whose terrifying mask conceals the deeper truth of one who "is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love" (2:13; cf. Exod. 34:6-7 and esp. Jon. 4:2).

2:15-17, From Expanded Summary to Climactic Petition. The final call is a striking summation of those preceding it, moving backward to echo key notes of the earlier texts (2:15a parallels 2:1a; 2:15b parallels 1:14a). The modifications and expansions of earlier motifs are designed both to emphasize the necessity for total community involvement (even babes and newlyweds must come) and to provide the petition the priests should use ("Spare thy people, O Lord, and make not thy heritage a reproach,"

2:17a). This petition concludes with a question that appeals to Yahweh's honor: "Why should they say among the peoples, 'Where is their God?' " (2:17b; cf. Pss. 79:10; 115:2), a question that brings the first major movement to a forceful climax.

The Divine Response to the Communal Complaint

2:18-19a, A Narrative Description of Yahweh's Action. These verses introduce oracles given in response to the community's penitence and petition and thereby constitute the pivot on which the book turns. The temporal horizon is now vastly expanded, moving forward in time from the immediate relief of the present emergency to the subsequent events that affect the future destiny of Israel and of the nations. The eschatological formula "And it shall come to pass afterward" (2:28) forms a break between the first and second series of oracles (2:19b-27 and 2:28-3:21 respectively). Moreover, a third reference to the nearness of the Day of the Lord (3:14b; cf. 2:1b; 1:15a) tightens the temporal gap between these two sets of oracles: the immediate relief of the plague is intimately connected with the imminent coming of the "Day," thus stressing the need to remain in a perpetual posture of vigilance and repentance.

2:19b-27, First Series of Oracles. An oracle of assurance (cf. Isa. 41:10, 13-14; 43:1-5) announces Yahweh's merciful response and reverses the effects of the plague of locusts. In the midst of language typical of this genre ("fear not," . . . "be glad and rejoice," vv. 21-23), Yahweh makes the most explicit statement of reversal: "I will restore to you the years the swarming locust has eaten, the hopper, the destroyer and the cutter, my great army which I sent among you," 2:25), a promise explicitly echoing 1:4 and 2:11. The recognition formula in 2:27 ("you shall know") forms both a climax for the first series of oracles and a bridge to the oracles that follow.

2:28-3:21, Second Series of Oracles. Joel 2:28-32 contains the promise of an outpouring of the Spirit on "all flesh" and is probably the most famous single text in Joel, since early Christians claimed that it was fulfilled on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2:17-21). Within Joel, this promise provides the first decisive sign in a series of eschatological events to come "afterward." Its significance lies in the extension of the prophetic gift to the whole community, whether old or young, male or female, slave or free, thus fulfilling the ancient Mosaic wish

(Num. 11:29) and correlating with other prophetic texts concerned with the gift of the Spirit (cf. Ezek. 36:26–27; 37:14). To be sure, the revolutionary extension of this gift is not universal; the nations will experience radical exclusion and destruction in the judgment to come (cf. the interpretations in Acts 2:16–21; Rom. 10:13).

The outpouring of the Spirit is accompanied by cosmic portents such as darkened sun and bloodied moon, phenomena traditionally associated with the coming of the “great and terrible day of the Lord” (2:30–31; cf. Isa. 31:10; Zeph. 1:15). Salvation will come to those who call upon the name of the Lord and those whom the Lord calls (2:32), a promise that maintains the delicate balance between the reciprocal “callings” of human supplicants and God.

The last subunit (3:1–21) is introduced by another typical eschatological formula, “For behold, in those days and at that time” (3:1a). It ties Israel’s restoration with the divine intention to judge “all the nations” (3:1b–2). What unfolds is probably the most baroque passage in Joel, a text whose sometimes jarring changes of focus suggest a complex compositional history (e.g., many interpreters consider 3:4–8 to be a later addition). The passage fits the general category of the so-called oracles against the nations (cf. Isa. 13–23; Jer. 46–50; Obad.).

The announcement of the coming judgment incorporates a summons to battle (3:9–12), an old genre (cf. Jer. 5:10; 6:4–6; 46:3–6) that functions here ironically. The nations are called to arms, but, in fact, they are to assemble in the symbolic valley of Jehoshaphat (= “Yahweh judges”) to be cut down in a bloody harvest and to be tread upon as grapes crushed in a wine vat (3:13). The entangled web of metaphors—spun out of judicial, martial, and agricultural images—creates a macabre effect. The parody at work in the scene comes out most vividly in an ironic inversion of a famous prophecy: “Beat your ploughshares into swords and your pruning hooks into spears” (3:10; cf. Isa. 2:4; Mic. 4:3). The eschatological war against the nations will be a reversal of the enemy invasion of Jerusalem (2:1–9). This section includes ■ promise of divine refuge for Israel in the coming storm (3:16). The second instance of the old recognition formula not only echoes 2:27 but effectively epitomizes the goal of the oracles: “you shall know that I am Yahweh your God, who dwell in Zion” (3:17a).

The book concludes with a prophecy concerning the contrasting destinies of Judah/Jerusalem and the nations (3:18–21). To some it seems anticlimactic and therefore a later addition. Yet it serves as a telling reprise for the second half of the book. The imagery of paradise regained, evoking memories of Eden (Gen. 2; Ezek. 47:1–13), does not represent a total return to a universal paradise, since the superabundant fertility of Judah has as its negative corollary the desolation of Egypt and Edom (3:18–19).

In the end, the oracles in 2:18–3:21 answer back to the opening call of the book and fill out the future dimensions of the story. Joel began with a simple summons to listen and to tell “your children and the children of your children” (1:3) in order to transmit the memory of things past as a prophetic message for things future. This memory involves both fear and hope. Moreover, the words of a portentous past are written into the Janus face of the future.

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Amos is a prophetic book of only nine chapters. Its central focus is the proclamation of Yahweh's judgment against Israel because some Israelites had oppressed the poor. Yahweh's burning wrath is directed against various nations but particularly against Israel because it treats people violently and unjustly. Yahweh's anger is, indeed, so hot that the downfall of Israel is imminent. Only at the end of the book can one find clearly expressed a message of hope, but that expectation seems to apply primarily to Judah rather than to the northern state of Israel, which is the major subject of the book (→ Israel). Most scholars think this proclamation of salvation for Judah is the product of literary activity much later than the time of Amos.

What little is known about this prophet must be reconstructed from the book itself. Amos came from Tekoa in Judah (1:1; cf. 7:12) and understood himself to have been commissioned by Yahweh to prophesy to Israel during the reign of Jeroboam II (ca. 786–746 B.C.). He does not seem to have been a lifelong prophet but rather a shepherd and “dresser of sycamore trees” (7:14, cf. 1:1).

Most scholars today believe that Amos communicated by spoken rather than by written words. It seems likely that others subsequently arranged the oral traditions that they had received; yet scholars are not agreed concerning the details of this process. Almost no one doubts that the book of Amos grew over time, but it remains difficult to reconstruct precisely the stages of development. It is perhaps better to begin with the book in its completed form and to interpret first of all, and perhaps primarily, the completed text.

The book of Amos consists of three major sections: an introductory superscription (1:1) and “motto” (1:2); the main body of the book (1:3–9:6); and a concluding postscript (9:7–15). The first and third sections presuppose Jerusalem as the central focus of divine activity: Uzziah, king of Judah, is listed ahead of Jeroboam, king of Israel (1:1). Yahweh roars from Jerusalem, his dwelling place (1:2). At the end of the book, the concern for the “falling booth of David” (9:11) centers upon the Jerusalemite royal dynasty; the reestablishment of the Jerusalemite political authority is the center of attention.

The main body of the book, by contrast, is notably Israelite in focus. Northern cities—Samaria, Bethel, and Gilgal—are prominent. Jeroboam, king of Israel, is the monarch against whom judgment is directed (7:9, 10–17). It is probable that the tradition's northern orientation, preserved in the second section, represents earlier stages of the tradition and that the first and third sections represent a reinterpretation of earlier Amos material to reflect the way that tradition was later read in Judah.

The structure for the main body of the book (1:3–9:6) is provided by certain “repetitional compositions,” i.e., compositions whose parts exhibit great similarity in form and language: “for three transgressions of x and for four . . .” (1:3–2:16); “thus the Lord Yahweh showed me . . .” (7:1–9; 8:1–3). Between the two major “repetitional compositions” (1:3–2:16; 7:1–9:4), one finds, for the most part, poetic utterances.

The main body of the book can be divided into two major parts (1:3–4:13; 5:1–9:6). The first (1:3–4:13) begins with a “repetitional composition” of oracles against various peoples (1:3–2:16). This “repetitional composition” is followed by a group of utterances (3:1–4:12) introduced by “Hear this word . . .” (3:1). This part concludes with a hymn, which praises Yahweh for the previous words of judgment (4:13).

The second part (5:1–9:6), which, like the first, concludes with a doxology (9:5–6), also contains a “repetitional composition,” a series of similarly worded vision reports (7:1–9:4). Furthermore, the second part includes a group of utterances (5:1–6:14) introduced by “Hear this word . . .” (5:1). But, unlike the first, the “repetitional composition” appears near the end of this part rather than at the beginning. Moreover, the section of text introduced by “hear this word . . .” appears at the beginning of the second part rather than in second place, as in the first part.

1:1–2

Superscription and Motto

The superscription in Amos begins with the title “the words of Amos” followed by a reference to his vocation as a shepherd, a reference to his home, and an indication of the time during which he functioned as a prophet.

The phrase "who was among the shepherds of Tekoa" is particularly significant. The book of Amos points out that Amos prophesied not as a part of lifelong profession, but rather as a "shepherd and dresser of sycamore trees," who was called by Yahweh to leave his flock and to prophesy to Israel (7:15). Indeed, the report that his home was Tekoa (1:1) indicates that his special commission to speak to Israel involved leaving familiar environs for a mission outside Judah.

Dating Amos's activity to "two years before the earthquake" corresponds to language about similar phenomena elsewhere in the book (8:8; 9:1, 5). The purpose of the superscription is to show that Amos's words were fulfilled in the earthquake that occurred subsequent to his preaching.

The "motto" (v. 2) contains language typical of theophanies (an OT theophany reports the appearance of God and its effect on the earth; → Theophany): "gives his voice" or "roars" in the thunder of a storm (Pss. 18:13; 46:6; 104:7; Isa. 30:30). The southern bias of this verse is clear: Yahweh roars from Jerusalem. Both the "motto" and the superscription, with the southern king Uzziah named ahead of Jeroboam, king of Israel, express the conviction that Amos's prophecy to Israel was the work of the God who dwells in Jerusalem.

The Main Body of the Book

This second section of the book, consisting of two major parts, revolves around the theme of God's presence. In the first part, a series of judgment speeches lays a foundation for an exhortation, namely, that the people should prepare for Yahweh to appear in their midst. The second part, building upon that exhortation, portrays Yahweh's presence as an event resulting in Israel's death.

1:3-4:13

Laying the Foundation for Yahweh's Theophany

The first part of the book's main body (1:3-4:13) opens with a lengthy section of poetry containing, at the outset, a series of oracles of judgment against various nations, including Israel (1:3-2:16). An elaboration of the judgment upon Israel follows (3:1-4:3). These judgment speeches set the context for exhortations to enter Yahweh's presence (4:4-5) or to prepare for a theophany (4:6-12), an encounter in which Israel would have to meet its judge face to face.

This part is structured as follows:

- 1:3-4:12, Prophetic proclamation
  - 1:3-4:3, Laying the foundation for a theophany: proclamation of judgment
  - 1:3-2:16, Against the nations and Israel
  - 3:1-4:3, Further judgment on Israel
  - 4:4-12, Exhortations concerning entry into Yahweh's presence
- 4:13, Response: doxological hymn

Yahweh has sent his burning anger upon various nations and upon Israel for their crimes against humanity (1:3-4:3). His anger is still burning, and he will not "cause it [his anger] to return" (or less literally, "to cease"). His wrath, still active, will lead to military defeat, destruction by fire, and exile for those nations who have violently abused other persons. This message of judgment has a two-part structure: first, judgment against various peoples, one of which is Israel (1:3-2:16); and second, singular attention to judgment upon Israel (3:1-4:3).

1:3-2:16, Against the Nations and Israel.

This "repetitional composition" contains a series of short, stereotyped oracles against various foreign peoples, concluding with oracles against Judah and Israel. They are introduced by a brief accusation and announcement of punishment: "For three crimes of x and four I will not cause it to return." (Such formulations, "graduated numerical sayings" [ $x + 1$ ], are common in the biblical tradition and in the ancient Near East [e.g., Ps. 62:11-12; Job 33:14-15; Prov. 30:15-16, 21-23, 29-31]). The rationale for using "three, four" here is unclear, especially since these numbers do not correspond to the number of crimes enumerated. More certain is the nature of the crimes specified; they are all (except for Judah) violent abuses of human beings.

Yahweh's punishment for these crimes occurs in the form of his anger, which, once sent forth, will not be called back. Fire, a stereotypical expression for Yahweh's anger (Deut. 32:22; Isa. 5:24, 25; 9:19; 66:15; Jer. 15:14; 17:4), is kindled to "eat" the "strongholds" of these nations' cities, with the result that they will suffer defeat, death by the sword, and exile.

Yahweh's anger directed against his own people, namely, Judah and, especially, Israel, provides the climax in this "repetitional composition." While Judah's misdeeds are stated generally as disobedience to law and walking according to lies, the crimes of Israel involve oppression of the poor: "they sell the righteous for silver and the needy for a pair of shoes" (Amos 2:6, RSV). Such social abuses are nonetheless violations against Yahweh, for they "profane" his "holy name" and altars and desecrate his sacred house (2:7-8).

Furthermore, although Yahweh has graciously delivered Israel, the Israelites have disobeyed him. The contrast between "I" and "you" statements personalizes and, thereby, emphasizes Israel's improper response: "I raised up some of your sons as prophets . . . as Nazirites . . ." (v. 11; →Nazirites); "you made the Nazirites drink wine . . . you commanded, saying, 'you must not prophesy'" (v. 12).

Because Israel has oppressed the poor, profaned Yahweh's name, abused his Nazirites, and silenced his prophets, Yahweh will punish the nation by military defeat (vv. 13-16). This defeat is expressed first by the image of an overloaded wagon that "presses down" (RSV) or "breaks open" (see Wolff 1977, p. 134) what is underneath. Then the imagery shifts to the portrayal of the fate of warriors in defeat.

3:1-4:3, Further Judgment on Israel. This compositional unit consists of the following speeches: 3:1-2, 3-8, 9-12, 13-15; 4:1-3. The focus is upon Israel—its misdeeds and the judgment upon it. The message of judgment begins with 3:1-2, which takes the form of a judgment oracle: first, there is a call to hear ("Hear this word . . ."), second, a basis or reason for judgment ("you only have I known . . ."), and third, an announcement of punishment ("therefore I will punish . . ."). Election is no guarantee of God's favor; it involves, rather, a demanding responsibility and serves as the basis for divine judgment and punishment. All else in 3:1-4:3 follows from this claim, which confronts the audience by its boldness and starkness.

What follows in 3:3-8 is an attempt by means of disputation language to support the assertion of vv. 1-2. In this disputation, Amos argues that he has spoken, not on his own, but at Yahweh's behest. The disputation begins with a series of rhetorical questions, e.g., "Do two walk together unless they have met?" The answer to this question and those that follow is obvious; each of these phenomena is the result of a "cause-and-effect" sequence. The disputation comes to resolution in v. 8. The disputation's logic depends upon the relationship between "cause" and "effect" to persuade the audience that the prophet's word of judgment is most assuredly "caused" by Yahweh's having spoken.

The text's imagery also helps the audience understand Amos's message. The first image conjures up in the mind something routine and nonthreatening: two do not walk together unless they have met. But the remaining questions in vv. 3-5 elicit mental pictures of life-threatening circumstances in the animal world, namely, a lion roaring over prey, a bird falling into a trap, or a snare springing from the ground because it has caught something. The imagery has escalated from the innocuous to that of vicious threat to life. Still, no human life is yet at stake.

With Amos 3:6, human life is thrown into question: "If a trumpet is blown in a city, do not the people tremble? If evil befalls a city, has not Yahweh done it?" Now the audience is personally involved, for images of threat to human life have emerged. "Could it be our city in which an alarm trumpet is sounded?" Such an emotional reaction, though unstated, may well have been elicited in the audience, for Amos has already said that Yahweh will visit his chosen people's iniquity upon them (3:2) and that punishment will come in the form of military defeat (2:13-16).

The resolution in Amos 3:8 justifies the sense of foreboding conveyed in vv. 3-6: the lion has roared—a symbol of military attack—and the people are certainly afraid. The stage is now set for an elaboration of Yahweh's judgment.

Amos 3:9-11 presents a modified form of the prophetic oracle of judgment—with the basis for judgment in v. 10 and the announcement of judgment in v. 11. It begins with instruction to God's heralds: "proclaim to the strongholds of Ashdod . . . and say, 'Assemble on the mountains of Samaria and see the great terrors in her midst. . .'" Yahweh's chosen in Samaria stand under judgment because of their sins, ironically subject to the scrutiny of gentile witnesses whom Yahweh has not known (cf. v. 2).

Imagery of military strength and defeat continues: Samaria's "strongholds," symbols of military might, are stocked with "violence and oppression" (v. 10). The city has hoarded violence and oppression, as if the people feared they might not have enough! Such commodities will not, however, protect them. An enemy will attack them and destroy the lofty "strongholds" (v. 11).

Amos 3:12 employs two images to elaborate the previous oracle: first, the shepherd who rescues nothing but torn animal parts from the lion, and, second, the recovery of nothing but furniture fragments from the enemy. Not only will the "strongholds" be brought low; nothing but fragments of the furnishings will be left. Still another image, that of a lion having devoured its prey (v. 12), connects animal violence to military defeat. Moreover, the lion's roaring over its prey is said to be the voice of Yahweh (v. 8). Thus the lion's attack (vv. 4, 12), the blowing of the alarm trumpet in a city (v. 6), the activity of witnesses in Yahweh's trial against Samaria (v. 9), the enemy's destruction of Samaria's mighty "strongholds" (v. 11), and the decimation of furnishings (v. 12) are all images that work together to depict the total annihilation of the city.

Amos 3:13-15 extends the portrayal of devastation. The legal language of v. 9, wherein witnesses are summoned, continues in an installation-of-witnesses speech (vv. 13-15): "Hear and testify against the house of Jacob. . . ." The witnesses testify that the altar at Bethel will be punished and that Yahweh will destroy "houses." Destruction is not limited to the strongholds but includes also the great houses of the upper class. Moreover, there will be no refuge from the slaughter. The horns of the altar, long a place of refuge (1 Kings 1:50; 2:28), will be cut off. The last hope for escaping the catastrophe consequently vanishes.

The final result is exile (Amos 4:1-3). The wealthy women of Samaria, who have oppressed the poor, will be led away by "hooks" through the breaches in the city wall—gaps in the protective wall opened by the enemy. Not only is there destruction of strongholds, houses, furnishings, and the horns of the altar; the people are also taken into exile. Truly nothing is left.

4:4-12, Entry into Yahweh's Presence.

The divine judgment proclaimed in Amos 1:3-4:3 paves the way for two exhortations concerning entry into Yahweh's presence (4:4-5, 6-12). Because Yahweh's anger has initiated judgment, Israel must prepare to confront his presence (see esp. v. 12). The first of these exhortations (vv. 4-5) is sarcastic in tone. It parodies a language summoning worshipers to enter the sanctuary and offer a sacrifice. One can imagine a summons such as "Come to Bethel and bring a sacrifice," but no religious official would have said, "Come to Bethel and transgress." Such mock encouragement must mean "Go right on sinning with your sacrifices, which you love to flaunt, so that all may see your piety! This is indeed the way to enter Yahweh's presence!"

The second exhortation (vv. 6-12) turns from sarcastic exhortation concerning Israelite behavior to a recitation of what Yahweh has done. Yahweh has sent a series of punishments in the hope that these chastisements would induce repentance, but all to no avail: "They did not return to me." So Yahweh announces judgment still to come (v. 12a) and exhorts Israel to "prepare" for a theophany (v. 12b) where they will "meet" him face to face (see Exod. 19:11, 15, 17 to observe "prepare" [RSV: "be ready"] and "meet" as terms associated with theophany).

4:13, Doxology. The doxology praises Yahweh for his creative power. It serves as a hymnic response that extols him for the preceding words of judgment (1:3-4:12).

5:1-9:6

Death and the End for Israel

This second part of the book's main body may be understood as a sequel to the exhortation to prepare for a theophany (4:12). Yahweh's arrival involves death and the end for Israel (5:1-9:6). This section is structured as follows:

5:1-9:4, Prophetic proclamation

5:1-6:14, Utterances concerning the death of Israel

5:1-17, The proclamation of death

5:18-6:14, Elaboration of the proclamation of death

7:1-9:4, Vision reports concerning the end of Israel

9:5-6, Response: doxology

5:1-17, The Proclamation of Death. This passage has two parts: vv. 1-9 and vv. 10-17. Verses 1-9 begin with a funeral lament (vv. 1-2): "Hear this word . . ." (call to hear); "fallen, no more to rise . . ." (lament proper). The prophet employs the image of a dead virgin and the genre of a funeral lament to portray a total end for Israel. For a woman to die a virgin was indeed something to bewail, as the narrative of Jephthah's daughter shows (Judg. 11:29-40). So too Israel dies, prematurely and unfulfilled, like a woman who had borne no children.

In v. 3, a word from God substantiates the lament: "The city which goes forth a thousand will have a hundred left. . . ." The imagery is that of a military disaster; the army is virtually wiped out. The funeral lament (vv. 1-2) and the announcement of defeat in battle (v. 3) express in concrete terms a transition from power or life to impotence or death.

In vv. 4-5, however, the language shifts to an exhortation that encourages behavior leading to life ("Seek me and live") and then an admonition ("Do not seek Bethel . . ."), as well as basis for the admonition ("for Gilgal will go into exile and Bethel will become nothing").

How should one assess the transition from lament over death (vv. 1-3) to exhortation about life? First, one must recognize that the language in vv. 4-5 is ironic. A typical exhortation would not encourage persons to seek Yahweh but would promote pilgrimages to the leading Yahweh sanctuaries. Verses 4-5 are obviously a parody of conventional speech, a parody that exhorts people to avoid seeking Yahweh in the very places he is thought to be present.

Verses 6-7 form a second exhortation: "Seek Yahweh and live, lest he break out like fire . . . and it eat with no one to quench. . . ." Destruction by fire is viewed as a creature, which has a mouth and eats. The metaphor of a devouring fire connects v. 6 to vv. 1-3. A fire that consumes is much like death in that what once was no longer is.

In v. 7, the prophet accuses people using figurative language. Justice is not literally turned to wormwood, nor is righteousness actually thrust down to the ground. But the comparison is meaningful: justice is not merely absent; it is turned into something else, something for which bitter wormwood is an appropriate metaphor. Or again, justice is not simply abandoned; it is cast down.

The doxology (vv. 8-9) continues the tone of judgment. Yahweh, who quite properly "turns" one thing into another (e.g., deep darkness into morning), is deliberately contrasted with Israel's improper "turning" of justice into wormwood. This hymn of praise sets Yahweh's behavior over against that of Israel.

Verses 10-17 are made up of three parts: vv. 10-13, 14-15, and 16-17. The repeated use of "therefore" is an important stylistic connector (vv. 11, 13, 16), as is the repetition of the verb "hate" (vv. 10, 15) and the phrase "in the gate" (vv. 10, 12, 15). The term "gate," a reference to the town gate where legal proceedings were customarily held, refers to the place and practice of justice. Indeed, justice is the basic theme of vv. 10-17.

Verses 10-12 provide the reasons for judgment, e.g., "They hate the reprove in the gate. . . ." But announcement of judgment for the future also appears: "houses of hewn stone you have built but you shall not live in them. . . ." Then, in v. 13, "therefore" appears, introducing a second assertion concerning the future: "Therefore the prudent in that time will be silent, for it is a bad time."

Three "imagined scenes" underlie vv. 10-13. The first elicits a scene in the town gate in which those who speak for justice encounter opposition from those who "hate" or "abhor" truthfulness (v. 10). Undoubtedly the former were despised by those who were using the legal process to acquire property unjustly at the expense of the poor. The second "imagined scene" brings to mind a picture of such abuse and its results. The poor are "trampled upon" (a rich figurative expression) with the result that their oppressors unjustly acquire wealth, such as houses and vineyards. Uninhabited houses and vineyards whose wine remains unimbibed provide concrete images that express the prophet's conviction that the elaborate plans to manipulate the legal system for illegitimate acquisition will result in the inability to enjoy the luxuries so painstakingly but unjustly acquired. The third "imagined scene" involves the mental picture of that day of judgment in which the "prudent" will keep silent (v. 13). Yahweh's judgment will bring such a terrible time that silence is the only wise response.

Amos 5:14-15 comprises two parts: an exhortation plus two purpose clauses (v. 14) and an exhortation plus an expression of possibility (v. 15). The tone of v. 14 appears initially to be that of a sincere exhortation. However, the end of the second purpose clause alters this tone. The addition of "as you have said" gives to the exhortation a new and mocking tone, for it pokes fun at the audience and its cheap mouth-ing of confidence in the divine presence as it prattles piously, "Yahweh is with us. . . ."

The final clause of the second exhortation ("perhaps Yahweh . . . will be gracious to a remnant of Joseph") reinforces the mocking tone of vv. 14-15. Such expressions were used in Israel to propose certain courses of action in the hope that the action might lead to favorable consequences (Gen. 16:2; Num. 22:6, 11; 23:3; 1 Sam. 6:5). But this particular expression of possibility (Amos 5:15b) ridicules the audience and their understanding of the significance of Yahweh's presence.

Verses 16-17 conclude the compositional unit (vv. 1-17) with an announcement of judgment. The time of judgment is portrayed as a time of mourning in cities and vineyards. Such activities might actually take place in a time of catastrophe, but the purpose of vv. 16-17 is to represent Israel's calamity by portraying it in terms of death. Thus, the end of the composition returns to the theme found at its beginning.

Verses 16-17 close with the words "for I will cross over in your midst." This assertion, namely, that Yahweh's presence will bring death, colors one's reading of the exhortation in vv. 14-15. The purpose clause, "that Yahweh . . . may be with you," can no longer be read straightforwardly. When read in the light of v. 17b, that purpose clause expresses an aim that, ironically, leads to death. The summons for people to prepare to meet their God (4:12) will come to fruition. He will be present—to bring death.

5:18-6:14, Elaboration on the Proclamation. This unit is composed of two sections (5:18-27; 6:1-14). In each section a woe-utterance (5:18-20; 6:1-7) is followed by a Yahweh-speech in which the Deity says, "I hate. . . ." (5:21-27; 6:8-14). Each of these two parts has its own particular emphases.

Amos 5:18-27 confronts the audience with an ironic reversal of what is normally expected. In vv. 18-20, the Day of Yahweh, contrary to popular opinion, is not a day to be desired but rather a day of darkness. Verses 21-23 also overturn ordinary expectation through Yahweh's assertion that he "hates" his worshipers' sacrifices. Israelites traditionally believed that Yahweh desires sacrifice. But here he rejects it, announcing that he wants justice and righteousness instead (v. 24).

Yahweh's hatred of Israel's sacrifices (5:21) brings to a climax a motif that begins in Amos 5:10. There the people are said to "hate" those who seek justice in the gate. Yet those who hate justice are exhorted to "hate evil," to "love good," and to establish justice in the gate (5:15)—to love what they hate and to hate what they presumably love. In 5:21–23, Yahweh proclaims his "hatred" of their sacrifices, the sacrifices they "love" to proclaim (4:4–5). Thus, Yahweh hates what Israel loves and loves what Israel hates.

Amos 6:1–14 condemns the majesty and splendor of Israel. The woe utterance (vv. 1–7) portrays leaders in positions of responsibility who in their revelry are interested only in luxury and self-indulgence but are unfortunately "not sick over the shattering of Joseph" (v. 6). Crime and punishment are ironically interrelated: those who are the "first" among the people (v. 1) will be the "first" to go into exile (v. 7). They maintain their status, even when the social order collapses.

Verses 8–14 also attack the splendor or pride of Israel. Yahweh "hates" it; therefore he will "deliver up" the city and its "fullness." Even if ten are left in one house, they too will die (vv. 9–10), and all houses will be destroyed (v. 11). The theme of Israel's pride appears also in vv. 13–14; the Israelites are proud of their military prowess. But, ironically, all their territory will be taken in a military invasion by a foreign nation.

7:1–9:4, Visions of Israel's End. This unit is made up of five vision reports (7:1–3, 4–6, 7–9; 8:1–3; 9:1–4) plus two supplements (7:10–17; 8:4–14) inserted into this vision report sequence. The first two reports narrate visions of devastating judgments against Israel in which the prophet succeeds, through intercessory prayer, in persuading Yahweh to withdraw the punishment. In the third and fourth visions, however, Yahweh announces an irrevocable judgment against Israel: "I will not again pass him by" (7:8; 8:2). The fifth vision report elaborates the message of judgment.

The vision reports develop the theme of death present in the second part of the main body (5:1–9:6). Like a wall tested by a plumb-line and found to be unfit, so Israel fails the test and therefore must, like the wall, be torn down (7:7–8). The word play (Heb. qayitz, "summer fruit", and qetz, "end") introduces a description of Israel's end (8:1–3). The final vision (9:1–4) fills out the picture of death: none escape the sword. No matter how far they flee, they cannot escape Yahweh's eyes; at his command they will die.

A supplement to the third vision (7:10–17) reports conflict between Amos and Amaziah, priest of Bethel. The book's concern over attempts to silence the prophetic word (cf. 2:11–12; 3:7–8) is at issue in this narrative. Amaziah cannot rightfully order Amos to prophesy in Judah since his commission is from Yahweh and not from Amaziah (7:12–15). Moreover, Amos is not a lifelong prophet but rather a shepherd who was given a special calling—to prophesy to Israel.

A supplement (8:4–14) to the fourth vision elaborates the message of death and mourning found in 8:3. But the judgment is radicalized. It involves more than exile, starvation, and death; there will be a famine of hearing Yahweh's creating and sustaining words.

9:5–6, Doxology. This hymn continues the language of mourning and of the shaking (rising and falling) of the earth (9:5; cf. 8:8; 9:1). The hymnist praises Yahweh, the sovereign creator, who controls the waters, moves the world, and even makes it mourn.

9:7–15

Postscript

The book ends with a reinterpretation of the message of judgment. By disputing the claim that deliverance from Egypt exempts Israel from judgment, the author claims that Yahweh will destroy "the sinful kingdom" (vv. 7–8a). This kingdom (the Israelite monarchy?) will disappear, but the "house of Jacob" will not be completely destroyed. Only sinners will die, and a remnant will survive (vv. 8b–10). Verses 11–15, undoubtedly composed during the Babylonian exile, understand the surviving remnant as linked to the renaissance of the "falling" Davidic dynasty. The ability of Jerusalemites so to reinterpret the earlier Amos tradition is a testimony to the vitality of the sacred word in shaping and reshaping faith.

MICHAEL H. FLOYD

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Obadiah is one long complex unit. But there are apparent tensions between the opening of Obadiah and the rest of the book with which any conception of its overall form must reckon.

The superscription (v. 1) identifies it as a vision, but the following subheading introduces it as a speech. The speaker is identified as Yahweh, God of Israel, but the quotation actually begins (v. 1) and ends (vv. 19–21) with someone else speaking. The subject is said to be the neighboring nation of Edom, but parts of the book concern the nations in general. These features begin to make sense since the term "vision" can refer to whatever the prophetic imagination has been divinely enabled to perceive, whether images seen (Dan. 8:1–12) or words heard (1 Sam. 3). It can also refer derivatively to a written report of such perceptions (Hab. 2:2; Jer. 36). Obadiah's inclusion of other voices besides the divine voice under the rubric of a speech of Yahweh shows that it is not, however, just such a record. The convention of reporting prophetic perceptions has been adapted to show that the text itself has divinatory significance. This document was meant to provide for its interpreters not just information about past prophecies, but also prophetic insight into the present. The whole book is a visionary word of Yahweh in this sense, though, strictly speaking, only vv. 2–18 comprise a speech of Yahweh. The incorporation of an announcement concerning the nations within an address to Edom (v. 15) is but one indication of the book's concern to integrate these two subjects. The focus is on Edom as one of the central agents, along with Israel, in a world-historical process that ultimately affects all peoples.

The book thus has integrity with respect to both form and content, but the close similarity between parts of it and parts of another anti-Edomite prophecy suggests that the author may have drawn on previously existing oracular materials (cf. vv. 1–5; Jer. 49:7, 9, 14–16). There is no consensus among modern interpreters, however, regarding any earlier stages, and since nothing biographical is known about the prophet for whom the book is named, there is no telling whether any certain parts of it or the whole should be attributed to him. In any case, the book in its final form is not so much a collection of prophecies, each occasioned by a particular event, as it is a critical reflection on the type of historical process represented by a whole period of Israelite-Edomite relations. The book's retrospective viewpoint presupposes both the Edomites' participation in the Babylonian conquest of Jerusalem in the sixth century B.C. (Ps. 137:7) and a subsequent attack on Edom by former allies, which cannot be as precisely dated (→ Edomites; Nabatea, Nabateans). Such considerations would put the final composition sometime in the postexilic period, probably in the sixth or fifth century B.C.

Behind these events there lie memories of the Edomites' refusal to allow the Hebrew refugees led by Moses to pass through their land (Num. 20:14–21) as well as of wars in which Edom came under and broke free from the control of Israelite monarchs (2 Sam. 8:13–14; 1 Kings 11:14–22; 2 Kings 14:7, 22; 16:6; 2 Chron. 20; 21:8–10). Obadiah comes from a tradition of prophetic, anti-Edomite polemic generated by this history (e.g., Isa. 34:5–17; Jer. 49:7–22; Lam. 4:21–22; Ezek. 25:12–14, 35; Amos 1:11–12 and Mal. 1:2–4). In form, Obadiah represents the emergence of a type of divination through historiographical study, which was especially characteristic of prophecy in the postexilic period. This development is further evident in the final canonical forms of other prophetic books, as well as in the final composition of historical narratives such as the Pentateuch and the Deuteronomistic History (→ Deuteronomistic Historian; Sources of the Pentateuch).

COMMENTARY

In its opening lines (v. 1), the word on Edom identifies the reception of an oracle from Yahweh with a diplomatic communication that puts all nations on notice; then, by means of a summons to battle, all are urged to align themselves against Edom in the coming struggle. This beginning suggests that whatever Yahweh has to say about Edom will also affect the rest of the world and that policy toward this nation will somehow influence all national destinies.

The oracle's first section (vv. 2–4) begins to explain what has happened to Edom and how this affects other nations. First comes a description of the Edomites' present predicament (vv. 2–3). As a result of Yahweh's control over their affairs and as a consequence of their own self-deceptive pride, they find themselves in a despicable state. A false sense of security, engendered by the region's naturally defensible high terrain, is symptomatic of their overall hubris. Then comes an indication of what Edom's situation portends for the international order (v. 4). Even if as a world power Edom were to be this arrogant, Yahweh would bring it down just the same. (See for the symbol of the eagle, Ezek. 17:1-10; for the image of being cast down from the stars, Isa. 14:12-17.) Edom's present fate is thus both an example of what Yahweh could do to any nation and part of what he is doing in accord with his larger design for the whole world.

The main body of the oracle (vv. 5-17) has two sections. The first (vv. 5-7) develops in greater detail the description of Edom's present predicament in vv. 2-3. Edom's dire straits are further described in terms of a double cross by former allies, who in their plundering have taken more than thieves and left less than harvesters. In falling prey to such victimization, there is hardly any evidence of Edom's proverbial wisdom! (See Jer. 49:7; Bar. 3:22.) The second section (vv. 8-15) similarly fills in the description of the worldwide future implications barely outlined in v. 4. These two sections are linked by a question (vv. 8-9) that asks rhetorically whether Edom's misfortunes are not the beginning of "the Day of Yahweh," whose scenario includes the Edomites' loss of their wisdom traditions as a prelude to their utter destruction (→ Judgment, Day of).

The Edomites' impending doom thus provides the paradigmatic case for what will befall all nations on that day (v. 15). As Edom's fortunes are even now being reversed, so is the world situation about to be reversed. And the pivot on which this cosmic process turns is the sanctuary of Yahweh in Jerusalem. Its destruction is the great wrong that needs to be set right, and its restoration to holiness (v. 17a) is the focal point of the great transformation. The change begins with Edom because its participation in the destruction was most treacherous. As kindred neighbors, the Edomites should not have joined with the alien powers. Because they were so heavily implicated in Jerusalem's "day of trouble" (note the recurrence of this phrase and variations in vv. 11-14), they are the first to have the troubles of the Day of Yahweh. They now know from their former allies the same kind of treachery that Israel once knew from them, and thus "on that day" Edom will finally be consumed by Israel (v. 18). The other nations that took part in or condoned the violation of Yahweh's sanctuary will similarly find that their victory toasts have turned to drunken gulps from the cup of doom (v. 16; cf. Ps. 75:8; Isa. 51:17-23; Jer. 25:15-17). But as for Israel, whose refuge on Mount Zion was once cut off (v. 14), they will now find there a refuge from which to dispossess all those who had dispossessed them (v. 17).

The outcome of this turnabout is described in vv. 19-21: Israel will fully regain its territoriality, Edom will become subordinate to the authority that emanates from Yahweh's sanctuary in Jerusalem, and Yahweh's cosmic kingship will then be once again intact.

By referring to Israel as Jacob and to Edom as Esau, Obadiah explicitly associates its reflections on the historic animosity between these two peoples with the pentateuchal stories of the intrafamilial strife between the twin sons of Isaac and Rebekah (Gen. 25:19-33:20; note 25:30b and 32:28). Against this background it becomes evident that the book is not just nationalistic sentiment masked in religious terms. Along with Israel's sense of being divinely destined to overcome Edom (Gen. 25:23; Num. 24:18) there come several other, relatively paradoxical, realizations: the conflict with Edom is rooted in the same fratricidal tendencies as intra-Israelite conflict; Israel encounters God in crippling struggles as well as in victorious ones (Gen. 32:24-32); and God could be fully encountered through reconciliation with Edom (Gen. 33:1-17; note v. 10b). Within a mythic frame of reference, which regards Yahweh's sanctuary in Jerusalem as the sign and center of the divinely established cosmic order (Ps. 48), Obadiah makes a theological analysis of a particular type of historical situation: there can be communities with enough common interests and affinities to make them like brothers who nevertheless opportunistically relate to imperial powers so as to exploit one another. But whenever this happens, cosmic standards of justice have been violated, creating an imbalance in the world order that God will inevitably redress.

TERENCE E. FRETHEIM

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Jonah probably dates from the fifth century B.C. when continuing hardships, foreign subjugation, and the nonfulfillment of exilic promises raised the issue of God's justice for Israel (cf. Mal. 2:17; 3:14–15).

The exact reference to Jonah in 1:1 roots the book in history (2 Kings 14:25), but literary features (e.g., irony, satire, hyperbole, repetition, humor, and the ending) indicate a nonhistoriographic purpose. The book is best seen as an interpretive development of these roots in the form of a short story pervasively didactic and carefully structured. Jonah himself becomes a type representing certain pious Israelites who hold a problematic theological perspective; Nineveh (cf. Nah. 3:1) is probably a cipher for the Persians (cf. Jth. 1:1). The book is a unity, as most recent scholars recognize, though the author uses many earlier motifs and traditions (cf. Gen. 18; 1 Kings 19; Jer. 18, 36; Joel 2). The book is prophetic in that it speaks a word of judgment and grace to a specific audience, evoking amendment of thought and life.

The book raises anew Abraham's question over Sodom, "Will the Judge of all the earth do right?" (Gen. 18:25), in view of Exod. 34:6, "... a God merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love ..." (cf. Jon. 4:2). Jonah's disobedience is symptomatic of a theological view that questions the indiscriminate extension of God's mercy to the wicked, especially in light of Israel's suffering at their hands. But simple justice is not God's way; God remains free to be gracious toward those who deserve nothing but punishment. This is true for both Jonah (Israel) and Nineveh. The object of the book is theological change that would effect obedience. God's means are heuristic, and to the very end Jonah retains the freedom to resist.

COMMENTARY

1:1–3, Jonah Called. Unlike other prophets who spoke oracles against the nations, Jonah is called to deliver a word of judgment to Nineveh in person. Because this means that the wicked destroyers of Jonah's homeland might repent and that God might respond in mercy rather than deserved judgment (cf. 4:2), Jonah's sense of justice is violated. Hence, to escape to a place in which God's call might be less compelling, he buys the most expensive ticket on a ship heading in the opposite direction—to Tarshish in Spain.

1:4–16, Jonah Pursued. Because Jonah's flight has an adverse effect on God's possibilities for Nineveh, God pursues the reluctant mediator of the divine word—not to visit him with wrath but to turn him around. Far from demonstrating divine omnipotence, the storm provides a new context for decision making but does not predetermine the results.

To lighten the ship, the sailors sacrifice the cargo to their gods; Jonah, however, closes his eyes to what God is about and descends into a deep sleep, a descent culminating in 2:6. Ironically, the captain reminds the prophet of his religious responsibilities, recognizing that prayer does not finally shape the divine response. When the lots pinpoint Jonah as the one who has occasioned the crisis, he is assaulted with questions. Responding incompletely, he nevertheless makes a confession that eventually moves the sailors to faith in his God, action that anticipates the Ninevites' response. But the confession does not stop the storm; in fact, the weather gets worse. What is at stake for God is Jonah's theologically informed disobedience, not his faith.

Attuned to the signs of transcendence, the sailors wonder how to stop the storm. Jonah confesses that he is the problem and asks to be thrown overboard. His sense of justice will not allow the innocent to perish for the guilty. Even more, refusing to change his convictions, which presumably would have stopped the storm, Jonah will show God what justice means; he will take upon himself the punishment he deserves. God, however, refuses to be bound by strict canons of justice and mercifully delivers Jonah by means of a fish. The sailors, meanwhile, insightfully recognizing that Jonah's death is not required, strive to return him to where he can be obedient. They finally agree to Jonah's request, reminding God that this is a divine dilemma; they should not be blamed if Jonah is innocent. The storm stops and the sailors respond as faithful Israelites would.

1:17-2:10, God's Deliverance and Jonah's Response.

The use of the fish to achieve God's purposes brackets Jonah's prayer. The fish, of unknown species, is God's instrument for saving Jonah from the sea and transporting him (in three days and nights, the time it takes for a journey from the underworld) to the place where God's call can be restated. In response to the deliverance from drowning, Jonah sings a song of thanksgiving from the fish's belly. Using traditional metaphoric language (cf. Pss. 30; 42), here also used literally, he recalls his distress, lament, and descent to the doors of Sheol (the abode of the dead, located beneath the sea floor). Ironically, he contrasts himself with the pagans, failing to see that he has forsaken God as much as they. He voices the central theme of God's deliverance—ironically, for he would limit God's exercise of the mercy that saved him. The prayer reveals no real change in an otherwise pious Jonah, but God and the fish mercifully, if unceremoniously, bring the unrepentant prophet home.

3:1-10, Nineveh and God Repent. The pattern of threatened disaster followed by human and divine repentance is common in Israel's experience (cf. Joel 2) and is enunciated in Jer. 18:7-11 as available to all. Hyperbole is pervasive. Nineveh is described in terms much larger than life; archaeology knows no such incredibly large city. Despite Jonah's minimal effort, everyone in the most evil city of the age immediately repents, even the animals. Deliberately overdrawn, such details highlight the irony of the reluctant prophet's unparalleled success.

Still in need of Jonah, God repeats the call. This act protects Jonah's freedom to resist in the face of much divine activity; but this time he acquiesces. Yet, his graceless message in the shadow of his own experience of divine love and his negative response to the results of his own preaching (4:1) indicate that he goes under duress and without mercy in his heart. His unconditional message—an unprecedented countdown to doom—speaks Jonah's own mind regarding what should occur; this will serve justice.

Surprisingly, the Ninevites believed God, and it is they who spread the word throughout the city. Like the captain, the king leads his community in repentant acts (cf. Jer. 36), acknowledging that they are not salvific in themselves. Human repentance is a necessary but not sufficient factor; salvation will depend finally on the kind of God that God is. God's repentance of evil, turning from an announcement of judgment having ill effects, is finally rooted in divine love (4:2), which cannot be presumed upon by those who repent. The divine repentance shows that God is not immutable. God is affected by people's actions and will reshape plans in that light, all in the service of God's unchangeable will for salvation of as many as possible.

4:1-11, A Theological Debate. Jonah becomes very angry, strenuously objecting to God's act of salvation! He now offers his reasons for fleeing. He had feared God would let mercy override justice, even for non-Israelites (cf. Ps. 145:8-9). Jonah does not disagree with the priority of God's grace as such, but he will not be a partner to its indiscriminate exercise. God must conform to basic canons of justice in responding to human conduct. Otherwise, God is capricious and life is absurd. And so, Jonah asks God to kill him (cf. Elijah in 2 Kings); he has participated in an act of injustice, and that is worthy of the death sentence. But God again refuses to accept Jonah's challenge (cf. 1:12) and mercifully engages him in conversation. God's approach is such that Jonah is free to respond, as the question format indicates: is his anger a proper response to Nineveh's deliverance? Jonah does not respond verbally (cf. 1:6) but challenges God with the firmness of his resolve. God should take another look at the situation; Jonah will sit and wait God out.

Again there is an impasse. Rather than a baneful storm, God now sends a beneficial plant; rather than being exposed to the elements, Jonah is protected from them. Ironically, God reinforces Jonah's shade with his own construction, displaying the plenitude of divine deliverance beyond human deserving or possibility. Through this ad hoc plant God delivers the one who is angry at God for delivering others. Ironically, when Jonah sits in the shadow of God's generosity, he rejoices. Heuristically, God responds with worm and wind; the plant withers and Jonah wearies. He is given a taste of destruction. How could he want that for anybody? But Jonah again wishes for death in view of such give-and-take capriciousness; God is not just.

Now God asks: is anger a proper response to the plant's destruction? A clever question—either answer impales Jonah. If the response is negative (as it should have been), recognizing that he is not in a position to make claims regarding God's gift to him, then he would be admitting that he cannot make judgments concerning what God does with God's own creatures. But if it is affirmative (as it was), then he tacitly recognizes God's right to do what God wills regarding Nineveh, for God's claims regarding Nineveh are much greater than Jonah's regarding the plant. What Jonah (Israel) has received from God is pure gift, given apart from questions of justice, concerning which he can make no claims. Therefore, if such gifts should be lost or given to others, the question of divine fairness is inappropriate.

God's freedom to have mercy is affirmed rather than God's compassion as such ("am I not allowed to have pity" is the sense of v. 11; cf. Matt. 20:15). Yet, God's will for all is salvation, and so one can expect that God, out of love, will be moved to compassion toward his repentant creatures, even the cows.

W. EUGENE MARCH

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Micah, the sixth of the twelve Minor Prophets, consists of a collection of prophetic materials broadly categorized as announcements of punishment and salvation. The book has two major parts, 1:2–5:15 and 6:1–7:20, preceded by a superscription (1:1). The two major parts are arranged in similar fashion, moving from accusations and announcements of destruction to pronouncements of hope and deliverance.

The superscription designates Micah of Moresheth as spokesman of the addresses collected in this book. Although Micah spoke during the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, approximately 742 to 698 B.C., we know very little about him.

In 745 B.C. the Assyrian Empire began a period of expansion under the leadership of Tiglath-pileser III. In 721 B.C. Assyria destroyed Samaria, the capital city of Israel (→ Samaria, City of; Samaria, District of), and took captive thousands of Israelites. Judah, Micah's principal place of activity, also felt the pain of Assyrian attack (→ Judah, Kingdom of). In 713 B.C. Judah barely avoided a major confrontation with the Assyrians. Then, in 701, Assyria's Sennacherib (→ Sennacherib) launched a major onslaught. Thousands of people were slain and many more were taken captive. Jerusalem was besieged but miraculously escaped destruction.

The book of Micah is built around a core of material widely regarded as original to Micah the Moreshite and fitting the times of the Assyrian crisis (chaps. 1–3). Debate continues among commentators, however, with respect to the remainder of the book.

The book of Micah seems to have grown in two or perhaps three stages. The first stage involved the work done by the prophet Micah remembered by a group of disciples and some of Judah's leaders (cf. Jer. 26:18–19). The second phase appears to have involved people concerned with preserving collections of prophetic announcements, particularly those of Isaiah and Micah (a close affinity exists between these two books). The first and second phase of the book's development may overlap.

The third phase, however, seems to post-date the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians in 587 B.C. Micah 6–7 is best understood from the perspective of the sixth or early fifth century B.C. The historical catastrophes experienced by Israel and Judah are given a theological interpretation. The justice of God has been worked. The punishment of Jacob is a sign for God's people and the nations of the world. The everlasting mercy of God will be exercised, however, to reclaim God's people as a further sign of God's intention for all humankind.

For the Christian community the book of Micah has taken on special significance. Micah 5:2–4 announces a righteous shepherd who will come forth from Bethlehem to rule on behalf of God. The Gospel of Matthew quotes Micah (Matt. 2:6) in support of the tradition that Jesus of Nazareth was born in Bethlehem.

COMMENTARY

PART ONE: 1:1–5:15

The Reign of the LORD Over the Nations

1:1, Micah, the Moreshite. The prophet is remembered as Micah of Moresheth. The name "Micah," which means "Who is like the Lord?" is a common name type in ancient Israel. Moresheth, also known as Moresheth-gath, was a small village approximately twenty-five miles southwest of Jerusalem (1:14). The village has not yet been positively identified by archaeologists. Apart from the superscription, nothing in the book of Micah gives any concrete information about the prophet. The material in the book was associated with this Micah by ancient editors. These same ancient editors dated the work of Micah to the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. Micah is remembered in Jer. 26:18 as having uttered words of doom against Zion and Jerusalem that prompted Hezekiah to repent. The primary subjects of the oracles are the capital cities of the Northern and Southern kingdoms, Samaria and Jerusalem.

1:2–16, Mourning Inescapable Destruction. Micah's message begins with a call to all peoples to hear the Lord. Material originally much more concrete and time-bound is made applicable by later editors to a wider audience: an announcement first directed at Samaria (1:3-7) is linked with a cry of lament for Jerusalem (1:8-16). This entire text serves to set the mood for the announcement that will unfold in chaps. 1-5: the sovereign Lord addresses humanity with judgment and deliverance. The controversy God has with Israel and Judah is thus put in a worldwide context.

The Lord is described as coming forth from the holy place provoking an upheaval of nature (→Theophany). The "holy temple" (RSV) or "sacred palace" (JB) of 1:2, in view of the indictment against Jerusalem in 1:5, probably refers to God's heavenly abode (cf. Pss. 11:4; 18:7; Isa. 6:2), though the term often refers to the Temple in Jerusalem (Pss. 5:8; 65:5; 138:2). God comes forth to battle enemies (Judg. 5:4; Isa. 26:21; Ps. 68:8), but here the "foe" is God's own people.

The judgment centers on the capital of the Northern Kingdom, Samaria, and on the rampant idolatry that signals the sin of Israel. Jerusalem is also mentioned, but almost as an aside (some commentators think it is an addition). As in Hosea, the widespread presence of idols is categorized as harlotry (1:7). Destruction of all idols constitutes part of the punishment. Because Samaria sought prosperity by such harlotry, the city will be laid waste. In 722/721 B.C. the Assyrian Shalmaneser captured and destroyed Samaria.

Verses 8 and 9 link the preceding announcement of forthcoming judgment on Samaria with the following description of disaster reaching the gate of Jerusalem. The prophet laments an incurable wound inflicted on the people (1:8). The prophet's anguish is punctuated by reference to "my people" (1:9). In the language and mode of mourning ("stripped," "naked," 1:8) the prophet laments the death of his people. In the Hebrew of 1:16 a singular feminine "you," possibly Jerusalem, is enjoined to lament by shaving her head. Her "children" (RSV) or "sons" (JB) are the outlying villages, whose inhabitants have been taken away into exile.

A number of uncertainties in a poorly preserved Hebrew text result in a wide variety of translations. Nonetheless, the basic outline of 1:8-16 is clear. With numerous wordplays involving the names of the towns mentioned, a picture of mounting disaster is painted. The people of Beth-leaphrah in 1:10 are told to roll in the dust (compare the term 'aphrah with the word "dust" in Hebrew, apar). The Hebrew term for "steeds" (RSV) or "horse" (JB) in 1:13 also sounds like the city name "Lachish." Such style is perhaps strange to modern readers, but it effectively guides the hearer to a sense of the total destruction that is the subject of the lamentation.

Many of the places mentioned in Micah 1 cannot be identified conclusively. Those that can lie to the southwest of Jerusalem and protect its approach routes. In 701 B.C. Sennacherib mounted an offensive against Judah from this direction. Sennacherib boasted in his annals of capturing forty-six cities, laying siege to Jerusalem, and taking away a large company of captives. This attack could well provide the historical setting for these verses.

2:1-5, Woe to Greedy Land-grabbers. Woe sayings are used frequently by the prophets to threaten the wicked by announcing imminent disaster (cf. Amos 5:18-20; 6:1-3; Isa. 5:8-24; 10:1-4). The subject here is the covetous oppression of greedy land-grabbers who ignored time-honored stipulations against treacherous dealings with neighbors (Exod. 30:17; 34:24; Lev. 6:1-5; 19:13; Prov. 14:31; 22:16). They plot ways (2:1) to acquire more land (possibly by making loans and then foreclosing). By so doing they attack the foundation of Israel's economy and society, a system based on the right of families to be free landholders obligated to no one.

The wickedness of the greedy will be their own ruin. The Lord will yoke the wicked with an evil they cannot escape (2:3). The land they so desperately desired will be taken from them (probably by conquerors). Professional mourners will sing a taunting, satirical dirge over them (2:4). Their ruin will be irreversible. They will have no one to represent them when land is reallocated after the coming judgment (2:5). The sentence of the wicked matches their crime.

This rather specific accusation seems to have been expanded later to refer to a wider audience. The terms "this breed" (JB) or "this family" (RSV) in 2:3 and "my people" in 2:4 seem to generalize the original charge. Likewise, "an evil time" and "in that day" in the same verses enable the message to be heard repeatedly in varying situations by the community that treasured the prophet's words.

2:6-11, Against False Preaching. Though the Hebrew text is problematic, the essential point is clear. Those who speak soothing lies to the people mislead them concerning the gravity of the situation. While the helpless are being deceived, defrauded, and expelled from their homes (2:8-10), the perpetrators of oppression are being assured by their "preachers" that all is well. Opposition is silenced (2:6). The false preachers wrongly use tradition to assure the people of God's patience (so Micah 2:7; cf. Exod. 34:6; Ps. 103:8; Joel 2:13).

The term sometimes translated as "preach" (RSV) can have a pejorative connotation such as "rant" or "rave." The activity described is usually associated with the speaking of prophets (Amos 7:16; Ezek. 20:46; 21:2). This passage indicates a serious controversy between the speaker and other "preachers" like that encountered earlier by Amos (Amos 3:3-8; 7:14-17) and later by Jeremiah (Jer. 28:5-9).

"This people" (2:11), a term that indicates a degree of separation between prophet and people not reflected in 1:9, wants only to hear words of blessing, promises of plenty (cf. such words in Joel 2:24; Amos 9:13-14). Though they drive widows and orphans from their homes (2:9-10), they applaud false preachers who will not tell the truth (2:11). Both people and preachers are rejected by the prophet.

2:12-13, The Gathering of Jacob. This is an enigmatic passage. Scattered "Jacob," a reference to God's people, is assured that the Lord will gather them. Such a word seems out of place in a context of accusation and announcement of impending judgment. Probably this word was added, at the time of the Babylonian attack on Jerusalem in 587 B.C. or even later. If it is original to the eighth century, it may represent a visionary hope that those taken into exile after the fall of Samaria in 722/721 B.C. will one day return.

3:1-4, Unjust Cannibals. Using the striking and shocking image of cannibalism, the prophet describes those responsible for administering justice as devouring the prophet's people (cf. 1:9). Various terms are chosen to designate these leaders: "princes," "heads," "rulers." In the villages the elders traditionally cared for matters of justice in courts convened at the town's gate. Others appointed by the king may also have had responsibility. Because they loved evil rather than good, the authorities allowed justice to fail (cf. Amos 5:10-15; Isa. 1:17, 21-23; Deut. 1:9-18).

As in preceding oracles, the punishment fits the crime. The rulers refused to hear the cries of their victims; thus, their cries for deliverance to the Lord (3:4)—in hope that they will be heard and delivered (Pss. 22:5; 107:13, 19; 142:5-6)—will be in vain (3:4). The Lord will turn away before their evil deeds (cf. Pss. 13:1; 27:9; 69:17).

3:5-8, Against Profiteering Prophets. Introducing his speech with the messenger formula "thus says the Lord," Micah levels a severe word of judgment against deceiving prophets who speak words of peace and well-being for a price. Such venal prophets will find themselves enshrouded with darkness. They will be confused, shamed, disgraced. Denied God's word, they will cover their lips in mourning (cf. Ezek. 24:17, 22).

In contrast, the speaker claims an endowment by God's spirit that guarantees a successful mission (3:8). Strength to persevere ("power," RSV) in the face of opposition is linked with the courage ("might," RSV) that characterizes brave warriors. The capacity to recognize and act for justice completes the prophet's endowment. The wrongs of the social order are denounced for what they represent: rebellion against the will of God, sin.

3:9-12, The Inescapable Judgment. With almost the same words as in 3:1 the prophet calls the rulers and leaders of Israel to give heed. Zion and Jerusalem, chosen and protected by God, are fouled with blood and wrongdoing. Misdirected zeal to build (3:8), perhaps, has prompted illegal or unjust acquisition of land. The authorities have ignored appeals for justice and their responsibility to uphold it (Exod. 23:1-3, 6-8). Judges, priests, and prophets are all for sale.

A cardinal tenet of the "official" theology of Micah's day was that God had chosen the Davidic king and Jerusalem (→ Covenant) and would maintain and protect both forever (Pss. 46; 48; 132). Thus, leaders trust the theology and say, "Is not the Lord in our midst? Evil will not come upon us" (Micah 3:11).

The prophet, however, has a different view (3:12). Because the leaders have forsaken God's way, Jerusalem and Zion, like Samaria before (cf. 1:6), will be plowed up and become a wooded hill!

4:1-5, God Will Reign in Zion. In striking contrast to the preceding announcement, this well-known promise succinctly expresses a hope for universal peace with justice founded on the benevolent reign of the Lord. A Jerusalem based on bloody wrongdoing has no future (3:9-12). God's intention for a transforming peace will be realized for individuals and nations.

The promise includes four elements. Zion, the mount on which God's house stands, will become preeminent in the latter days (4:1). All nations will come in pilgrimage to this new center to receive divine instruction, torah, and divine adjudication of international disputes (4:2-3). There will be worldwide peace, the dismantling of the machines of war, and the construction of implements of production (4:3). Finally, all people will have the means and the security to pursue life to the fullest (4:4).

But there is no illusion. The nations do not yet act in accordance with this expectation. Nonetheless God's people affirm their intention to live on the basis of their hope in God's promise (4:5).

There is much debate about the historical setting of this famous passage and its almost identical parallel in Isa. 2:2-4. The slight differences between the two suggest that neither is related directly to the other; both are dependent on some other tradition. Perhaps those who collected and transmitted the message of Micah included this promise because it enhanced the theological perspective they proclaimed. God's response to iniquity was judgment, but God's intention thereby was to refashion the people and establish a worldwide dominion marked by peace and justice.

4:6-8, Gathering the Survivors. These verses present two brief promises of restoration in the latter days, a theme introduced in 4:1-5. The first saying, 4:6-7, announces the gathering and return of those driven into exile by the historical disasters that have befallen Israel and Judah. The term frequently translated "lame" is used to describe Jacob in Gen. 32:31. It is used in Micah as a poetic reference to the people of Israel/Judah, to Jacob, wounded by the encounter with God. A remnant (→ Remnant) will be fashioned by God and established in Zion where God will reign. In 4:8, the second brief saying continues the theme of God's restoration of dominion at Zion (cf. 3:9-12; 4:1-5).

4:9-10, You Shall Be Rescued. This oracle of salvation is built on a contrast between present distress and future deliverance. It is the first of three sayings beginning with "now." A series of taunting questions is addressed to a singular "you," the daughter of Zion, a personification of Jerusalem (cf. 4:8, 13). The people face a time of terror. The king has perhaps died or at least lost authority. Jerusalem and her people cry out as a woman in labor (cf. Jer. 4:31; 6:24; 13:21). "Now" the people will be forced from city into open field!

The last lines of the oracle change the message to one of salvation. God will intervene to rescue the daughter of Zion. This rescue is described as "redemption," the legal process of securing the release of someone or something. God's people will be delivered from their enemies. The explicit mention of Babylon in 4:10 suggests that the relevant historical circumstance is the exile of many Judeans after Babylon destroyed Jerusalem in 587 B.C.

4:11-13, You Shall Thresh the Nations. The second "now" oracle uses language associated with threshing grain. Hostile nations, perhaps the neighboring states or some more generalized enemies of a later time, will gather to desecrate Zion (4:11). As part of God's mysterious plans, however, these enemy peoples are actually being gathered like sheaves for threshing (4:12). "Now" many are gathering against the daughter of Zion. But God will work a reversal whereby Zion will thresh those so gathered. The wealth gained as booty will be devoted to God (cf. Josh. 6:17-19; 1 Sam. 15:3). A relatively rare divine title, "Lord of all the earth" (Josh. 3:11, 13; Ps. 97:15; Zech. 4:14; 6:5), further emphasizes the visionary character of the passage.

5:1-4, God's Ruler to Come. The third "now" oracle declares that a ruler will emerge to shepherd God's people in an appropriate manner. Bethlehem, the family home of King David (cf. 2 Sam. 16:1), will be this leader's birthplace. The distress described (5:1) is perhaps related to Sennacherib's attack in 701 B.C., but the specific terminology used ("siege") suggests the Babylonian attack a century later (cf. 2 Kings 24:10; 25:21; Jer. 52:5). Christian tradition claimed this oracle in its exposition of the origins of Jesus (Matt. 2:5-6; John 7:42).

5:5-9, Rule Among Adversaries. In this unit, comprised of three originally independent sayings (5:5-6, 7, 8-9), two primary assertions are made. First, Assyria will never again dominate. Second, God's remnant (cf. 2:12; 4:6-7), God's special work, will be secure among the nations. This will come to pass at some later time when God brings about the reversal of current conditions. As the text now stands, this coming new security is linked with the appearance of the ruler celebrated in the preceding verses. The language and theme of this unit suggest a sixth- or fifth-century setting for its composition.

5:10-15, The Final Purge. The concluding oracle of chaps. 1-5 serves to recall the opening announcement of God's intention to judge Samaria, Jerusalem, and all peoples (1:2-7). An original poem built on the repetition of "I will cut off . . ." has been supplemented with the last two verses. False sources of confidence, whether military (horses and chariots) or religious (soothsayers and idols), will be destroyed. The people and the land will be purged of all that is offensive to God. The nations that will not obey or listen (cf. 1:2) will encounter God's punishment. The concluding verse uses anthropomorphic language to emphasize that God will not permit human disobedience to prevail.

PART TWO: 6:1-7:20

The Reign of the LORD Over His People

6:1-5, God's Controversy. This dramatic passage initiates the carefully arranged sequence that follows. God is portrayed as filing a lawsuit against the people (cf. Isa. 1:18-20; 3:13-15; Hos. 4:1-3, 4-6; Jer. 2:4-13). The witnesses summoned are the mountains, hills, and foundations of the earth rather than the more frequent heavens and earth (Isa. 1:2; Deut. 32:1). God speaks as both plaintiff (6:1-2) and defendant (6:3-5). This kind of address is sometimes called a covenant lawsuit and has as its background a type of international suzerainty treaty that spelled out the terms and consequences of agreements made between an overlord and vassal.<sup>7</sup>

God speaks directly to "my people" and recalls the saving history in which God has repeatedly rescued and led Israel (Deut. 7:8; Josh. 24:5–11; Pss. 78:42–55; 105:26–45). In light of this history God cannot understand the people's faithlessness. God redeemed Israel so that the saving acts of God would be known and recited with praise and honor.

6:6–8, God's Requirements. In response to God's questions in the preceding verses, Micah 6:6–8 provides an acknowledgement of a need for forgiveness and reconciliation. The unidentified speaker represents those who seek instruction on the appropriate sacrifice to offer God (6:6–7). A procedure of requesting priestly clarification of such matters is the background for the passage (cf. 1 Sam. 6:2–4).

A famous summary of God's requirements then follows (6:8). God seeks the doing of justice, which involves the faithful honoring of God-established relationships (cf. Amos 5:15; Isa. 1:12–17; Jer. 7:5–6). Second, God expects the love of "kindness" (RSV), a devotion to loyalty, the practice of steadfast love (cf. Hos. 2:19; 4:1–3; 6:6). The third requirement is proper attention to God, to "walk humbly" (RSV) rather than presumptuously (cf. Prov. 11:2–3; 15:33; 18:12). This verse (6:8) is often quoted as a summation of the prophetic ethical tradition.

6:9–16, God's Intention to Punish. The central point is clear: God announces punishment because of social injustice (6:11; cf. 3:2–3, 9–11). A series of bad things will befall the people and the land (6:13–15; cf. Deut. 28:25–46). The people are accused of adopting the ways of the house of Omri, and more particularly those of Ahab (6:16), who was remembered for moral wrongdoing and encouraging idolatry (1 Kings 16:30–34; 21:1–15). This reference suggests a relatively late period when the tradition of Omri and Ahab had become a well-known symbol for wickedness (cf. 2 Kings 8:27; 21:3). The consequence of that sin will be desolation and scorn (cf. Jer. 19:8; 29:18; Lev. 26:31–33).

7:1–7, A Time of Trial. The time is a wicked time (cf. 6:10–12). As after the gleaning when nothing is left in the field, the speaker feels alone (7:1). All of the righteous ones, the godly, have perished (7:2). The wicked join together to accomplish their goals (7:3). As a result the society breaks down completely; the relationships that make life productive and enjoyable cease (7:2, 5–6). In such a time of trial the faithful wait for deliverance (7:7). Thereby they express their confidence in God (Pss. 38:15; 42:5, 11; 43:5; 130:5–6). In the NT the coming of Jesus is seen as producing a similar crisis (Matt. 10:21, 35–39; Mark 13:12–13; Luke 12:52–53).

7:8–20, God's Forgiveness Will Prevail.

The closing verses of chaps. 6–7 sound liturgical. First there is a song of trust (7:8–10) followed by a promise of restoration (7:11–13). Next is an appeal that the nations be compelled to acknowledge God (7:14–17) with a concluding song of praise, sung by the people, of the Lord's steadfast love and compassion (7:18–20). The individual poems may have been developed separately but their present arrangement seems purposeful. The judgment announced in 6:9–16 will eventually give way to vindication, restoration, and pardon (7:8–20).

In these verses, a number of allusions are somewhat unclear. The enemy remembered in 7:10 is probably Edom, which participated in the destruction of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. (cf. Obad. 10–15; Isa. 34:8–14; Ps. 137:7). In 7:11–12 a dispersed people return, apparently to Jerusalem, where the walls will be rebuilt. This text probably assumes a time in the early fifth century B.C. The text of 7:15 is difficult to understand since it remains unclear to whom the "you," "I," and "him" or "them" refer.

The concluding verses (7:18–20) are much clearer. In the language of a time-honored theological formulation, God's forgiveness is extolled (cf. Exod. 34:6–7; Pss. 86:15; 103:8–10; 145:8; Jon. 4:2; Joel 2:13; Neh. 9:14). The iniquity of God's people brought disaster. The incomparable God of forgiveness, however, will act to bring restoration as a sign of continuing faithfulness to Abraham (7:19–20).

NAHUM

DUANE L. CHRISTENSEN

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Nahum is a poetic text composed for use within an ancient Israelite worship setting. Its subject is the imminent fall of Nineveh, the capital of Assyria from the time of Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.) to its destruction in 612 (→ Nineveh). As an oracle against a foreign nation, its original performance was probably motivated by political aims.

No book in the Bible has been maligned as much as this one. It is frequently described as a vengeful, nationalistic expression of glee over the destruction of a bitter enemy that some would want to remove from the canon of sacred Scripture altogether. Nahum has been described as ethically and theologically deficient, even the work of a false prophet. As a result, the book has been virtually ignored in both the modern church and synagogue.

Much of this fate is, however, not deserved. Nahum is primarily a book about God's justice, not about human vengeance, hatred, and military conquest. It is best read as a complement to the book of Jonah. Whereas Nahum focuses on the "dark side" of God, Jonah portrays God's mercy and compassion toward the same wicked city. Both aspects are essential for an understanding of the divine nature. It should be noted that, though the positive side of God is muted in Nahum, it is by no means absent (see 1:3, 7).

No interpreter has understood the essential message of Nahum more clearly than Martin Luther when he wrote: "The book teaches us to trust God and to believe, especially when we despair of all human help, human powers, and counsel, that the Lord stands by those who are His, shields His own against all attacks of the enemy, be they ever so powerful" (Maier, p. 86).

A careful analysis of the poetry reveals an elegant literary structure: the book consists of two equal halves framing 2:10. Identically structured units appear in 1:4–6; 2:3–5; and 2:11–13d. The best way to explain the remarkable structural symmetry of the book is to posit musical influence. The Hebrew text of Nahum bears the mark of original musical composition and performance within an ancient Israelite liturgical setting. Hence, the hand that shaped this sophisticated work of literary art is that of an author/composer.

An opening hymn (1:1–10) sets the tone for what follows: a display of awesome power when Yahweh appears as the Divine Warrior. Nahum has taken the first half of an acrostic poem already in existence and adapted it to new ends. The resulting acrostic pattern forms a sentence that, together with the central verse of the book (2:10), summarizes his message: all will be utter desolation and ruin when Yahweh appears in judgment. Most of the book consists of a lengthy taunt song in four parts that is directed against the wicked city of Nineveh (1:15–3:19).

COMMENTARY

1:1–10

Acrostic Hymn of Theophany: Yahweh's Vindicating Wrath

In Nahum 1, an acrostic hymn based on at least the first half of the Hebrew alphabet has apparently been adapted to a new purpose, perhaps to form a cipher (code) from the sequence of letters and/or other opening elements (see van der Woude). This cipher contains a summary of the meaning of the book:

I am the exalted Yahweh and (I am) in the presence of sin;
In a flood (I am) bringing a full end completely.

Verse 1 contains a double title: the book of Nahum is both an "oracle" and a "book of (the) vision," the latter lending some support to the notion of a scribal cipher in vv. 2–10.

Verse 2 describes the wrath of Yahweh in terms reminiscent of ancient Canaanite poetic patterns. God is presented as "jealous" and "avenging"—terms subject to distortion in English translation. In particular, the attribution of "vengeance" to the character of Yahweh has been the source of misunderstanding. As G. E. Mendenhall has shown, the Hebrew root nm is properly translated by terms that designate punitive vindication in a judicial sense and should not be construed as involving "malicious retaliation for inflicted wrongs." As a result, Yahweh is here depicted as a suzerain (→ Covenant), one who demands the exclusive devotion of his vassals; for he is utterly intolerant of rivals.

Verse 2 is set over against vv. 9–10, both of which focus on “the dark side” of Yahweh, namely, his jealous anger that leads to punishment. Verse 3 and vv. 7–8 present the other side of Yahweh, one who is “slow to anger” (cf. Exod. 34:6–7). Nah. 1:4–6 functions as a “refrain,” which may be compared with similar refrains in 2:3–5 and 2:11–13d. These verses focus on the reaction of the cosmos to the appearance of the Divine Warrior and include a number of allusions to Canaanite mythology. For example, the description of Yahweh in 1:2 contains the Hebrew names for both the Canaanite gods El and Baal. Moreover, the terms “sea” and “rivers” in 1:4 also allude to deities of the same names in Canaanite lore.

The difficulties many have found in translating 1:9–10 are lessened by dividing the poetry as the following translation does:

What will you devise / against Yahweh? / a full end / He Himself will make /
It will not arise a second time /
(namely) distress /
For / (you will be) like entangled thorns /
And (though you are) like soddened / drunkards / Consumed (you will be) / like dry stubble / completely /

This unit is set off from what precedes it by the abrupt use of a plural opening verb (“devise”) and the use of the term “completely,” both as its final word and as a term constructed from the initial letter of each poetic line in the continuation of the acrostic poem. The image of a mass of sopping wet, matted thorns burning like dry stubble is striking. The fire of Yahweh knows no limitation, as the prophet Elijah demonstrated so vividly on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18).

1:11–14

Transitional Oracles: The Defeat of Belial

Verses 11 and 14 are addressed to Nineveh on the one hand (feminine singular) and the king of Assyria on the other (masculine singular) and function as a frame surrounding an oracle introduced by the formula “Thus says Yahweh” (1:12–13). The prophetic announcement that “Belial has come forth from you” (1:11) is balanced by a word of judgment announcing the king’s coming oblivion (1:14). The oracle in 1:12–13 is directed to Judah (feminine singular) announcing that when the Assyrians are cut off, Yahweh will set Judah free. Belial here, and in 1:15 below, is the personified leader of the enemy forces (→ Belial). Taken literally, the name may mean something like “no value,” “worthlessness,” “confusion,” or “chaos.”

1:15–3:19

Taunt Song Against Nineveh

The rest of the book consists of an extended taunt song arranged in four parts, the first two of which are separated by a transitional summation of the book as a whole (2:10) and a short dirge (2:11–13), which contains within it an oracle against Nineveh introduced by the formula “utterance of Yahweh.”

1:15–2:9, Taunt Song Against Nineveh:

Part One. Verse 15 contains familiar words (cf. Isa. 52:7) addressed to Judah, urging her to resume normal behavior because Belial has been cut off. Nah. 2:1–2 declare to Nineveh that “a shatterer has come up against you”; for Yahweh is restoring “the majesty of Jacob.” These verses are set over against a visionary description in which the citadel of Nineveh is stormed (2:6–8a). Between these two units stands a refrain (2:3–5) in which the “actual” assault on Nineveh is described graphically. This first section of the taunt song concludes with a lament portraying the plundering of the city (2:8b–9).

2:10, Summation: All Is Utter Desolation and Ruin.

Nah. 2:10 is the structural center of the book. The assonance of the opening three Hebrew words is striking and yet difficult to capture in translation: perhaps “desolation and dissipation and dilapidation.” The final two Hebrew words of this verse (cf. Joel 2:6) are a conundrum for virtually all translators and interpreters. The translation of K. J. Cathcart, “and the faces of all gather paleness,” may well be correct.

2:11–13d, Transitional Dirge: The Lion’s Den.

The image of the lion is rich, both in the Bible and in Assyrian culture. The refrain parallels that in 1:4–6, where the mighty Yahweh appeared in all his wrath. The “lion of Judah” is a familiar poetic image of Yahweh (cf. Amos 3:8); but lions are also a dominant motif within Assyrian art. Here the den of the mighty Assyrian lion, who has taken so much prey, is destroyed. The unit concludes with a prophetic oracle, introduced by the familiar “utterance of Yahweh,” that makes explicit the divine source of this destruction (2:13).

2:13e–3:7, Taunt Song Against Nineveh:

Part Two. The final clause of 2:13, “And the voices of your messengers will be heard no more,” introduces the funeral lament over the “bloody city” in 3:1. This lament is balanced structurally by a dirge in 3:7 that poses the rhetorical question, “Who will mourn Nineveh's ruin?" These bracketing verses enclose another graphic vision of bloody carnage (3:2-3; cf. 2:3-5), one set over against a prophetic oracle of judgment (3:5-6) that is introduced by the familiar "utterance of Yahweh of hosts." The imagery is repulsive: Yahweh will expose Nineveh's nakedness and pelt her with filth. At the center of this unit stands the reason for such vile judgment: Nineveh's gross harlotry (3:4).

3:8-13, Taunt Song Against Nineveh:

Part Three. An opening lament (3:8) poses the rhetorical question, "Are you better than Thebes?" The destruction of Thebes at the hands of Ashurbanipal marked the zenith of Assyrian expansion and, apparently, the high point of Assyrian brutality as well. The prophetic judgment of 3:9-12 makes it clear that Assyria will experience the same fate it meted out to Thebes. This section concludes in 3:13 with an oracle of judgment in which destruction is announced using language reminiscent of ancient Near Eastern treaty curses.

3:14-19, Taunt Song Against Nineveh:

Part Four. The book of Nahum ends with a remarkable funeral lament. Using bitter irony, the author urges the people to prepare for a siege by strengthening their fortifications (3:14-15). But all is in vain, as the vision of 3:16-18a makes clear. Like locusts, the leaders of Nineveh take flight, leaving the hapless king to his fate. His wound is fatal, and all who hear the report clap their hands (3:19b). The dirge concludes with a rhetorical question: "For upon whom has not come your evil unceasingly?" The only other book in the Hebrew Bible to end with a question is that of Jonah, which, curiously, also has Nineveh as its subject.

HABAKKUK

MARVIN A. SWEENEY

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Habakkuk provides little direct historical or personal information about the prophet to whom it is attributed. He is identified twice simply as "Habakkuk the Prophet" (Hab. 1:1; 3:1), with no indication of the time in which he lived. Consequently, later nonbiblical traditions place Habakkuk in a number of historical contexts. In its title, the apocryphal Bel and the Dragon (second century B.C.) claims to be "from the Prophecy of Habakkuk, son of Jeshua of the Tribe of Levi" and identifies the prophet as a contemporary of Daniel, living during the Babylonian exile. The pseudepigraphical Lives of the Prophets (first century A.D.) follows this dating, although it identifies Habakkuk as a member of the tribe of Simeon. The midrashic work Seder 'Olam Rabbah (second-third century A.D.) claims that Habakkuk lived during the reign of King Manasseh (697–642 B.C.), whereas the Jewish mystical work Sefer ha-Zohar (ca. A.D. 1280) identifies Habakkuk as the son of the Shunamite woman whom the prophet Elisha (ninth century B.C.) restored to life (2 Kings 4:8–37).

Most modern scholars agree that reference to the rise of the Chaldeans (Hab. 1:6) and the general descriptions of distress in the land of Judah (chaps. 1–2) indicate that Habakkuk spoke during the reign of King Jehoiakim (609–598 B.C.) or perhaps during the brief reign of his son Jehoiachin (597 B.C.). Judah became a vassal state of the Chaldean or Neo-Babylonian Empire following Nebuchadnezzar's defeat of the Egyptian army at Carchemish and Hamath in 605 B.C. (→ Chaldea; Nebuchadnezzar). Jehoiakim was a loyal subject of Babylon for three years, imposing heavy taxation on the population of Judah and repressing dissent to meet the demands of the Babylonian monarch. After Jehoiakim revolted in 602 B.C., Nebuchadnezzar sent bands of raiders to harass Judah until he could mount a full-scale invasion of the land. Jehoiakim probably died during the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem in 598 B.C. Following the capitulation of the city, Nebuchadnezzar deported the new king, Jehoiachin, and leading members of Judean society to Babylon (→ Babylon). Many scholars believe that Habakkuk, a contemporary of Jeremiah, was a prophet active at the Temple of Jerusalem during these years (see Jeremiah).

The book of Habakkuk is designed to address the theological issue of theodicy, which involves justifying the righteousness of God in circumstances of great evil. The superscription in Hab. 1:1 identifies the first major section of the book (chaps. 1–2) as a "pronouncement." The word "pronouncement," frequently translated as "burden," refers to a specific type of prophetic oracle, one based on a vision or other revelatory experience that attempts to explain the manner in which God's purpose will be manifested in human affairs. It is generally spoken by a prophet in response to an inquiry or complaint concerning a particular situation. Here the pronouncement is presented in the form of a dialogue between Habakkuk and God. In the first exchange, the prophet complains that the land is in turmoil (1:2–4), but God responds that the turmoil is caused by a divine plan to establish Chaldean dominance in the world (1:5–11). Habakkuk then complains about the treachery of the Chaldeans, who have overstepped their bounds and do not acknowledge God as the source of their power (1:12–17). God's response, reported in Hab. 2:1–20, includes a vision that states the basic principle that, unlike those who are arrogant, those who are righteous will live by their steadfast faith. The lengthy elaboration of this principle in vv. 5–20 employs five "woe" oracles to predict that the Chaldeans will eventually fall victim to their excessive greed.

The second major section of the book, identified by its superscription as the "prayer" of Habakkuk (3:1), follows in Hab. 3:1–19. Many scholars have argued that this "prayer" was not an original part of the book, because it appears to be a liturgical psalm, distinct from chaps. 1–2. In the present form of the book, however, the psalm functions as the prophet's reaction to the "pronouncement" of chaps. 1–2. The psalmist petitions God to defeat an invading enemy. Using theophanic imagery, the psalmist acknowledges God's role as Master of the Universe and waits faithfully for the manifestation of God's power (→ Theophany), which will eventuate in the downfall of the Chaldeans. Consequently, the book of Habakkuk affirms the righteousness of God and anticipates the realization of the divine plan.

Habakkuk has played an important role in both Judaism and Christianity. The authors of the Dead Sea Scrolls produced a commentary on the first two chapters of the book in the first century B.C. The apostle Paul used Hab. 2:4 as a major textual basis for formulating the doctrine of “justification by faith” (Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11; cf. Heb. 10:38–39). Likewise, the talmudic Rabbi Simlai identified this verse as a summary of all the 613 commandments of the Torah (b. Mak. 23b–24a). In Jewish tradition, Habakkuk 3 is understood as a description of the revelation at Sinai; it is read as the prophetic portion for the second day of the festival of Shavuot (Pentecost), which commemorates the giving of the Torah at Sinai (b. Meg. 31a).

COMMENTARY

1:1–2:20

The Pronouncement of Habakkuk

Habakkuk's pronouncement represents his attempt to explain the significance of the rise of the Neo-Babylonian Empire and its domination of Judah. Although he views the Babylonians as wicked oppressors of the righteous, Habakkuk maintains that the rise of Babylon is an act of God, the true master of the world. However, greed and the failure to recognize God as the source of its power have caused Babylon to over-extend its grasp in an attempt to master the entire earth. The oppressed nations will then overthrow Babylon and God's righteousness will triumph.

Habakkuk's pronouncement is presented in the form of a dialogue between the prophet and God. The prophet's understanding of Babylon's rise develops as God responds to each of Habakkuk's complaints.

1:1, The Superscription. This verse is a title for the pronouncement that follows. Not only does it identify the type of prophetic oracle employed here, it also designates Habakkuk as a “prophet.” Because of this title many scholars think that Habakkuk was a professional Temple prophet.

1:2–4, Habakkuk's First Complaint. Habakkuk uses typical complaint language (cf. Job 19:1–7; Ps. 18:6, 41) to protest to God concerning the breakdown of order in the land caused by an unnamed wicked party. The identity of this “wicked” party has prompted much discussion. Some maintain that it is none other than Jehoiakim and his officials, because the prophet's description of the land's turmoil includes terminology used elsewhere to indicate Judahite abuses of social justice (Amos 3:10; Isa. 10:1; Ps. 12:6; Prov. 16:28–29). Certainly, Jehoiakim was no stranger to the abuses of social justice, as Jeremiah's condemnation of this king demonstrates (Jer. 22:1–8, 13–19). Nevertheless, the “wicked” party should be identified as the Babylonians. In Hab. 1:4, the description of the righteous “surrounded” by the wicked employs a verb that also means “besieged,” suggesting Babylon's military actions (cf. 1:10). In such circumstances, Babylonian justice (1:7) would undermine Judean law (1:4). Furthermore, Habakkuk 1:13 identifies the Babylonians as “wicked,” and the “violence” of Babylon (1:9; cf. 1:8; 2:17) corresponds to Habakkuk's complaint in v. 2.

1:5–11, God's First Response. The divine response to Habakkuk's complaint states that the Chaldean's emergence depends on God's intentional activity. God identifies no specific purpose for this act, although Habakkuk's comment in v. 12 suggests that it was as judgment. After describing the might of its army, however, God defines the basic problem with Babylon, “Then they sweep through like wind, pass by, and incur guilt; their own might has become their god” (v.11). The Babylonians do not recognize that God has given them their victories.

1:12–17, Habakkuk's Second Complaint. Dissatisfied with God's response, Habakkuk renews his complaint. He begins by referring to God as creator and master of the universe. (The statement “We shall not die” is an ancient scribal emendation of the text, which originally read, “You shall not die.”) Habakkuk challenges God directly in v. 13 by asking how he can tolerate the evil of Babylon's treachery against the righteous. In v. 14, he then proceeds to charge that God is directly responsible for the triumph of evil over righteousness. Using the imagery of a fisherman to describe Babylon's greed and idolatry, the prophet then asks God how long this evil will continue.

2:1–20, Habakkuk's Report of God's Second Response. Habakkuk stands watch (cf. Ezek. 3:16–21; 33:1–9) to wait for God's response to his “complaint.” It begins with instructions to write down the vision that is to follow, a procedure that is known for both visions (Isa. 29:11–12) and pronouncements (Isa. 30:6–7, 8), and to wait for the time of its fulfillment. The basic principle of the vision is stated in Hab. 2:4, “Behold, his soul within him is arrogant [lit., “puffed up”], it is not upright, but the righteous shall live due to his steadfast faith.” The Hebrew term translated as “steadfast faith” expresses reliability, confidence, continuity, and trust (→ Faith). Here, it refers to the confidence of the righteous in God's reliability and indicates that the righteous will continue to trust in God despite adversity. This text contrasts Babylon, puffed up by its own arrogance, with the righteous people whom it is oppressing and implies that whereas the righteous will live, Babylon will not.

Verses 5–20 elaborate the meaning of 2:1–4. Babylon is compared to a boisterous drunk who is initially inflamed by wine but who quickly fades under its influence as he drinks more and more. The insatiable greed of the drunk is illustrated by a mythological reference to Sheol or Death personified, whose appetite is never satisfied. A taunt by the nations who will rise up against Babylon then illustrates the coming downfall of the wicked empire. The taunt includes five woe oracles accusing Babylon of various crimes that will bring punishment. These include plundering (vv. 6b–8), extortion (vv. 9–11), bloodshed (vv. 12–14), degradation of people and lands (vv. 15–17), and idolatry (vv. 18–19). The statement concerning idolatry summarizes the reason that the other crimes take place and reiterates the basic problem concerning Babylon, its failure to recognize God (cf. 1:11, 16; 2:4, 13a). The section concludes with a demand for silence before the Lord (v. 20), which frequently precedes the manifestation of God's power (cf. Zeph. 1:7; Zech. 2:13; Ps. 46:10).

The Prayer of Habakkuk

The prayer petitions God to manifest divine power in the world so as to deliver the land from invaders (v. 16). The introductory and closing sections of this petition (vv. 2, 16–19a) bracket two sections that depict a theophany (vv. 3–6, 7–15). A theophany, a description of God's manifestation in the world, generally includes two elements, a description of his approach and descriptions of accompanying natural upheavals (cf. Deut. 33:2; Judg. 5:4–5; Mic. 1:3–4; Ps. 68:8–9). These theophanic sections express the psalmist's confidence that God will indeed intervene to defeat the invaders. In this respect, the psalmist demonstrates the steadfast faith of the righteous mentioned in Hab. 2:4.

The technical musical terms that appear in the prayer (vv. 1, 3, 9, 13, 19) suggest that it may have been employed as a liturgical psalm in the Temple at Jerusalem.

3:1, The Superscription. The psalm is named a prayer, the title given to a number of psalms that probably functioned as part of the Temple liturgy (cf. Pss. 17:1; 86:1; 90:1; 102:1; 142:1). The term "Shigionoth" is related to an Akkadian term that means "song of lament" and appears in the title of Psalm 7, a lament psalm. In its present context, the term may refer to the prophet's complaints in chaps. 1–2, indicating that the psalm is Habakkuk's reaction to God's response.

3:2, Introduction. The psalmist asks God to manifest the divine "work" in the world (cf. 1:5). Within the context of this book, such "work" would refer to the vision of Babylon's downfall (2:4–19).

3:3–6, Description of God's Approach. Here, the psalmist reports God's appearance in the world. He advances from Teman (Edom) and Paran, names that are used to refer to the region of Mount Sinai (cf. Deut. 33:2; Judg. 5:4–5).

3:7–15, Description of God's Victory. Drawing on ancient mythological traditions, the psalmist praises God for past victories. He refers to the defeat of the Midianites during the Exodus period (Num. 25; 31) and to God's defeat of the sea, the symbol of cosmic chaos, at the time of creation (cf. Ps. 104; Job 38–39). In this respect, the psalmist extols God as the master of both the natural world and the realm of human events.

3:16–19a, Conclusion. The psalmist, overwhelmed by God's majesty, expresses confidence that God will answer the petition despite the present adverse conditions. The imagery of "hinds' feet" indicates the psalmist's sense of security and trust in God (cf. Ps. 18:33).

3:19b, Instructions to the Choirmaster. This psalm is to be accompanied by stringed instruments (cf. Pss. 4:1; 6:1; 54:1; 55:1; 61:1; 67:1; 76:1; Isa. 38:20).

ELIZABETH ACHTEMEIER

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Zephaniah, one of the twelve Minor Prophets, is made up of nine brief prophetic oracles. They are, as a collection, introduced by a superscription (1:1) and concluded by an appendix (3:18–20). Chaps. 1 and 2 probably date from shortly after 640 B.C., while chap. 3, vv. 1–17 come from the years 612–609. The present form of the book is a unity; each oracle is linked, whether linguistically or thematically, with the one that has gone before it.

The prophet Zephaniah was active during the reign of King Josiah in Judah (1:1; 639–609 B.C.), one of the periods when Judah enjoyed independence from foreign domination. The Assyrian Empire was tottering and finally fell with the loss of its capital city to the Babylonians in 612 B.C. The Egyptian Empire did not subject Judah to its yoke until 609 B.C., when Josiah was killed in the battle of Megiddo. Thus Zephaniah's ministry occurred in a period of political renewal and territorial expansion (→ Judah, Kingdom of).

But Judah also needed a religious renewal. Assyrian domination of the kingdom during the reigns of Josiah's predecessors Manasseh (698–642 B.C.) and Amon (642–640 B.C.) had brought with it foreign customs and pagan deities. Canaanite Baal worship flourished, with its abominable practices of sacred prostitution and child sacrifice, and those prophets who objected were persecuted or killed. Josiah therefore instituted a widespread religious reform based on the book of Deuteronomy in which all worship was centralized in Jerusalem and pagan cults and priests were removed. Deuteronomy became the law of the land, and the covenant with the Lord was renewed (→ Covenant). The first two chapters of Zephaniah reflect the corruption in Judah before this reform. The last chapter reflects the reform's failure.

COMMENTARY

1:1, Superscription. We know nothing of Zephaniah other than what his book tells us. He is the one prophet for whom four generations of forebears are listed. However, the Gedaliah listed is not the governor of 1 Kings 25:22, and the Hezekiah named is probably not the king who reigned over Judah in the eighth century B.C. Zephaniah was a contemporary of Jeremiah's and, like that prophet, may have been a member of the party that championed the Deuteronomic reform of 622/21 (→ Deuteronomy).

1:2–6, The Announcement of Judgment. The book opens with a radical announcement that God's wrath will destroy the whole of creation because of the wickedness of human beings. Nothing will be left; all will be obliterated.

The judgment, however, centers on Judah. Because of its idolatry (vv. 4–5; → Baal; Milcom), syncretism (v. 5), and backsliding (v. 6), God will destroy not only Judah, but everyone. The covenant relationship between God and the people never precludes God's judgment of their sin.

1:7–13, The Indictment Against Judah. Judah's sins are enumerated. Assyrian dress and customs have corrupted the court (v. 8), violence and fraud permeate society, and pagan gods such as those that were thought to guard the thresholds of houses are worshiped (v. 9). But the primary indictment occurs in v. 12. The Judeans are compared to wine, left to thicken and spoil upon its "lees" or sediment. They do nothing to return to God, because they believe that God does nothing—either good or bad. In short, they have invented a world from which they think God's rule and action are totally absent.

Consequently, God, the Lord of nature and history and of the covenant, declares war against his people. He prepares the sacrifice, which preceded wars in the OT, and consecrates his warriors (v. 7). The coming battle is then described. Appropriately, it will begin in the commercial section of a Jerusalem that has become thoroughly secularized (vv. 10–11), but then it will spread to every part of the land (v. 13), with God searching out his apostate people to destroy them.

1:14–18, The Day of the Lord. The day of God's warfare against earth is called the "Day of the Lord," and this passage, made famous in the Roman Catholic mass and in poetry and music as the dies irae (Lat., "day of wrath"), describes the nature of that day. It opens with the war cry of God, the "mighty man" (v. 14), and brings total devastation. Nothing can turn it aside, neither fortification (v. 16) nor bribe (v. 18). In fulfillment of the covenant curse of Deut. 28:29, the Judeans will grope like the blind as they meet the fire of God's wrath that consumes the whole earth (vv. 17-18).

The Day of the Lord

The concept of the Day of the Lord has its roots in Israel's tribal league (1220-1000 B.C.), when it was believed that God, the Divine Warrior, fought for Israel against its enemies. On that Day, the Israelites expected God to defeat all their enemies and to exalt Israel. The prophets upset this popular idea by declaring that the imminent Day would bring God's judgment on the wicked in Israel as well, leaving only a faithful remnant (see Amos 5:18-20; Isa. 2:6-22; Ezek. 7:5-27; Joel 1:15; 2:1-11; Mal. 4:5). Thus the Day would be for Israel too a day of battle, wrath, darkness, and destruction.

2:1-4, The Call to Repentance. There is only one way Judah may be spared on the Day of the Lord, namely, by repentance. The prophet therefore calls the people to an assembly for a nationwide day of fasting and penitence. The urgency of his call is marked by the threefold "before" in v. 2. If the people will renounce their proud attempt to be their own gods and seek the Lord in humility and obedience and in that trust which is righteousness before God, they may escape the judgment (v. 3). As an illustration of the coming judgment, the destruction of the four remaining cities of the Philistine confederacy is portrayed.

2:5-15, Universal Judgment Pictured. The thought of v. 4 continues with a portrayal of the destruction of the known world, symbolized by Philistia to the west (vv. 5-7), Moab and Ammon to the east (vv. 8-11), Ethiopia inclusive of Egypt to the south (v. 12), and Assyria to the north (vv. 13-15). Judgment comes on the other nations because of their pride: pride of wealth, alluded to by the mention of greedy Canaanite traders (v. 5) and of fine cedar work (v. 14); pride of power (vv. 8, 10); and pride of self-security (v. 15). These nations and their gods will, however, finally bow before the sovereignty of God (cf. v. 11).

There will be left a remnant of Judah, however, which will then possess the territory of these former enemies (vv. 7, 9). The conditional note of 2:3 has now become a promise that there will be those who escape the judgment.

3:1-8, Woe to the Unrepentant. It has become evident, however, that most of the people in Judah will not return to their God. Zephaniah therefore pronounces a woe oracle over them, i.e., a lament for the dead.

God has tried in vain to correct his errant people. He has sent them prophets (v. 2) and illustrated his wrath by destroying nations around Judah (v. 6). Daily he has shown his covenant faithfulness by sustaining the round of nature (v. 5). God had expected Judah to perceive his ways and respond in covenant faithfulness (v. 7), but Judah had not. Its rebellion is summed up in the oppression wrought by its officials and judges (v. 3) and by the priests' and prophets' corruption of their offices (v. 4). Judah continues unashamedly in its ways (v. 5).

Yahweh's response is "therefore wait for me" (v. 8), a phrase that means "wait for my action" (cf. Isa. 40:31). The Lord will assemble all nations, including Judah, to court for trial and he will testify against them. The sentence will be death for all who have rebelled against his rule (v. 8; cf. Ezek. 20:33).

3:9-13, The New People of God. Judgment, however, is not God's final word, and so beyond his destroying work lies his work of salvation. There is a faithful remnant that has spread out into the world (see 2:7, 9). From that remnant God will make a new humanity—a new faithful people who will serve him, who will call on his name in truth (cf. 1:5; Gen. 11:1-9), and who will come to Jerusalem to worship him (vv. 9-10).

This new people will no longer make for themselves gods, no longer try to construct for themselves a world without God. Rather, in the humility appropriate to creatures before their Creator, they will depend solely on God for their lives and security, reflecting his moral character and faithfully fulfilling their covenants with their Lord and with one another. The result will be that good and peaceful life that God intended for creation in the beginning (cf. Gen. 1:31).

3:14-17, The Joy of the New Creation. The final picture presented by Zephaniah is one of unbounded joy, of the new people of God—personified by Zion—singing and shouting aloud, holding carnival, because God has removed his judgments against them and secured their lives against all enemies and evil (vv. 14-15). If God is for them, nothing and no one can be against them.

God is for them indeed. No longer does he take up his war cry against them (cf. 1:14). Rather, v. 17 reads, "he will hold his peace in his love" (cf. RSV margin). Now there is peace between earth and heaven.

Moreover, not only Israel rejoices, but God too is pictured in celebration. He has taken up his eternal dwelling place in the midst of his people (v. 15; cf. Ezek. 37:26–27). The God who created the earth and who has the power to destroy it, the God who sustains all the processes of nature and rules over every nation, the Mighty Warrior against whom nothing and no one can stand—in short, the God presented throughout the oracles of Zephaniah—that God nevertheless has great joy, and indeed exults, when he can live in covenant with faithful human beings. Such is the final message of the book of Zephaniah. Zephaniah's portrayal of such a joyful fellowship was a picture for the future presented to seventh-century-B.C. Judah; it is consonant with similar pictures in both the OT and the NT.

3:18–20, A Later Appendix. In the Hebrew text, v. 18 does not properly connect with v. 17 and is largely unintelligible. Moreover, vv. 19–20 seem to echo passages in Isaiah 56–66. These three verses are probably an expansion, added to Zephaniah by the Deuteronomistic editors in the sixth century B.C., to make the book's message applicable to their exilic time. Verses 19–20 promise that exiled Israel will be returned to its homeland and that its fortunes will be restored before the eyes of all the world. Zephaniah's own thought that only a remnant will survive may be implied here, but these verses lack the explicit eschatological emphases found in 3:11–13, 14–17.

HAGGAI

PETER R. ACKROYD

INTRODUCTION

Haggai is known only from the book that bears his name, and from his appearance, with Zechariah, in one narrative in Ezra (5:1; 6:14). The name in Hebrew means "festal" or "of a festival," perhaps marking his birth on such a day, but we have no genealogy and no information other than what may be deduced from the Book of Haggai and the narrative. He is described as a prophet (1:1; Ezra 5:1), and his function as messenger of God is stressed in Hag. 1:13 ("messenger of Yahweh with the message of Yahweh" or "in the divine commission"). The background to his activity is indicated by the dates, all in the second year of Darius I of Persia (522–486 B.C.; → Darius), and by the names of the leaders Zerubbabel (→ Zerubbabel) and Joshua (Jeshua), the high priest (→ Jeshua). While Darius established his rule, there was a period of political upheaval. The book itself gives indications of natural disasters and of economic difficulties. Conditions for the small Judean community cannot have been easy in these years.

The structure of the book shows close links with Zechariah 1–8: the dates (Hag. 1:1, [15a]; 1:15b–2:1; 2:10, [18], 20) are similar to those in Zechariah. The chronological references (except those bracketed in the foregoing list) provide a framework to the oracles and the two small narratives in 1:12–14 and 2:11–14. In their style, these dates resemble elements in the Priestly work and in Chronicles, which suggests that in their present form they may be of later, editorial, origin. The links between the two prophetic collections suggest that this part of the "book of the twelve prophets" (see Introduction to the Prophetic Books) was shaped by one particular group in the postexilic period.

The careful structuring of the material suggests a deliberate presentation of the prophet and his part in the reestablishment of Temple and community during the early Persian period: in this, the book may be set alongside the various narratives in Ezra 1–6, to which it provides a counterpart. Though the prophetic oracles in the book reveal various facets of the prophet's activity, their presentation within an archival structure may be designed to interpret their significance rather than merely to record them. The present form of the book reflects on and expounds a prophet involved in events of lasting importance for the Jewish community, presented here as the "remnant" (→ Remnant).

The text of Haggai is for the most part clear (the fragment of date in 1:15a may be misplaced; the reference in 2:18 is incomplete). It is often supposed that the oracles are in prose, but this does not do full justice to their strongly rhythmic quality (esp. 1:4–11; 2:3–9, 14, 21–23). The oracular style of earlier prophecy is here blended with more didactic and homiletic elements (see also Malachi), marked by repetition (note the repeated "reflect upon your way of life" or "your condition" in Hag. 1:5, 7; cf. 2:15, 18).

The limited amount of material and the difficulties of interpretation suggest that we cannot give a full picture of Haggai's message. Nor should it be assumed that Haggai and Zechariah, now so closely linked and appearing to act in unison, according to Ezra 5–6, held the same views about the nature and hopes of the community. Haggai provides one line of approach to the delicate problems of political subjection; his message is full of confidence that his people, self-centered and reluctant though they may be, respond to the prophetic summons and face a future of hope and blessing. The relation between the Temple, symbol of the divine presence, and the well-being of the people is a theme of great importance in the postexilic period for the right understanding of how the community rethought its position after the disasters of conquest and disruption.

COMMENTARY

1:1–11, Restore the Temple! These verses clearly form a unit, perhaps built up from two or three smaller sections. The date (1:1) introduces a pronouncement on the people's reluctance to restore the Temple (1:2); 1:3 introduces a further prophetic word (1:4–6). But the two sections are linked in that the quotation of the people's comment in the former is answered by the questions and challenges of the latter. Failure to restore the Temple is connected with distressing economic conditions—poor harvests and inflation. A new element in vv. 7–11 provides an elaboration of the aforementioned theme: the promise of the divine presence is set over against the people's preoccupation with their own affairs and is set in contrast with a drought seen as divine judgment.

1:12-15a, The Response. Those addressed—Davidic heir and governor Zerubbabel, high priest Joshua, and the people—acknowledge the prophet's authority, their spirits divinely stirred (for the use of this expression with reference to Cyrus, see Ezra 1:1).

1:15b-2:9, The Glory of the Temple. After a new date formula, the prophet opens with an exhortation to courage, followed by an assurance of God's presence. Doubts about the temple now being restored, poor by contrast with memories of its former state (2:3-5), are answered by the promise of a divine intervention in the affairs of the world, to glorify the Temple and to make it both a center for the tribute of all nations and a pledge for the well-being of the Judean community.

2:10-19, Purity and Prosperity. There are two elements: vv. 10-14 and vv. 15-19. An inquiry regarding the nature of holiness and uncleanness (vv. 11-13) introduces a judgment on the unfitness of the people (v. 14). This unit resumes the theme of failure to restore the Temple: the people's present state is unacceptable before God. But the second element (vv. 15-19) shows that a restored Temple, glorified by his presence, assures well-being for the future. These verses contrast the past with the future and represent a further development of themes used in the opening section of the book.

2:20-23, Davidic Promise. A specific word to Zerubbabel offers him executive power from God, like the signet ring that represents royal authority (cf. 1 Kings 21:8). Both in these verses and in Hag. 2:6-7, we may see evidence of a hope for the overthrow of alien rule and a restoration of independence for Judah under a Davidic ruler, but it is possible that the conventional pictures of theophany point to divine intervention rather than political upheaval. The Persian period reveals various ways in which the Jewish community thought about its life as a subject people and about its hopes for the future.

ZECHARIAH

DAVID L. PETERSEN

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Zechariah has two parts. The first is 1–8, visions and oracles for the most part attributable to Zechariah, son of Berechiah, who was active as a prophet from 520 to 518 B.C. The second is 9–14, sometimes called Deutero-Zechariah, anonymous oracles that, though difficult to date, derive from a period later than that of the first section, most probably the fifth–fourth centuries B.C. Within these two units there is significant diversity. In 1–8, there are eight vision reports interspersed with speeches, and then in 9–14, two “oracles,” as indicated by the superscriptions at the beginning of chaps. 9 and 12. Hence, for the final editor of Zechariah 9–14, this section appears to be made up of two primary units: chaps. 9–11 and 12–14.

Although the historical setting for the second part of the book is virtually impossible to determine, the setting for the first part is rather clear. By the mid-sixth century B.C. the Persian Empire had replaced the neo-Babylonians as the controlling power not only of Mesopotamia, but of Syro-Palestine as well (→ Babylon). Judah, which had earlier been a subdivision of the Babylonian Empire, was now a subprovincial district in the Persian Empire. Those who had been deported as captives in 595 and 587 B.C. by the Babylonians had become Persian prisoners (→ Exile).

With the advent of this new empire led by Cyrus, whom the prophet of Isaiah 40–55 labeled as a “Messiah” (Isa. 45:1), fortunes for some Israelites began to look up (→ Cyrus II). Some of those who had been deported, as well as their children born in captivity, were allowed to return to the homeland. Moreover, Persian policy, which included support for local religions, supported the restitution of the Temple in Jerusalem. There were, however, competing notions of what the rebuilt community should look like, especially about religious and political matters. During the years 520–518 B.C., Israelites, including both those who had been in exile and those who had remained in the land, were attempting to rebuild their community in and around Jerusalem. The book of Haggai attests to this process with very focused attention on the rebuilding of the Temple (→ Haggai). Haggai suggests that important leadership roles during this period were held by Joshua, the high priest, and Zerubbabel, a member of the Davidic royal line and, probably, a minor official of the Persian Empire with civil responsibilities. Zechariah 1–8, too, is designed to provide a way of thinking about the restoration time, but not in quite so concrete a way as Haggai.

Zechariah 9–14 has been dated by biblical scholars to widely varying settings, from the pre-exilic to the Greco-Roman periods. Several recent studies have suggested the fifth–fourth centuries B.C. as the most likely context. This was a time when the stability, even identity of the Judahite community was at issue. The problems of the community were so severe that the authors of 9–14 thought it necessary for Yahweh to intervene directly.

One of the paramount difficulties in discussing Deutero-Zechariah is the issue of its boundaries. Some scholars have, with good reason, suggested that Malachi is in fact part of the material added to Zechariah, making Zech. 9:1 through Mal. 3:24 a sizable block of late prophetic literature added to Zechariah 1–8. (Zech. 9:1, 12:1, and Mal. 1:1 all commence with the word “oracle.”) Because of the lack of scholarly consensus about the relation of Malachi to Deutero-Zechariah, it seems appropriate to take the clue for its interpretation from the final form of that text, namely, that there are two “oracles”: 9–11 and 12–14.

COMMENTARY

PART ONE: 1:1–8:23

Visions and Oracles of Restoration

1:1–6:8 Visions

There are eight visions in Zechariah 1–8. Visions are an important part of the prophetic repertoire (e.g., Amos 7:1–7; Jer. 1:11–14). However, in no other prophetic book do they make up so large a part of the prophet’s proclamation. The visions in 1–8 share three essential themes: they depict activity between heaven and earth, they present a world in which things are on the move, and they provide a perspective that is universal (note the phrase “all the earth” in Zech. 1:11; 4:14). By using these themes, the visionary seems to be suggesting that Yahweh's imminent action is truly universal and that what he does will restore Judah.

1:8-17, First Vision. Zechariah beholds the divine corral where the deity's horses are at rest. The place is well watered, almost Edenic—v. 8, “near the watery deep” (RSV “in the glen”). Zechariah is disturbed to learn that things are calm since Judah still suffers the effects of defeat and exile. The horses and riders that serve as the deity's patrol report to a messenger of the Lord, who is present, that the earth is at peace (Zech. 1:11). The messenger then poses a disturbing question: “How long, O Yahweh of Hosts, before you have compassion?” This lamentlike language receives a response in the form of two oracles: Yahweh has become jealous for Israel and he will do something. A promise focusing on Temple restoration and rebuilt cities follows. This vision authorizes the prophet to proclaim that a change is about to occur for Judah and Jerusalem.

1:18-21, Second Vision. The prophet reports seeing four horns. Although the report is enigmatic, the prophet probably sees an altar that in ancient Syro-Palestine often had four corners or horns (→ Altar). However, this image is interpreted as referring to the four powers that decimated Judah. One senses here that the four horns symbolize all foreign nations. Artisans or smiths who are on the way will not reconstruct an altar but will destroy those who have destroyed Jerusalem and its altar. If the first vision promised weal to Israel, the second promises woe to foreign nations, especially those that destroyed Israel.

2:1-5, Third Vision. Here the prophet, for the first time, enters the visionary world. He meets a man who is undertaking measurements of Jerusalem, measurements that prescribe dimensions for the restored city. An angelic interpreter interrupts these proceedings and proclaims that the new Jerusalem will exist without boundaries. (Boundaries for the restored Jerusalem were, in contrast, revealed in Ezek. 40-48.) Moreover, Yahweh, symbolized by walls of fire, will protect Israel. By the end of this vision, Zechariah's reports begin to focus on Judah and Jerusalem within the universal compass established in the first two visions.

3:1-10, Fourth Vision. With the introduction of Joshua the high priest, the visionary vocabulary becomes even more specific than in earlier visions. The prophet sees the divine council, but without the Deity present. (See 1 Kings 22:19-23 for a description of the divine council in action.) Joshua is cleansed and purified, presumably so that he may undertake his priestly role. If the Temple were to be rebuilt, it would be necessary to have the priesthood in place. Ezekiel 40-48 addresses this matter but does not suggest that the high priest has a role. For Zechariah, a high priest is necessary. This fourth vision serves to justify not only the role of high priest but a specific person to hold it.

4:1-5, 10b-14, Fifth Vision. In this vision, interrupted in the middle by an oracle (4:6-10a), Zechariah reports his vision of a golden lampstand, a type of lampstand attested to by archaeological discovery. It is not the classic Jewish menorah, but a bowl with seven pinched or indented spouts. Above it stand two trees that presumably provide the lamp with olive oil. The seven spouts symbolize Yahweh's all-searching and beneficent eyes. The two trees or “sons of oil” no doubt refer to the two leaders of the postexilic community, the civil leader and the high priest. The imagery here does not seem to be that of anointing. Rather the writer emphasizes the interrelationship between the lamp, which symbolizes the divine presence, and the trees, which symbolize human leadership in the restored community. There is something of an innate, divine-human connection as symbolized by the trees, which provide oil for the lamp, and the lamp, which provides the light for the trees. This vision suggests a rather specific form of leadership structure for the restored community, namely, civil and priestly leaders who depend upon Yahweh for their power.

5:1-4, Sixth Vision. Zechariah sees a flying scroll of huge and yet precise proportions. The divine mediator interprets it as a curse, which is a standard feature of Israel's covenant with God (→ Covenant). The point of this vision is straightforward. In the restored community Yahweh will continue to punish evildoers, almost magically. This perspective alone suggests that for Zechariah the restoration would not be utopian; there would still be those who err, and they would be punished.

5:5-11, Seventh Vision. In this most bizarre of the visions, Zechariah sees a basket with lead lid and, inside, a figure personifying wickedness. This vision report has several distinctive features. It denigrates Mesopotamia, the plain of Shinar, the land toward which the basket of evil is headed. Moreover, the basket heading east allows some sort of cosmic balance to be achieved. Evil goes out of Syro-Palestine while presumably there are those loyal to Yahweh, the “good,” who are moving from the east, or Mesopotamia, to Syro-Palestine.

6:1-8, Eighth Vision. In this final vision Zechariah again sees the horses, which are now joined by chariots and set before bronze mountains, nothing less than the opening to the place where God dwells. Things are now in motion, unlike the calm of the first vision. The Deity's patrol has been sent out; restoration for Judah is under way. The good news of renewal for those loyal to Yahweh has been perceived and reported by the visionary Zechariah. The visions put the events of ca. 520–518 B.C. in cosmic perspective.

1:1–8:23

Oracles

Although visions predominate in Zechariah 1–8, oracular material is prominent as well. An oracle introduces the book (1:1–6). Its language is typical of Israel's pre-exilic prophets. With this rhetoric, Zechariah is presented as an authentic prophetic voice. But these verses have a specific meaning: return, lest you suffer the disaster that befell your fathers!

Apart from the introduction, there are two basic sorts of oracles: those scattered throughout the visions, in 1:7–6:15, and those collected at the end of this section in chaps. 7–8. The first sort seem to be a response to the visions. For example, Zech. 1:14–17 specifies that the future time of weal will concentrate on Jerusalem but will as well include other cities. The oracles in Zech. 4:6–10 interpret the complex imagery of the lampstand vision by referring to specific individuals, Zerubbabel and Josiah.

When oracles do occur, there is always more than one. (Not all visions receive an oracular response.) This multiplicity of sayings attests to the rich implications of the visions, so much so that the sayings connected to one vision (e.g., 4:6–7, 8–10) often provide distinctive emphases. In this instance, the first oracle emphasizes the prominence of Zerubbabel in comparison with Joshua, and the second focuses on Zerubbabel as Temple builder.

The oracles associated with the visions seem thematically both similar to and different from those visions. They are different in the way that they emphasize the importance of the royal figure and the special place of Jerusalem in the restored polity. They concretize what was left unspecified in the visions. Nonetheless there are certain commonalities between the visions and these oracles. For example, one may note the continuity between the cosmic symbolism of the four winds in the final vision, and the notion of four winds in 2:10. Interestingly, both the visions and oracles in 1–8 share certain motifs present in the book of Isaiah, for example, the personified Zion (Isa. 4:9), cities of Judah (Isa. 4:49), and nations coming to Zion (Isa. 56:6–7).

The oracles in Zechariah 7–8 are quite different. This collection begins as a response not to vision reports but to a question posed in 7:3: should the community continue to mourn and fast? In the oracular material that follows, there are three basic sections: 7:1–14; 8:1–17, and 8:18–23. In the first small subcollection, there is a response of sorts to the question about fasting that eventuates in a series of counterquestions, vv. 5–7, as well as more general hortatory language, vv. 8–14. Then, in the second collection, which is itself subdivided into three blocks (8:1–8, 9–13, 14–17), the reader learns that Yahweh will act on behalf of Zion and that a marvelous restoration will occur. But, as with the previous collection, the ending provides admonitory language as a prerequisite of the good times that are about to occur. The end time will not be a utopia, namely, a time without problems.

In the final collection of oracles, 8:18–23, the prophet's long-awaited answer to the query raised in 7:3 is presented: fast shall become feast. But even here there is admonition—"love truth." Then, in the final two oracles of the first part of the book, a universalistic note is struck as the importance of Jerusalem is highlighted by reference to an international pilgrimage in which many peoples will come to Zion.

Some interpreters have been tempted to think that the visions in the book of Zechariah present the primary or important material and that the oracles are of secondary importance. To suggest this would be far from the mark. In the final form of the book the oracles in chaps. 1–6 provide the exposition of the meaning of the visions, many of which seem to demand interpretation. Furthermore, chaps. 7–8 present a picture of the prophet that enlarges the one given in the visions. In the earlier section, Zechariah was a visionary, one whose work required further interpretation. In the final two chapters, he becomes oracular speaker, answering questions and commenting on topics of importance to the postexilic community. Together, chaps. 1–6 and 7–8 constitute a comprehensive picture of prophetic activity, one in which Zechariah's prophetic credentials are emphasized. This is important since some have maintained that the book of Haggai is written to defend his role as prime mover in the rebuilding of the Temple. One may suggest, by contrast, that Zechariah 1–8 justifies the full range of this prophet's activity.

PART TWO: 9:1–14:21

Oracles About the Future

9:1–11:17

First Oracle

Like the book of Amos, Zechariah 9 begins with oracles against foreign nations. Similar to Amos too is the fact that in this chapter the nations are those of Syro-Palestine: Phoenicia, Syria, and Philistia. Also similar to Amos, the cities within these nations are mentioned by name. Unlike the oracles in Amos, however, there is less attention to indictment of these nations than there is to the punitive action of Yahweh. Yahweh will defeat these nations and cities, an action enabling him to be perceived as guardian of his nation. One result of this divine war will be the institution of Yahweh's kingship (9:9-13): "His kingdom shall be from sea to sea." Moreover, those who worship Yahweh are to be saved from their plight (vv. 11-13). The motif of Yahweh as divine warrior is picked up and highlighted at the end of the poem in vv. 14-15. In graphic language, we hear that those whom he is protecting will consume the blood of the slain enemy warriors. The divine war will bring fertility and prosperity (vv. 16-17). Zechariah 9 involves two essential themes: defeat and destruction for the foreign nations and return and restoration for Israel.

Theme and language change in Zechariah 10. In v. 1, the people of Yahweh are commanded to request rain. The theme of fertility connects 10:1 with 9:17. However, in 10:1, fertility is the result of a petition to Yahweh rather than the result of a successful institution of Yahweh's kingship, as it is in chap. 9. One senses a different topic in v. 2, which appears to have the form of a judgment oracle. There is an indictment in the first half of the verse, a description of improper forms of intermediation, and then in the second half, a retrospective judgment that the people (here construed in metaphorical terms as "sheep,") wander without leadership. The connecting word, "shepherd," unites vv. 2 and 3. It would seem that, in v. 2, shepherds were religious leaders, prophets, or priests, whereas in vv. 3-5, one has the impression that "shepherd" is in fact a political leader. It is not, however, easy to determine whether the leader is Israelite or foreign.

Unlike 10:1-2, which seem to be short, unrelated poems, 10:3-12 appears to be a longer and unified unit, which, apart from the negative statement in v. 3, contains significant positive statements about Israel. Verses 4-5 speak of military action, but here, unlike Zechariah 9, it is the people who fight instead of Yahweh. The allusive style uses descriptions of Israel's earlier battles, for example, the riders on horses and similar language from Exod. 15:1. Like Zechariah 9, however, this poem concerns both the Northern and the Southern kingdoms, namely, Judah and Ephraim, as was the case in Zech. 9:13. Verses 8-12 promise that Yahweh will reverse his exile of Israel by acting to bring them back. Just as the military language echoes the Red Sea events, so too the language of return alludes to salvation at the Red Sea. Zech. 10:11 suggests that just as Israel earlier escaped from Egypt, so now they will escape from captivity in Mesopotamia. The poem puts this prophecy of military action and return in a theological perspective by concluding with a promise that their strength will be in Yahweh and they shall glory in his name.

Zechariah 11 begins with an address to yet another foreign nation, Lebanon. However, the tone of this oracle is different from the standard oracle against a nation, like the one in 9:1-8. Imperatives, e.g., "Open your doors" (11:1)—as well as literary personifications, for example, "O cypress" (11:2)—make this an unusual literary piece. What appears to be a call to obedience directed at Lebanon quickly and ironically becomes a call to self-destruction: "Open your doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour your cedars." This entire poem, 11:1-3, uses terms from the forest: jungle, forest, oak, tree, cypress, cedar. This vocabulary is consistent with the notion of fertility raised earlier in chaps. 9 and 10. However, since this is a poem against a foreign nation, destruction rather than the creation of fertility is the point. Direct discourse as well as the language of fertility create a literary linkage between 10:1 and 11:3.

The rest of Zechariah 11, except for the woe oracle (v. 17), is prose. Zech. 11:4-17 and 13:7-9 both speak against shepherds. Some scholars have suggested that, despite the fact 13:7-9 is poetry and 11:4-17 is, with the exception of v. 17, prose, both texts belong together as one piece, an examination of Israel's leaders. Zech. 11:4-16 is an autobiographical narrative in form. However, the identity of the individual described is as obscure as that of the shepherds or shepherd in chap. 10. Someone is charged with the responsibility of becoming a shepherd for a flock. This is, however, an unhappy task since the flock has been doomed to slaughter. Improper attention to wealth has resulted in a sentence of doom for this flock.

The autobiographic report continues and we hear that some individual, the first person "I" in vv. 7-8, does in fact assume the role of shepherd. While this ambiguous shepherd performed his role, he reports having destroyed three other shepherds. This statement suggests a context in which there is social friction within the community out of which this text has grown. As a result of these difficulties, the person who had assumed the role of shepherd declined that role, especially since he reports that the flock is in fact destined to die.

Termination of this person's role as shepherd is described in vv. 10-14, a description that, though obscure, no doubt refers to the ritual destruction of the symbols of leadership. This same individual is, in vv. 15-16, challenged to act as shepherd again. However, this time the person refuses. And then, in v. 16, the author presents the notion of a shepherd as one who will destroy.

The role of shepherd here is obviously complex. In the ancient Near East, the shepherd metaphor normally refers to the royal office—that of the king (→ Shepherd). In the postexilic era and within the Israelite context, the metaphor of shepherd might refer either to a religious or to a civil-religious leader. In any case, the tone of this prosaic section at the end of chap. 11, a section that concludes the first “oracle,” is decidedly negative. The war oracle in 11:17 reemphasizes the notion of a worthless shepherd and includes formal curses upon one who exercises this role. In 13:7-9, the shepherd is clearly Yahweh’s or “my shepherd.” Similar to chap. 11 is the strong feeling of solidarity between the sheep/people and the shepherd/leader as well as the suffering all parties will undergo.

Interestingly, in 13:8-9, there is provision for a remnant, a group that will survive Yahweh’s punishment of the shepherd and his flock. Using standard covenant language, the author proclaims that the survivors will become Yahweh’s people. In contrast to these verses in Zechariah 13, however, the language about shepherds in Zechariah 11 is fundamentally negative in its view of the future. Woe overpowers a positive outlook.

12:1-14:21

Second Oracle

Unlike Zechariah 9-11 the final chapters of the book record “a word of the Lord concerning Israel.” Consistent with this difference is a further distinction in literary style and theme. Whereas chaps. 9-11 were predominantly poetry, chaps. 12-14 are predominantly prose. In addition, the phrase “on that day,” recurs with such regularity that these chapters appear to be made up of small fragments. (The phrase “on that day” appears in 12:3, 4, 6, 8 [2 times], 9, 11; 13:1, 2, 4; 14:4, 6, 8, 9, 13, 20). In spite of the fact that these final three chapters seem to focus on Israel, chap. 12 does begin by setting an international context for Yahweh’s activity. At the outset we learned that there will be strife between those loyal to Yahweh and “all the peoples round about” (12:2). In 12:1-9, the author highlights the prominent position Jerusalem will have in the cosmic battle. There is even a hint of intra-Israelite strife (13:2). However, this issue remains muted compared to its importance in Isaiah 56-66. The Zion tradition appears in the motif of an inviolable city in which the deity lives.

The author then shifts themes and in 12:10-13:1 deals with the Davidic monarchy traditions. In so doing, he broaches the matters of earlier culpability and future possibilities. Some reference to apparent persecution and resulting mourning, as that has been caused by the Davidic house, is introduced in 12:10. However, the author foresees the possibility of cleansing for the Davidic line by Yahweh’s purifying waters (13:1). This can happen, however, only after radical clan-by-clan lamentation (12:11-14).

Zech. 13:2-6 is a thematic complex on prophecy. Although Zech. 13:2 commences with reference to idols, prophecy as such, not simply false prophecy, receives strong negative judgment. It would appear that in this condemnation the writer thinks prophecy in the preclassical or classical molds is no longer to be allowed. If someone claims to be a prophet, “his father and mother who bore him, will say to him ‘you shall not live.’” Whereas Zechariah 12-13 seemed to allow for continuity with earlier Israelite traditions, notably the Zion and Davidic motifs, Zech. 13:2-6 presents a counterbalance challenging the possibility of prophetic activity in the present age.

In Zechariah 14, one senses an intensification of motifs already broached in the book, e.g., military activity against Yahweh’s foes. Consequently, some interpreters have viewed this chapter as apocalyptic in its orientation (→ Apocalyptic Literature). As in 12:1-13:6 the subsections of Zechariah 14 are segmented by the occurrence of the phrase “on that day.” And as before conflict is understood from the very outset as part of the Day of Yahweh (14:1). The motif of despoiling predator nations attested elsewhere (Nah. 2:9; Hag. 2:7-8) initiates this culminating chapter. But then the Zion tradition reappears in the prophecy of a battle at Jerusalem in which some Yahwists will survive while others will not. The remnant motif present in Zech. 13:9 reappears in 14:2. Then in 14:4-5 the personal presence of Yahweh as warrior is depicted using traditional themes from Israel’s description of theophany, namely, the appearance of the deity and the attendant disturbance of the cosmic order. Even Israelites will flee from God’s terrifying presence.

The theophany will cause fantastic changes in the natural world. There will be a radically new time when human experience of this age will be abrogated—no more cold, but presumably pleasant warmth, no more night but continuous light (14:6-7; cf. Isa. 24:23). Eden-like living waters (cf. Joel 4:18) will presumably lead to marvelous fertility.

All this will result from Yahweh’s kingship. Moreover, the doctrine of Deut. 6:4, that Yahweh is one, will be firmly established (Zech. 14:9). Consistent with this constancy will be the elevated place of the royal city, even as literally “the whole land” recedes and becomes a plain (cf. Isa. 40:4). Zech. 14:11 corroborates the promise of an impressive population for Jerusalem given earlier in Joel 4:20.

Zech. 14:12–15 returns to the topic of Yahweh's defeat of those who will attack Jerusalem. They will suffer from decimating plagues (14:12). Classical holy war traditions are used to describe the battle in which warriors from the same army will kill each other, a motif that, in 14:14, is reformulated to recognize the possibility of intra-Israelite conflict—"even Judah will fight against Jerusalem." The final portion of 14:14 returns to the notion of despoilation introduced in 14:1, just as 14:15 picks up on the plague motif broached in 14:12.

Zech. 14:16–21 portrays a time after the decisive military confrontation. Some from the attacking nations have survived, but now instead of attacking Jerusalem they will come on an annual pilgrimage for the Feast of Booths (14:16). There is even a punitive threat—no rain—to enforce this journey (14:17). The "family of Egypt" comes in for special attention (14:18–19). Finally, 14:20–21 provides ritual prescriptions for the celebration of that feast. Horses, bells, inscriptions, special basins, and sacrifices at the Temple will make up this remarkable ritual event. Zech. 14:20–21 implies that, by this time, the purity requisite for legitimate Yahwistic rituals will have been achieved.

There are several important themes in Deutero-Zechariah: military conflict, especially against foreign nations and with Yahweh as principal warrior; indictment of communal leaders, whether foreign or domestic, whether civil or religious; the hope of restoration for Jerusalem and those loyal to Yahweh; and the anticipation of a new time in which things will be very different and very good but still not perfect. Despite the significant literary variety present in Zechariah 9–14, there is remarkable thematic unity within these two oracles, 9–11 and 12–14. These "oracles" present the reader with two versions of Yahweh-initiated action. In 9–11 the primary tone is doom; in 12–14 it is that of promise.

The final form of Zechariah provides the reader with two literatures that have been juxtaposed and presented as one book. Despite their discrete points of origin, there are integral connections between 1–8 and 9–14. There are, of course, similarities in language, for example, "the daughter of Zion" in 2:10 and 9:9. But more importantly, both sections share important themes: the divine initiative, the cosmic scope of Yahweh's activity, and the important role of Zion in the restored community. Since such important ties link 1–8 to 9–14 and since 1–8 was composed earlier than the final chapters, it seems likely that those who wrote 9–14 knew and were influenced by 1–8. The earlier writers were concerned essentially about what was happening in their time, namely, the restoration in Judah ca. 520 B.C. The later authors focused instead on Yahweh's future action, activity that would enable the restored community to do more than just survive and bring a time when the people would receive Yahweh as king and would be his glorious people.

PAUL D. HANSON

Literary Form

With the exception of 1:1 and 4:4–6, the Book of Malachi can be read as a compositional unity from the hand of a single author. It is held together by a common literary form, a narrative report of a dispute. Time and again, Yahweh makes an assertion, and the priests or the people respond with a query, usually implying objection to the divine pronouncement. This question leads to a clarification of the divine assertion; the intention of the divine word is elaborated and strengthened in the direction of indictment and judgment of the doubting people or of admonition.

Questions concerning authorship have revolved around the superscription in 1:1. Though some scholars take the Hebrew word mal'aki in this verse to be the personal name of the prophetic author, an alternative explanation seems preferable, namely, that the word derives from a misreading of the term "my messenger" (mal'aki) in 3:1 as a personal name designating the author. If this is the case, the book of Malachi is an anonymous composition that may have at one time circulated with two other anonymous collections, Zechariah 9–11 and Zechariah 12–14, a possibility suggested by the appearance of the same formula at the head of all three collections, "Oracle, word of Yahweh." Structurally, the book divides into six sections, 1:2–5; 1:6–2:9; 2:10–16; 2:17–3:5; 3:6–12; and 3:13–4:3.

Historical Setting

Though undated, the book of Malachi can be placed with confidence in the first half of the fifth century B.C. The high hopes connected with the era of the restored Temple reflected in the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah clearly have been shattered. The book describes a priesthood that has degenerated into practices violating the laws regulating ritual sacrifice and that is lax in its responsibility of guiding and teaching the people. And the effects of degeneration and laxity are apparent throughout the land: people are renegeing on their tithes; intermarriage is calling into question the identity of the Jewish community; and the day laborers, widows, orphans, and sojourners are suffering oppression. Nehemiah, whose activity in Judah began in 445 B.C., focused his reform efforts on ending intermarriage (Neh. 10:28–30), restoring the practices of honest tithing (10:32, 38–39) and of proper ritual (10:33–37), and ending exploitation of the poor (5:1–13). It is plausible to see Malachi as active shortly before the debut of Nehemiah. Thus, the book may be placed in the reign of Xerxes I (486–464 B.C.), when the Persians were experiencing their first stinging defeats by Greek armies. At this time, Judah was a vassal state of the Persians, living under a non-Davidic governor appointed by the Persians (Mal. 1:8), and may have been searching the international conflicts of the time for signs of divine intervention.

Socioreligious Setting

The author of Malachi writes from a perspective combining ethical norms rooted deeply in pre-exilic prophecy with concerns about proper sacrifice and exemplary conduct on the part of the priests. The object of attack is the presiding or Zadokite priesthood (→ Zadok). The attack is based on an ideal of priestly fidelity associated with God's "covenant with Levi," an archaic ideal to which certain levitical priests were appealing in their polemic against the dominant (and in their eyes defiled) priesthood. This polemic has a long prehistory reaching back to the Davidic period when the Mushite Abiathar served in the tabernacle alongside Zadok the Zadokite priest (→ Mushi). From the time of Solomon on, the Zadokites came to dominate the Temple cult, and the Mushites were restricted increasingly to outlying shrines and nontemple functions like itinerant teaching. As a result, traces of an ongoing polemic between Zadokites (or Aaronides) and Mushites can be seen in many parts of the Bible, e.g., Exodus 32, Numbers 12, 16, and 25, and Isaiah 56 and 66. The message of the book of Malachi, with its combination of ritual concerns and prophetic themes and its diatribe against the presiding Zadokite priesthood, can therefore best be understood as arising among levitical priests who feel that the present degraded state of the rival priesthood and the demoralized condition of the land substantiate their claims to legitimate priestly authority in Temple and community. Astutely, they attack the position of their rivals by pointing out how the latter's conduct directly contradicts the Priestly Blessing of Num. 6:23-27. At the same time, they substantiate their own claim to authority by appealing to the archaic blessing of Levi found in the Blessing of Moses (Deut. 33:8-11). It is likely that Malachi belongs to a late stage of protest that arose in connection with Zadokite control over the Temple rebuilding in the years 520-515 B.C. (see Isa. 56-66). The bleak conditions of Temple and community and the apparent inability of the protagonists to effect thoroughgoing reform abet the development of an apocalyptic outlook. What the righteous but disenfranchised cannot accomplish, God will accomplish in an awesome day of judgment and vindication, which will purge from the land all evil, restore a pure priesthood from the sons of Levi, and inaugurate an era of blessing.

Religious Significance

The themes of Malachi were important for a community threatened from within by moral degeneracy and cultic decay. These themes preserved classical early Yahwistic and prophetic concerns for justice and compassion. They also nurtured the integrity of a cultic and sacrificial system that played an important part socially, by undergirding the identity of the Jews within the Persian Empire, and economically, by equitably redistributing the produce of the land. Though the conditions faced by Ezra and Nehemiah suggest that the reform movement advocated in Malachi remained largely ineffectual, the book likely played a part in preparing the way for the two great reformers as they traveled from Persia to Judah on their mission of restoring stability to the land. The admonition added later to Malachi in 4:4 indicates that later readers recognized the words of Malachi to be fully in the spirit of God's commandments to Moses. Indeed, the themes of God's unchanging love and loyalty and the standards of fidelity and justice and dignity in worship that this book places before those who fear the Lord are themes whose meaning have not gone unnoticed among the spiritually sensitive down to our own time. Another theme also left its imprint on later ages, that describing the "messenger" (identified in 4:5 as Elijah) who would prepare the way for the Lord on the Day of Judgment (Mark 1:2; Matt. 11:10, 14; 17:10-13; Luke 1:17; John 1:21, 25; m. 'Ed. 8.7; Tg. Ps.-J. Exod. 40:10; Tg. Ps.-J. Deut. 30:4). The reemergence of this theme in the Gospels gives special significance to the fact that Malachi provides the link between OT and NT in most Christian Bibles.

1:2-5, The Sovereignty of God's Love. Yahweh's first word is directed to the heart of the people: "I have loved you." In the disputational style of the book, the people reply, "How have you loved us?" Yahweh's reply is based upon a comparison between two brothers, who are the eponymous ancestors of Edom and Israel. In contrast to God's love for Jacob, Esau has been the object of divine wrath. The comparison is harsh, but drives home the fact that Israel's election is based on nothing but the sovereign love of God. But why should Edom have been singled out as the example of divine curse? Though the early history of the relationship between Edom and Israel was a mixture of enmity and peaceful coexistence, the Edomites came to represent the epitome of evil when they used the Babylonian destruction of Judah and Jerusalem in 587 B.C. as an opportunity to plunder the land (Lam. 4:21-22; Ps. 137:7; cf. Isa. 34:5-9; 63:1-6). Reference to Yahweh's undoing of their every effort to rebuild may be related to the pressure that was placed on Edom from the east and that culminated a century or two later in Edom's being driven into southern Judah by the Nabateans. This unit concludes by expressing a universalistic leitmotif in the book, "Yahweh is exalted beyond the border of Judah."

1:6-2:9, Faithful Priests Honor God. The unit begins with a proverbial saying, "Son honors father, and servant his master." In a double exchange with the priests, Yahweh goes on to assert that though he is father and master, the priests give him no honor, but rather despise his name by offering blemished sacrifices. We thus witness a situation in which the standards for Temple ritual set by the Torah (e.g., Deut. 15:21; 17:1; Lev. 22:17-25) are flagrantly broken. The priests no longer take the reality of God seriously, since, according to the Deuteronomistic tradition here attested, the divine name is the reality of the deity manifested in the cult (Deut. 12:5, 11; 16:2, 6). The condemnation in v. 10 is harsh: no cult would be preferable to the existing one! Mal. 1:11, which has been the object of considerable debate and is often regarded as secondary, is integral to this argument, if it is read as an intentional contrast to the despicable disregard for God's reality by the priests. They are despising the God who is exalted among the nations and who is honored by every pure offering, regardless of where it is offered. This is the second instance of the book's universalistic leitmotif.

The priests are responsible for bringing blessing to the people and for leading them in the way of blessing by faithfully instructing them in the Torah. The priests have failed in both these duties (2:1-3, 8-9). Hence the disputation develops into a pronouncement of judgment: Yahweh's curse falls upon the priests, as their hereditary line is broken off, as they are rendered unfit for service by becoming defiled in a most shameful manner, with the dung of their own offerings being spread over their faces, and as people no longer honor them as teachers. The impact of this judgment is heightened by way of a contrast. Between the two prongs of the judgment Yahweh describes his "covenant with Levi," a covenant described in the Blessing of Moses (Deut. 33:8-11). When upheld, the fruits of this covenant were "life and peace," for in it the priests feared and honored the name of the Lord and through their example and teaching "turned many from iniquity."

2:10-16, Marriage Is a Covenant. The prophet addresses a larger audience as he turns to a problem threatening the very unity of the community. That unity is established upon a principle expressed in the opening prophetic question: "Do we not all have one father? Did not one God create us?" This central confession of Yahwistic faith is now being denied by the people through their marrying foreigners and thereby becoming yoked to foreign gods. The second half of this unit points out how the priests themselves again are instrumental in leading the people to unfaithfulness: though marriage is nothing less than a covenant witnessed by God, the priests are faithless to the wives of their youth. Such action notwithstanding, they are thrown into a quandary when Yahweh refuses to accept their sacrifices. "I hate divorce," Yahweh declares, and with this statement concludes a plea for marital faithfulness that goes beyond the one found in the Torah (cf. Deut. 24:1-4).

2:17-3:5, The Day of Yahweh's Cleansing. The disputation that begins this unit brings to light the perversion of values and the collapse of true faith that undermines the community's health. The people weary God by saying, "All who do evil are good in the eyes of Yahweh, and God takes delight in them," and by asking, "Where is the God of justice?" Poignantly these two sentences describe a shocking cynicism and mocking disbelief that defiantly resists prophetic critique and efforts to stir up feelings of remorse.

Before such an audience any prophet is tempted to despair. But here we find what was beginning to emerge as another response to a bleak situation, a vision of the coming of the very one the people have mocked and denied, the God of justice! God's way is prepared by mal'aki ("my messenger"). Against the background of Isa. 40:1-11, we can best picture this messenger as one of the heralds of the divine assembly, an individual charged with preparing the people for the day of Yahweh's epiphany. Proper preparation means the restoration of a sanctified cult, for the Temple is to this writer, as it was to the Deuteronomistic writers and to Ezekiel, Haggai, and Zechariah, the place of Yahweh's presence among the people. As expected in light of Mal. 2:4-7, the sanctification of the cult and the restoration of sacrifices pleasing to Yahweh would be carried out by a purified levitical priesthood (compare the messenger's purifying the sons of Levi with the seraph's purifying Isaiah as a part of the latter's commissioning in Isa. 6:6-7). Then Yahweh would appear for the great Day of Judgment and would restore the land by pronouncing judgment against all those who break the commandments. The list of offenders, namely, sorcerers, adulterers, those who swear falsely, those who oppress the day laborer, the widow, and the orphan, and those who cast aside the alien, harks back to the ideals of early Yahwism and to the stringent moral standards of the pre-exilic prophets. Just as the collapse of a moral universe was tied to a collapse of belief, so too the list of offenders is summarized by a phrase focusing on the heart of the broken covenant, those who do not fear Yahweh. A resanctified priesthood and a land purged of those defiantly breaking the covenant and its Torah—that is the vision of this unit, a vision directly addressing the problems described in the units immediately preceding and following it.

3:6-12, The Fruits of Honest Tithing. In these verses, the writer compares Yahweh's never-changing faithfulness with the perpetual apostasy of Israel. But even after this history of ingratitude and sin, the age-old invitation is extended once again: "Return to me, and I will return to you." True to the disputational style, the people try to deflect the thrust of this call to repentance by asking, "How can we return?" Their response leads into another indictment: the people are robbing Yahweh by renegeing on the tithes they are committed to bring into the Temple storehouse. Yahweh's charge involves more than a gesture of piety; the Temple was the organ through which the produce of the land was redistributed, both to Temple personnel and to other groups in the land. Dereliction in fulfilling one's rightful tithe was thus tantamount to upsetting the cosmic harmony that alone could assure prosperity in the land. Once the people renew their commitment to the Temple, the cosmic harmony of which the Temple cult was the earthly center will be reestablished, and the curse visiting the land because of the people's disobedience will give way to blessing (cf. Hag. 1-2). This sentiment leads into another formulation of the universalistic leitmotif of the book: the restoration of the tithe will redound to Yahweh's glory far beyond Judah, for all nations will witness the fruits of true worship (v. 12).

3:13-4:3, God Will Restore the Distinction Between the Righteous and the Wicked. One last time the theme of blasphemy is revisited, as the disputation exposes the arrogant disdain of the wicked: "It is useless to serve God. . . . We shall declare the arrogant blessed. . . . Not only are evildoers successful, but when they test God, they escape punishment." This deplorable situation, similar to the one that evoked judgment in 2:17-3:5, introduces here another contrast: over against the wicked there now appear those who fear Yahweh. Though the leaders and most of the people have obliterated the distinction between righteousness and evil, that distinction is preserved before Yahweh, written in "a book of remembrance" (cf. Ps. 139:16; Dan. 12:1). On the day when Yahweh acts, the righteous will be delivered and reconstituted as Yahweh's "special possession," fulfilling an ancient promise reaching back to Yahweh's covenant with Israel at Sinai (Exod. 19:5-6). Before Yahweh's holiness, all wickedness will be burned like stubble, whereas for those who fear Yahweh the "sun of righteousness" will rise "with healing in its wings." The God-fearers are even envisioned as being drawn into the action on Yahweh's Day of Judgment, as was later the case in the sectarian writings of Qumran.

4:4-6, Closing Exhortation. A later editor has added an appropriate exhortation, much in the style of the book of Deuteronomy, urging reverence for the Torah. Another postscript identifies the messenger of 3:1 with Elijah, the prophet who was taken up into heaven by a fiery chariot (2 Kings 2:11) and who would be instrumental in healing the foundation of Jewish community, the family, as a means of preparing a people for covenantal blessings rather than for the ban of destruction.

THE APOCRYPHA

INTRODUCTION TO THE APOCRYPHA

JOHN J. COLLINS

The term "apocrypha" means "hidden things," but in ecclesiastical contexts it is used to refer to those books included in the OT of the Latin Vulgate translation but not in the Hebrew Bible. Traditionally this designation has been applied to fifteen books or portions of books: 1 Esdras, 2 Esdras, Tobit, Judith, The Additions to Esther, Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, Baruch, Letter of Jeremiah, Song of the Three Youths (including the Prayer of Azariah), Susanna, Bel and the Dragon (this and the previous two known collectively as The Additions to Daniel), Prayer of Manasseh, 1 Maccabees, and 2 Maccabees. Also included among the Apocrypha, especially in the Bibles of the Greek Orthodox and other Orthodox churches, are 3 and 4 Maccabees and Psalm 151, which are found in manuscripts of the Greek Bible (the Septuagint, LXX). The Psalms of Solomon are also found in manuscripts of the Greek Bible but have not traditionally been included in the category Apocrypha.

---

ORIGIN OF THE CATEGORY "APOCRYPHA"

---

The distinction between canonical and apocryphal writings is found clearly in 2 Esdras 14. There Ezra is inspired to dictate ninety-four books and instructs: "Make public the twenty-four books that you wrote first and let the worthy and the unworthy read them; but keep the seventy that were written last, in order to give them to the wise among your people" (2 Esd. 14:45–46). The seventy books constitute a category of esoteric literature, presumably including apocalyptic revelations such as are found in 2 Esdras itself, but the esoteric character is atypical of the traditional Apocrypha.

By the time 2 Esdras 14 was written at the end of the first century A.D., the canon of the Hebrew Bible was closed. The number of books was variously given as twenty-two or twenty-four, but the variation can be explained as a matter of counting (e.g., Jeremiah and Lamentations may be counted as one or as two; the same is true for Judges and Ruth; see Beckwith, pp. 235–73). Traditionally, the closing of the canon was associated with the so-called Council of Jamnia about A.D. 90. The tendency in some recent studies (Leiman, Beckwith) has been to push back the closing of the Hebrew canon to the pre-Christian era.

The rabbis appear to have recognized three classes of books: those that "defile the hands" (the sacred canonical Scriptures), books that were withdrawn or stored away (Heb. ganaz) and whose use was subject to restrictions, and "outside books" (separim chisonim) whose use was forbidden. The famous rabbi Akiba is said to have specified Sirach as one of the forbidden books, but it is cited in the Talmud "much like any other biblical book" (Leiman, p. 97), so his opinion cannot have prevailed. Yet it did not "defile the hands" either (t. Yad. 2:13). Origen remarks that Tobit and Judith were not even among the hidden books (Gk. apocrypha) of the Jews (Letter to Africanus 13), but there is no clear evidence that there was an official list of books that were stored away.

The Greek-speaking Christian church accepted a larger collection of Jewish writings as authoritative than what was included in the Hebrew canon. The traditional explanation of this fact is that Alexandrian Judaism had a more extensive canon than its Palestinian counterpart and that the Christians adopted the canon of the Diaspora. The notion of an Alexandrian canon, however, has been discredited by the work of Sundberg, who argues that only the Torah and the Prophets were closed before A.D. 70. The Christian church, then, inherited an open canon in the area of the Writings. Whether in fact the list of canonical Writings was still fluid in Diaspora Judaism at the time of the great revolts (A.D. 66–135) is disputed (e.g., Beckwith, p. 385), but at least it was fluid in Christianity in the second and third centuries. When Melito of Sardis in the late second century A.D. was asked for "an accurate statement of the ancient books," he had to send to Palestine for an answer. His list is confined to the Hebrew canon, but without Esther. Others were more inclusive. Tertullian was aware that the book of Enoch was not in the Jewish canon; yet "since Enoch by the same scripture has also made proclamation concerning the Lord, nothing whatever must be rejected by us which pertains to us" (On Women's Dress 1.3). Clement of Alexandria cited Tobit, Sirach, and the Wisdom of Solomon as Scripture and Judith and 2 Maccabees as historical sources. Origen accepted Susanna as part of the text of Daniel although he knew it was not in the Hebrew, because Susanna "is found in every church of Christ." Tobit could not be used in disputation with Jews but could within the churches (Letter to Africanus 13).

In preparing the Latin Vulgate (A.D. 390–405), Jerome was committed to the Hebraica veritas (Lat., "the Hebrew truth") in canon as well as text. Yet he translated the additional books and passages too and called attention to their apocryphal status in his prefaces. The prefaces, however, were not always copied or heeded, and so the Western church came to regard all books of the Vulgate as part of Scripture. The Gelasian Decree at the end of the fifth century recognized Tobit, Judith, the Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, and 1 and 2 Maccabees; other Apocrypha, such as Susanna, were accepted as parts of other biblical books.

The Protestant Reformers did not condemn the Apocryphal books but denied that they had divine authority or that they could be used to establish doctrine. The Council of Trent in 1546 affirmed the canonicity of the apocryphal books, with the exceptions of 1 and 2 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasseh, which were less firmly supported by tradition. These books were printed in an appendix to the NT in subsequent editions of the Vulgate. The Apocrypha were still included in the King James Version of 1611 but were omitted with increasing frequency in later printings.

The Roman Catholic church today abides by the decision of the Council of Trent on the matter of canon. Catholics sometimes refer to the disputed books as "deuterocanonical," implying that they were written later than the protocanonical OT. The Greek Orthodox church accepts, in addition, 1 Esdras, Psalm 151, the Prayer of Manasseh, and 3 Maccabees, with 4 Maccabees in an appendix. The Russian Orthodox church accepts 1 and 2 Esdras, Psalm 151, and 3 Maccabees.

THE LITERARY GENRES

The works of the Apocrypha may be classified under two broad headings: narrative texts and discursive texts. Within the category of narrative we may distinguish works of historiography (1 and 2 Maccabees), historical fiction (Judith, Tobit, 3 Maccabees), and an apocalypse (2 Esdras). Within the category of discursive writing we may distinguish sapiential writings (Sirach, Wisdom of Solomon), exhortations (4 Maccabees, Letter of Jeremiah), and prayers (Prayer of Manasseh, Prayer of Azariah).

The Narrative Works

Historiography. There has been a growing awareness in recent years that historiography is never simply a record of fact but always involves an imaginative, constructive element. The distinction between history and fiction is not an absolute one, but the terms are useful for indicating the extremes of a continuum.

The most obviously "historical" book of the Apocrypha is undoubtedly 1 Maccabees. This work was composed toward the end of the second century B.C., most probably in Hebrew. It reports the events from the outbreak of the Maccabean revolt to the end of the reign of Simon (134 B.C.) and draws on some earlier written sources (e.g., the chronicles of John Hyrcanus, 1 Macc. 16:24). It is written in a sober style, which inspires confidence in its reliability. Nonetheless, it should not be taken as an unbiased account. On the contrary, it may be viewed as political propaganda for the Hasmonean house, which is described as "the family of those men through whom deliverance was given to Israel" (5:62). Throughout, the Maccabees are presented as "pious" while their opponents are "lawless."

The ideological aspects of the narrative are especially evident in the speeches and prayers attributed to the protagonists. The deathbed speech of Mattathias serves to place the Maccabees in the tradition of the biblical heroes from Abraham to the companions of Daniel. There are frequent allusions to biblical prototypes throughout the narrative—Mattathias' first act of violence is legitimated by analogy with that of Phinehas in Num. 25:6–11. The author also inserts hymns of praise to Judas (1 Macc. 3:3–9) and Simon (14:4–15). The success of the Maccabees is attributed throughout to the power of their God (e.g., 3:19, 4:9–11). None of this is to deny the value of 1 Maccabees as a historical source, when due account is taken of its tendentious nature.

2 Maccabees is an epitome of a longer history by Jason of Cyrene, who may have been an eyewitness to the events he reports. The purpose of the abbreviator is stated explicitly in 2:25: “we have aimed to please those who wish to read, to make it easy for those who wish to memorize and to profit all readers.” History, as conceived in 2 Maccabees, can accommodate heavenly apparitions and interventions (e.g., 2 Macc. 11:8). The religious character of this history is evident in the central role of the Temple (e.g., in the miraculous story of Heliodorus in chap. 3). It also serves a broader hortatory purpose, as is evident in the martyrdom of the seven brothers in 2 Maccabees 7 and in the account of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes in chap. 9. Yet, while 2 Maccabees lacks the sober tone of 1 Maccabees, it is not necessarily inferior as a historical source. It preserves a number of important documents in chap. 11 and its account of the events leading up to the Maccabean revolt is in some respects more complete and accurate than that of 1 Maccabees. It also presents an interestingly different account of the events, focusing more on Judas and neglecting his father and brothers. The deaths of the martyrs are also recognized as a factor that contributed to the Jewish victory. Consequently the history as reported in 2 Maccabees is less amenable to the propaganda of the Hasmonean house. The popularity of the books of Maccabees rests, surely, on the fact that they are our main sources for a very important episode in Jewish history.

Historical Fiction. The work known as 1 Esdras (3 Ezra in the Latin Vulgate) might also be classified as historiography, since it is primarily a variant text of the end of Chronicles, Ezra, and part of Nehemiah. It includes, however, a narrative that is not paralleled in the biblical text and belongs to another genre. This is the story of Darius’ banquet in 3:1–4:63, which tells of the contest of wisdom between three courtiers in which the Jew Zerubbabel is victorious. This story belongs to a widespread genre variously identified as “court tale” because of its setting or “wisdom tale” because of its theme. Biblical examples can be found in the Joseph story in Genesis, in Esther, and Daniel 1–6. The designation “Diaspora novel” is sometimes used for the Jewish tales, but this ignores the non-Jewish examples such as the tale of Ahiqar. These tales fall into the category of historical fiction, because they describe a setting in realistic historical detail, but unlike the books of Maccabees they are scarcely constrained at all by the record or recollection of historical events. The objective of the story in 1 Esdras is to establish the superior wisdom of the Jewish youth Zerubbabel.

A number of other tales of the Apocrypha are set in the eastern Diaspora. Tobit is said to have been taken captive to Assyria in the days of Shalmaneser in 722 B.C. The book’s cavalier approach to historical data is shown by the fact that the secession of the northern tribes from Jerusalem (922 B.C.) is said to have taken place when the same Tobit was a very young man. In part, the portrayal of Tobit as a suffering, righteous man is reminiscent of the prologue of Job. The folkloristic character of the story is evident in the episode concerning the evil demon Asmodeus, who slew each of a woman's seven husbands before they had been with her. It is also significant that Tobit is said to be the uncle of Ahikar and thereby located in relation to a broader cycle of Near Eastern folklore.

We have noted already that the first six chapters of the book of Daniel are made up of court or wisdom tales. We know from the Dead Sea Scrolls that Daniel 4 was a variant of a traditional tale, of which another older variant is found in the Prayer of Nabonidus. In another Danielic composition, 4QPseudoDan, Daniel delivers a prophecy in a royal court. Two other stories are attached to the Greek version of Daniel, Bel and the Dragon and Susanna. The story of Bel and the Dragon is set in the royal court like the stories in Daniel 1–6. It also shares the motif of the lions' den with Daniel 6. In the protocanonical book, polemic against idolatry was a subordinate theme (e.g., Dan 3:18; 5:23). In the apocryphal stories, it receives the primary emphasis as Daniel unmasks the fraudulence of the gods of the Babylonians. The episode where Habbakuk is transported to Babylon by the hair of his head to feed Daniel in the lions' den is an element of fantasy that contrasts with the relatively sober canonical stories.

The story of Susanna is found after Daniel 12 in the LXX, before Daniel 1 in the translation of Theodotion. (Bel and the Dragon appears after Susanna in the LXX and after Daniel 12 in Theodotion.) The story tells how the intervention of Daniel saved the innocent Susanna from her detractors. The tale is set in Babylon but Daniel is described simply as "a young lad," not as an official in the royal court. The wisdom he exhibits recalls the judicial wisdom of Solomon in 1 Kings 3 rather than the mantic wisdom of Daniel 1–6. Daniel's role in the story is probably due to a play on his name (Heb., "my judge is God") rather than to the tradition of Daniel as a wise courtier. The story itself is a tale of parabolic reversal, in which the youthful Daniel confounds his elders and the suspect woman is proven more righteous than the judges of her people.

The book of Judith has a stronger appearance of history than either Tobit or the Danielic stories, in the sense that it claims to describe a public event of some magnitude—an invasion of Syria and Palestine by Nebuchadnezzar. The author's disregard for historical accuracy, however, is evident not only in the confused statement that Nebuchadnezzar was king of the Assyrians, but also in the assumption that the events in question take place after the return from the Exile. There is no independent record elsewhere of these events, and even the scene of the action in Judah (Bethulia) is an enigma. The very name of the protagonist, Judith (Heb., "Jewess"), suggests that she is a type figure rather than a historical individual. The story recalls the exploits of the woman Jael in Judges 4. The theological lesson, that God can destroy the most powerful enemies of Israel even by the hand of a woman, is celebrated in a hymn in chap. 16 and was probably intended to inspire Jewish resistance to foreign oppressors.

A final example of historical fiction, 3 Maccabees, is set not in the eastern Diaspora, but in Egypt during the reign of Ptolemy IV Philopator. The story involves two episodes. First there is an attempt by Ptolemy to enter the Temple of Jerusalem, which is prevented.

This episode is apparently based on the story of Heliodorus in 2 Maccabees 3. Second, there is an attempt to reduce the Egyptian Jews to the status of slaves and brand them with the emblem of Dionysus. The order is thwarted, first by lapses in the king's memory and then by the miraculous intervention of two angels. A variant account of this episode is found in Josephus Against Apion 2:53–55, where it is set in the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes II (Physcon). Various attempts have been made to establish the historical reliability of the story in one setting or the other. Philopator was devoted to the cult of Dionysus, and Physcon was notorious for his cruelty and was ill disposed to the Jews. At most, however, we can speak of partial historical reminiscences. The story is not a record of historical events but a fantasy of supernatural deliverance from extreme danger. The threat to the Jewish people is reminiscent of the book of Esther, and 3 Maccabees has many close parallels with the Greek translation of Esther. Like the stories of the fiery furnace and the lions' den in Daniel, it was designed to support endurance in an alien, sometimes hostile environment.

Apocalypse: 2 Esdras. 2 Esdras is a composite work. Chaps. 1 and 2 (together also called 5 Ezra) are made up of a collection of oracles with an apocalyptic vision in 2:42–48. Chaps. 15 and 16 (called 6 Ezra) are also a collection of oracles with an eschatological focus. Both of these passages are of Christian origin. The bulk of 2 Esdras however (chaps. 3–14) is taken up with a Jewish apocalypse, commonly called 4 Ezra, which dates from about A.D. 100.

2 Esdras 3–14 is an apocalypse in the sense that it is a revelation of eschatological mysteries mediated by an angel. It is a complex work made up of three dialogues (chaps. 3:1–9:25), three visions (9:26–13:58), and an epilogue. The constituent parts are held together by a narrative thread that tells of Ezra's transformation from a skeptical critic of divine justice to a receptive vehicle for divine revelation. The dialogues are reminiscent of the book of Job because of Ezra's probing questions. Interestingly, the author emphasizes that Ezra has neither ascended to heaven nor descended to hell (4:8) and so does not lay claim to the kind of apocalyptic knowledge associated with Enoch. What the dialogues establish, however, is that the problem of divine justice is insoluble without such revelation. In the transitional chapter (9:26–10:59) Ezra finds himself cast in the role of comforter; he tells the woman in his vision to "let yourself be persuaded . . . and consoled" (10:20). Thereafter he accepts his own advice, as the angel describes the fulfillment that is to come. Commentators have been troubled by the change in Ezra's attitude in the second half of the book, and some have suggested multiple authorship or that Ezra and the angel are mouthpieces for different parties. These suggestions are unnecessary if we take seriously the narrative character of the book, which invites the reader to identify with Ezra in his transition from doubt to faith.

The Discursive Writings

Sapiential Works. Pride of place among the discursive writings must go to the two great wisdom books, Sirach (or the Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach) and the Wisdom of Solomon. Sirach is the only book of the Apocrypha that may have been considered canonical by some rabbis or whose status was seriously in dispute (see Leiman, pp. 92–102). Its popularity in Christianity is reflected in its Latin name, Liber Ecclesiasticus, or “Church Book.” The Wisdom of Solomon was the book of the Apocrypha most widely used in early Christianity, both Eastern and Western, although it was listed among the NT Scriptures, not the OT, in the Muratorian canon. It was widely accepted as Scripture by the end of the second century, but Origen says it was still disputed in the third.

While both of these books stand in the wisdom tradition and have important affinities with each other, they are still quite different in character. Sirach, sometimes called Ecclesiasticus, is essentially a collection of proverbs and maxims, after the manner of the book of Proverbs. Like Proverbs 8, it includes a poem placed on the lips of personified wisdom. Sirach makes a significant departure from Proverbs, however, when it identifies wisdom with the book of the Torah of Moses (Sir. 24:23). This identification does not restrict the range of Sirach’s wisdom, but serves as a norm for the discernment of true wisdom. The sage, in Sirach’s view, is one who studies the law of the Most High and is concerned with prophecies, but who also travels through foreign lands to seek the good and evil among humankind (Sir. 39). The biblical history provides a parade of exemplars of wisdom, which is reviewed in the “Praise of the Fathers” (chaps. 44–49) and marks the first attempt to integrate sacred history into a wisdom book.

Sirach is exceptional among ancient Jewish writings in that we know who wrote it and when and who translated it and when. This very specificity may well have militated against its acceptance in the canon, when the book of Daniel, which was composed at a slightly later time, could pass as a work from the age of prophecy. The fact that we know the provenance of Sirach, however, is valuable for the historian and makes Sirach useful, in a way that earlier wisdom books are not, as a witness to the society of a particular period: Jerusalem shortly before the Hellenistic reform in the early second century B.C. Sirach’s posture has rightly been dubbed conservative; for him the Torah remained the norm. Yet he was far from closed-minded and his book reflects familiarity with Greek literature as well as with the biblical tradition. The encomium of the high priest Simon (chap. 50) enables us to place Sirach in the political context of the time.

The Wisdom of Solomon, in contrast, has scarcely any proverbial material and is presented as an exhortation to the rulers of the earth to “love righteousness.” It is a product of the Greek-speaking Diaspora, most probably of Alexandria, and reflects a thought-world similar to that of the philosopher Philo. There is continuity with Sirach in the figure of personified wisdom (here equated with the Gk. logos, or “word”; 9:1–2), and also in the incorporation of biblical history in chaps. 10–19. As in Sirach, this history is a store of examples, a point that the Wisdom of Solomon underlines by omitting the names of the biblical personalities.

The most striking aspect of the Wisdom of Solomon is undoubtedly its use of Greek philosophy and in particular its acceptance of the Platonic idea of the immortality of the soul. On this point it contrasts sharply with Sirach, who held that "whether life is for ten or a hundred or a thousand years there is no inquiry about it in Hades" (Sir. 41:4). Wisdom's account of the judgment after death was also indebted to Jewish apocalyptic traditions such as we find in 1 Enoch, but the dominant tone of the work is Hellenistic. The sentiment that "a perishable body weighs down the soul" (9:15) was alien to Hebraic Judaism but had far-reaching influence on Christianity. Wisdom anticipates another doctrine of Catholic Christianity in chap. 13 where it appears to endorse the idea of revelation through nature, as Paul also does in Romans 1.

Another hymn in praise of wisdom is found in chap. 3 of the book of Baruch. This book is made up of segments of diverse origin, at least some of which were composed in Hebrew. They were appended to the book of Jeremiah in many manuscripts of the Greek Bible and are sometimes cited as part of that book. The wisdom poem is found in 3:9-4:4 and is reminiscent of that in Job 28, insofar as it emphasizes that humanity does not know the way to wisdom. Unlike Job, but like Sirach, Baruch concludes by identifying wisdom with "the book of the commandments of God" (4:1). Baruch, however, construes this identification in a way that is more nationalistic than what we find in any earlier Jewish wisdom book: "Happy are we, O Israel, for we know what is pleasing to God" (4:4).

Exhortations. We have noted already that the Wisdom of Solomon is presented as an exhortation to the kings of the earth, but the hortatory purpose of the book is pursued indirectly through reflections on the nature of wisdom and of the universe. A more direct form of exhortation is found in 4 Maccabees, which like Wisdom is a product of the Hellenistic Diaspora (possibly Antioch). The subject addressed is whether reason is sovereign over emotions. "Reason," however, is virtually equated with obedience to the law—the Jewish law in all its particularity, including dietary restrictions. Fidelity to the law is the point at issue in the stories of the Maccabean martyrs that are adduced as illustrations. The stories show that it is possible to be faithful to the full law, even in the face of torture. The reasonableness of such conduct is suggested by the hope for "a life of eternal blessedness" (17:18) and more particularly by the inherent nobility of virtue.

4 Maccabees is a rhetorical rather than philosophical work. It simply asserts that the Jewish law is in accord with reason. Granted this assumption, it is able to portray the conduct of the martyrs in terms that Greeks could respect. It is eclectic in its philosophy, with smatterings of Stoicism and Platonism. Its peculiarity lies in its combination of an uncompromising, particularistic adherence to the law and a thoroughly Hellenized consciousness, which placed a high value on philosophy even if it did not pursue it rigorously.

A very different homiletical work is found in the Letter of Jeremiah, which was most probably composed in Hebrew no later than the second century B.C. Sometimes it stands as an independent work in the manuscripts and sometimes it is attached to the book of Baruch. It is a straightforward polemic against idolatry, divided into segments by such pronouncements as "From this you will know that they are not gods; so do not fear them" (v. 23). It is devoid of any attempt to find common ground with the gentile world in the manner of Hellenistic compositions such as 4 Maccabees.

Prayers. The recitation of prayers is a characteristic feature of Jewish writings of the Hellenistic period. Sometimes prayers were added in the course of transmission of biblical books. The Hebrew book of Esther is remarkable for its lack not only of prayers but even of reference to the Deity. The Greek additions to Esther compensate for these deficiencies by placing prayers on the lips of Mordecai and Esther. They also mention that the Jews cried to God at the beginning of their problems (11:10, which comes before chap. 1 in the Gk.) and at the end Mordecai declares that "these things have come from God." The prayers of Mordecai and Esther are prayers for deliverance specific to their contexts. Esther uses the opportunity to protest that she had not eaten at Haman's table—an issue on which the Hebrew text was silent.

The Greek translation of Daniel is also embellished in chap. 3 by the addition of the prayers of Azariah and the three youths. These are traditional prayers, not specially composed for this context. The prayer of the three youths is appropriate to its context in the fiery furnace. It is a hymn reminiscent of Psalm 136 that gives thanks to the Lord for the works of creation. The Prayer of Azariah, in contrast, is a communal confession of sin, which is singularly inappropriate in the context. This type of prayer is very common in postexilic Judaism. Biblical examples can be found in Nehemiah 9 and Daniel 9 and a later example in the Qumran text "Words of the Heavenly Luminaries" (4QDibHam). Typically they contain a confession of sin, acknowledgement of God's justice, reference to the dejected state of Israel, and prayer for deliverance. They reflect an understanding of history that is characteristic of the Deuteronomistic writings. Since these prayers are widespread over a period of several centuries they were probably variations on a pattern of liturgical prayer. (Another prayer of the same type is found in Bar. 1:15–3:8, which has verbal parallels to the prayer in Daniel 9.)

The Prayer of Manasseh is an individual confession of sin that exhibits the same logic and pattern as the communal prayers. It begins by establishing the justice of God and follows with a confession of sin and plea for mercy. The inspiration for the prayer is evidently derived from 2 Chronicles 33, which tells of the repentance of Manasseh and refers to his prayer.

The book of Baruch concludes with another lengthy prayer in 4:5–5:9 that calls on Israel to take courage because God's punishment is not final. Once again, the predicament of Israel is understood as a punishment for sin, in accordance with Deuteronomistic theology. In this case, however, the emphasis is on the imminent restoration, and the language recalls Isaiah 40–55.

The book of Psalms in the LXX also includes an additional psalm, Psalm 151. A longer variant of this psalm has been found in Hebrew at Qumran. There is reason to think that the Greek Psalm 151 was a condensation of this Hebrew psalm and of another that followed it in the Qumran Psalms Scroll. The psalm is ascribed to David himself. In the Greek version it recalls the election of David and his triumph over Goliath.

This review has been confined to those prayers and psalms that are printed separately in modern editions of the Apocrypha. Prayers are scattered throughout the apocryphal books. Notable examples include the rousing prayer for divine intervention in Sirach 36, which is widely thought to be inserted out of context, and Solomon's prayer for wisdom in Wisdom of Solomon 9. The book of Tobit contains a confession of sin in chap. 3, benedictions by Tobias and Raguel in chap. 8, and a prayer of rejoicing by Tobit in chap. 13 that recalls the Song of Hannah in 1 Samuel 2. Judith has a song of victory in Judith 16 and there are laments for the desolation of Jerusalem in 1 Macc. 2:6-12; 3:45, 49-53.

OTHER EXTRACANONICAL LITERATURE

The Apocrypha can scarcely be said to be a representative collection of Jewish literature between the Bible and the Mishnah. Some major categories are underrepresented. The apocalyptic literature is represented only by 2 Esdras, which is one of the finer works of the genre, but somewhat atypical nonetheless. The Apocrypha includes no Testament as an independent work, although testaments are included in 1 Maccabees (2:49-70, testament of Mattathias) and Tobit (4:3-21, mainly moral instruction, and 14:3-11, mainly predictive). Sibylline Oracles, which flourished in Hellenistic Judaism from the second century B.C., are not represented. In general, the extensive literature dealing with eschatological prophecy was only minimally taken up. Biblical paraphrases, such as we find in Jubilees and Pseudo-Philo, are also omitted. The Dead Sea Scrolls have brought to light other genres of literature (Rules, Commentaries [pesharim]) that are not hinted at in this collection.

At least some books that were not finally included in the Apocrypha were sometimes regarded as authoritative in the early church. 1 Enoch is cited in the Letter of Jude and is probably alluded to in 1 Pet. 3:19-20 and 2 Pet. 2:4. It is cited as Scripture in the Letter of Barnabas and Tertullian argued that it should be accepted by Christians since it "made proclamation concerning the Lord" (On Women's Dress 1.3). The Assumption of Moses is also cited in Jude. Clement of Alexandria displayed familiarity with several Pseudepigrapha. Many of the Pseudepigrapha (Jubilees, 1 Enoch, Ascension of Isaiah) were preserved by the Ethiopian church, intermingled in the biblical manuscripts, and Jubilees at least was accepted as canonical (see Beckwith, pp. 478-505).

The significance of this extracanonical literature is manifold. It is of great historical importance for understanding the variety within Jewish religion in the formative period of Christianity and of rabbinic Judaism. Stories and motifs from the Apocrypha have become embedded in Western culture—Handel wrote oratorios on Susanna and Judas Maccabeus. Italian and German operas were composed on the theme of Judith. Susanna, Tobit, and Judith were popular subjects for artists. A verse from 2 Esdras (6:42, which says that the waters occupy one-seventh part of the earth) is said to have inspired Columbus on his voyage of discovery (see Metzger, pp. xviii–xx).

The theological importance of the Apocrypha is considerable too. The very existence of this body of literature is a reminder that the canon, in any of its forms, is a selection from a wider corpus of traditional literature and that there was considerable fluidity on its boundaries. The recent revival of interest in the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha can only enrich our appreciation of the biblical heritage by helping us recover a fuller spectrum of the tradition.

1 ESDRAS

R A L P H W. K L E I N

INTRODUCTION

The First Book of Esdras contains an alternate form of the text of 2 Chronicles 35–36, Ezra 1–10, Neh. 7:73–8:13, and an account of a contest in the court of Darius (1 Esd. 3:1–5:6) not attested elsewhere in the Bible.

The book is called Esdras a in the Septuagint (LXX), where it is distinguished from Esdras b, a literal Greek translation of the OT books of Ezra and Nehemiah. 1 Esdras is called 3 Ezra in the Latin Vulgate (Vg.), where it, the Prayer of Manasseh, and 2 Esdras (known there as 4, 5, and 6 Ezra) are printed as a supplement to the NT.

The relationship between 1 Esdras and other portions of the canon is as follows:

- 1 Esd. 1:1–22 = 2 Chron. 35:1–19
- 1 Esd. 1:23–24 = (no parallel)
- 1 Esd. 1:25–58 = 2 Chron. 35:20–36:21
- 1 Esd. 2:1–5a = 2 Chron. 36:22–23 /
Ezra 1:1–3a
- 1 Esd. 2:5b–15 = Ezra 1:3b–11
- 1 Esd. 2:16–30 = Ezra 4:7–24
- 1 Esd. 3:1–5:6 = (no parallel)
- 1 Esd. 5:7–73 = Ezra 2:1–4:5
- 1 Esd. 6:1–9:36 = Ezra 5:1–10:44
- 1 Esd. 9:37–55 = Neh. 7:73–8:13a.

Except for the last section above, 1 Esdras omits everything from the book of Nehemiah. Neh. 7:73–8:13a is treated, probably correctly, as a part of the story of Ezra, without mention of Nehemiah. The major addition in 1 Esd. 3:1–5:6 recounts the wisdom of Zerubbabel and explains why Darius, the Persian king, authorized a return of the Jews from Babylon to Jerusalem and their rebuilding of the Temple, and why he supported financially and legally the postexilic religious establishment in Jerusalem. It also exalts Zerubbabel and, implicitly, the Davidic line.

Ezra 4:7–24 has been moved to a position before 1 Esd. 3:1–5:6 (at 1 Esd. 2:16–30). According to this passage, criticisms from the enemies of the Jews during the days of Artaxerxes led to the cessation of work on the Temple until the time of Darius, even though Artaxerxes ruled after Darius. 1 Esdras partially unscrambled this confusion by putting Darius' efforts to stop the Temple in 2:16–30 before his permission for Zerubbabel to rebuild the Temple in 3:1–5:6.

To some 1 Esdras represents a fragmentary copy of an earlier arrangement of the Chronicler's history. In this view all or most of 1 Chronicles 1 to 2 Chronicles 34 has been lost from the beginning of 1 Esdras and at least Neh. 8:13b–18 from the end. Recent studies, however, question whether there ever was a Chronicler's history consisting of a unified account of 1 and 2 Chronicles and Ezra (or Ezra and Nehemiah) (→ Chronicler).

Others, therefore, treat 1 Esdras as a more or less complete document that has been drawn from the materials now in 1 and 2 Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah. They represent the integrity of the present book and seek to understand what its author or editor might have wanted to say by the present arrangement of materials. Tamara Eskenazi, for example, believes that the author of 1 Esdras wanted to conform the books of Ezra and Nehemiah to the ideology of the books of Chronicles by giving special emphasis to the centrality of David, the inclusive characteristics of Israel, the doctrine of retribution and the need to obey the prophets, and the Temple and its practices. Anne E. Gardner attempts to relate 1 Esdras as a complete book to the events and people of the Maccabean crisis. The reinterpretation of the death of Josiah in 1:23–24 shows that this disaster too was the result of sin and not divine caprice. The insertion of the story of the three bodyguards was to show that all the riches and power in the world are of no interest compared to rebuilding the Temple. The Temple's central importance is also emphasized by setting the beginning and ending of the book in the Temple, or at least in its vicinity.

Whether the book is a fragment or complete, whether its order represents an earlier form of the Chronicler's history or a compilation drawn from the canonical books of 2 Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, this much is certain: the addition in 1:23–24 helps to resolve the theological anomaly of Josiah's premature death, and the addition in 3:1–5:6 places great emphasis on the Davidic Zerubbabel and explains why the Persian Darius was moved to authorize the rebuilding of the Temple.

The Greek translation now contained in 1 Esdras, though relatively free, is based on an older and often shorter form of the Hebrew and Aramaic biblical text. Esdras b in the LXX is based on a Semitic text that closely resembles the later, Masoretic Text (MT).

COMMENTARY

(For passages with parallels elsewhere in the canon, readers are referred to the commentaries on the appropriate sections of 2 Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah.)

1:1-2:30

Extracts from 2 Chronicles and Ezra

1:1-58

The Last Kings of Judah

1:1-22 (2 Chron. 35:1-19), Josiah's Passover. It is unlikely that 1 Esdras originally began at this point, since Josiah is not introduced in v. 1 as the king and no year is provided in the date formula of this verse (see 2 Chron. 34:8, where the date is given as Josiah's eighteenth year). The Levites slaughtered the Passover sacrifice as they had for the Passover of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 30:17), and the Passover was both roasted and boiled (cf. Exod. 12:8-9; Deut. 16:7). No Passover had been held like this one since the time of Samuel the prophet (1 Esd. 1:20; in 2 Kings 23:22 the last such Passover was held when the judges ruled Israel). The uniqueness of this Passover, in the opinion of the Chronicler, apparently consisted in the prominent role of the Levites.

1:23-24 (without canonical parallel), The Reason for the Fall of Israel. These verses are a supplement based on 1 Kings 13:2, 32 (a prophecy of the rise of Josiah) or 2 Kings 23:24-27. They explain that the evil of the people at the time of Josiah was so great that the judgmental words of the LORD eventually had to rise up against Israel. Without these verses some might conclude that the great piety of Josiah would have prevented the final destruction of Jerusalem that occurred a few years after his death. C. C. Torrey believes that these two verses were part of the original text of Chronicles.

1:25-33 (2 Chron. 35:20-27), The Death of Josiah. Josiah was killed in a battle with Pharaoh Neco of Egypt, near Megiddo, in 609 B.C. The Egyptian leader was on his way to the Euphrates to support the Assyrians, who had suffered a series of defeats at the hands of the Neo-Babylonian Empire. The death of Josiah at the age of forty is theologically unexplained in 2 Kings and in fact it seems to contradict the doctrine of retribution, which held that a person's fate corresponded to his or her deeds (→ Retribution). According to 2 Chron. 35:21, Neco sent messengers to Josiah warning him not to disobey the word of the LORD by opposing his march toward the Euphrates. In v. 28, 1 Esdras asserts that this word of the LORD that favored Neco was actually delivered by Jeremiah the prophet. By ignoring such a prophetic word in his attack on Neco, Josiah brought about his premature death. 1 Esdras reports that these events were recorded in the histories of the kings of Judea (cf. 2 Kings 23:28) while 2 Chron. 35:25 adds that the laments for Josiah were written in "the laments," a reference either to the biblical book of Lamentations or to some other similar collection.

1:34-58 (2 Chron. 36:1-21), The Successors of Josiah and the Destruction of Jerusalem. The names of the kings are confused in 1 Esdras: instead of the expected Jehoahaz in v. 34, the Greek text reads Jeconiah (= Jehoiachin), and instead of Jehoiachin in v. 43, the Greek text reads Jehoiakim. According to 2 Chron. 36:4 (1 Esd. 1:37 is defective), the king of Egypt made Eliakim king and then changed his name to Jehoiakim. Neco exiled Jehoahaz to Egypt according to 2 Chron. 36:4, but 1 Esdras reports in 1:38 that Jehoiakim brought Zarius (?) from Egypt.

1 Esdras 1:40 follows 2 Chron. 36:6 in reporting that Jehoiakim was taken to Babylonian exile (cf. 2 Kings 24:1, 5). 1 Esdras speaks of the king's uncleanness and impiety (v. 42), whereas 2 Chron. 36:8 mentions his abominations. Both 2 Chronicles (36:12) and 1 Esdras (1:47) criticize Zedekiah for refusing to submit to the word of the LORD delivered through Jeremiah. 1 Esdras adds that Zedekiah violated an oath sworn to Nebuchadnezzar and transgressed the laws of the LORD (v. 48).

When the Exile finally came, it lasted for seventy years, to fulfill the word of Jeremiah (v. 58; cf. Jer. 25:11; 29:10). During this time the land enjoyed its Sabbath rest in fulfillment of Lev. 26:34-35. Because the people had not made provision for proper Sabbath observance in the pre-exilic period, rest for the land was provided by the Exile. Through this Sabbath rest the word of the prophet Jeremiah has been linked to and interpreted by a passage from the Torah.

2:1-30

The Early Days of the Return

2:1-5a (2 Chron. 36:22-23; Ezra 1:1-3a), The Decree of Cyrus. The last verses of 2 Chronicles are repeated in the opening verses of Ezra. 1 Esdras does not repeat the doublet at the end of Chronicles and the beginning of Ezra, and this fact has led a number of scholars to suppose that the books of 1 and 2 Chronicles and (at least) Ezra once formed a part of the supposed Chronicler's history of Israel (see the "Introduction" above). Cyrus, under the influence of the Lord of Israel, decreed that the Judean exiles could go home and restore the Temple to fulfill the word of Jeremiah (e.g., Jer. 51:1, 6; cf. Isa. 41:2, 25; 44:28; 45:1).

2:5b-15 (Ezra 1:3b-11), The Return Under Sheshbazzar. After Cyrus had given permission for the return to the land of Israel and the rebuilding of the Temple, he urged that the returnees be supported with generous offerings by their neighbors. He also restored the Temple vessels, which had been captured by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 24:13; 25:13-16; 2 Chron. 36:10, 18; Jer. 52:17-19), to Sheshbazzar, the governor. This restoration helped to establish continuity between the First and Second Temples, just as the new Temple was set on its old site (Ezra 6:3; 1 Esd. 6:24) and the altar on its original foundations (Ezra 3:3; 1 Esd. 5:50).

2:16-30 (Ezra 4:7-24), Letters to and from Artaxerxes. According to Ezra 4:4-5 (1 Esd. 5:72-73), the people of the land harassed the Jews and prevented the completion of the Temple during the time of Cyrus (559-530 B.C.) and up to the second year of Darius (522-486 B.C.). The next verses, Ezra 4:6-23, justify the Jewish rejection of help from their neighbors (Ezra 4:3), since subsequent history—fifty years later—proved that the Samaritans had no positive interest in the restoration of Jerusalem (→ Samaritans). Ezra 4:24 returns chronologically to 4:5, the cessation of work on the Temple that lasted until 520 B.C.

1 Esdras lacks an equivalent for most of the obscure Ezra 4:6, and it has moved the whole unit under discussion to a different place than it occupies in the book of Ezra. Because of the ringing endorsement of the Temple by Darius in 1 Esd. 3:1-5:6, it was necessary to put the account of Darius stopping the Temple building earlier. Thus, readers of 1 Esdras are not able to treat 1 Esd. 2:16-29 (Ezra 4:6-23) as a digression designed to show the faithless character of the Samaritans. This shift in location also separates this passage from its continuation in 1 Esd. 6:1-7:9 (Ezra 5:1-6:18). Ezra 4:7-6:18 is written in Aramaic and often referred to as the Aramaic Chronicle.

Various Samaritan leaders in the time of Artaxerxes I (465-424 B.C.) complained in writing to the Persian king about the rebellious character of Jerusalem. They charged that the Jews were repairing the walls of the city and laying the foundations for the Temple (2:18; "the building of the Temple is now going on," 2:20; cf. the more general "repairing the foundations" in Ezra 4:12). These activities, according to the accusers, would lead to loss of taxes for the empire and open revolt. They implored the king to check the official archives that would show that the Jews had always been rebellious and that this troubling characteristic, in fact, had been the reason for the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians. They alleged that the present rebellion would deprive the king of his Syro-Palestinian holdings.

The king's records confirmed the charges that Jerusalem had long been the home of rebels and cruel kings (2:26-27; Ezra 4:18-20). He ordered all work on the city to cease, and the Samaritan officials hurried to Jerusalem with a military force and stopped the building. Hence the building of the Temple ceased until the second year of Darius, or 520 B.C. According to both 1 Esdras and Ezra, the reason for the delay in Temple building was the interference by local obstructionists, not the indifference of the restoration community, as in Haggai and Zechariah.

3:1-5:6

The Contest of the Bodyguards

3:1-17a, What One Thing Is Strongest?

King Darius prepared a great banquet for all the officials of the Persian Empire, which stretched from India to Ethiopia (cf. Esther 1:1; 8:9). While there is a hint that the king had insomnia (1 Esd. 3:3), the king is asleep during the initial contest among the bodyguards. Strangely, the bored bodyguards determined for themselves what prizes the king would award in the contest (vv. 5-7). Whoever would come up with the wisest answer about what is the strongest would receive fine clothing, a gold bed, and an exalted position as "kinsman" of the king. In his retelling of the account, first-century Jewish historian Josephus has the king himself propose the contest and promise the rewards (Antiquities of the Jews 11.3.2 §35).

The bodyguards decided to put their proposals under the king's pillow and to abide by the decision he and the three nobles of Persia would make. The first two bodyguards proposed wine and the king respectively as the two strongest things in all the world. The third suggested that women are the strongest, but then changed his answer to truth, since it is the victor over all things. When the king woke up and learned about the contest, he summoned all his officials and ordered the three bodyguards to explain the reasons for their opinions.

3:17b-24, The Speech of the First Bodyguard. Each speech has a common introductory formula ("Gentlemen," followed by a rhetorical question), and each ends in a similar way ("he stopped speaking"). Wine demonstrates its strength by equally leading astray the mind of all classes in society. Wine makes people forget sorrows or poverty, but it also makes people forget to be friendly. People drunk with wine fight, and when they sober up, they cannot remember what they have done. After exploring the ambiguities of wine, the wise bodyguard concludes that it must be the strongest thing, since it forces people to do the things he has just described.

4:1-12, The Speech of the Second Bodyguard. References to men as the strongest (v. 2; cf. 4:14) have led to the proposal that a speech about the strength of men has been lost. The second bodyguard concentrates primarily on the ambivalent qualities of the king. Kings get people to fight for them blindly and to turn over all their booty to the royal treasury. Soldiers hardly ever wonder whether the goal of war justifies the supreme sacrifice. Farmers too are controlled by the king, who forces them to pay taxes on their produce. The word obey is prominent in this speech (vv. 3, 5, 10, 11, 12). People fight for or farm for the king even though he is only a man (v. 6). In addition, the king eats, drinks, and sleeps, and so he is vulnerable. Yet no one attacks him or goes off to take care of his own business (v. 11). Seven times in vv. 7-9, the speaker notes that whatever the king commands, his subjects do.

4:13-41, The Speech of the Third Bodyguard. The fact that Zerubbabel suddenly appears without advance notice in v. 13 probably means that the contest among the bodyguards once served another (non-Jewish?) function before it was included in 1 Esdras. Zerubbabel first reviews the previous proposals about the king, men, and wine before turning to consider women. Since women are the originators of kings and other rulers, by giving birth to them, they are clearly superior to these political figures. Women also raise the men who plant vineyards, which in turn produce wine. Women make men's clothes and affect their reputation. Men who have accumulated all sorts of treasures drop them in open-mouthed amazement when they gaze at a beautiful woman. Men leave their parents and their native lands to live out their lives with their wives. Hence, the bodyguard argues, "women rule over you."

While soldiers are forced by the king's power to fight, men voluntarily undertake all sorts of military or dangerous adventures for the women they love. They face wild animals or even take up lives of crime so that they can lay their trophies at the feet of a woman. Many lose their minds because of women, become slaves because of them, and perish or sin because of them.

The third bodyguard, Zerubbabel, even dares to contrast the strength of women with that of King Darius. While foreign lands fear him, his concubine Apame playfully takes his crown and puts it on her head and slaps the king with her left hand. The king looks at her in open-mouthed amazement like the rich men noted above. He laughs when she laughs; when she becomes angry, he flatters her. This defense of the strength of women is an incisive critique of the second bodyguard's proposal about the strength of kings.

Just when it seems as if the case is closed—the king and his nobles look at one another, astonished at Zerubbabel's boldness and ready to make their decision (v. 33)—the third bodyguard begins to assert the superiority of truth as the strongest of all phenomena (cf. Ps. 117:2; 146:6). "Truth" may connote rightness, steadfastness, and uprightness in addition to its usual meanings. Truth is a quality of God. Earth and heaven call upon and bless truth; all the previous candidates for the strongest thing—wine, the king, women, the sons of men and their works—are deemed unrighteous or deceptive. Because of their unrighteousness people die, but truth is strong and prevails forever and ever. Truth controls the strength, kingship, power, and majesty of all the ages (1 Esd. 4:40; cf. 1 Chron. 29:11-13 and the doxological conclusion to the Lord's Prayer). Truth is an impartial judge. That is why Zerubbabel could tell the truth about the king's subordination to his concubine in 1 Esd. 4:29-32. Finally, the bodyguard prays, "Blessed be the God of truth!" (This prayer hints that God himself may even be stronger than truth; cf. also vv. 34-35a.) The speech of the third bodyguard leads the people to acclaim his answer. The Latin rendering of their cheer—Magna est veritas et praevalet ("Great is truth and it will prevail")—has become a well-known proverb.

4:42-57, Zerubbabel's Prize. Darius recognized Zerubbabel as the wisest of his bodyguards and honored him as a kinsman (v. 42; cf. 3:7). Thanks to the story of the three bodyguards, Zerubbabel becomes in 1 Esdras the most important person of the restoration period. He is wise, pious, and loves the people. God gave him the wisdom that won the contest. As in Daniel, a Jew has pitted his wisdom against that of gentile rivals and has won both the contest and the king's favor. His personal success and his favor with Darius did not make him forget his duty. Zerubbabel reminded the king of vows that he and Cyrus had made to build Jerusalem, to return the ritual vessels there, and to rebuild the Temple. Though 1 Esd. 1:55 (2 Chron. 36:19) reports that the kings of the Chaldeans destroyed the Temple, v. 45 blames that action on the Edomites (cf. Ezek. 36:5; Obad. 11-14).

In his favorable reply (1 Esd. 4:47-57) Darius combined elements of the decree of Cyrus (Ezra 1:2-4; 6:3-5), his own affirmation of this decree (Ezra 6:6-12), and Artaxerxes' authorization of Nehemiah (Neh. 2:5, 8). He granted Zerubbabel and the other returnees safe conduct, provided cedar-wood from Lebanon to rebuild the Temple, and exempted the Jews from governmental searches of their houses. Darius also excused the Jews from taxes and expelled the Idumeans (Edomites) from their territory. He provided for annual grants for rebuilding the Temple and for maintaining the regular worship, perhaps hoping that sacrifices and prayers would be made for him and his sons (cf. 1 Esd. 6:31; Ezra 6:10). Like his predecessor Cyrus (Ezra 6:5), he commanded that the Temple vessels be restored. In 1 Esdras and Ezra the Temple vessels are returned also by Sheshbazzar (1 Esd. 2:14-15; Ezra 1:11; cf. 1 Esd. 6:18-19; Ezra 5:14-15), in addition to Zerubbabel. The commandment to offer seventeen daily sacrifices (1 Esd. 4:52) is unattested elsewhere in the OT.

4:58-63, The Jewish Response. Zerubbabel (called only the "young man" in v. 58) offered appropriate thanksgiving to the King of Heaven, who had granted him wisdom. When he shared the good news with other Jews in Babylon, they rejoiced for seven days, a response more enthusiastic than seems to have been the case historically.

5:1-6, The Leaders of the Return. Darius provided the caravan with a cavalry escort of one thousand and sent them off with martial music. The names in v. 5 show some confusion. Jeshua is the high priest of the early postexilic period (see Ezra 3:2). The other figure is the governor Zerubbabel. Read: "Zerubbabel, son of Shealtiel, son of Jehoiachin, of the house of David . . ." The book of Ezra makes no mention of Zerubbabel's Davidic descent, perhaps because the author was receptive to Persian domination and attached no hopes for deliverance to the house of David.

The Rebuilding of the Temple

5:7-46 (Ezra 2:1-70; cf. Neh. 7:6-73a), The List of Those Who Returned. This list may be a composite summary of a number of returns to Palestine during the reigns of Cyrus and his successor Cambyses, though in 1 Esdras it is used to describe the return of Zerubbabel during the reign of Darius. Twelve leaders are listed in v. 8 (instead of Bigvai [RSV] read Nahamani [cf. Neh. 7:7]). Laity are listed in 1 Esd. 5:9-23, priests in vv. 24-25, Levites and other Temple personnel in vv. 26-35, and those who could not prove their ancestry in vv. 36-40. The governor Atharhars (= tirshata' of the Hebrew text [Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65]) seems to be falsely identified in 1 Esd. 5:40 with Nehemiah (cf. Neh. 8:9; 10:1). The list presupposes that the community in Palestine was composed almost exclusively of Jews who had been in exile (cf. Jer. 24:10), though this does not conform to historical fact.

5:47-65 (Ezra 3:1-13), The Altar and the Temple Foundation. The text of Ezra implies that the altar was set up without delay, in September, 538 B.C., though it has confused Zerubbabel with Sheshbazzar. According to the arrangement of materials in 1 Esdras, however, the altar was reestablished only in the reign of Darius (522-486 B.C.). The people celebrated the Feast of Booths (or Tabernacles), which began on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, and offered up the daily sacrifices required for this feast. Thereafter, all appointed feasts were kept (1 Esd. 5:52).

The foundation of the Temple was laid on the new moon of the second month of the second year of their return (v. 57, lacking in Ezra 3; but see 1 Esd. 5:56 and Ezra 3:8). In 1 Esdras this account must refer to 520 B.C., a date that causes difficulty in 1 Esd. 5:63, where some were still alive who had seen the First Temple that had been destroyed sixty-seven years earlier. In Ezra 3:8 the "second year" refers to the second year of the exiles' work on the house of God, not to the second year after their return from exile.

The ceremony at the beginning of the repairs on the Temple echoes that of Solomon at the dedication of the Temple (1 Kings 8; 2 Chron. 5-7) and of David at the bringing of the Ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15-16). Older people, who had seen the First Temple, wept, while many others rejoiced. The Greek of 1 Esd. 5:65 suggests that people could not hear the trumpets because of the weeping of the people. The corresponding Hebrew verse (Ezra 3:13) notes that the people could not distinguish the sounds of shouts of joy from the shouts of weeping.

5:66-73 (Ezra 4:1-5), Opponents Stop the Building of the Temple.

Adversaries heard the sound of the trumpets and came to find out what was going on. The Jewish leaders refused the offer of these enemies, who claimed to have been worshiping the LORD ever since Esarhaddon had brought them to Palestine. The placement of these verses in the reign of Darius by 1 Esd. 5:6 (cf. 5:47, 56, 57) causes great difficulties, since Zerubbabel and Jeshua seem to be under orders from Cyrus, the second Persian king before Darius, to rebuild the Temple. It may be that 1 Esdras originally had only a two-month interruption of work during the reign of Darius, and that the present confusion results from partial assimilation to the text of Ezra.

6:1-7:15 (Ezra 5:1-6:22), The Temple Completed. Work on the Temple resumed in the second year of Darius (6:1; this date is lacking in Ezra 5:1), thanks to the encouragement of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah and the leadership of Zerubbabel and Jeshua. Tattenai and Shetharbozenai (transcribed as Sisinnos and Sathrabuzanes in 1 Esdras), Persian officials of Coele Syria and Phoenicia (called the province "Beyond the River" in Ezra 5:3), questioned the Jews about their authorization for Temple building and demanded (1 Esd. 6:12; Ezra 5:10 "asked") a list of the leaders' names. Fortunately, they decided to bring their concerns to Darius instead of trying to stop the project. In their letter to Darius they quoted the Jews' self-defense (1 Esd. 6:13-20), in which the Jews recited the history of the Temple from its erection by Solomon to its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar and to the authorization to rebuild it by Cyrus. They claimed that the Temple vessels were given by Cyrus to their governors Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel (6:18; Ezra 5:14 mentions only Sheshbazzar). The Persian officials concluded their letter by asking Darius if the claim of Cyrus's approval for the Temple was true.

Darius found the decree of Cyrus in Ecbatana and ordered the Persian officials not to interfere with the Temple and to allow Zerubbabel, the governor of the Jews, and his colleagues to continue (1 Esd. 6:27). The text of Ezra (6:7) does not identify the governor by name, nor does it call him the servant of the LORD (cf. also 1 Esd. 6:29; Ezra 6:8). Darius ordered financial support for the Temple and for the sacrificial service that would be carried on there. He also put any opponents of the Temple under the threat of capital punishment (1 Esd. 6:32). Verse 33 refers to the LORD who is "called upon" at the Temple; the corresponding text of Ezra (6:12) refers to God "who has caused his name to dwell there."

The Persian officials cooperated with the Jews, and the work proceeded, encouraged by Haggai and Zechariah, the command of God, and the consent of Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes (1 Esd. 7:1-4). The latter king, of course, ruled long after the Temple was completed. Perhaps his provisions for the Temple at the time of Ezra led to the addition of his name here. The Temple was completed on the twenty-third (7:5; Ezra 6:15: third) day of the month Adar, in the sixth year of Darius (April 1, 515 B.C.). The twenty-third of Adar fell on a Friday; the third on a Sabbath. At the dedication the priests and Levites performed the appropriate sacrifices as prescribed in the Pentateuch (the author of 1 Chron. 23-26 attributed such prescriptions to David). 1 Esdras adds that the gatekeepers were at each gate (7:9; this reference is lacking in Ezra 6:18).

Subsequently (in the text of Ezra the language switches from Aramaic back to Hebrew at this point), the community kept the Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread in thanksgiving for the help given them by Darius, who here is given the unusual title of "the king of the Assyrians" (1 Esd. 7:15; Ezra 6:22). At the rededications of the Temple in the time of Hezekiah and Josiah, Passover was also observed (2 Chron. 30:13-27; 2 Chron. 35:1-19).

8:1-9:55

The Career of Ezra

8:1-67 (Ezra 7:1-8:36), Ezra's Trip to Jerusalem. Fifty-seven years later, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes (458 B.C.), Ezra, a priest and scribe, was sent to Jerusalem to investigate the situation there on the basis of the law. Ezra's priestly status is demonstrated by the genealogy in 8:1-2. The king's letter (8:9-24; the text of Ezra 7:12-26 is in Aramaic) commanded Ezra to lead Jews to Jerusalem, deliver gifts to the Temple, make inquiry about how the law was being implemented in Judah and Jerusalem, and appoint judges to administer and teach the law.

Ezra expressed his thanksgiving at the beginning of a first person narrative (1 Esd. 8:25-90; Ezra 7:27-9:15). After a list of those who were ready to return with Ezra (1 Esd. 8:28-40; Ezra 8:1-14), Ezra sought to find additional priests and Levites to go with him to Jerusalem; in the book of Ezra only the absence of Levites is mentioned. Thirty-eight descendants of Levi were found, in addition to 220 Temple servants. Ezra fasted and prayed for protection but did not seek a royal escort, lest that be construed as a lack of trust in the power of the LORD. He entrusted the enormous gifts he was bringing to twelve priests, who were charged with delivering the gifts to the authorities in Jerusalem. The inflated totals—equal to the income of 100,000 to 500,000 people—may be an attempt to give glory to the Temple. The king, his officials, and all Israel had given these gifts (1 Esd. 8:55) just as they did for the construction of Solomon's Temple (1 Chron. 26:26).

With God's help Ezra's entourage arrived safe and sound in Jerusalem and turned over the gifts to two priests and two Levites. A series of animal sacrifices—12 bulls, 96 rams, 72 lambs, and 12 he-goats—may express the idea that the restoration community was "all Israel," since the numbers are all multiples of twelve.

8:68–9:36 (Ezra 9:1–10:44), A Crisis over Mixed Marriages. Ezra was informed that a number of people, including the leaders, had married foreign wives, a situation that had the potential of leading to syncretistic practices. After expressing shock and mourning for this iniquity, Ezra confessed Israel's sin throughout its history but also noted the gracious actions of God that had recently given them a root and a name. The LORD had also brought them into favor with the Persian kings who glorified the Temple of the LORD and raised Zion from desolation (1 Esd. 8:81; cf. the more modest claims in Ezra 9:9). This restored community now had violated the law and the prophets by intermarrying with the peoples of the land, and this raised the possibility that God would destroy the community without root, seed, or name.

At the suggestion of Shecaniah (Gk., Jecaniah), Ezra led the people in taking an oath to divorce their foreign wives (1 Esd. 8:91–96; Ezra 10:1–5). In response to a proclamation that threatened severe penalties, an assembly was held of all the tribes of Judah and Benjamin in Jerusalem on the twentieth day of the ninth month. The multitude listened to Ezra and agreed to divorce their foreign wives, though they asked for additional time because of the large number of people involved and the inclement weather and decided to turn the matter over to a special investigative commission. Ezra appointed the commission on the new moon of the tenth month, and it completed its work by the new moon of the first month. Thus, within a year of Ezra's departure from Babylon (1 Esd. 8:61), a purified community had been created in Jerusalem. The account closes in 8:18–36 (Ezra 10:18–44) with a list of 101 or 102 priests, Levites, and laity who had intermarried. The problem, which was primarily confined to the upper classes, involved only a very small percent of the population.

9:37–55 (Neh. 7:73–8:13a), Ezra Reads the Law. 1 Esdras appears to contain an equivalent to Neh. 7:73, the last verse of the list in Nehemiah 7. If this judgment is correct, the compiler of 1 Esdras probably knew the present arrangement of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. Some argue that 1 Esdras did not know about Nehemiah 1–7 and that his placement of Nehemiah 8 right after Ezra 10 represents the original location for this chapter. Most are agreed that the events of Nehemiah 8 belong historically in the context of Ezra 10.

Ezra read the law to the assembly on the first day of the seventh month, at the east gate of the Temple. The book from which Ezra read for five to six hours (1 Esd. 9:41) was very likely some form of the Pentateuch. The people assented to the law by calling out "Amen" and by prostrating themselves on the ground. Thirteen Levites taught the law to the assembly by explaining what had been read (v. 48).

Verse 49 should be emended to read: "Ezra the chief priest and reader said to the Levites, who were teaching the multitudes . . ." The Greek text has the "governor" (Attharátēs) address Ezra and the Levites (cf. RSV and Neh. 8:9). Ezra assured the Levites that the day was a holy feast day, and that there was no reason to mourn since the LORD would exalt them. Inspired by what they had heard, the community prepared for a festive meal, in which those who had nothing could also share. The book of 1 Esdras breaks off in mid-sentence in 9:55, "And they came together . . ." The Hebrew text of the corresponding verse in Neh. 8:13 reads: "And on the second day the heads of the fathers' houses of all the people, with the priests and the Levites, gathered together to Ezra the scribe in order to study the words of the law." Did 1 Esdras originally end in mid-sentence, with this whole verse, or with all of Neh. 8:13–18, the account of the celebration of the Feast of Booths (Feast of Tabernacles)? According to Neh. 8:17 there had been no Feast of Booths like this since the days of Joshua (Joshua; cf. 2 Chron. 30:26; 2 Chron. 35:18). Josephus, who follows 1 Esdras in the Antiquities, alludes to all of Neh. 8:13–18 (Antiquities of the Jews 11.5.5 §157).

Names and Parts

A number of writings in Jewish and Christian tradition are connected with the figure of Ezra, or Esdras, as the name is rendered in Greek. In the Greek and Latin Bible manuscripts that preserve the most familiar of these works, it was customary to distinguish them by number (i.e., 1 Esdras, 2 Esdras, 3 Esdras, etc.). Unfortunately, the Septuagint (the Greek translation, LXX), the Latin Vulgate, many later Latin manuscripts, and the English editions all use different numbering systems. Complicating the situation even more is the fact that the Second Book of Esdras actually consists of three independent writings (chaps. 1–2, chaps. 3–14, and chaps. 15–16). Modern biblical scholars customarily use either a system of numbering derived from the Latin Vulgate or one derived from the later Latin manuscripts. Here we will use the one derived from the Vulgate in which 1 Ezra is the canonical book of Ezra; 2 Ezra is the canonical book of Nehemiah; 3 Ezra is the book of 1 Esdras in the English Apocrypha; and 4 Ezra is the central portion of 2 Esdras (i.e., 2 Esdras 3–14). To identify the two independent writings that accompany 4 Ezra, the title 5 Ezra is used to refer to 2 Esdras 1–2, while 6 Ezra identifies 2 Esdras 15–16.

Literary Analysis and Description

5 Ezra. 5 Ezra, which was composed as an independent literary unit, is made up of two parts: a prophetic indictment of God's people (1:4–2:9) and a promise of redemption to a new people (2:10–48).

4 Ezra. 4 Ezra is an apocalypse, a form of literature in which heavenly secrets, often including information about the impending end of days, are revealed to a seer. Such revelations are frequently presented as visions, mediated by an angel (see the books of Daniel and Revelation). 4 Ezra consists of seven such visions, separated by small narrative units. The first three visions take the form of dialogues between Ezra, the pseudonymous author (→ Pseudonym), and an angel of God. The fourth is a waking experience of the heavenly Jerusalem;

the fifth and sixth are symbolic dreams interpreted by an angel. The seventh vision relates Ezra's receipt of sacred scriptures from God and his transmission of them.

6 Ezra. 6 Ezra may have been written as an appendix to 4 Ezra. In literary form the work moves from prophetic prediction of eschatological woes (15:5–16:34) to exhortation of God's people (16:35–78). In content, 6 Ezra is heavily dependent upon the OT prophetic writings.

Text and Original Language

■ Ezra. 5 Ezra was probably written in Greek, although it survives only in two significantly different Latin versions.

4 Ezra. 4 Ezra is a Jewish work, originally written in Hebrew. The Hebrew original was translated into Greek and from Greek into a variety of languages by different churches: Latin, Ethiopic, Syriac, Georgian, Arabic, Armenian, and Coptic. The Hebrew and Greek versions are lost, except for a few quotations, and all modern translations of the book are based on these later "daughter" versions.

6 Ezra. Although a fragment of 6 Ezra exists in Greek, the book's probable language of composition, the work survives in full only in two Latin versions.

Historical, Social, and Religious Setting

■ Ezra. The date, place of origin, and authorship of 5 Ezra are uncertain. The contents of the book suggest, however, that it was composed during the second century A.D. by a Christian who was writing in the context of a dispute with Judaism.

4 Ezra. We can be more confident about the circumstances of the composition of 4 Ezra. The book stems from the last decade of the first century A.D. and was composed in reaction to the Roman destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Its primary concern, therefore, is to understand that traumatic event. To do this the book charts Ezra's development from distress to consolation. This development is paralleled by his growth as a visionary until, by the end of the sixth vision, he is designated a prophet. Full consolation has also brought full prophetic status. Thus another major concern of the book, the restoration of the tradition of secrets concerning the eschaton, or end-time, is made possible by Ezra's consolation.

Little is known about the social setting of the book, although it is possible to point to literary connections between 4 Ezra and other Jewish writings. Especially close are the Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch, which is dependent on 4 Ezra and written somewhat later, and the Biblical Antiquities of Pseudo-Philo, which seems to be earlier than 4 Ezra. In addition, the eagle vision of 4 Ezra (chaps. 11–12) is explicitly related to the vision of Daniel 7 (see 4 Ezra 12:11). Whether these literary relationships imply a social, historical continuity or something about the author's self-conscious sense of writing in a tradition cannot be finally established.

It is possible that the dialogues between Ezra and the angel in the first three visions reflect the conflicting viewpoints of two different groups in society. It seems more fruitful, however, to think of the conflicts in the book as reflecting the author's inner life and developing perspective. In its general views and attitudes, 4 Ezra seems to be close to rabbinic Judaism as it developed in the decades after the destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70.

6 Ezra. 6 Ezra was written to encourage a community in a time of persecution. Internal indications suggest a date in the late third century A.D. (see commentary below on 15:28–33). The work is usually regarded as a Christian composition, although Jewish authorship cannot be excluded.

Role in Religious Communities

5 Ezra. The texts of 5 and 6 Ezra were joined with 4 Ezra at some time before A.D. 800. (For the historical influence of the combined work, see commentary below under 4 Ezra.) The latter part of 5 Ezra (2:33–48) exerted a strong influence upon the liturgy of the Roman church.

4 Ezra. The role of 4 Ezra in Judaism remains largely unknown, since Jewish tradition lost it at an early date. Its wide circulation among the Christian churches indicates its popularity there. 4 Ezra was on the fringe of canonical scriptures in the Latin church down to the Council of Trent and is usually included in manuscripts of the Latin Bible (the Vulgate). Its position was similar in the Armenian church. Other churches seem to have cherished it but did not consider it fully part of Scripture. The "Prayer of Ezra" (8:20–36) had an independent life in the Latin and Syriac liturgical traditions.

6 Ezra. 6 Ezra does not seem to have had a strong influence in Jewish or Christian communities. It is quoted extensively, however, by the British historian Gildas (sixth century A.D.).

COMMENTARY

PART ONE: 1:1–2:48

The Fifth Book of Ezra

A short work composed independently of 4 Ezra and 6 Ezra, 5 Ezra depicts Ezra as a prophet pronouncing judgment on God's people and announcing the transferral of God's patrimony to a new people or new "nations."

1:1–3

Ascription

The book is ascribed to "the prophet Ezra," whose priestly genealogy is traced (cf. Ezra 7:1–5; 1 Esd. 8:1–2). The designation of Ezra as "prophet" is unusual. In Ezra-Nehemiah and 1 Esdras he is described as "priest" or "scribe."

1:4–2:9

Prophetic Indictment

At God's command, Ezra indicts God's people, Israel, for their continual disobedience to the divine commandments. The present people will be abandoned, and God's inheritance will be given to a new people.

1:4–23, Historical Recital. After being commissioned by God as a prophet, Ezra recalls God's mighty acts for Israel during the Exodus. This historical review touches upon various well-known highlights of the biblical Exodus story but also includes several incidents not mentioned there (see vv. 11, 20b). Interwoven with the elements of the historical recital are rhetorical questions and statements of exasperation uttered by God (vv. 7b–9; 14b; 15b–17a; 21b), emphasizing the people's persistent unfaithfulness.

Such rehearsals of God's saving acts occur frequently in the Hebrew Bible (see, e.g., Pss. 105 and 106; Ezek. 20). This recital is especially close to the prayer in Neh. 9:6–31 (attributed to Ezra in the LXX) and to Psalm 78. In fact it may have been modeled on the latter. While the present passage serves as a prelude to God's indictment of the unfaithful people, a very different use of such a historical summary is made in 4 Ezra 3:4–27 (see commentary below).

1:24–37, Pronouncement of Judgment. On the basis of the incriminating evidence brought forward in the historical recital, God delivers an indictment against his people. He will turn and "give [his] name" to "other nations," who will be characterized by qualities of gratitude, obedience, and belief.

The simile of the hen gathering her brood and the context of vv. 30-33 have close parallels in the NT synoptic Gospels (cf. esp. Matt. 23:30-38). These parallels are interpreted by most commentators as evidence for Christian authorship of 5 Ezra.

1:38-40, Vision of the Coming People.

Ezra, addressed by God as "father," is summoned by God to observe "the people coming from the east." Language and images that had earlier been used to describe the return of Israel from exile (cf. Bar. 4:36; 5:5) and the expectation of the eschatological return of the dispersed tribes of Israel (cf. 4 Ezra 13:46-47) are here applied to the new people of God. In a symbolic way the heritage of Israel is given to this people. God announces that the leaders who will be given to the people coming from the east will include the three patriarchs and the twelve minor prophets.

2:1-7, Further Pronouncement of Judgment.

In a passage strongly recalling Bar. 4:11-21, Jerusalem, the "mother" of the people who have "sinned before the Lord God," bewails her children's sins. Whereas in Baruch Jerusalem sees her children returning from the east (Bar. 5:5), here Ezra is again invoked as "father" to testify against both mother and children and so bring about their destruction. This summons to Ezra (2:5-7) is often interpreted as a reference to the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 or 135.

2:8-9, Woe Against Assyria. The next section, in which God threatens Assyria with the punishment of Sodom and Gomorrah, seems incongruous in its context. It is not clear whom the author intends to identify as "Assyria."

2:10-41

Prophetic Exhortation of the New People

The focus of the book shifts from indictment of God's former people to encouragement of the newly chosen people.

2:10-14, Blessing and Instruction. God announces that his new people will inherit blessings previously reserved for Israel (vv. 10-11). That 5 Ezra is not a Jewish work in its present form is clear from this deprecatory reference to Israel. In addition, there are numerous echoes of phrases from the NT in these verses (cf. Matt. 24:22; Mark 13:37; Luke 11:9-10).

2:15-32, Exhortation of the Mother. The image of the mother, introduced in 2:2-6, is elaborated. In contrast to the previous passage, however, here the mother and her role are depicted in positive terms. The prophet encourages the mother to embrace her sons (v. 15) and, after enumerating the eschatological delights awaiting her children, informs her of her earthly, social responsibilities (vv. 20-23). The mother is reassured that when the day of tribulation comes, her children will receive "the first place in [God's] resurrection" (v. 23). The emphasis on eschatology (vv. 18-19, 24, 26-30) and resurrection (vv. 16, 23, 31) is especially pronounced.

The description of the mother in 2:15-32 is presented in deliberate contrast to that found in 2:2-6. In Bar. 4:8-35, which seems to have influenced the author of 5 Ezra, the mother in both her desolate and joyful aspects represents Jerusalem. In 5 Ezra, however, though the sorrowing mother appears to be Jerusalem, the book's Christian tenor has persuaded many commentators that the mother addressed in 2:15-32 stands for the church.

2:33-41, Encouragement of the Nations.

Ezra, now speaking in the first person, states that he was commanded by God on Mount Horeb to go to Israel but was rejected. He directs to the nations who "hear and understand" a series of exhortatory, eschatologically oriented statements. The depiction of Ezra on Mount Horeb (equated in biblical tradition with Mount Sinai) suggests a typological comparison of Ezra with Moses. These figures are also compared in 4 Ezra 14:1-8 and in various rabbinic sources.

2:42-48

The Vision of Ezra

Ezra receives a vision of a tall young man distributing crowns to a surrounding multitude on Mount Zion. An angel informs Ezra that the youth is the "son of God" and the crowd, those who "confessed the name of God." The vision probably represents Jesus rewarding Christian confessors (possibly martyrs). Though it has close parallels in Revelation 7 and the early Christian work Hermas, Similitudes 8-9, the vision is clearly based on Jewish models, especially 4 Ezra 13.

PART TWO: 3:1-14:48

The Fourth Book of Ezra

The section 3:1-14:48, which we are referring to as 4 Ezra, is a separate work from the preceding chaps. 1-2 and the following chaps. 15-16. It focuses on the religious problems raised for Ju-dism by the destruction of the Temple and Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70.

3:1-5:20

First Vision

The first vision is composed of four parts: an address to God, a dispute, a dialogic prediction, and a direct prediction. In the first the seer alone is the speaker; the second and third are dialogues between the seer and an angel; the fourth is set in the mouth of the angel alone.

3:1-3, Introduction. The protagonist, Ezra, is presented lying on his bed during the thirtieth year of the Babylonian exile. He is distressed by the suffering of Zion and breaks into an inspired address to God. Curiously, Ezra is identified with Salathiel (Heb. Shealtiel), perhaps Salathiel the father of Zerubbabel. See Ezra 3:2; 5:2.

3:4-36, Address. The address to God falls into two parts. The first, 3:4-27, sets forth the wondrous works of God in history, from the creation of Adam (3:5), through the saving of Noah (3:11), the election of Abraham (3:13), Exodus and Sinai (3:17-19), to David (3:23). In counterpoint to these events, the repeated sins of humankind and the punishment that God visits upon them are highlighted (3:7, 9-10, 25-27). The destruction of Jerusalem is the climax of sin and punishment. Even more significantly, throughout the address Ezra accuses God of responsibility for these events: God created; God punished; even when God gave the Law to "bring forth fruit in them," the evil inclination remained in the heart of the people "and thou didst not hinder them" (3:8, RSV).

In the Hebrew Bible such recitals of the gracious deeds of God usually precede the making or renewal of a covenant between God and Israel or form part of a legal indictment of Israel before the heavenly court for transgressing the covenant (cf. Josh. 24; Ezek. 20; Neh. 9). Here 4 Ezra strikingly inverts the biblical form and indicts God before the bar of his own justice for conducting the world unjustly. This radical position comes out of the seer's struggle to understand the seemingly incomprehensible destruction of the Temple.

4 Ezra's view that the tendency to sin was inherited from Adam by all generations is not unlike Pauline attitudes about original sin. What 4 Ezra says is inherited, however, is not sin but the weakness that enables persons to sin (3:26-27).

Following this very strong statement, a new, almost reflective tone enters (3:28-36). Ezra asks whether Babylon is any better (morally) than Zion, that it has gained dominion (3:28). Israel, whatever its sins, is still more God-fearing than other nations: "What nation has kept thy commandments so well?" (3:35, RSV). Already in the prophetic writings, although the political affliction of Israel by foreign nations was seen as the working of God, questions were raised about the moral qualities of the nations (see Isa. 10:5-19; cf. Jer. 25:8-14). Yet the justice of the punishment was not questioned by the prophets, whereas for 4 Ezra the moral faults of Babylon (Rome) raise questions about the justice of the punishment itself. Setting the theme for the dialogic dispute that follows, Ezra reproaches God who has "not shown to any one how thy way may be comprehended" (3:31, RSV). In this way the central issue of the book is posed, that of the justice of God's action toward Israel and by implication toward all humankind.

4:1-25, The Dispute. The angel Uriel appears in response to the address. He chides Ezra for wishing to understand the "way of the Most High," i.e., the working of divine providence. By use of riddle questions (4:5-8) and the striking dual parable of the forest and the sea (4:13-18) he demonstrates to Ezra that "men on earth can understand earthly things and nothing else; only those who live above the skies can understand the things above the skies" (4:21, NEB). Ezra responds that the angel has misconstrued his intent. He had only wanted to ask "why the people whom you loved has been given over to godless tribes" (4:23, RSV).

Ezra has posed a major issue. He wishes to understand the course of events as he has presented them in the preceding address. The angel does not deny the validity of his presentation but replies that this is something mortals cannot understand. Ezra responds that Uriel has avoided the question. What a strange sort of dialogue! It has no parallel in the other apocalypses, and perhaps, like much of the dialogue in the first three visions, it reflects the author's own inner conflicts.

The riddle questions here in 4:5-8 and in 5:36-37 imply a rejection of the possibility of specially revealed knowledge of heavenly secrets such as one finds in many apocalypses. In spite of this rejection of special knowledge, Ezra repeatedly formulates his quest in terms of knowing and understanding. He seeks to understand the working of God, incomprehensible to him when he considers the fate of Israel. This is a proper subject of concern to mortals, he insists, in spite of the angel's denial.

4:26-52, Dialogic Prediction. Continuing the dialogue form, the author shifts from disputatious to predictive dialogue. The angel makes certain prophetic pronouncements about which the seer poses simple questions to elicit information. Although most of the angel's responses are clear, the transition from disputa-tion to predictive dialogue is marked by a cryptic oracular passage (4:26-32; cf. similar transitional passages in 5:41-42; 6:8-10; 7:25; 8:3). The pronouncement that "the age is hastening swiftly to its end" (4:26, RSV) is elaborated in the ensuing oracle (4:33-52), as the seer seeks more details about the prediction of the imminent end: when will this be (4:33); is human evil delaying it (4:38-39); has more time passed than is to come (4:44-46)? To these three queries the angel replies that the times are predetermined (4:34-37), that they will not be delayed (4:40-43), and that most of the times are past (4:50). The section concludes with the seer's question whether "those days" are imminent (4:51).

In this section the angel repeatedly emphasizes the idea that the future has been predetermined by God (4:36-37, 42, 50). Counterpointing this idea is a pervasive sense of urgency and haste (4:26, 33, 40-42, 51). These themes and the tension between them are central to the thought of the book. How, then, does their introduction respond to the questions the seer has posed at the end of the previous section? They clearly do not satisfy Ezra, for he returns to the same questions again in the second vision. It is as if here the angel takes up the last of Ezra's questions in 4:52 and answers it alone.

5:1-13, Direct Prediction. The next passage, spoken entirely by the angel, is very like that which concludes the second vision (6:11-29). The dominant idea is that evil will peak before the end comes. This evil, which is caused by human sin, will be characterized by disruption of social, family, and natural order. The signs, as these fierce events are called, are presented in four groups—cosmic disruption (5:4b-5), the reign of the eschatological ruler (5:6-7), chaos (5:8-9), and the loss of wisdom (5:9b-11). Such lists of signs are widespread in Jewish and Christian apocalypses, in rabbinic literature, and in the NT (e.g., Matt. 24:6-29; Mark 13:7-24; Luke 21:9-26; 1 Enoch 99:4-9; m. Sota 9:15). They derive partly from passages in the Hebrew Bible that assume that the regularity of nature can be disturbed by human sin (e.g., Lev. 26:18-26; Deut. 11:17). Ezra is to watch for these signs that will alert him to the imminent end (4 Ezra 9:1-2). He is to fast for another seven days, after which he will hear "yet greater things than these" (5:13, RSV).

5:14-20, Conclusion. In 5:14-15 Ezra's violent physical reaction to the vision is described. Real trance experience, perhaps even that of the author, may lie behind this description. The onset of the experience was marked in 3:1-3, where Ezra is described as lying on his bed and contemplating the destruction of Zion until inspiration seizes him and he is impelled to speak.

At the very end of the vision he is approached by Palatiel, leader of the people, who is concerned for his welfare; but Ezra dismisses him.

5:21-6:34

Second Vision

The second vision is composed of four main parts exactly corresponding to the four main parts of the first vision. The same shift of speech from the seer, to dialogue, to direct angelic prediction occurs here too.

5:21-22, Introduction. The first lines conclude the narrative transition, referring back to the angelic commandment in 5:13 and the introduction to the first vision. The onset of Ezra's vision experience is described, as in 3:3.

5:23-30, Address. The first part of the address (5:23-27) is a series of comparisons, showing that there is one chosen thing of each kind. These comparisons culminate in the characterization of Israel as the elect people of God. Election is described as "love" (5:27), a theme that recurs in the disputatious dialogue that follows. God's punishment of Israel is consequently described not in the legal language of judgment, but as "hate" (5:30). In the second part of the speech (5:28-30) Ezra poses three questions. The root of his concern is once again the fate of Israel; here he poses the issue to God in terms of his love for Israel.

5:31-40, The Dispute. As on the earlier night, the angel appears and reproaches Ezra, saying, "Do you love [Israel] more than his Maker does?" (5:33, RSV). Note the prominence of the idea of love. Ezra responds, saying, "I try to understand the ways of the Most High" (5:34, NEB; cf. 3:31). The angel again employs riddle questions to demonstrate Ezra's inability to comprehend the way of God's governance of the world, which is also described in terms of love and judgment. Ezra accepts the limitations of his abilities and, in contrast to the first vision, here does not pose anew the questions about the fate of Zion. The angel concludes: "You cannot discover my judgment, or the goal of the love that I have promised my people" (5:40, RSV; cf. 4:21).

5:41-6:10, Dialogic Prediction. The transition from dispute to prediction is marked by a question and an oracular response (5:41-42). Verse 5:40 had hinted at the future ("goal" and "judgment"), and in 5:41 the seer asks about God's future action. Will the redemption include all generations or only those actually alive at the end (cf. 13:19-20; and see 1 Thess. 4:13-17)? The simile of the crown, used in the response (4 Ezra 5:42), clearly implies that judgment will take place in an equal fashion for all, through resurrection (cf. 5:45).

In a series of questions Ezra expresses his impatient desire to see the judgment immediately. Using the image of a womb, the angel emphasizes the fixed order of creation—as a womb cannot produce ten at once, so the earth would contradict its natural properties if it produced the allotted number of human beings simultaneously (5:46–49) and so hastened the end. Still, the angel assures him, the creation “already is aging and passing the strength of youth” (5:55, RSV). Thus Ezra learns that all will be judged equally, that judgment cannot be immediate, and that the end is fixed and unchangeable but will come soon.

In 5:56 the issue of a timetable is abandoned as Ezra desires to know “through whom you will visit your creation.” The beginning of the end, he is told, will be through human agency (perhaps a reference to the Messiah), though its consummation will be through God. God’s unique role is strongly supported by the series of statements in 6:1–6. God alone made the whole of creation. Even before that he planned the events of the end, and he alone will execute them. In 6:7, when Ezra asks about the division between this age and the age to come, the angel’s answer is couched in symbolic terms. As Jacob’s hand grasped Esau’s heel (see Gen. 25:26), so nothing will intervene between the two ages.

6:11–29, Direct Prediction. By its reference to signs revealed “on a previous night” (6:12) the next section refers to the corresponding prediction passage at the end of the first vision (5:1–13). The angel warns Ezra that he will hear a loud voice that may cause the earth to shake (6:13–16). Ezra hears the divine voice (6:17), which delivers an oracle (6:18–20a) and reveals signs of the end (6:20b–28).

The heart of the passage lies in the revelation of the “end of the signs” (6:12). It is introduced by solemn events: an elaborate question, the seer’s rising to his feet (he has been lying down throughout the first two visions), the shaking of the earth, and the resounding divine voice—recalling the theophanies of, e.g., Judg. 5:4; 1 Kings 19:11–12; Nah. 1:5; Ps. 18:13. A list of woes follows, describing the events that will signal the breakdown of cosmic order. Finally, in 6:26–28, redemption is briefly described. This note of hope marks the end of the first part of the book, climaxing the spiritual struggle and questioning of the first two visions.

6:30–34, Conclusion. The next verses contain the injunctions with which the second vision concludes (cf. 5:13; 9:23–25). The statement that the seer is acceptable to God (6:32b) is a new element, an innovation no doubt related to the preceding message of redemption. The cryptic command in 6:34 not to think vain thoughts may refer to questions and responses such as those in 4:2, 20–21 and 5:33, 40. The essential message is, Believe because of the signs, and do not ask such questions.

6:35–9:25

Third Vision

The exceptionally long third vision (longer than the first and second combined) falls into three major sections, 6:35–7:44; 7:45–8:3; and 8:4–9:25. Each of these parts is structured, basically, like the first two visions.

6:35–37, Section 1: Introduction. As in the introduction to the first two visions, the seer’s troubled state of mind is described, followed by the onset of his spiritual experience and speech.

6:38–59, Section 1: Address. The address is parallel in general to the prayerful addresses that open the preceding visions. Like them, it is formulated in the second person and is divided into two parts: 6:38–54 and 6:55–59. The first part tells of the works done on the six days of creation. In the second part the implications of this recital are set forth. The creation account often draws word for word on Genesis 1. No other similar use of Genesis 1 in a prayer is known. The recital of creation is so presented as to emphasize the election of Israel (6:55–59). Several special themes are introduced: the idea of creation through divine speech (e.g., 6:38, 43), the creation of the luminaries for the service of humankind (6:45–46), the preservation of Leviathan and Behemoth (6:49–52) and their purpose in the events of the eschaton (6:52). Verses 54–59 focus the author’s problem for the ensuing dispute. While 6:54 connects “the people whom you have chosen” with the creation of Adam, 6:59 asks, “Was the world really made for us? Why, then, may we not take possession of our world?” (NEB). In the first vision the problem is formulated in terms of history, moving from creation to exile. In the second vision it is put in terms of the election of Israel. The present address combines these two preoccupations; its chief subject is creation, yet its questions arise from the concept of election.

The prophecy of redemption at the end of the second vision did not satisfy the author. Now he returns to the same basic issues: Why is the fate of Israel as it is? How does that accord with divine justice and providence? A shift has taken place in the author’s understanding during the first two visions and is highlighted by the fact that he does not even mention the destruction of the Temple, previously the central issue.

7:1–25, Section 1: Dispute. As in 4:1 and 5:31, the dispute opens with the appearance of an angel who commands the seer to stand, the sign of a particularly solemn context (cf. 6:13; 10:33; 14:2). The angel begins by recounting two parables and their explication (7:3–16). Both parables stress that a difficult first stage must be traversed before the spacious future is achieved. If this is ■ response to 6:59 (“Why, then, may we not take possession of our world?” NEB), then the world to come, not this world, is Israel’s heritage. The image of the city in the second parable may suggest such a view, since a city is a common way of referring to the future world or the heavenly Jerusalem (cf. Herm. Sim. 9.12.5). 4 Ezra 7:15–16 implies the same conclusion, with its contrast between mortality and “the future world.”

In 7:17–18 Ezra objects that although it is reasonable to ask the righteous to sustain the difficulties of this world, since they will inherit the world to come, the wicked will suffer in both worlds. The angel rebukes Ezra for thinking he understands God’s justice better than God himself. The fate of the righteous and the wicked is written in the Torah (→ Torah). The wicked did not hearken (7:22), so they will be punished, and the righteous will be rewarded (7:21–25).

One problem is that although Israel is clearly under discussion up to 7:10, from there on the passage refers to the righteous and the wicked in general. Even allusions to Torah here do not unambiguously refer to Israel; in 7:11 “my statutes” seems to mean divine commands in general. The discourse shifts from Israel, via Adam’s sin, to the righteous and the wicked, the reverse of the development in chap. 3.

7:26–44, Section 1: Direct Prediction. The next passage opens with the prophetic phrase “Behold, the time will come” (7:26; cf. 5:1; 6:18) and concludes with an assertion of the special revelation made to Ezra. 4 Ezra 7:26 deliberately relates this passage to the preceding direct predictions (5:1–13; 6:11–29) and forms a complement to them, carrying the prediction on to the day of judgment. The passage is structured according to the eschatological timetable.

In this passage, as elsewhere in the book, the Messiah is called “servant” (some translations give “son,” reflecting a Greek word with both meanings but a Hebrew original that meant “servant”). The messianic kingdom precedes the Day of Judgment and is limited to four hundred years, after which the Messiah will die. Unlike the fifth and sixth visions, here the Messiah plays no role in the inception of his kingdom. Following his death (which is unparalleled in other sources) the world will revert to the state before creation. Then ■ new world will be created, and the resurrection of the dead and judgment will take place. The picture of God on a throne rebuking the wicked is appropriate to the representation of this judgment as a courtroom scene (cf. Dan. 7:9–14). The withdrawal of mercy, highly stressed here, is connected with the idea that judgment is perfect. Until that time, there is place for mercy; but on the Day of Judgment itself, truth alone will rule.

7:45–74, Section 2: The Dispute. The dispute opens the second section of the vision, which concludes with 8:3. Broadly, the passage may be designated “dialogic dispute,” for Ezra’s questions urge his point of view against the angel’s. Its major parts are Ezra’s sustained address (7:45–48); the angel’s response concerning the two worlds (7:49–51); a parable narrated by the angel (7:52–57); Ezra’s statement of the moral of the parable (7:58), from which the angel draws the implications (7:59–61); Ezra’s lament (7:62–69); the angel’s final, detailed response (7:70–74).

Starting from the view that the world to come is for the righteous only (cf. 7:26–44), Ezra objects that few persons will be saved but many damned (7:45–48). Although the objection somewhat resembles that of 7:17–18, it is focused not on eschatological reward, but on the present quandary that is evident only after the revelation about reward. This quandary is the problem of the “evil heart,” which now leads to the damnation of “almost all who have been created” (7:48, RSV). The angel’s assertion in 7:50 implies that God values the righteous highly and that it was to reward them that he created the world to come. The parable of the precious and base metals (7:52), which is completed in 8:2–3, further suggests that God, owner of the precious, keeps them unmixed with the worthless.

In this way the angel repeats and refocuses Ezra’s initial charge: indeed there are only few righteous, he asserts, but over them God rejoices. To this hard message Ezra responds with a lament, a cry of distress. He had opened the pericope with the exclamation, “Blessed are those who are alive and keep thy commandments!” (7:45, RSV). Now he closes the body of his argument and the lament with the contrasting, “And if we were not to come into judgment after death, perhaps it would have been better for us” (7:69, RSV).

The pericope concludes with the angel’s carefully argued reply (7:70–75) that judgment is foreordained, human action foreseen, and its results provided for in advance; that because human beings have intelligence they exercise free will and consequently bear the results of their actions; and that this is particularly true of the requirements of Torah, which were given to humans, but which they did not observe.

7:75–99, Section 2: Dialogic Prediction. The next pericope is composed chiefly of the angel's sustained response to the seer's question whether after death recompense will ensue immediately (7:75). The response falls into three parts: introduction on the nature of death (7:76–78); the description of the postmortem state of the wicked (7:79–87) and the righteous (7:88–98); and a conclusion (7:99). The descriptions of the fates of the righteous and the wicked are closely parallel in their structure. They are sevenfold, corresponding, it seems, to the seven heavens. The passage is very distinctive, with a title ("Concerning death the teaching is: . . ." RSV) and a conclusion ("This is the order of the souls of the righteous, . . ." RSV).

At the time of death, which is decreed by God, the soul leaves the body and adores the glory of God (7:78). A detailed description of the state of the souls of the dead follows. This teaching is unique in ancient Jewish literature, although the idea of such a state is found elsewhere, e.g., Testament of Abraham A. 13–14. The view of 4 Ezra 7 is that this intermediate state comes directly after death and is itself succeeded by resurrection and judgment.

7:100–115, Section 2: Dispute. The exact point of the transitional dialogue in 7:100–101 is obscure, but it seems to be whether souls experience any interval between their death and entry into their postmortem habitations.

The elaborate formula in 7:102 introduces a major new topic. In his ongoing search for some softening of what he perceives as draconian divine judgment, Ezra moves from considering the fate of the souls after death to intercession: will there be intercession on the Day of Judgment? The angel answers with an uncompromising no. In the past, the seer protests, there has been intercession, so why not in the future (7:106–111)? If such prayer has been effective in this corrupt world, he argues (and adduces examples from Scripture to prove his point), surely it will be so in the world to come. To the contrary, the angel replies, intercession is an indication of the imperfection of this world "in which the glory of God does not abide continually" (7:112). But in the future, perfect age, there will be no intercession. This accords with the view, noted earlier in the book, that until the end humans can repent and will experience God's mercy; but at the end truth and judgment alone will prevail (7:32–38). No intercessory prayer will be possible.

7:116–8:3, Section 2: Second Dispute. The second dispute is a complex passage composed of four parts: Ezra's lament (7:116–126), the angel's response (7:127–131), an exegesis of Exod. 34:6–7 (7:132–140), and the angel's response and conclusion (8:1–3). We have characterized 7:116–126 as a lament, even though it is a series of questions. Four such passages of lament can be isolated in the first three visions: 4:12, 22–24;

5:35; 7:62–69; and 7:116–126. These laments occur when the seer despairs of achieving any resolution to his problems. Each opens with a rhetorical question about the purpose of birth and then poses the point of the seer's despair.

The angel answers in terms of free will and the responsibility of human beings for their actions (7:127–131). He implicitly rejects the idea of "original sin" that Ezra might have implied (7:118) and strongly asserts the freedom of human action and the corresponding human responsibility for this action. His position is bolstered by a quotation of Deut. 30:19, a rare use of a proof-text in our book (7:129). The response to the issue of the few and the many is not that there is some means by which the many can be saved from punishment, but that there will be more joy over the few than there will be grief over the many (7:131; cf. 7:60–61).

Just as the angel used Scripture to make his point, so Ezra cites Scripture in his prayerful response (7:132–140). In a phrase-by-phrase exegesis of Exod. 34:6–7, Ezra asserts God's mercy and compassion. (Both the selection of the passage and the method of interpretation—midrash—recall rabbinic reflection on the nature of God.) The relations implied between God and human beings are complex, but the overall point is clear, that humans can survive only because of God's mercy.

In his final response, which is also the conclusion of the second section of the vision, the angel reiterates the opening position of 7:49–61. Indeed, 8:1–3 is the conclusion of the parable that was told in 7:52–59 (8:2 should be translated "But I will explain the parable [i.e., that of 7:52–59] to you, Ezra"). This subdivision concludes, as it started, with the assertion of the inevitability of human fate. The problem of the few and the many remains unresolved.

8:4–19a, Section 3: Monologue. The monologue that opens the third section of this very long vision and the prayer (8:19b–36) are first-person addresses by Ezra that together function similarly to the speeches with which the first three visions open. In the monologue Ezra presents the issues that concern him (8:4–14) and then the questions arising from them (8:15–19a). If the creation of human beings was such a complex and wondrous procedure, Ezra asks, why does God destroy them so quickly (8:14)? This question seems universal, yet in vv. 15–18 the specific fate of Israel is to the fore; Ezra prays in Israel's behalf. Thus the issue of the few and the many, which runs through the whole second section of the third vision, is refocused in an intriguing way.

Both the content and style of this passage are so structured as to reiterate God's responsibility for creation of human beings. The tone is set gently by 8:4–5, Ezra's apostrophe to his own soul; in his address to God the theme becomes dominant (8:6–12), and it is brought to absolute explicitness by vv. 13–14. God is responsible for the creation and growth of mortals as well as for their fate. The line of argument is similar to that of 3:4–36, where God is made responsible for the course of history.

8:19b–36, Section 3: The Prayer. The prayer pronounced by Ezra forms the second part of his introductory speech. It has had a special influence in various churches, some of which transmitted it separately for liturgical use. The parallelism that is typical of biblical prayers also dominates its literary character. It is composed of an opening doxology (8:20–23), a call for attention and statement of purpose (8:24–25), and the body of the prayer, consisting of intercessory petition, confession, and grounds for petition (8:26–36). The same central elements (doxology, confession, and petition) occur in earlier prayers, especially Ezra 9, Nehemiah 9, and Daniel 9.

The thrust of the prayer is a call for divine mercy. The argument that God cannot be called “merciful” except by forgiving “us sinners, who have no just deeds to our credit” (8:32, NEB) is a reference back to the midrash on the divine attributes (7:132).

The prayer carries on the preoccupation with the issue of the few and the many, but concern for Israel, which was prominent in the address (8:15–18), now disappears. The prayer is focused on the conflict between the ideas of 8:1–3 and God’s care, evident in creation.

8:37–62a, Section 3: Dispute. The next passage, a mixture of dispute and prediction, is composed of two speeches by the angel, separated by a short address by the seer. The definitive comment by the angel in v. 40 and the character of vv. 61–62 show that the end of the long third vision is approaching.

The passage plays a clear role within the overall framework of the third vision. All Ezra’s attempts to find mercy for the wicked are rebuffed. Ezra, although he reflects love for humankind by his concern, in fact loves them less than God, whose love is expressed by his very joy over the righteous. Thus Ezra’s argument in behalf of the wicked is misplaced, and he should rejoice, instead, over his own reward and that of those like him (8:46–49). This reward is detailed in the remarkable list in vv. 51–54.

The wicked have determined their own fate, denying God even though they knew that they must die an eternal death (8:56, 58). Their death and the corresponding life of the righteous, which is asserted in v. 46, bracket the heart of the passage. So, the problem of the few and the many has been resolved—the many perish not as God’s responsibility but as their own.

The passage concludes with two classical, apocalyptic themes, the nearness of the end and the revelation of the secrets to the righteous (vv. 61–62a). Finally, Ezra seems to have accepted the angel’s arguments and docilely turns in 8:63 to asking questions about the signs. His understanding has reached a new stage that makes such questions relevant.

8:62b–9:22, Section 3: Direct Prediction. The next pericope falls into four sections, with questions by the seer alternating with addresses by the angel. If we take the direct predictions at the end of the first two visions together they present events that are to occur at the time of the messianic woes and at the Day of Judgment (5:1–13; 6:11–29). Although the present passage fulfills a corresponding role at the end of the third vision, it does not add to their list of events. Instead, it focuses on the issue of when the signs will take place. This is a question that has been on the seer’s mind since early in the first vision (4:33). Here Ezra is told that when he observes the predicted signs starting to happen he will know the end is near (9:1–4). The importance and use of such lists of signs is to enable those who know them to tell when the end is coming.

Verses 5–6 are somewhat obscure but seem to introduce the idea of the purposiveness of creation, or the divine intent expressed in the eschatological reward. The eschatological redemption is described only very briefly and then, in 9:10–11, the angel returns to the idea that repentance is only possible in this world. In conclusion, Ezra reasserts the position that he has held throughout this vision, but now he neither argues with God nor reproaches him (9:14–16).

The angel’s final address accepts Ezra’s answer and strongly reasserts the relationship between deed and reward (9:17). Disobedience is the work of humankind, not of God, who takes responsibility for the righteous and their perfection. The images used for the righteous are drawn from earlier passages in the book.

9:23–25, Section 3: Conclusion and Injunctions. In the concluding injunctions Ezra is commanded to live in an open field for seven days, eating only the flowers that grow there. At the end of that period, the angel promises, “I will come and talk with you” (v. 25).

9:26–10:59

Fourth Vision

The fourth vision is pivotal in the structure of the book and displays a major shift in the author’s perceptions. It begins much like the previous three visions, but concludes with the description of a profound waking experience much different from any the seer has undergone before.

9:26–28, Introduction. A new narrative context is set by the new physical location (the field) and by the eating of the flowers. The seer's distress, inspiration, and speech are described here just as in the first three visions.

9:29–37, Address. The address is exactly parallel in function to those with which the first three visions began. A question is posed to God based on a recital of history (cf. 3:4–36; 6:38–59). God revealed himself to Israel in the wilderness and pronounced the Law (9:29–31); God's speech, quoted directly, does not occur in the Bible but is derived from 4 Ezra 3:20–22.

Here Ezra's concern is refocused. He has accepted the angel's views on divine providence and theodicy. Now anomalies about the idea of Torah become central. God gave Torah, yet left the evil inclination in the heart of the people, so the Torah was unable to produce its fruit of eternal life. These ideas, already raised tellingly in 3:19–22, are here brought up again even more acutely. The anomaly is that the eternal Torah survives the vessel that contains it.

9:38–10:4, Vision, First Part. The vision does not respond to the real problems raised in the address. The author is conscious of this, as is clear from 9:39 ("abandoning my meditations," NEB) and 10:5 ("I interrupted the train of my thoughts," NEB). Since he is a skilled writer, this discontinuity probably arose from the author's actual vision experience. That experience caused a reorientation of his perception of the world as a result of which the former issues ceased to concern him.

The passage is composed of initial description (9:38–39), Ezra's dialogue with the woman (9:40–42), and the woman's tale (9:43–10:4). She tells him that, barren for thirty years, she eventually bore a child and raised him, and that on the day of his marriage he fell down dead. She fled to the field, determined to mourn until she died. It has been suggested that this is a folktale, used by the author of 4 Ezra for his own purposes. If so, then the story is incomplete, for it has no ending, and it is well integrated into the book.

In a number of respects the figures of Ezra and the woman are parallel. Her thirty barren years can be compared with the thirty years since the fall of Jerusalem in 3:1. Her fasting, mourning, and weeping exactly parallel Ezra's in the previous part of the book.

10:5–24, Vision, Second Part. Ezra then talks to the mourning woman to comfort her (10:5–17), and her response (10:18) is followed by his final address (10:19–24). The most important aspect of this passage is the change in Ezra's role from the one comforted to comforter. We noted above that the mourning woman took on many of the characteristics that Ezra himself, as mourner for Zion, had borne previously. Just as the woman plays Ezra's role, Ezra now takes on that of the angel. He reproves the woman (10:6), just as the angel reproved him (e.g., 4:2; 5:33). Like the angel, here Ezra implies that the woman does not see the whole picture. Moreover, there are clear parallels between the rhetorical techniques the angel used earlier and those Ezra now employs (cf. 7:54 with 10:9; 5:51–53 with 10:12–14). The author uses these literary means to mark the change in Ezra's own understanding and spiritual state.

This reversal of roles flows from Ezra's acceptance of the implications of the angel's prior teaching. Although he had, even at the end of the third vision, encountered difficulty in accepting the ideas about the few and the many, here he uses them to comfort the woman (10:10). Even further, he who had questioned God's justice consoles her, saying, "If you acknowledge the decree of God to be just, you will receive your son back in due time" (10:16, RSV). Thus Ezra consoles the woman, using the very ideas and concepts he himself has struggled to accept from the beginning of the book.

10:25–27a, Transformation. The next passage is unique in Jewish apocalyptic literature. Four stages of transformation are described: the illumination of the woman's countenance (10:25), her cry and the shaking of the earth (10:26), her transformation into a city (10:27), and Ezra's cry of terror. The city is, of course, the heavenly Jerusalem.

The most striking thing about this section is the intensity of the seer's experience. Sight, hearing, and physical orientation are disturbed until the terrified Ezra cries out for his angelic guide and loses consciousness (10:28–30). What is being described is an intense emotional experience analogous to conversion, i.e., the restructuring of personality in light of beliefs previously assented to, and an ensuing enlightenment. Each of the various elements of this experience have parallels earlier in the book (cf. 6:13–16; 7:125; see Dan. 10:6).

10:27b–37, The Appearance of the Angel. The angel appears in response to Ezra's call, just as in 5:31 and 7:1. The familiar figure of the angel connects this rather different experience to the preceding ones. The description of Ezra's faint in v. 30 and the dialogue with the angel in vv. 31–37 convey a strong sense of his inner turmoil. Ezra is commanded to stand (10:33), as he was twice previously (6:13 and 7:2). This is a sign of the particular solemnity of the revelation that is to follow (cf. 14:2).

10:38-54, The Interpretation. The central message of the vision, the restoration of Zion, is the consolation Ezra sought. The passage makes three points. First, the vision is called a revelation of secrets (10:38-39). Note how the interpretation is bracketed by references to the revelation of secrets (10:38, 55-59). Second, the interpretation proper is given, opening with a formal title (10:40) and followed by a summary of the contents of the vision (10:41-43). A detailed interpretation of most of the vision ensues: the woman is Zion; her thirty years of barrenness are the three hundred years before offerings were made in Zion; the birth of the son is Solomon's building of the city; his careful nurture is the time of Israel's habitation of the city; and his death is the destruction of Zion (10:44-48). Third, the angel explains Ezra's experience to him (10:49-54). Verse 38 tells us of Ezra's fear; v. 55 of its reversal.

In his vision Ezra sees both the woman and her transformation into a city. These two parts of the same vision differ: whereas the woman symbolizes Zion, the city is Zion. Both elements are seen in the vision, and both are explained in the interpretation. Moreover, the city is not said to disappear, nor is Ezra said to wake from a dream. The vision experience continues throughout.

10:55-59, Conclusion and Injunctions. Structurally, the next section resembles the conclusions of the preceding visions (encouragement, 10:55; injunctions, 10:55b-56; explanation, 10:57; and concluding injunctions, 10:58-59). The content, however, differs. Ezra is told to go in and see the building, implying that the building is still there (10:55). He is to see "as much as the eye can see" (cf. 1 Cor. 2:9), indicating special revelation of an esoteric type.

11:1-12:51

Fifth Vision

The fifth vision, a symbolic dream vision and interpretation, conveys the message of the imminent end of the hated Roman Empire and the coming of the messianic kingdom. It stands in a long tradition of political visions, the chief biblical representatives of which are Daniel 2 and 7. The interpretation of this vision is crucial for dating 4 Ezra.

11:1a, Introduction. Unlike the preceding visions, here there is no description of the seer's psychological state but only the observation that he saw a dream.

11:1b-12:3a, Vision. A long passage narrates the content of the complex symbolic dream. The dream falls into three chief parts, the description of the eagle (11:1b-35), the judgment scene (11:36-46), and the execution of the judgment (12:1-3a).

The dream is described in very great detail. Expressions like "and I looked and behold" mark the introduction of new elements and form one of the notable characteristics of the style of this passage. The various stages are (1) general description (11:1b), (2) initial stance of the eagle (11:2-4), (3) the eagle's rule over the whole earth (11:5-6), (4) preparation for the rule of the wings and the heads (11:7-9), (5) summary and observations (11:10-11), (6) rule of the wings on the right-hand side (11:12-19), (7) rule of the wings on the left-hand side (11:20-21), (8) summary (11:22-23), (9) rule of four small wings (11:24-27), (10) fate of remaining two small wings (11:28-32), (11) fate of the heads (11:33-35), (12) appearance of the lion (11:36-37), (13) indictment of the eagle (11:38-43), (14) sentencing of the eagle (11:44-46), (15) execution of the sentence (12:1-3a).

Stages 13-15 clearly represent a legal process, including the laying of specific charges, the sentencing, and the execution of the sentence. Although the animal symbolism is sustained throughout the vision, God is not included in the symbolic structure. A measure of self-involvement of the seer in the dream is found (11:36), as is usual in dreams, but there is no hint of an angelic guide or of any action attributed to the seer. This vision is much more typical of apocalypses than are those found in the preceding sections of the book.

12:3b-9, Seer's Response. Opening with an introduction (12:3b), the response passage continues with a brief soliloquy by Ezra (12:4-6; cf. 7:62) and a prayer to God (12:7-9). Like 10:25-37 and 13:13b-20, this section recounts the seer's response to the dream and his prayer for enlightenment. All three passages contain the sequential elements of fear, wonderment, and prayer. At the literary level the passage carries readers from the dream to the interpretation. The appearance of the angel, as in the sixth vision, is assumed but not described.

12:10-36, Interpretation. In the interpretation the symbols are each stated, and then their meaning is given. The introduction (12:11-12) is followed by seven stages of interpretation (12:13-34), ending with a conclusion (12:35-36). The dream is explicitly said to be of the fourth of the beasts that Daniel saw (12:11-12), referring to Daniel 7. It is extremely rare that an apocalyptic vision is set in an explicit relation to other visions. The various wings, little wings, and heads are identified as kings and rulers of an empire. The lion is the Messiah, and the destruction of the eagle is the freeing of the earth from the tyranny of that empire.

The vision is thus interpreted as a summary presentation of the history of the Roman Empire. Historical surveys of this sort are particularly prevalent in the literature of the Second Temple period (see Dan. 7; 10-12; 1 Enoch 85-90). History is presented as a schematic process. The author's interest is not merely in the abstract presentation of such a scheme but in discerning just where he stands in this process. A similar interest is betrayed in Ezra's question at the end of the third vision (8:63).

As in many apocalyptic overviews of history, the point at which the author moves from the telling of past history to real prediction may be assumed to indicate the date at which the book was written. Thus the exact identification of the wings, little wings, and heads is of great importance. The author seems to move from history to prediction in the time of the third head. The most persuasive suggestion would make the second wing Augustus and the three heads Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian. If so, the vision was written in the time of Domitian, A.D. 81-96, probably in the early 90s.

12:37-39, Conclusion and Injunctions.

The next section is structurally parallel to the conclusions of the first four visions. Ezra is commanded to write the vision in a book, to hide it, and to teach it only to the truly wise (cf. Dan. 12:4). This is the first such command in 4 Ezra, and the theme is central to chap. 14. Ezra has become the recipient of secrets that are to be transmitted further.

12:40-51, Narrative Interlude. Verse 51 is properly part of the preceding section; the rest is a narrative interlude. The only other such narrative interlude is 5:16-19, which comes after the first vision. Here, the passage is composed of an introduction (12:40), the people's address to Ezra (12:41-45a), Ezra's response (12:45b-49), and a narrative conclusion (12:50).

A key to the understanding of this passage is the familiar concept "it would be better to die than live." This was Ezra's piercing cry in 4:12, and now the people pronounce it (12:44). God's spokesman, the angel, comforted Ezra in chap. 4; here Ezra comforts the people in God's name. Thus, as in the fourth vision, a reversal of roles has taken place.

Ezra is called a prophet by the people (12:42), a title that is now appropriate, since he speaks for God. This designation fits with his full assumption of the role of apocalyptic seer, already evident in the preceding pericope. He tells the people who inquire after his doings merely that he has been "praying on account of Zion." In accordance with the command to conceal the secrets, Ezra does not hint at the revelation he has received.

13:1-13:58

Sixth Vision

In a dream Ezra sees a man arising from the sea and conquering his enemies. The man is interpreted as the servant who will overcome the wicked in the eschatological battle and gather the scattered tribes of Israel. The dream provides a more detailed discussion of certain things spoken of in the preceding vision. The redeemer figure is described as "man." His title and superhuman character have been compared with those of the Son of man in 1 Enoch and in the NT.

13:1, Introduction. A simple verse records Ezra's dream after seven days (cf. 12:39, 51).

13:2-13a, Dream. The narrative of the dream falls into four episodes separated by "after this, I looked and behold": the appearance of the man (13:2-4); preparations for attack and defense (13:5-7); the battle (13:8-11); and the redemption (13:12-13a). It is set in a very simple narrative framework, and its symbol structure is also simple when compared with the fifth vision.

The man appears from the sea (cf. Dan. 7:2-3). He flies on the clouds of heaven (cf. Dan. 7:13), and wherever he turns all melt. A multitude assembles to attack him, and he bestrides a mountain. They attack, but he destroys them with his fiery breath. Then a peaceful multitude assembles before him. What is notable is that the language used to describe the man's appearance and activity is suggestive of a superhuman or cosmic role. The flying on clouds, the melting of enemies, and the fiery breath are all elements usually found of God as divine warrior (cf. Pss. 18:7-15; 29:3-9).

13:13b-20a, Seer's Response. Like 12:36-39, the next passage forms a bridge between the dream and its interpretation. Ezra prays to the Most High, referring to his own worthiness. He concludes with two cries of "Alas!" based on his own understanding of the vision. Significantly, 13:20a is a reversal of what Ezra and the community had previously said, "Better my death than my life" (4:12; 12:44). Now Ezra asserts, "Better to be alive at the end than dead." An important change has taken place in his understanding.

13:20b-55, Interpretation. The angel's explanation of the dream is composed of an introduction and an answer to the seer's question (13:20b-24), the interpretation of the dream (13:25-53a), and a conclusion (13:53b-55). In this passage there is considerable repetition and lack of clarity. The man is interpreted three times (13:25–26, 32, 51–52); the sequence of events is interrupted (cf. vv. 25–26 and 32–39).

In his response (13:20b–24) to Ezra's words the angel reasserts the seer's position, using language very close to that of 9:7–8. He then proceeds to interpret the dream. The angel says that the man is the precreated Messiah who will deliver creation and rule the remnant (see 3:6; 6:6; 9:8; and 12:32 on precreation). The interpretation of the mountain is influenced by Dan. 2:34 and contradicts the vision (cf. 13:6 and 36). The fiery elements that destroy the enemies in the dream are here interpreted in legal terms.

The tight relationship between vision and interpretation observed in the fourth and fifth visions is absent. Moreover, the brief dream here contrasts with the diffuse, somewhat incoherent interpretation. A number of elements of the dream are not interpreted, while many elements of the interpretation are not hinted at in the dream. Most striking is the long description of the ten tribes (13:40–47) to which the author appends a description of the redemption of those in the land (13:48–50), a description having no basis in the vision.

The author seems to be writing an interpretation to an inherited symbol structure. This would explain the disjunction of dream and interpretation. Notably, the figure of the Messiah in the interpretation is congruent with the rest of the book, whereas the figure in the dream, with its superhuman, cosmic characteristics, draws on a different tradition with analogies elsewhere in the period of the Second Temple.

13:56–58, Conclusion and Injunctions.

The brief conclusion contains an angelic assurance, an injunction, and the promise of future revelations. The praise of Ezra's love of wisdom shows that he has reached a stage when he will be told "yet weightier and more wondrous matters."

14:1–48

Seventh Vision

The concluding vision differs from all those preceding. It is the story of a waking experience, a direct revelation from God to Ezra, culminating in the revelation of the Scriptures, both public and secret. It concludes with Ezra's translation to heaven.

14:1–2, Introduction. God calls to Ezra from a bush, using the same formula of summons and response as in the calls of Abraham, Moses, and Samuel (Gen. 22:1; Exod. 3:4; 1 Sam. 3:4–8).

14:3–18, Address. The divine address to Ezra, instructing him as to his conduct, may be divided into three parts: history of the revelation to Moses (14:3–6), prediction (14:7–12), and final injunctions (14:13–18).

The crucial nature of this vision is highlighted by various means. The vision opens with an address by God, not by the seer. The history starts from the call of Moses and the Exodus, and climaxes with Sinai. (The direct quotation of God's speech that occurs in v. 6 is not from the Bible, but is apparently related to 14:45–46; cf. 9:31.) The theme of secret and public revelation is introduced and recurs throughout this vision (see already 12:37–38). The command to remember the "signs," "dreams," and "interpretations" (14:8) focuses all the eschatological prophecies of the book in this vision. The double prediction of Ezra's end and the end of the world (14:9–12, 16–18) heightens the sense of impending doom. This sense is reinforced by the foretelling of Ezra's ascension (14:9), by the prediction of the division of the times (14:11–12), by the announcement of the senescence of the earth and the consequent woes (14:10, 16–18a), and by the foretelling of the coming of the eagle (14:18b). The imminence of this final prophecy is marked by the expression "and now."

14:19–22, Speech. Ezra accepts the injunctions God has laid upon him, and at the end of v. 20, he poses a question to God: how will his reproof be received by those still unborn? To resolve this issue he asks for inspiration from the Holy Spirit so that he can write down "the things which were written in thy law" (14:22, RSV).

14:23–26, Injunctions. Ezra's prayer is granted, and God issues instructions to him. Ezra, to whom the scriptures will be revealed anew, is to depart for forty days, like Moses. He is to comfort the people, prepare writing tablets, and take skilled scribes with him.

14:27–36, Ezra's Speech. In accordance with the divine command Ezra addresses the people. He calls for attention (14:28), relates the historical sins of Israel that account for the present situation (14:29–33), exhorts the people and promises them reward (14:34–35), and concludes with an injunction (14:36). The formula "Hear these words, O Israel" (14:28) occurs also in 9:30 and recalls Deuteronomy. The historical recital serves to highlight God's grace and Israel's unfaithfulness, much like the use of such recitals in the Bible (e.g., Ezra 9; Neh. 9; Ps. 106; contrast the use of historical recital earlier in 4 Ezra 3). The exhortation assures the people that if only they repent, they will receive eternal life. The theme taken up is that of Torah, one that had been raised but not resolved in 9:29–37.

14:37-48, Revelation of Scriptures. The next verses describe the execution of the commands laid upon Ezra by God in 14:23-26. Ezra returns to the field with the five men (cf. v. 37). The next day he undergoes a waking experience in which he is given a goblet full of the Holy Spirit to drink. He senses the influx of inspiration, the feeling of enlightenment. He retains its content and is able to articulate it, so that the scribes can write it (14:38-41). This is a remarkable description of an experience that transcends those related previously. It not only authenticates Ezra's vision, but also explains how he could have written ninety-four books in forty days. The five scribes are also said to be inspired and to write in an unknown script. The crucial point is reached in God's instructions to Ezra concerning the disposal of the newly revealed books. Twenty-four books (one traditional reckoning of the Hebrew Bible) are to be made known publicly; the remaining seventy are to be transmitted secretly. These secret books are said to contain saving knowledge (14:47). They apparently include 4 Ezra itself, for in 12:37-38 the eagle vision is described, using the same language as is here used of the secret books. The theme of life is taken up. The scriptures are given so that "those who wish to live in the last days may live" (14:22, RSV).

In a certain way, chap. 14 is about the revelation of 4 Ezra itself. This conclusion is also indicated by the parallel between the forty days of the six previous visions and the forty days of the seventh vision. The revelation that is at the heart of this narrative is both that of the ninety-four books and that of the secrets of the times that Ezra has received. It forms a true climax to the spiritual quest and saga of Ezra's development.

The final verse (14:48) is uncertain on textual grounds, but clearly in view of 14:15 some such description of Ezra's translation is demanded.

PART THREE: 15:1-16:78

The Sixth Book of Ezra

Composed possibly as an appendix to 4 Ezra, 6 Ezra predicts and describes calamities that will soon occur on the earth and promises deliverance to those of God's people who refrain from sin.

15:1-4

The Prophetic Commission

God instructs the prophet (who is unnamed, but in the present context is to be understood as Ezra) not only to speak his prophecy but also to record it in writing.

15:5-16:34

Prediction of Worldwide Catastrophes

Through the prophet, God announces that destruction and calamities are about to take place in the world in general and in certain specific locations, as punishment for human sin. These "woes" form part of the traditional historical schema of eschatological literature: cf. 4 Ezra 5:1-13, 6:17-24, and commentary.

15:5-19, Forecasting of Calamities. After briefly reviewing the impending woes, the prophet states that these are actions of punishment by God that are brought about by iniquity on earth, especially that practiced against innocent and righteous people. The consequent tribulation will be universal (15:14) and will manifest itself in the form of violence in society. The events predicted in vv. 15-19 find parallels elsewhere in eschatological literature (cf. Mark 13 and parallels; 4 Ezra 5:1-2, 9-10; 13:30-31).

15:20-27, Condemnation of Sinners. An indictment is delivered against sinners that encompasses both rulers who persecute the righteous (15:20-21) and sinners among God's people (15:24-25). This theme of condemnation of sin is recurrent in 6 Ezra (see esp. 16:53-67, 76-78).

15:28-33, Vision of Conflict in the East. The prophet describes a vision of two military forces (each represented symbolically by an animal) engaged in battle in the east. It is generally thought that these two forces represent the troops of Odenathus of Palmyra ("the Arabian dragons," v. 29) and those of Shapur I of Persia ("the Carmonians," v. 30), which fought on the eastern borders of the Roman Empire in A.D. 260-261. If this identification is correct, it establishes the earliest possible date of composition for the work.

15:34-45, Vision of Storm Clouds. The seer proceeds to relate a symbolic vision of storm clouds that arise from various directions, come into conflict, and pour out destruction on the earth. Eventually the storm clouds reach and destroy "Babylon," almost certainly a symbolic representation of Rome (see 4 Ezra 3:28-36 and commentary above; cf. Rev. 14:8; 18:2-3). Although 6 Ezra 15:43-45 thus anticipate (as in Revelation) or describe the destruction of Rome, it is not possible to identify with precision the historical events (if any) represented in 15:34-42.

15:46-63, Condemnation of Asia. The prophecy turns to a condemnation of Asia for

"shar[ing] in the glamour" (15:46, RSV) of the "hateful" Babylon (again to be identified with Rome; cf. esp. Rev. 17:3-5; 18:3). Because of its imitation of Rome's harlotry and its persecution of God's people, Asia will be totally devastated; in fact, the agents of Rome's destruction will turn back to plunder Asia (15:60). The special attention given here to the fate of Asia makes it seem possible that 6 Ezra was composed in this province.

16:1-17, The Inevitability of God's Judgment. After the prophet threatens destruction to four major parts of the Roman Empire (16:1-2), his discourse takes a more reflective turn. Employing a series of rhetorical questions set in parallel structure (16:3-11), the seer uses examples from the spheres of natural and human activity to emphasize the conclusiveness of God's judgment, once it has been set in motion (cf. Amos 3:3-8).

16:18-34, Prediction of Desolation on the Earth. The prophet envisions the initial stages of the impending catastrophes, then sketches in graphic terms the desolation that will prevail on earth in their wake. The idea of desolation as a result of God's judgment is familiar from prophetic and eschatological literature (cf. Isa. 6:11; Zeph. 3:6). In addition, various of the specific images employed here find parallels elsewhere (to 6 Ezra 16:28, cf. Amos 5:3 and Matt. 24:40-41; to 6 Ezra 16:29-31, cf. Isa. 17:6; to 6 Ezra 16:32, cf. Isa. 7:23-25).

16:35-78

Exhortation of God's People

Whereas the first major part of 6 Ezra is concerned exclusively with prediction of woes (15:5-16:34), the book's final section focuses on the exhortation of God's people. God's elect are counseled to withdraw from worldly activity and to abstain vigorously from sin, in view of the impending calamities.

16:35-52, Advice and Instruction. The prophet warns God's people of the imminence of the coming destruction and exhorts them to be like "strangers on earth" (16:40, NEB) during the time of tribulation. Every worldly activity should be undertaken as though it will not bear fruit, since in fact the land will soon be plundered and its inhabitants taken captive.

The image of childbirth in 16:38-39 is close to 4:40-42 and to 1 Thess. 5:3. Also, the literarily parallel statements that make up 16:41-47 show similarities to Deut. 28:30-33, 38-42 and 1 Cor. 7:29-31.

16:53-67, Warnings to Sinners. As was noted above (see commentary on 15:20-27), 6 Ezra features a strong polemic against sin. The present section stresses the futility of trying to hide one's sins from God. The recital of God's acts of creation in 16:55-62, intended to underscore the creator's omniscience, finds parallels in wisdom literature (cf. Job 38; Sir. 43) and in apocalyptic literature (cf. 4 Ezra 4:5-9; 1 Enoch 93:11-14).

16:68-73, Prediction of Persecution. The seer anticipates the advent of a terrible persecution against "those who fear the Lord" (16:70; cf. 15:8-10, 20-21, 52-56). This persecution will demonstrate the "tested quality" (16:73, RSV) of God's chosen people.

16:74-78, Concluding Instruction to the Elect. The prophetic discourse concludes with a reassurance of salvation to the elect and a stern warning to them not to be overcome by sin.

Literary Analysis

Tobit as Narrative. Tobit is a piece of historical fiction set in the Assyrian captivity that recounts the sufferings of a pious Israelite and his family and God's alleviation of these troubles. From a literary point of view Tobit is a rich and complex text that eludes simple analysis. Taken as a whole, however, the work is a sophisticated and carefully crafted narrative.

Briefly, this is the plot. In spite of his faithfulness to God and his many deeds of mercy to others, Tobit suffers greatly. When he can no longer believe that God will deliver him, he prays for death. In another city, his relative Sarah also sees death as the only likely solution to her suffering. But when all appears hopeless, God sends healing by means of the angel Raphael. Parallel to the story of Tobit is the uncompleted story of Israel. Tobit's situation is paradigmatic for the exiled nation. As God has chastised Tobit, so Israel, suffering in exile, is being chastised. But God's mercy on Tobit and his family guarantees that this mercy will bring the Israelites back to their land. Since this event, described only in predictions, awaits fulfillment, one level of the double story is incomplete.

The author's mastery of narrative technique is evident at many points. The plot develops, is complicated, and is resolved in classic fashion. Parallel scenes advance the plot and develop characterization. Narrative tension is maintained by revealing to readers what the characters do not know and by moving in and out of alternating scenes with different subplots and characters. These characters are exemplary in their piety and believable in their human flaws. The protagonist, Tobit, is a complex figure. Although he epitomizes the right life and is articulate in his conviction that God rewards the righteous, he can vacillate between faith and doubt. His movement, however, from despair at the beginning to doxology at the end, offers a model and a promise for readers who can empathize with his predicament. Humor is an important component in Tobit, and one often senses the author's delight in entertaining readers. This factor notwithstanding, the book is a serious treatment of the religious problem of innocent suffering.

Other Literary Forms. Although the author writes narrative, the complex use of other literary forms enriches the work and complicates the issue of its genre. The characters express sorrow and praise in prayers and hymns written in the diction and forms of contemporary Israelite liturgical usage. Twice Tobit instructs his son in a deathbed testament. First he speaks in proverbs. Later, his prediction of future events is reminiscent of historical apocalypses, such as Daniel 7-12. God's resolution of Tobit's suffering, which dominates the narrative, is recounted in an extended angelic epiphany or appearance.

In addition to these clearly discernible forms are traces of folkloristic motifs and themes such as "The Grateful Dead" and "The Dangerous Bride." Also reflected is the traditional tale of the persecuted and vindicated courtier (Dan. 1-6, Esther, and the nonbiblical story of Ahikar).

Religious Dimensions

The literary complexity of Tobit mirrors the richness of the book's religious expression. Fundamentally, the work makes a many-faceted statement about the interrelationships of God, humanity, and the world, and it does so through many traditional religious themes. Basic is the assertion that a providential God orchestrates the events of life and history for the benefit of Israel and the Israelites. Faithfulness to God and love toward others are rewarded.

The author's assertions about the sovereignty of God do not avoid the problematic aspects of human experience, which are explained in several ways. Evil spirits wreak havoc on the righteous and innocent. Since the righteous are not perfect, the merciful God must sometimes "scourge" or "chastise" them before providing their due rewards. The dispensing of such rewards is, moreover, no simple matter and involves a complex divine juggling act; final benefit for all requires temporary suffering for some.

A central factor in the book is the inability of human beings to perceive divine activity. This failure to understand is, in an important sense, the point of the work. God's purpose moves on in spite of human ignorance of it. Heaven's decisions and actions are hidden from human knowledge. The healing angel is thought to be merely a friendly and helpful companion. A journey undertaken for one purpose has unimaginably beneficial consequences. People widely separated wrongly suppose that the worst is happening. The resolution of the plot involves a revelation—not simply of the angel's identity, but of the triumph of God's purpose and the frailness of human faith. Tobit is not an apocalyptic work. Nonetheless, in its two-storied universe, with angels and demons, its claim that God's hidden purposes are operative, and its assertion that God's triumph will be revealed, the book owes a debt to apocalyptic texts like 1 Enoch.

Although the author's eye is on the workings of the heavenly court, God intervenes on earth in human life and history. God and the angels are "with" the righteous as they live their lives and "with" Israel in its exile. Human beings are healed now, and final healing will restore the people to their land and again give them access to the sanctuary from which they apostasized.

Constitutive of the book's portrayal of God's activity on earth is its own version of the cross-cultural myth of the disguised heavenly helper. NT students will find here one prototype for the Marcan Gospel's story of Jesus, the hidden Son of God who comes to heal and combat Satan, and whose unique saving death reveals his identity.

For the author of Tobit, God's merciful, saving activity is cause for doxology, and the book is replete with hymns and hymnic language. Tobit's progress from doubt to affirmation is marked by his successive use of a prayer of lament and a hymn of praise. It is not accidental that the book itself is said to be a doxological confession of God's great and marvelous activity (12:16-22).

Social Aspects

For the author of Tobit, religion is embodied in social realities—of which we are given some tantalizing glimpses. Marriage and family are central for social stability and for Israelite national and religious identity. Of marriage customs and family obligations there are numerous hints. Proper burial of the dead is a pervasive concern. The pious life is enacted in concrete deeds of loving-kindness. Thus, the religious obligation to bring tithes and first fruits is intended to benefit others, and the rich have a special responsibility to share their wealth through the giving of alms.

For Israelites in exile the righteous life has its negative social consequences. Tobit is persecuted and ridiculed by antagonistic and unsympathetic neighbors. The importance of endogamy (i.e., marriage within one's own tribal group) must be underscored, because intermarriage and assimilation are an easy capitulation to the social pressures felt in a minority situation.

Place and Time of Writing

Tobit is thoroughly exilic in its viewpoint, and return to the land of Israel and Jerusalem is a consummation devoutly to be awaited. These factors, inextricably woven into the narrative fabric, strongly suggest that the book was written in the Diaspora (i.e., among Jews living outside the land of Palestine). A date in the third century B.C. seems likely, although the oral and folkloric roots are older.

Text

Tobit was composed in Aramaic and translated into Hebrew and Greek. The Greek was transmitted in a long form (C<sup>2</sup>, supported by the Old Latin version) and a short form (C<sup>1</sup>). Fragments of several Aramaic and Hebrew manuscripts from Qumran indicate that the long form is more original (although it lacks two sections found in C<sup>1</sup> and the Old Latin: 4:7-19; 13:6-10a). All major English editions (including the forthcoming revision of the RSV) are now based on the long form. This commentary follows that form but makes occasional reference to possible original readings in C<sup>1</sup> (sometimes supported by the Old Latin).

1:1-2

Superscription

The superscription describes the work as "the book of the words of Tobit"; it was written at the command of the angel Raphael (12:20) as a doxological confession of God's intervention in the lives of the protagonists. The name Tobit is a Greek form of the Hebrew name Tobî, probably short for Tobiah ("Yahweh is my good"), which in the present work is the name of Tobit's son (in Gk., Tobias). Tobit's home was in Thisbe, a city the author locates in upper Galilee. The location is the first of a number of parallels with 1 Enoch, which describes certain mythic events as taking place in the same general area (1 Enoch 13:4-10).

Tobit's Piety and Its Consequences

The narrative begins as Tobit recounts his piety and its anomalous consequences. Although he did not participate in Israel's apostasy, he and his family were taken into exile, where his pious concern cost him his job and his physical well-being.

1:3-9

Tobit in Galilee

The first person singular narrative begun here will continue until 3:7, when the story of Sarah is introduced by an anonymous third-person narrator who will recount the rest of the story. Using the idiom of the two ways (1:3; see commentary below on 4:3-19), Tobit describes himself as a righteous Israelite who devotes himself to acts of kindness for his exiled compatriots in Assyrian Nineveh.

This activity is traced back to his days in Israel, where he was an exception among the apostates in the Northern Kingdom (1:4-8). Tobit describes the prevailing situation—Jeroboam's schism and his establishment of a rival sanctuary at Dan (1 Kings 12:25-33; cf. Tob. 2:6, the quotation of Amos's oracle against Bethel). The divine establishment of the Jerusalem Temple will be emphasized in chap. 14. In the midst of Israelite apostates, Tobit is singularly faithful to the Jerusalem sanctuary, to which he makes the pilgrimages prescribed in the "eternal commandment" in the Mosaic Torah (Deut. 16:16-17). Tied to these pilgrimages are the obligations to bring first fruits and tithes: first fruits of crops (Deut. 26:1-11); tithes of herds (Lev. 27:32); first shearings (Deut. 18:4); tithes of crops (Lev. 27:30; Deut. 14:22-23); a tithe turned into money (Deut. 14:25); and the third-year tithe for the orphans, widows, and sojourners (Deut. 14:28-29). Emphasized in this recitation are the Israelites' obligations to Jerusalem and to the Aaronidic priesthood, the Levites, and the poor and deprived. Concerning the last, Tobit will say much more later.

Tobit learned the law from his grandmother. This reference to the family is the first of many. Already in the next sentence, Tobit states that he married a woman from his own kindred; in 4:12-13 he will instruct their son Tobias to do so.

1:10-2:10

Tobit's Piety in Assyria

The deportation to Assyria provides the story of Tobit with the Diaspora setting that is presumed for the rest of the narrative. As before, Tobit's piety is the author's central concern, but now this pious conduct has disastrous consequences.

1:10-15, Tobit's Success in Shalmaneser's Court. With the deportation (722 B.C.; see 2 Kings 17), Tobit takes up residence in Nineveh, the capital of Assyria, where he remains the pious exception. Tob. 1:10-13 is reminiscent of Dan. 1:8-20, where Daniel and his friends rise to prominence in a Mesopotamian court after maintaining righteous conduct in a gentile context. Other elements typical of Daniel 3 and 6 will occur in Tob. 1:16-22. Tobit's deposit of money and inability to retrieve it are crucial for the development of the plot in chaps. 4-11. That the Israelite Gabael lives in Media (as do Sarah and her family, 3:7) can be explained by 2 Kings 17:6, which locates part of the deportees in the cities of Medes.

Although the text follows the narrative in 2 Kings 17-18, its historical statements and inferences are incorrect. The succession of Assyrian kings was: Shalmaneser V, 727-722 B.C.; Sargon II, 722-705; Sennacherib, 705-681; and Esarhaddon, 681-669. Shalmaneser and Sennacherib were brothers and not father and son. Although Sargon defeated Samaria and deported the Israelites, his absence here and in the next section is probably due to the omission of his name in 2 Kings.

1:16-22, Tobit Persecuted and Restored.

Events here parallel Daniel 3 and 6. The Israelite courtier is persecuted for righteous deeds and then restored to high position. Different from Daniel, the persecution and restoration of Tobit occur under successive kings, and the righteous deeds are acts of mercy, deeds of particular interest to this author. On feeding the hungry and clothing the naked, see Tob. 4:16. The concern is emphasized by the many commands to give alms (cf. 4:7-11). On burial of the dead, cf. 2:1-10; 4:3-4; 6:14; 8:12; and 14:10-13. The importance of burial is presumed in the Hebrew Bible, as it is throughout the literature of the ancient world. Exposure of bodies was especially abhorrent (cf. Deut. 28:26; 1 Kings 21:24; 2 Kings 9:30-37; Ps. 79:2-3).

Sennacherib's murder of Judeans (Tob. 1:18) is not indicated in 2 Kings 19, 2 Chronicles 32, or Isaiah 37, although his defeat is seen as divine punishment. While Sennacherib's death occurred two decades after his siege of Jerusalem, 2 Kings 19:35-37; 2 Chron. 32:20-21; and Isa. 37:37-38 suggest a much shorter period of time (here specified as forty days). Again the author of Tobit is misled. Tobit's persecution for burying the victims of the king is reminiscent of Euripides' Antigone.

In 1:21-22 Tobit identifies Ahikar as his nephew. The story of Ahikar was a popular tale about a sage in the court of Esarhaddon who was conspired against by his nephew Nadin (called Nadab in Tob. 14:10–11), condemned to death, rescued, and restored to power. The plot parallels Daniel 3 and 6. The earliest evidence for the story is fifth-century B.C. Aramaic papyrus found at the ruins of the Egyptian Jewish colony of Elephantine. Neither the manuscript nor the later versions of the text, translated into numerous other languages, indicate that Ahikar was a Jew or a relative of someone named Tobit. The author of Tobit mentions Ahikar again in 2:10; 11:18; and 14:10, where details of the story's plot are given. Tob. 4:17 closely parallels a proverb in 2:10 of the Syriac version of the Ahikar story.

2:1–10, Tobit's Blindness. This scene parallels the previous one: mention of a monarch; Tobit's burial of the dead; the disastrous consequences; and reference to Ahikar's kindness. Different from 1:16–22, the consequences of this event will require most of the rest of the book to resolve.

The incident is typical of the characterization of Tobit and portrays one of the major problems dealt with in the book. The pious Israelite suffers because he attends to the needs of others. Tobit's piety is evident in his concern to bury the Israelite and in other details. He observes the feast of Pentecost, and, more important, he wishes to share his meal with the poor (cf. 1:17; Luke 14:12–24; 16:19–31). The references to ablation are puzzling. According to Num. 19:11–19, contact with the corpse renders one unclean for seven days. The present text suggests that Tobit's ablation cleanses him, so that he can enter his house (Tob. 2:4–5). The sequence: burial, ablation, sleeping outdoors (vv. 7–9) may indicate impurity (thus G<sup>1</sup>), or it may simply provide narrative cause for the event that follows. The function of the reference to sunset is unclear. Does Tobit postpone the burial so that he can eat the meal on the feast day? Or has the detail been suggested by the references to sunset in Num. 19:19–22 and Amos 8:9? (See the next paragraph.)

The quotation of Amos 8:10 in Tob. 2:6 is ironic. The oracle against the sinners of Bethel, who trample on the poor and take their grain (Amos 5:11; 8:4–6) is here applied to the pious one who shares his bread with the poor. Elements in the Amos passage are woven into the narrative of Tobit: it is on a feast day (Tob. 2:1) that Tobit's joy turns to sorrow (v. 5) and mourning (v. 6). The motif of mockery will return in 3:1–15. Why does the author have his hero blinded by bird droppings? It is a cruel conclusion to the incident, and one can imagine the continued mockery. Perhaps the birds are agents of a demon like Asmodeus (3:8; cf. Jub. 11:11, where Satan sends ravens to devour seed; and Mark 4:4, 15, which appears to know some such tradition). In any case, the event triggers the divinely directed scenario that is tracked through the rest of the plot. Perhaps the author asserts that God works even in cruel and evidently arbitrary circumstances. Such a point is reinforced by a comparison with Sir. 38:1–7. Although physicians are agents of divine healing, their failure will facilitate God's plans for the Tobiad family. The section ends with a motif that will recur frequently. Tobit's family grieves, because they do not know of God's eventual disposition of the case (cf. 11:17–18).

Tobit's Fate Linked to Sarah's

Tobit's reproach by Anna and his death wish are parallel to Sarah's reproach by her servants and her prayer for death. This literary diptych and its immediate sequel are the turning point in the story. The prayers are heard, but they will be answered in an unexpected way—through healing rather than death. This resolution will join two parts of the family and solve another problem for Israelites in exile—finding a suitable spouse with whom to maintain one's religious and cultural identity in a foreign land. The description of Israelites in prayer is integral to the author's view of piety, and the laments prepare for the contrasting hymn of praise in chap. 13.

2:11–3:6

Tobit Led to Seek Escape in Death

The problem of Tobit's blindness is exacerbated by a new domestic incident, which leads him to pray for death as an escape from his misery.

2:11–14, Tobit's Criticism and Anna's Reproach. The exacerbation of Tobit's troubles is tied to his concern about the righteous life, but the section is replete with irony. The prosperous, influential, and generous public servant is now dependent on his wife's earning power and the generosity of her employers. Although his deeds stemmed from his trust in God and presumed God's reward, he cannot believe that he is the recipient of the generosity of others. These reactions flesh out the characterization of a complex and believable human being. His central virtue—a concern with righteousness—is his undoing. In a state of depression because he fails to experience God's blessing for his righteous deeds, Tobit interprets an act of generosity as confirmation of his sad plight. Now he believes his wife has strayed from the straight and narrow. Concern with righteousness has become an obsession. His shaken faith in divine retribution has its corollary in his inability to trust Anna.

Her response is ironic, although its precise meaning is unclear. According to G<sup>2</sup> Tobit's criticism shows his true colors ("Now we can see what you are" 2:14 NEB). The text of G<sup>1</sup> looks like an ironic suggestion that Tobit is playing God, claiming to know everything (in spite of his blindness).

3:1-6, Tobit's Prayer. God's righteous judgment is the pervading theme of Tobit's prayer. In keeping with the book's double focus, this judgment is dispensed to individuals like Tobit and is evident in the nation's exile. His earlier recitation of his pious deeds notwithstanding (chaps. 1-2), Tobit does not claim perfection, but confesses "my sins and errors" (3:3). The prayer does not presume that God exacts retribution for every sin. Verse 2 balances divine justice with mercy and faithfulness. Nonetheless, the prayer recognizes God's right to exact the retribution that Tobit sees in his life. Paradoxically, Tobit parallels the punishment he perceives in his righteous life with the nation's plight, which tradition uniformly saw as just.

Tobit's petition (v. 6) expresses another paradox—faith's mixture of doubt and acceptance. As woes are compounded, Tobit can no longer believe that God will reverse these disasters. Yet he accepts the divine sovereignty that expresses itself in premature death. This acceptance is not based on a belief that such a death will be reversed through resurrection and eternal life.

3:7-15

Sarah Led to Seek Escape in Death

The swift movement from Nineveh to Ecbatana to the heavenly throne room (v. 16) and the use of temporal expressions (vv. 7, 10, 11) tighten the narrative and unify the action, but they also depict God's control over widely scattered events.

3:7-9, Sarah Reproached by Her Maids.

Sarah's plight is similar to Tobit's. She is an innocent victim of circumstances beyond her control. The demonic element, perhaps suggested in 2:10, is explicit here. The reproach that Tobit felt in the disparity between his piety and his lot in life has its counterpart in the reproach of Sarah's inability to consummate her marriage and have children to continue her father's line. The motif of the demon lover was widespread. In contemporary Jewish literature it is closely paralleled in the story of watchers, angelic beings who descend from heaven to mate with human women, in 1 Enoch 6-11. Here the demon who cannot consummate his lust kills his rivals.

3:10-15, Sarah's Prayer. Sarah's response and prayer have their own nuances. Her reflections move from self-pity to filial concern. Because her contemplated suicide would grieve her father, she turns to Tobit's solution. Let God take her life. Although Sarah's prayer is similar to Tobit's, there are remarkable differences. Sarah begins with praise and never refers to God's justice. To the contrary, she protests her innocence (cf. vv. 14-15a with vv. 3, 5). Moreover, a second reference to her death is modified. If God does not see fit to let her die, then let God heed her (and remove her affliction). It is an alternative Tobit has not considered.

A Solution Prepared in Heaven

Prayer catalyzes the divine resolution of human problems. The introductory expression "at that very time" and the repetition of the verb "hear" connect this scene with the prayers, and the rest of the paragraph summarizes the events to come. In the heavenly throne room the seven archangels (cf. 1 Enoch 20) relay the prayers they receive (cf. Tob. 12:12, 15) and are sent to answer them. Raphael's name (Heb., "God has healed") denotes the angel's activity (cf. 1 Enoch 10:4, 7; 40:9). For a close parallel to this view of the divine throne room and the relationship between prayer and the angels' roles as intercessors and agents of deliverance cf. 1 Enoch 8-10; 40; 47; 97:5; 99:3; 100:4. The probable original wording of Tob. 3:16 and 12:12, 15, "before the glory of the Great One (Holy One)," reflects the formulas in 1 Enoch 103:1; 104:1. God's providence will result in Tobias' marriage to the woman for whom he is the most suitable husband (3:17). This providence is evident in Tobit's and Sarah's simultaneous return to the world where their prayers will be answered.

4:1-11:19

The Healing of Tobit and Sarah

Heaven has made its decision to deliver Tobit and Sarah; the enactment remains to be described. Essential to the narrative art in these chapters is a disparity between readers' knowledge of what is happening and the characters' ignorance. This disparity has its humorous side but also makes a religious statement: God's purposes are operative even when they are not perceived. The denouement will reveal this to the characters.

4:1-5:3

Tobit Prepares for His Death

Certain that his prayer will be answered, Tobit prepares for his death. He must straighten out his finances and give his son the testamentary advice typical of deathbed situations.

4:1-2, Tobit Remembers a Bank Deposit.

Human events can have a divine dimension. We may paraphrase 4:1 as follows: "As soon as God had decided to help, God jogged Tobit's memory." This recollection will trigger events that effect the healing of Tobit and Sarah and the marriage of Tobias and Sarah. Tobit's human perception is altogether different. Confronted with the certainty of his death, he wishes to secure his son's future. And so he remembers the money he deposited (1:14-15), which can lift Tobias from the family's present deprivation. He cannot suspect the outcome of Tobias' journey.

4:3-19, Tobit's Testament. Tobit's certainty about his imminent death is evident in his testamentary instruction to Tobias. The genre is familiar from texts like Genesis 49, Deuteronomy 31-34, 1 Enoch 81-82, 91, Jubilees 21-23, the Testament of Moses, and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. (On the literary form, see the commentary below on 14:1-11.) The narrative in Tobit has already presented the exemplary biographical material typical of these texts. The context here confines itself to the kind of ethical instruction that predominates in many Jewish testaments. The focal issues are the special concerns in Tobit: proper burial (4:3-4); charitable and generous use of wealth and possessions (vv. 7-11, 14, 16-17); and endogamous marriage (vv. 12-13). This specific advice is punctuated with general instructions that use the categories of the "two ways." This section and its reprises in 12:6-10 and 14:10-11 have many parallels in Jewish wisdom literature and lend an explicitly didactic tone to the present work (→ Wisdom). The poetic parallelism in this section is not indicated in all English editions.

Typical of the testamentary form is the summoning of the son (4:3) and the command to bury. This text stresses the son's responsibility to his parents (cf. Matt. 8:21; Luke 9:59). The phrasing recalls the commandment to honor one's parents (Exod. 20:12; Deut. 5:16) and its paraphrase in Sir. 7:27. Tob. 4:3-4 reflects this author's broader interest in familial matters.

Verses 5-6 introduce the idiom of the two ways—of righteousness (or truth) and iniquity. The imagery is typical of Jewish and early Christian wisdom instruction and appears also in pagan sources. A parallel to the antithetical formulation of these verses and to 4:19 occurs in 1 Enoch 94:1-5.

A major section of text, Tob. 4:7-19, is omitted in G<sup>2</sup>, but its originality is supported by its presence in G<sup>1</sup> and the Old Latin translation, which otherwise tends to agree with G<sup>2</sup>.

The prospering of the ways of the righteous (v. 6) forms a transition to the discussion of wealth in vv. 7-11, where Tobit promises that generosity will be rewarded. Verse 7b expresses a principle of appropriate compensation ("Do not turn away your face . . . the face of God will not be turned away"). Similarly, to give alms to others is to lay up treasure for oneself (v. 9). Almsgiving was an important part of Israelite piety and expressed the biblical concern for the poor (→ Alms). The topic is integral to this book. The hero himself performed such acts of charity (1:3, 17), and his commands here provide the ethical context for Tobias' receipt of the money from Gabael in Rages (9:1-6). As Raphael and Tobit repeat later, God rewards such generous use of wealth (12:8-10; 14:11). There is irony in Tobit's observations, however. He is awaiting a premature death, which is not the proper recompense for his conduct. But for the author, who knows the outcome, the statement is true, and it will be reiterated when it is shown to be true. Tob. 4:11 suggests a parallel between almsgiving and sacrifice, which will be made explicit in 12:9. According to this view, one obtains forgiveness and atonement not only through sacrifice in the temple, but also through generous deeds. Several centuries later the idea would have a special and essential religious function for the Jews, whose Temple had been permanently destroyed.

The injunctions about wealth and possessions provide a context for NT statements on the subject, especially the wisdom material in Matt. 6:19-33; Luke 12:22-34, in passages peculiar to Luke, and in the Letter of James.

From the responsible use of wealth, Tobit returns to the topic of the family (cf. Tob. 4:3-4), here the making of a proper marriage. In one of the book's playful ironies, Tobit gives instructions that will be carried out in a way he hardly suspects. Tobias' journey to fetch the money will result in his marriage to the kind of wife that Tobit has in mind. The prohibition against marriage to a foreign spouse appears already in the story of Isaac and Rebekah (Gen. 24:3), where a journey is also undertaken to find such a spouse. The concern reappears in Ezra 9-10 and Neh. 10:28-30, is emphasized in Jubilees' recasting of the Genesis narratives, and is central in Joseph and Asenath. The topic is especially relevant here in a document set in the Diaspora. Tob. 4:13 reflects the author's sociopsychological insight. In an alien culture it can be tempting for a member of the minority to marry into the majority to prove oneself better than one's compatriots. For Tobit such arrogant disdain of one's own people leads to the destruction of the nation and religious and cultural disorder. This, rather than a notion of racial purity, is the basis for endogamy.

The proverb in v. 13b is probably traditional. Although the proverb begins with a comment on the arrogance of exogamous marriage (i.e., marriage outside the tribal unit), the next two lines discuss useless behavior and its results—loss, want, and hunger. Verse 14a complements this train of thought and may have been part of the tradition: shiftless behavior can lead to hunger; so can the withholding of wages (for the biblical command, cf. Lev. 19:13). In the context of Tobit, 4:14a is a command for the proper use of wealth, with the promise of appropriate recompense.

Verses 14b–15a are a pair of general injunctions. The first is a balanced line (“in all . . . in all”) that begins like v. 12 (“watch yourself”). The second is the earliest datable formulation of the Golden Rule.

Verses 15b–17 touch on traditional topics of Jewish piety: feed the hungry, clothe the naked, give alms. The subject of food is introduced by a reference to the abuse overdrinking—also a traditional wisdom topic (cf. Prov. 23:29–35; Sir. 31:25–30; T. Judah 11–14, 16). Tob. 4:17 is one of several parallels to the story of Ahiqar (2:10 in the Syriac version of Ahiqar; see commentary above on 1:16–22). Here the point is: sustain the hungry, but if they are sinners, leave your food at the grave of the righteous dead. The ethic is startlingly narrow and the practice obscure, but the author’s interest in burial is evident.

The interpretation of 4:18–19 depends on one’s textual reconstruction; the omission in G<sup>2</sup> ends at v. 19b (“ . . . the Lord gives”). In G<sup>1</sup> and the Old Latin seeking good counsel and the imagery of the two ways are central. Verse 19a may reflect Ps. 34:1, a psalm whose theme is relevant to the story of Tobit. The warning about nations’ lack of good counsel (cf. Deut. 32:28) is pertinent in a Diaspora writing. What God gives varies according to the texts: in G<sup>1</sup>, “all good things” (cf. Matt. 7:7–14, with many parallels to this text); in G<sup>2</sup>, “good counsel.” According to the Old Latin and G<sup>2</sup> in part, God exalts and brings down to Sheol. The concluding admonition parallels 1 Enoch 94:5, which also concludes a section of two ways instruction (1 Enoch 94:1–5).

4:20–5:3, Tobit’s Instructions About the Money. His ethical instructions completed, Tobit takes up the subject of money in Rages (4:1–2). Still speaking in the idiom of wisdom instruction, he assures Tobias that this money will reverse their circumstances if Tobias uses it rightly (4:20–21). Tobias’ response (5:1) echoes Exod. 19:8; 24:3; 7; and Josh. 1:16 and constitutes his formal acceptance of his father’s Torah, on teaching. Tob. 5:3b answers Tobias’ second question in v. 2b and forms a transition to the next section of the story.

Tobias Hires a Traveling Companion

Tobias’ journey to Rages in Media requires a traveling companion. Little do Tobit and Tobias suspect that he will be an angel sent to effect God’s beneficent purposes. This ignorance and the double entendres by Tobit and Raphael are the subject of considerable narrative delight.

5:4–8, Tobias Finds Raphael. The section of Tobit that is cast in the form of an angelic epiphany begins here as the angel appears to Tobias in human form. The presence of an unrecognized divine being is an ancient folkloristic motif (cf. Gen. 18). Especially close to Tobit is its use in Books 1–3 of Homer’s Odyssey.

Raphael’s words in 5:6 suggest that this man is a frequent traveler through Mesopotamia. In reality, Raphael alludes to his angelic journeys (cf. v. 9). The distance from Rages to Ecbatana took Alexander’s army ten days’ forced march.

5:9–16a, Tobit’s Conversation with Raphael. The author continues the playful description of the ignorance of Tobit and Tobias over the real state of affairs. As readers know, Tobit’s concern about Raphael’s lineage and qualifications is beside the point.

The opening words of the conversation are psychologically loaded. Tobit reacts bitterly to the angel’s common greeting “may all be well with you,” and with some self-pity he likens himself to the dead man he expects to be. But Raphael means what he says and predicts an outcome that Tobit cannot comprehend.

When Tobit queries Raphael about his family, the angel futilely attempts to avoid the issue. He must lie. The discussion of Raphael’s lineage is, of course, absurd, but his and his father’s alleged names suggest the story’s outcome (Azarias, Gk., from the Heb. for “The Lord has helped”; Ananias, Gk., from the Heb. for “the Lord has had mercy”). Tobit’s desire to know the facts (Gk. alētheia) about Raphael’s family is a piece of authorial irony, but it is also a theological comment: human beings can know “the truth” only when God reveals it, and human precautions are a charade when God is in charge. Both Tobit’s comment on Raphael’s family stock (v. 13) and his benediction on the angel (v. 16) are gratuitous.

5:16b, Tobit’s Farewell. The two textual traditions narrate this section with different nuances. In G<sup>1</sup> there is a play on the idea of “the way.” God will prosper Tobias on his journey, as God prospers the “way” of the righteous (cf. 4:19). The idea appears in G<sup>2</sup> in the next section. Here G<sup>2</sup> implies that Tobit expects to be alive when Tobias returns. In both texts Tobit’s wish for an angelic guide unwittingly expresses the truth.

5:17–22, Anna's Sorrow and Tobit's Encouragement. For Anna, Tobias' departure is a cause for sorrow, and the expected monetary gain is not worth the risk. Her sensibility contrasts with Tobit's faith: an angel will accompany Tobias, his journey will prosper, and he will return safely.

6:1–17

Tobias and Raphael on the Road to Media

The journey to Media has several functions. Most obviously, it provides the geographic movement that enables Tobias to seek his financial fortune. But in God's scheme, Tobias is headed for other, unexpected goals. He will meet the woman destined to be his bride, and along the way he will acquire the magical apparatus that will facilitate the healing of Tobit and Sarah.

6:1–8, Tobias Catches a Fish. As elsewhere in the story, God intervenes directly in human events. The means for healing Tobit and Sarah literally leaps out of the water just as Tobias arrives at the riverbank. God has prepared a great fish to accomplish the divine purpose. The parallel to the Jonah story is clearer in G<sup>1</sup>, where the fish attempts to swallow Tobias himself rather than just his foot (cf. also commentary below on 14:3b–7). An allusion to magical practice for physical cure and exorcism is evident, but the author's appraisal of it is less certain. Perhaps he makes fun of magic. In any case one wonders how Tobias can survive a journey through the Mesopotamian heat transporting the reeking organs of the fish. Although the journey is from one geographic location to another, the narrative recalls the accounts of Enoch's cosmic journeys (1 Enoch 17–36). In the company of an angel Tobias travels to a place where he sees something he does not understand. When he asks, the angel explains.

6:9–17, Raphael Promises Tobias a Bride.

When Tobias and Raphael have traversed the 325 miles to the Median capital, the angel informs Tobias of the events that will take place in Ecbatana. The section serves two functions. First, it allows Tobias to protest against the dangers of marrying Sarah but then to accept Raphael's assurance of divine protection. This acceptance is remarkable since he does not know that his companion is an angel. Second, in this section Tobias receives the instructions necessary to defeat the demon.

The conversation is carefully constructed and held together by key words. The references to "this night" emphasize how swiftly the action will move and how imminent is the danger that Tobias may perish on his wedding night. Raphael's repeated urging ("listen to me, brother") meets with resistance. Tobias has "heard" about the fate of Sarah's previous husbands, and he is "afraid" the same will happen to him. After Raphael's reassurances and the formulaic "fear not," typical of epiphanies (though Tobias does not perceive this as such), the young man acquiesces in what he has "heard" from Raphael. The angel uses several arguments. He responds to Tobias' concern that he live to bury his parents (4:3–4) by recalling Tobit's other command that he marry a woman from his family (4:12–13). In addition, the apparatus for an exorcism, combined with earnest prayer, will effect the couple's deliverance. Finally, without citing his sources, Raphael assures Tobias that Sarah is the bride eternally destined for him. Predestination is an aspect of the author's belief that God intervenes in human affairs.

7:1–9:6

The Travelers in Media: Sarah Is Healed

This lengthy section solves the second of the problems in chap. 3. Sarah is healed when Tobias and Raphael dispose of Asmodeus. Moreover, Tobias' marriage fulfills Tobit's commandment (4:12–13) and dramatizes the importance of endogamy.

7:1–8a, Tobias and Raphael Are Welcomed.

Once Tobias has agreed to marry Sarah, he is anxious to be taken to her house, where he is welcomed with great emotion. As in 6:13, the author assumes that news traveled through the Mesopotamian Israelite communities. Although Tobit is "healthy and alive," Raguel finds incongruous the blindness of a man who fits the Greek ideal of goodness and nobility (the translator uses the Gk. terms kalos and agathos) and epitomizes Israelite piety (he is righteous and does deeds of mercy; cf., e.g., 1:3).

7:8b–15, The Wedding of Tobias and Sarah.

Tobias wastes no time in reminding Raphael of his promise to arrange a marriage with Sarah. One did not discuss business before meals. Tobias' breach of etiquette underscores the urgency of the request. Raphael's role as marriage broker combines features from Genesis 24, where Abraham sends a servant to find a wife for Isaac, promising that an angel would accompany him (Gen. 24:7, 40).

Tobias need not worry; according to the law of levirate marriage, he is the leading candidate for Sarah's hand, a fact emphasized by the references to the law of Moses (cf. Deut. 25:5–10). The author is concerned not with descendants for the first husband, the point of levirate law, but with Sarah's status as an only child (Tob. 3:15). In this context Raguel's willingness to "tell the truth" (7:10) is praiseworthy. The author's irony appears in Raguel's statement, "Eat, drink, and be merry tonight, for there is no one else to take Sarah my daughter, except you" (v. 10). It is an ad hoc reformulation of the familiar aphorism; past events suggest that tomorrow Tobias will be dead. Tobias' single-minded determination to marry Sarah contrasts with Raguel's vacillation between the assumption that Tobias will die like the others and his hope that things will be different. This hope may reflect Raguel's evident ignorance of the demonic cause of the husbands' deaths. The brief description of the wedding ceremony sheds a little light on the details of such occasions. The document that Raguel writes is not the ketubah (Heb., a marriage contract written by the bridegroom) well known from rabbinic writings.

7:16-8:18, The Wedding Night: Healing and Joy. With the wedding ceremony and meal finished, the moment of truth has arrived. Will the marriage be consummated, or will another bridegroom die? The mother is hopeful and quiets her daughter's sorrow with the doubly repeated "have courage" (Gk. tharsei), very likely a translation of the same Aramaic as Raphael's "fear not" (6:17).

The first part of 8:4 appears to have originally been located after v. 1. The parents bring Tobias to the wedding chamber, and then they leave and shut the door. Whether the text ever described the demon's entrance into the wedding chamber is uncertain. In any case Tobias' magical ritual and the young couple's prayer stand in the same order as in Raphael's earlier description (6:16-17).

The idea that the stench of roasted fish organs (now many days ripe) could drive off a demon was surely intended as humorous, though it may reflect some actual ritual. "Binding" is a technical term used for the incapacitating of demons. The description recalls 1 Enoch 10:4, where Raphael binds Asael hand and foot (cf. Matt. 22:13). Asmodeus' banishment to Egypt suggests that Tobit was written in a place other than in Egypt.

The prayer of Tobias and Sarah is a functional equivalent of the magical ritual. They pray for mercy (Gk. eleos, a technical term in Tobit for deliverance; see commentary below on 13:1-2) and salvation (Gk. soteria). They have already been saved from the demon; so the prayer (which fits well with other liturgical elements in Tobit) is a petition for continued blessing. Perhaps the references to the fish and the ritual go back to older folkloristic motifs that were early integrated into this story. Noteworthy in the prayer is the allusion to Genesis, not as a reference to Scripture, but as a reminder of God's will in creation.

The prayer's doxological character contrasts with Raguel's pessimistic assumption that Tobias will die. For readers the digging of the grave is a ludicrous act of unfaith that parallels some of Tobit's actions. The narration of the simultaneous contrasting events inside and outside the wedding chamber parallels chap. 3. When Raguel ascertains that Tobias is alive, he sings a hymn similar to Sarah's and Tobias' prayer.

8:19-9:6, The Wedding Feast, the Money Recovered. Now that the bridegroom has survived the family hex, Raguel orders a sumptuous public feast. Tob. 8:21 focuses on family relationships, and Raguel's repeated "have courage, child" (in G<sup>2</sup>) parallels Edna's words to Sarah (7:18) and emphasizes Tobias' status as the family's son.

With the marriage of Tobias the nature of the journey has changed. Tobias' companion has shown his credibility and is sent on alone to fetch the money. Time is of the essence. Tobias' delay will worry his father, or perhaps his father will die before the young man returns. When Gabael arrives, he is welcomed as a member of the family (cf. 1:14), and his meeting with Tobias (9:6) closely parallels that in 7:1-8.

10:1-11:18

The Return of Tobias

This major section recounts the completion of Tobias' journey and the healing of Tobit. Thus a solution is found for the problem that led to the development of the plot.

10:1-7a, Anticipation and Apprehension at Home. Again the author juxtaposes simultaneous contrasting scenes. Over against the joy of the wedding celebration stands the gloom of the Tobiad household. Not only are Tobit and Anna ignorant of events in Ecbatana, they assume the worst. The scene is a counterpart to 5:17-22, but the interaction between Tobit and Anna has become more bitter. The psychology is interesting. Tobit counts the days of Tobias' absence (10:1; cf. 9:4) and creates a pessimistic scenario to explain the delay. When Anna outdoes him by supposing that Tobias has died, Tobit responds with words of comfort, which Anna refuses to accept. She acts as one mourning the dead.

10:7b-11:1a, Newlyweds and Parents Bid Farewell. Again changing scenes, the author returns to the dutiful son's concern about his father. Understandably, Raguel wants his new-found son and newly healed daughter to remain, but when he fails to delay the departure, he sends Tobias off with his bride and with a substantial dowry that is a down payment on a full inheritance (cf. Raphael's prediction, 6:11).

The scene is a counterpart to the farewell in 5:16b. In overlapping speeches Raguel and Edna offer parting words of instruction and encouragement. Central is the book's pervading concern with family, expressed with complementary sentiments. Raguel reminds Sarah that in her father-in-law's house she will be the daughter of Tobit and Anna. Edna exhorts her "son" to care for "my daughter." Both send the couple off "in peace," wishing them a safe journey, prosperity, and children that Raguel and Edna will live to see. Raguel's concluding exhortation about honoring parents may be textually out of place and may have originally been addressed to Sarah. Tobias praises God, as we have come to expect.

11:1b-4, Tobias and Raphael Arrive at Nineveh. As earlier, Raphael instructs Tobias, reminding him, as well as readers, that the fish's gall has yet to be used. A curious narrative touch is the reference to Tobias' dog, which had gone off on the journey with them (5:16, G<sup>1</sup>; 6:1, G<sup>2</sup>) and is now mentioned again for the first time.

11:5-15a, Reunion and Healing. The author returns to Anna (cf. 10:7a), who despite her gloomy protests, is still watching the road for Tobias' return. She is her blind husband's eyes and informs him that "your son" is coming. Raphael's instructions build narrative tension. The wording of G<sup>2</sup>, "he will see the light" (v. 7), suggests a wordplay, for Tobias is "the light of my eyes" (v. 14, G<sup>2</sup>; cf. Anna's expression in 10:5). Anna's readiness to die recalls the motif in 4:4. With a touch of pathos the father is depicted as stumbling out to meet his son. The healing has a magical or miraculous element; fish gall works where the physicians had failed (cf. 2:10). But plot is of importance. The physicians' failure allowed Tobit to recover his money, Sarah to be healed, and Tobias to find his destined wife. Doxology is in order, as when Sarah was healed. The motif will be expanded in chaps. 12-13. The interpretation of Tobit's experience as scourging and mercy will also recur in 13:1-2. That Tobit "sees" his son has double meaning, connoting both the son's return and Tobit's recovery of his sight. The scene has some interesting parallels (and resonances?) in Luke 15:20-24.

11:15b-18, The Parents Meet Their New Daughter. With this scene another theme is resolved. Tobit meets the wife he had hoped Tobias would find (4:12-13). Of course, he praises God on his way to meet her. The people's astonishment is a motif that will be typical of the later miracle stories in the Gospels. Tob. 11:17 again emphasizes the family. The rejoicing of the people gives the scene the character of a communal festival (cf. Esther 8:16-17). Reference to "the Jews," if original to the text, is odd in a document about a northern Israelite family (but cf. 1:3-7 and chap. 13). On Ahikar and Nadab, see commentary above on 1:16-22.

12:1-13:18

The Aftermath of the Healing

Now that the major problems have been resolved, the author provides a final narrative twist. When Tobit and Tobias offer their helper a bonus, they discover his real identity and are told that appropriate thanks belongs to God who sent the healer. So they sing hymns of praise, and Tobit writes the doxological book we have been reading—including a hymn of praise (chap. 13).

The assertion by some scholars that chaps. 13-14 are late additions to the book is not supported by the Aramaic and Hebrew fragments from Qumran, which contain parts of both chapters.

12:1-22

The Healer Reveals Himself and Ascends

The author now concludes the angelic epiphany introduced at 3:16-17. The disguised angel reveals his true identity, Tobit and Tobias react in terror, Raphael reassures them, commissions them to a task, and then disappears.

12:1-5, Tobit Wishes to Square Accounts.

The protagonists continue to act in accordance with their wrong perceptions. As Tobias' summary suggests (v. 3), Raphael has resolved all their problems and is worthy of a special reward. The 50-percent commission vastly exceeds what was implied in 5:14 but is consonant with the generosity espoused throughout the book.

12:6-10, Raphael Instructs Tobit and Tobias.

Raphael's self-revelation and instructions are given privately to the men of the story and not in the presence of Anna and Sarah, who have also been beneficiaries of the angel's activities. Raphael emphasizes that proper payment is the offering of praise and thanks for God's deeds in the presence of all humanity (vv. 6-7; cf. vv. 17-18). Such public acknowledgment anticipates the universalistic note to be struck in 13:11 and 14:6-7.

The injunctions in 12:7b-10 indicate the proper use of wealth and promise blessings to the giver of alms. By the time readers come to this reprise of Tobit's testamentary instructions (4:5-11), it is clear that almsgiving does deliver from death (cf. 4:10; 14:11). The combined references to prayer, fasting (G<sup>1</sup>, Old Latin), almsgiving, and "storing up" gold are paralleled in Matt. 6:1-21, which thus reflects its background in Jewish wisdom teaching.

12:11-21, Raphael Reveals His Identity and Ascends. Raphael reviews past events, revealing to the protagonists the divine activity of which they had been unaware. His explanation brings Tobit and Tobias up to date on what readers have known since 3:16-17 and adds a few details to that section. Raphael is one of seven angels of the presence who have special access to the divine throne room, where they relay the prayers of humanity in the form of memoranda to the heavenly King. The text of 12:13 is uncertain. According to G<sup>1</sup>, Tobit's pious deeds were not hidden from the angelic witness. The motif of testing in G<sup>2</sup> suggests the same idea but may imply some divine initiative in the incident described in 2:1-10. (On Raphael's second function as divinely sent savior, or specifically, healer, see commentary above on 3:16-17.)

The form of Raphael's self-revelation, as well as the human reaction, the angelic reassurance, and the sudden disappearance, are traditional elements in the epiphany form. More often than not, such epiphanies have a commissioning function. Although that function is not central in Tobit (Raphael appears in order to heal), it is present in the command to praise God and write a doxological book (12:20; cf. Rev. 1:19) and in the fulfillment of the command (Tob. 12:22). That angels do not eat human food is a traditional idea (cf. T. Abraham 4, Recension A; Luke 24:36-43). The formula, "I am ascending to him who sent me" (Tob. 12:20), recalls the language of the Fourth Gospel, which shares with Tobit a common pattern of a descending and ascending Savior.

12:22, Tobit and Tobias Praise God. This verse concludes the principal narrative in the book by underscoring its doxological tone, which is punctuated by the hymn that follows.

13:1-14:1

Tobit's Hymn of Praise

Tobit's hymn partakes of two worlds. Its themes, diction, and literary form are typical of Israelite piety in the real world in which the author of Tobit and his audience lived. Indeed, it may be a reused liturgical composition. Because the hymn reflects real usage, it lends verisimilitude to the literary portrait of Tobit in the fictive setting that constitutes the hymn's second world.

Within the world of that narrative, the hymn not only serves the literary functions of characterization and plot development but also helps to express some of the author's central religious conceptions: exile and return; judgment, repentance, righteousness, and deliverance; God's sovereignty and ultimate triumph.

Between the narrative introduction (13:1) and conclusion (14:1) the hymn is framed by a pair of matched benedictions (13:1, 18). The introduction (vv. 1-2) sets the theme (divine justice and mercy), and the body of the poem is divided into two major sections addressed to the "sons of Israel" in Exile (vv. 3-7) and to Jerusalem (vv. 8-18). Pairs of opposing words ("scourge"/"have mercy"; "grieve"/"rejoice"; "scattered"/"gathered") contrast Israel's present situation in exile and its future return to Jerusalem, which are functions of God's judgment for sin and the salvation that will follow repentance.

The composition is a hymn of praise in response to God's mighty acts, a prayer of rejoicing. Its consistently optimistic tone is evident in the repetition of verbs like "praise," "exalt," "give thanks," "rejoice." Although much of the vocabulary is reminiscent of the Psalter (esp. Pss. 92-118), key themes and terminology reflect the concerns of the author and the author's time. Israel is in dispersion. The glory of Jerusalem and the Temple are eschatological or end-time realities, described in imagery derived from the Isaian tradition. God's royal rule is denoted by such titles as "King of the Ages" and "King of Heaven," which do not occur in the Psalter, but are frequent in liturgical passages in the apocalyptic literature of the Hellenistic period.

13:1-2, Introduction. An initial blessing with an explication ("I give thanks to you / Blessed are you . . . because . . .") is formulaic in prayers of this period (cf. 1QH 5:20; 10:14). The terminology in the address implies the title "King of the Ages" (cf. Tob. 13:6, 10). (On the word pair "scourge"/"have mercy," see commentary below on v. 5, where it applies to Israel, and above on 11:15a, where Tobit applies the words to his own experience.) The double theme of judgment and salvation is developed in v. 2. Sickness and healing were, in Israelite thought, a descent to and return from Hades. On the God who kills and brings to life, cf. Deut. 32:39; 1 Sam. 2:6. For the whole complex of ideas here, see Wisd. of Sol. 16:13-15; cf. also 2 Macc. 7:35, in the context of resurrection. For death, Sheol, and resurrection as metaphors for exile and return, cf. Ezekiel 37 and Bar. 2:17; 3:4-8.

13:3-7, Address to Israel in Exile. The address to "the sons of Israel" (v. 3) is presumed in this section in its use of the second person plural. This first major part of the prayer, like the second (vv. 8–18), concludes with the author speaking in the first person singular (vv. 6–7).

This section (and not least its titles for God) emphasizes the power and majesty of the Divine Judge, who has scattered Israel into exile because of their sins. As chastisement or scourging, however, this banishment is the act of the heavenly “Father” (v. 4). Israel is to acknowledge this act for what it is—in the presence of the nations—lest they conclude that their might led to the defeat of Israel (cf. Deut. 32:27–31). Semantically and conceptually, a fine line separates Israel’s “confession” of God’s judicial power from their “giving thanks” to God. Such thanksgiving and praise recognize that God’s scourging is not ultimate punishment but paternal chastisement that will be mercifully alleviated when God gathers the scattered people. This mercy is predicated on Israel’s repentance. When they “turn” back to God, then God will “turn” to them, a common prophetic theme. This crucial motif of Israel’s repentance, absent in Deuteronomy 32, is present, however, in its context (Deut. 30:1–6) and appears in Jewish texts of the Hellenistic and Roman periods that employ the historical scheme found in the latter chapters of Deuteronomy.

13:8–14:1, Address to Jerusalem. This second part of the prayer complements the first. Reference is made to Israel’s punishment (vv. 9, 14), Jerusalem’s suffering because of the sins of its “sons” (v. 9; cf. 2 Macc. 5:19–20), and the present distress of its inhabitants (v. 10). But the text’s emphasis on God’s anticipated salvation is evident in the density of doxological terminology and the repeated references to joy and gladness. Since salvation presumes repentance, earlier mention of Israel’s iniquities (v. 5) and the nation’s status as sinners (v. 6) is replaced by reference to their new status as “the righteous” (vv. 9, 13).

Although Tobit is depicted as a Galilean and the author doubtless thinks of a Return to the whole of the land of Israel, this hymn focuses on Jerusalem as the locus of salvation. This emphasis is consonant with the account of Tobit’s journeys to Jerusalem (1:5–8) and the eschatological scenario in 14:5–7. Jerusalem’s importance is indicated by the fourfold use of the name (13:8, 9, 16, 17) and the shift from the plural address to the Israelites in vv. 3–7 to the singular address to Jerusalem in vv. 8–18. This mode of direct address and the concern for the deliverance of Jerusalem and its attendant joy are paralleled in the “Apostrophe to Zion” (a noncanonical poem preserved on the Qumran Cave 11 Psalms Scroll 22:1–15), Bar. 4:36–5:9, and Psalm of Solomon 11 (cf. also Sir. 36:1–17), which are probably remnants of a category of literature that gave liturgical expression to Zion-centered future hope (cf. also the prayers in Dan. 9:4–19; Bar. 1:15–3:8; the Prayer of Azariah [Song of Three Youths 1–22]).

The chief source for these expressions of a hope in Zion’s restoration is in the oracles of Isaiah 40–66 (esp. Isa. 54:11–14 [cf. Tob. 13:16–18] and Isa. 60:4–14 [cf. Tob. 13:11]). Thus, Tobit 13 and other contemporary texts attest a liturgical or contemplative setting for nourishing the older, unfulfilled prophetic hopes for restoration. A bolder expression of the hope for a divinely rebuilt Jerusalem appears in Rev. 21:9–27, which has also been influenced by a tradition fed by Ezekiel 40–48.

Death and Narrative Closure

Our story closes with the deaths of the dramatis personae, and the accounts serve several narrative functions. Tobit’s testament contains final instructions that bring closure to aspects of the story. The land of exile will perish. The return of God’s scattered people, anticipated in chap. 13, is guaranteed by the prophetic word. The command to give alms is repeated. Proper burials are carried out. Tobit’s prediction about Nineveh’s destruction is fulfilled.

Tobit’s Death and Second Testament

The final chapter centers on Tobit’s death. His second testament (see commentary above on 4:3–19, Tobit’s first testament) has many elements typical of the genre: the protagonist’s deathbed situation and his age (14:2, 3); the summoning of children and grandchildren (v. 3); eschatological prediction (vv. 4–7); ethical instructions (vv. 8–11a); death and burial (v. 11b). Two literary peculiarities of Tobit govern the shape of the testamentary form here. Tobit’s ethical instructions have already been given in chap. 4, where he anticipated his death. In keeping with the author’s parallelism between the individual and the nation, most of Tobit’s instructions in chap. 14 constitute a prediction about Israel’s future that complements the scenario in Tobit’s hymn (chap. 13).

14:2–3, Tobit’s Deathbed. In contrast to chap. 4, when he sorrowfully anticipated the premature death he had invoked as an escape from an unbearable life, Tobit now dies “in peace” after the full and prosperous life that has been the reward of his piety. The texts differ as to his age. Death at one hundred and fifty-eight

(G<sup>1</sup>) seems more likely than one hundred and twelve (G<sup>2</sup>); we would expect the pious hero to live longer than his son, who dies at the age of one hundred and twenty-seven (14:14). In keeping with earlier emphases, Tobit's life after his recovery has been marked by almsgiving and doxology. In preparation for his death, the father summons his son and grandsons (G<sup>1</sup>, Old Latin) in order to give his testament.

14:4–7, Tobit's Testamentary Prophecy. Speaking with the insight traditionally ascribed to a deathbed situation, Tobit utters a prophecy that he supports by an appeal to "the prophets of Israel" (G<sup>2</sup>) and the word of Nahum (G<sup>2</sup>, which G<sup>1</sup> has revised to the more familiar story of Jonah [see also commentary above on 6:1–8]). The appeal to the veracity of the prophetic word (cf. 2:6) attests the authority of the prophetic corpus in the author's time.

The first event in the predictive scenario is the destruction of Nineveh (612 B.C.). Reference to the event is natural in a story set in that city, although the repeated vendetta (14:4, 10, 15) is hardly prepared for in the narrative (but cf. 1:16–20). Though apologetic in tone (prophecy has been fulfilled), it may also express the author's unhappiness with Diaspora existence.

Tobit's prediction has the expected references to the Babylonian Exile, the Return, and the building of the Second Temple. More interesting are his expectations of a glorious eschatological Temple, the Gentiles' conversion and abandoning of their idols, the return of the whole Dispersion, and the expunging of evil-doers from all the earth. Certain of these elements appeared in chap. 13 and are rooted in prophetic tradition (esp. Isaiah 40–66). Close parallels in the eschatological scenarios in 1 Enoch 10–11; 90; and 91:7–9, 11–17 may attest common tradition.

14:8–11a, Tobit's Ethical Instructions. In this summary statement reference to almsgiving and doxology is an expected final emphasis. Testaments teach ethics by positive and negative example. Tobit's example, already recounted in detail, is here supplemented by a brief reference to Ahiqar and Nadab. Ahiqar's almsgiving was suggested in 2:10. The allusion to death and life, darkness and life is a reprise of 13:2.

14:11b–12a, Tobit and Anna Die and Are Buried. With Tobit's death and burial the testamentary form concludes. The glorious burials of the main characters (vv. 11–13) are a final reminder that this is a story about the wealthy. For this author the pious rich deserve such obsequies. By way of contrast cf. 1 Enoch 103:5–8 and Luke 16:19–31. Tobit's and Anna's burials resolve the concerns in 4:3–4; 6:14; 14:10.

14:12b–15, Tobias' Death. Tobias' responsibility as a son extends to the burial of his father-in-law and mother-in-law. The author brings closure to his story by associating Tobias' death not with his burial, but with his joy and his praise of God for Nineveh's destruction. This last word guarantees the fulfillment of the other predictions in Tobit's testament.

Historical Context

Hellenism. For the Jewish community the encounter with Hellenism, the cultural influence of Greece, was a time of challenge and crisis. Throughout its history Israel had managed to assimilate alien cultural elements: Babylonian legal tradition, Canaanite poetry, Egyptian wisdom literature, etc. Israel had been able to incorporate alien law into its own context of covenant and to reshape the narrative structure of myths to generate symbols valid for its own experience.

Apparently, the pervading presence of Hellenism after the conquest of Palestine by Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. posed a more serious challenge. Hellenism presented itself as a higher culture, with great richness and strong allure. Greek culture was not wholly bound up with traditional Greek religious thought. It was also a literature, a philosophy, and an ethics. Over the course of time a form of Judaism even developed that included Hellenistic values, showing that many Jews considered Hellenism to be reconcilable with their religious beliefs.

Antiochus IV Epiphanes. At a certain point, however, a grave crisis arose. After the death of Alexander the Great in 323 B.C., his empire was divided among his generals into Greek, Egyptian, and Syrian areas. Ptolemy and his descendants ruled in Egypt; Syria came under the control of the Seleucids. Judea and the rest of Palestine was disputed territory, subject first to the Ptolemaic kingdom (301–198 B.C.), and after 198 B.C. to the Seleucids. When Antiochus III captured the area in 198 B.C., he issued an edict that allowed the Jews free exercise of their religion and their national customs. For twenty-five years a forward-looking Jewish party developed, open to collaboration and to assimilation of Greek customs (→ Alexander; Seleucids, The).

In 175 B.C. Antiochus IV Epiphanes ascended the throne. He sought to advance the growth of Hellenism as a means of promoting cultural uniformity and stability in his empire. Though some Jews welcomed this development, others were opposed to it. When disturbances broke out in Jerusalem in 168 B.C., Antiochus responded with a cruel persecution of the Jews of Judea. Coexistence and collaboration with Hellenism became impossible. The party that advocated collaboration was discredited. As the books of Maccabees tell, the hour had come for the passive resistance of the martyrs and the active resistance led by Judah the Maccabee (→ Maccabees).

It was against this background, that the book of Judith was composed. In it the name of the protagonist is the feminine form of the national hero's name: Judah/Judith. The book highlights fidelity to the Lord and his commandments, trust in God, and a combative attitude. The context of crisis and belligerence produced a partial and simplified vision, one with no nuances. With religious fervor, the author calls for armed resistance.

Narrative Art

With the passage of time the Jews had developed their narrative technique (also with Hellenistic influences). By the time in which Judith was written it was possible to construct an ample and well-modulated narrative emerging out of a central idea rather than a collection of loosely related episodes. Among the classical books of Israel, only the story of Joseph shows such narrative ability.

The book of Judith is a literary innovation, although not in its narrative motifs, which are traditional. The proud and aggressive ruler depicted in Judith is the successor of the character of Sennacherib in Isaiah 36–38. Over against him, the heroine is, in literary terms, a direct descendant of Jael, who slays the defeated general Sisera (Judg. 4–5). She also has some of the traits of the wise woman of 2 Samuel 20, who saves the inhabitants of the city by tossing the rebel's head to the besiegers. The alien Achior, who sings the praises of Israel in Judith 5, has his antecedents in Rahab of Jericho (Josh. 2) and in Balaam (Num. 22–24). The theme of seduction is already insinuated in the story of Jael. The head cut off and used to create confusion among the enemy is an obvious offshoot of the story of David and Goliath, except that the weak and beautiful woman takes the place of the handsome and almost weaponless shepherd boy. And the victory of a weak people through divine intervention is as traditional as one can imagine—although this time it is accomplished without an angel of death, pestilence in the enemy camp, or miracles (see 2 Kings 6–7; Isa. 38).

Purpose and Function

The repetition of traditional themes is significant both as a vehicle and as part of the message. The author wishes to encourage the people by bringing to mind national memories transformed into an original and interesting story. The past is still present and may repeat itself, even while taking new forms. Judith the widow personifies the nation. She gives advice like Deborah, strikes like Jael, and sings like Miriam. The book also continues, actualizes, and enriches the great lyrical tradition of an Israel that sings of its heroes and its God.

Text

Originally written in Hebrew, the book has come down to us in an artless and literal Greek translation. Behind this translation it is sometimes possible to recreate the original Hebrew text. There does exist a translation of the Greek text into Latin (known as the Old Latin), which follows the Greek text rather closely. On the other hand, the Vulgate, the Latin translation prepared by Jerome, differs markedly from the Greek. In his "Preface to Judith" Jerome claims that he worked from an Aramaic text of Judith, which he translated in a single night. Although the Aramaic text Jerome used is no longer known, scholars think it was a rather free translation of the Greek. Thus Jerome's translation is not generally considered a valuable witness to the original form of the Hebrew text. The Vulgate (or the Aramaic text on which it was based) often seems to be trying to improve on the Greek text, although usually detracting from its vigor and enlarging on its piety.

COMMENTARY

1:1–16, A Clash of Giants. In the very first paragraph the author winks at us to let us know that the story is fictional and that we should not waste our time trying to identify its historical setting. Only by accepting the fiction will we gather the meaning. Nebuchadnezzar never ruled in Nineveh, as stated in Jth. 1:1, nor did Arpachshad rule in Ecbatana (see Gen. 10:22–24).

The first chapter depicts the clash of two mighty kings, Nebuchadnezzar and Arpachshad, and enjoys the hyperbole. The immense walls of Ecbatana are the measure of Nebuchadnezzar's victory, which in turn will be the implicit measure of what takes place in Bethulia. Nebuchadnezzar wishes to involve all kingdoms from Persia to Egypt in his conquest of Ecbatana. But their wish for neutrality and their disrespectful attitude raise his ire.

At the end of the chapter the author drops a phrase that should be carefully read and remembered. Nebuchadnezzar, the author says, destroyed Ecbatana and "turned its beauty into shame" (1:14). Later on, the narrative will introduce another beauty that someone will seek to shame (13:16).

A respite of four months while victory is celebrated is another hyperbole by a storyteller who is in no hurry and feels no need to be conservative in numbers. Meanwhile, does the king's ire abate? No one can go unpunished who humiliates the most powerful man on earth. Is he only a man?

2:1–13, The Divine King. King Nebuchadnezzar makes decisions and issues commands like a god. The author purposely places on the lips of the king expressions that the prophets put on the lips of God—compare v. 11 with Ezek. 5:11; 7:4, 9; and 9:5, 10; and v. 12 with Isa. 46:11 and 48:15. He who originally appeared like another Sennacherib (2 Kings 18:19) now seems to aspire to a divine role—like the king in Isaiah 14. He does not swear by his god, but "as I live, and by the power of my kingdom." This oath contains a satirical allusion to the pretensions of Antiochus IV Epiphanes.

From the pinnacle of power Nebuchadnezzar moves to excessive pride. Habitual readers of the Bible know that such arrogance cannot be victorious or remain unpunished. The phrase "what I have spoken my hand will execute" (RSV) is laden with irony for wise readers, and even for some not so wise. Although we do not know the details—which keeps our interest—we do know the outcome—which calms us.

Holofernes (or, more properly, Horofernes) is a Persian name. Also Persian is the formula "preparing earth and water" (2:7). Those are two more signs of the fictional character of the story, which freely knits together diverse pieces of history: Ecbatana of Media, the Babylonian king of Assyria, Persian generals, and so forth.

2:14–3:10, Holofernes the Conqueror. The general with a Persian name is put in command of an Assyrian army. In the cryptic language of the book, Assyria stands for Syria, that is, the Seleucid kingdom. Nebuchadnezzar is Antiochus IV. Holofernes is probably Nicanor, one of Antiochus' generals, whose name means "conqueror."

The route of the campaign is not geographically logical, nor does the author pretend that it is. The purpose of the itinerary is to cover a wide expanse in a brief time. There is considerable variety—strong cities, desert bedouins, shepherds, and farmers—one could say, all of culture. The list also includes traditional names, some of which have no political significance at the time when the book was written but do have historical resonance for Jewish readers—names such as Japheth, Midian, and those of territories that had been Phoenician or Philistine.

In brief strokes the campaign places the general at the Mediterranean coast. Azotus and Ascalon, names in the ancient Philistine Pentapolis, surrender themselves and their possessions unconditionally. They could be called vassals or, even better, slaves, like the Egyptians in the time of Joseph (Gen. 47:13-26). We are reminded of Jeremiah who, during the gravest crisis in the nation's history, admonished the Judeans to "bring your necks under the yoke of the king of Babylon, and serve him and his people and live" (Jer. 27:12, RSV).

But the reaction of Holofernes goes beyond the orders he has received from the king, or at least those recorded in the narrative. His religious policy also goes beyond the intentions of those who have surrendered. Holofernes seeks to destroy the various national religions to install the sole worship of Nebuchadnezzar. At this point one hears echoes of the divine title of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, "god manifest." The contemporary implications of the preceding chapter become clearer (cf. Dan. 11:36; 2 Macc. 9:12). Chap. 3 ends with a radical option. To save their lives the peoples must surrender their freedom and even their religion. Again, compare the measures taken by Antiochus IV in 1 Maccabees 1.

Having subdued the coastal peoples, the general camps before Dothan of Judea. There his rapid advance will be stopped. He makes camp, however, with the morale of the undisputed conqueror. All he has to do is to stretch out his hand to occupy a defenseless region that he has already encircled.

4:1-15, Resistance at Bethulia. This is the point of the dramatic and unexpected contrast—unexpected, that is, for naive readers, but not unexpected for the readers who know the Bible. In an extreme situation, Judea does not surrender but rather makes ready for war. From this small territory two forces will oppose the military giant—the courage of a people and their trust in God.

The author takes time to describe the situation, still symbolically. The return from exile and a rebuilt Temple would seem to correspond to the times of Haggai and Zechariah. The high priest's name, Joakim, is a detail that seems to be taken from the book of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:10, 26). Other anachronistic elements are the extension of the land as far as Samaria, the fact that the Jews have no king, and that the supreme authority is that of the high priest, assisted by a senate. In fact the book refers to the conditions described in 1 Macc. 4:36-61 and 2 Macc. 10:1-8, where the Temple is consecrated anew after its desecration by Antiochus IV.

In the story the people fear for the Temple, since they have heard of the measures Holofernes has taken against other local religions. This concern permits the narrator to focus on the religious theme, after having given primary attention to geographical details. In effect the narrator treats the Temple as the absolute center of the country and for its inhabitants.

The people's reaction is not limited to the purely ritual and liturgical measures of sackcloth, ashes, and humble prayer. At this point the defense of the Temple also requires military measures. Prayer and preparation for war go together. Rather than the quietness required by Isa. 30:15, what is needed is an attitude like that of Neh. 4:17, where the builders of Jerusalem's walls worked with their weapons at their sides. The military preparation is described in general terms, although the description of the passes to be defended recalls the narrow passes of Megiddo. The religious preparation is prayer, expressing the people's trust.

At the end of chap. 3 we encountered for the first time the name of Judea, the scene of the rest of the book. In 4:6 we encounter that of Bethulia, the center of resistance. It would be useless to try to pinpoint the place; it has never existed on the map of Palestine. One should look rather to its symbolic meaning.

Bethulia (in Gk., Baityloua) is not Jerusalem, which would have been the obvious place for the confrontation (as in the time of Hezekiah and Sennacherib). Is Bethulia perhaps intended as a polemical contrast to the capital? At any rate there are other possible connotations. In 1 Chron. 4:30 there is a reference to Bethuel in the lands of Simeon. The tribe of Simeon will play an important part in the book of Judith. Moreover, Bethulia sounds like a cross between Bethel and betulah. Bethel was a religious capital with a tradition going back to the times of the patriarchs. Betulah is a Hebrew word meaning "virgin, young woman." It is a good name for a city that wishes to remain spotless. (Recall the phrase "turned its beauty into shame" in 1:14.)

5:1-21, The Foreigner's Report. The storyteller seems to enjoy keeping the reader in suspense. As if the narrative rhythm of the preceding sections were not slow enough, a lateral episode is inserted here involving a secondary character. This episode will be ably woven into the plot until its final unfolding.

At the end of his campaign Holofernes encounters his first serious resistance. He is surprised and enraged. He is surprised, according to the author's depiction, by this strange people, and as a general he feels the need for information. In the list of his questions (5:3-4) there are echoes of Num. 13:17-20 (Moses' inquiries regarding the Canaanites). The focus of the series of questions in Judith is on the different behavior of these people, for "they alone, of all who live in the west" have defied Holofernes.

Holofernes' questions are answered by Achior, the Ammonite leader. He is a character with several functions. He is an alien who will join the people of Israel, like Rahab. He is a teacher of the history and theology of Israel to foreign ears. An ally of Holofernes, he will turn against the invader. He will be the trustworthy witness at the end. Achior's summary of Israel's national history would tell nothing new to Jewish readers. The author's interest is in the point of view, for Achior is a hostile foreigner. How should foreigners look upon Jews?

The historical portion of Achior's speech is stylized and refers only to the main stages of Israel's history, giving preference to geographical movements and characterized by the absence of personal names. There is no mention of Abraham, Jacob, Moses, or David (similar to the historical sketch in Wisd. of Sol. 10). It is as if there were a choral protagonist, the people, and a transcendent one, God. From Chaldea to Mesopotamia, and then to Canaan. Pause. Deportation and repatriation. Following the narrative setting of the book, the informer stops at this point. The action of God becomes noticeable at the third stage of the people's journey. "Their God commanded them to leave their place" (5:9). It becomes more explicit at the fourth stage. God "afflicted the whole land of Egypt, . . . dried up the Red Sea, . . . and led them on to Sinai" (5:12-14). In the last two stages of deportation and repatriation God's action establishes a principle of retribution (5:17-19), thus giving the entire piece a didactic and rhetorical character.

Achior, the narrator, wishes to make Holofernes understand a principle of history and to move him to act in consequence. This will serve as a lesson to readers. Holofernes was warned but did not heed the warning. As an irony of history, he will have caused his own destruction. For Jewish readers it will also have been helpful to remind them of the principle that what is important is to be faithful to God, who will be on their side, even in times of war. In the historical process of relation with God, once the fidelity of the people is broken, the next necessary step is return. The Jews are a people who have already returned to God, a subject to which we shall return in chap. 9.

5:22-6:9, Reaction to the Speech. The reaction is quite hostile, tumultuous on the part of the soldiers, more rationally articulated by the general. The narrator shows us characters and attitudes dramatically through action. The soldiers cannot accept something that will undercut their vanity as soldiers. This trait will propel the narrative action to the final denouement. "It's their own fault," readers will comment, without the author saying so explicitly. Pride and arrogant self-confidence remind us of Sennacherib's thoughts as described in Isa. 10:8-11 and 36:18-20. Fatal blindness reminds us of Pharaoh entering the waters with his armies, going to meet death. As the saying goes, "God blinds those whom God will destroy."

On the surface the officers' words are justifiable bragging. In what they do not say, they are a lesson in theology. "They are a people with no strength or power for making war" (5:23b, RSV). Yes, because God needs no armies to grant victory. A few are enough against many. God has weapons enough. This is a constant theme in the history of Israel, since the time of the Exodus. Foreigners will not and therefore cannot understand this, even when they are told by a foreigner like themselves, Achior. As Ps. 20:7 puts it, "Some boast of chariots, and some of horses; but we boast of the name of the Lord our God" (RSV).

The speech of Holofernes in 6:2-9, beside abounding in rhetorical bragging, is an ad hominem response to Achior on the theological plane. Achior had not spoken of the military might of the Jews, and therefore he did not have to be refuted on that point. He had spoken highly of the conditional protection of their God. On this point a rebuttal was needed.

The general's bragging is a hyperbolic echo of his officers' cries and really addressed to them. Readers see in his words a dramatic irony awaiting the denouement. The irony will be obvious to those who hear overtones of similar attitudes (Ben-hadad in 1 Kings 20:10-11; Amaziah and Jehoash in 2 Kings 14:9-10).

The theological theme is more important. Holofernes claims exclusive deity for the king, Nebuchadnezzar, with the formula "who is God except . . .," a phrase whose lineage is classic (Isa. 43:11; 44:6, 8; 45:5-21; 46:9; Ps. 18:31). What the Jews profess of their God, Holofernes professes of his king. Nebuchadnezzar's almost divine title is significant, "the lord of the whole earth."

Holofernes invents a refined punishment for Achior, one that combines ire and mockery. He is to share in the fate of the Jews, who are to be destroyed. This decision plays a role in the narrative, for by allowing him to keep his life temporarily, Holofernes gives him a continuing place in the story. The intended punishment also has an ironic function. Those who foresee the ultimate outcome are already laughing. Those who do not will also laugh in the end.

6:10-21, Achior's Lot. Achior is an Ammonite, and therefore an enemy of Israel, excluded from the sacral community (Deut. 23:3-4). Now, forced to do so by his recent master, he will join the Jewish people. Notice the movement. The soldiers lead him out of the allied pagan camp and toward Jewish territory. The Jews then introduce him into the city. Thus Achior imitates the movement of the Jews that he has just described. Leaving pagan Egypt, they enter the land of Canaan. The enemy is taking Achior to salvation. This will be his reward for having spoken truly regarding the Jews. The literary character of Achior may represent the proselytes of the time, who left paganism for a superior ethics or religion. In the narrative Achior has simply approached; he is at the gates.

Achior lying bound is like an insulting and mocking present from the besiegers. He is an important officer. He could become a spy against Holofernes. No matter. Those who are secure in their victory can afford to give the adversary some minor advantages.

The author has decided that the inhabitants of Bethulia will receive this enemy cordially and without suspicion. They believe what he tells them. The reader must simply accept things as they are told and look at the scene. Here is the Ammonite "in the midst of their people," telling them what has happened. In another scene, in 14:8, we shall hear echoes of this one, with another person "in the presence of the people." Achior then becomes a guest of Uzziah, the city magistrate. In passing, we are told that this magistrate is of the tribe of Simeon. Later we shall see the significance of this detail.

The naive credulity of the people is neutralized and even justified by their trust in God. The people of Bethulia respond with an invocation that is the basis for their petition (6:19), implying the great theological principle of Ps. 138:6, "though the Lord is high, he regards the lowly; but the haughty he knows from afar" (RSV; cf. Ps. 113:6-7). There follows a night of calling for help to the God of Israel.

The hospitality banquet and the night of prayer close the episode of Achior, which has interrupted the military action. In exchange for this delay, we have learned about life in Be-thulia, which begins to take on increased importance in the narrative.

7:1-32, The Besieged City. The picture of the small city surrounded by a huge army centers all the action on one point. From a human perspective it is obvious that Holofernes will win. Theologically, we expect the Lord's victory. Readers who recall the siege of Sennacherib will expect that "the angel of the Lord" will settle the matter. Or they could look to the poetic expressions of Psalms 46 and 48, which describe God's victories. The writer chooses a different narrative line, opening new fields of action by having the general choose a different military strategy.

The new strategy is suggested by allied chiefs. The contrast with Achior is noteworthy. He had recommended no attack to avoid shame. They also recommended not attacking but rather subduing the city through thirst, so as not to face losses. When Holofernes agrees, the narrative gains time. God will not be called upon to save the city at the break of dawn.

The advice of the allied officers betrays their lack of understanding. They say that the Israelites rely "on the height of the mountains," on the topography of their land and on the strategic placement of their strongholds. They judge like the Syrians in 1 Kings 20:23. The truth of the matter is that Israel does not receive its help from the mountains but from the Lord (see Ps. 125, and 1 Kings 20:28).

The temporal structure of the new action is asymmetrically divided. On the first day (vv. 1-5) the besiegers advance. The Israelites grow concerned and set a night watch. The second day (vv. 6-19) the besiegers take the springs. The defenders are discouraged, but they call upon the Lord. After thirty-four days of continuing siege and thirst (vv. 20-29), the people demand surrender. Uzziah persuades the people to hold out for five more days (vv. 30-32). God is given a limited time for action. This turn of events opens another measure of time in the narrative, one that is narrow and tense.

Returning to the beginning of the chapter, Holofernes' new strategy revolves around the spring. This traditional detail, confirmed by archaeology (Hazor, Jerusalem, Megiddo), has a clear function in the narrative. Moreover, for readers who know biblical language, a spring is loaded with symbolic value. A never-failing spring is God for Israel (Isa. 8:6; 12:3; Jer. 2:13; Ps. 36:9); all others are "cracked cisterns" or rivers that flood and destroy.

The inhabitants of Bethulia are at first alarmed and prepare to resist the assault. Then comes the scarcity of water, which is described with overtones from Lam. 2:11, 21. The people mutiny, like the Israelites in Egypt (Exod. 5:21) or like other rebellions in the desert, when they declared that they would rather live and be slaves (Exod. 14:12). In contrast to those other rebellions, in their present mutiny against their leaders the honor of God is not denied. If the people suffer now, it is because of their past sins. They humbly accept the punishment, as Jeremiah had urged an earlier generation to do (Jer. 27:12). Intimidated by the crowd, Uziah weakens. He gives God a deadline, which is the same as tempting God, for God will intervene "at the set time which I appoint" (Ps. 75:2, RSV) and not when the people decide.

8:1-8, The Protagonist Enters. Finally, after seven chapters full of events, the protagonist, Judith, enters. The ancients gave no titles to their books, or they simply called them by their first word. Unwarned readers have no idea at this point that the book has a feminine protagonist. That is not the case for those of us who know the title or who have read it before.

Judith enters belatedly, like a prima donna coming on stage in the second act of the opera. She is adorned with all the qualities that the author freely bestows on her. She is beautiful, rich, and devout. She is also a widow who leads an ascetic life. Her name, Judith (Heb. yehudit), is the feminine of Judah or Judahite (yehudah or yehudi), and she is the personification of the Jewish people. Like Uziah, she belongs to the tribe of Simeon, probably as a reminder and contrast with Dinah, the violated sister of Simeon (see Gen. 34). She is a widow, for the Jewish nation is living at a time of grave danger and affliction, like a forlorn widow. In her faithfulness to her husband's name she embodies the nation's faithfulness to its Lord.

8:9-36, Speech and Dialogue. It is noteworthy that Judith summons the chiefs rather than attending the council. In this she acts like Deborah calling Barak (Judg. 4). From her voluntary retreat she enjoys undeniable authority. Her lengthy speech is programmatic, with prophetic accents and abundant echoes of several biblical texts. Through her mouth tradition calls on the present. Two points should be underscored. First of all, she corrects the people's interpretation that their present situation is a punishment from God. It is not so. The people are faithful to God (cf. Ps. 44:18-19), and their suffering is a test from God, such as those sent earlier to the patriarchs. It is an honor to be tested and purified by God. Second, a surrender would have enormous consequences for all Israel. Bethulia is presently holding the future of all the people, for "the temple and the altar" rest upon them.

There follows a brief and tense dialogue. The words of Uziah are ambiguous (8:28-31). There could be a sting of irony in them, as though saying, "We know that you are intelligent, but you really do not understand. You should go back and pray, while I fulfill my oath." Or they could be sincere, coming from one who acknowledges in the wise Judith a prophetic gift like Elijah's, capable of bringing rain. In either case the oath cannot be undone.

Judith does not answer directly. She accepts the oath and the deadline, and she announces that she has a secret and personal plan. She takes full responsibility. From the chiefs she requires trust and support, with no questions asked. Here the author, who already had an ace of suspense in the deadline of five days, plays another ace by mysteriously announcing a memorable event to come.

9:1-14, Judith's Prayer. First of all, Judith prays. Compared to an average psalm, her prayer is long. In the economy of the book, it is exceedingly long. There is cause for haste; only four days are left. Yet Judith spends all this time in prayer. For her, as for the author, it is time best used.

In the prayer the space devoted to supplication is minor, while the hymnic introduction of praise is much longer. The outline is as follows: vv. 2-4, historical evocation of the God of the patriarch Simeon; vv. 5-6, God the Lord of history; v. 7, the power of the Assyrians; vv. 8-9, petition; vv. 11-12, God as Savior and Creator; and vv. 13-14, repetition and acknowledgment. Why this unequal distribution? The petition is based on and framed by the hymnic verses. Judith's action will be God's action. This action, which reaches back to the patriarchs, is foreseen and governed by God. It will be revelatory.

The meaning of the prayer is shown through a web of explicit and implicit correspondences. Explicit are the actions of the Shechemites in shaming a virgin of Israel (v. 2) and the plan of the Assyrians to shame the Temple (v. 8), and the striking of "slaves along with princes" by both Simeon and Judith (vv. 3, 10). Implicit is Dinah as virgin and Judith as widow, both women conventionally seen as weak and defenseless before the alien. Judith represents Israel in its weakness, for she is a woman and a widow (vv. 9-10). The power of Assyria is opposed to Jewish weakness, and God takes the side of the weak (vv. 7, 11, 14). God, who acts through human means, has no parallel and is equal only to God.

By the time her prayer ends, do we know more of Judith's plan? A little more. Though Judith says nothing to the leaders of the people, thus arousing our curiosity, she has nothing to hide from God. In allowing us to listen to her private prayer, the author could let us know fully what the plan is. The narrative takes an intermediate course. We know that Judith plans to employ the seduction of her words ("by the deceit of my lips," "make my deceitful words to be their wound and stripe," vv. 10, 13, RSV). Only her words? What about her beauty? What does the reference to Dinah tell us?

The prayer partly imitates the poetic style of the Psalms, using synonyms and parallelisms. It contains quotations and echoes from the Psalms and the Prophets. Where it breaks with tradition is in its positive valuation of Simeon's vengeance, which Genesis condemns both in the narrative put in Jacob's lips and in the testament of the patriarch (Gen. 34:30 and 49:5-6). The author of our book takes the side of Simeon and Levi against Jacob. And now we see why the author decided to make the heroine a member of the diluted, if not extinct, tribe of Simeon.

10:1-23, Judith Goes to the Assyrian Camp. Finally the protagonist begins to act—but not immediately (vv. 1-10). The beautiful coquette spends part of the little time remaining in careful toilette that the author divides into nine separate actions. Now the storyteller mocks readers' haste. And we tell ourselves, "Apparently the seduction will not be merely verbal."

Judith's dress is laden with symbolic meaning when seen in the light of Isa. 52:1-2, where Jerusalem is called by God to joy and feasting. "Awake, put on your strength, . . . put on your beautiful garments. . . . Shake yourself from the dust" (RSV). As Judith's widow's garments mourned the oppression of the people, so her joyous raiment anticipates salvation. The new action has begun. Judith's beauty will conquer, sweeping all as it passes. The narrator enjoys telling us see that beauty through the eyes of others in the story. The first of these are the leaders of Bethulia, who in their brief prayer correctly link her beauty with the glory and exaltation of Jerusalem (Jth. 10:8).

Judith's other measures are part of her secret. Why does she need to take with her clean food? To keep the laws of purity or as part of her plan? Her maid will be a silent figure, a witness, a defense, a helper. We must gaze upon Judith leaving through the eyes of the inhabitants of Bethulia—from above, wondering, worrying. With a technique like that of cinematography, changing our perspective, the storyteller lets us see her next coming toward us in the enemy guardpost. This is the beginning of the conquering advance of beauty, which contrasts with the destructive advance of Holofernes (vv. 11-19). Who will win? Judith conquers the guards (v. 14), creates a tumult among the soldiers (v. 18), overcomes the staff and the general himself (v. 23), and then falls prostrate. That beautiful face humbles itself before the general, as if beauty were rendering homage to the power of arms. Is it so? Holofernes is thinking about conquering her, and he sees her already surrendering.

It is at this point that the masterful irony of these chapters comes into play. Judith's words walk a narrow edge of ambiguity. Their interpretation will depend on the hearers' attitude. Judith appears to surrender before the defenders of Bethulia do likewise. She goes over to the enemy with very valuable information. It is a good exchange—Judith for Achior.

One has to read and reread the dialogue to grasp its ironic ambiguity. "They are about to be handed over to you," Judith says, and readers recall the five-day limit. "You have saved your life. . . . Do not be afraid. . . . He will treat you well," the soldiers reply. Their words sound almost like an oracle of salvation (cf. Isa. 42:1-7). What does it mean, for a man to treat a woman well? Admiring Judith, the soldiers speculate on the prowess of the Jewish men who "will be able to ensnare the whole world" (RSV), never suspecting that this woman is a snare.

11:1-12:20, Judith and Holofernes Face to Face. It is in this section of the narrative that the dramatic irony reaches its apex, as it develops at various levels. The irony appears in the verbal duel between the beautiful and the powerful. We have already been told that Judith is wise and able (like so many other women in the history of Israel). The action now shows the vanity and sensuality of Holofernes. The woman will use these two vices as allies in her plan. She will bait his vanity by praising his successes, promising new ones, and downplaying the role of the king. His sensuality, captivated by the display of her beauty, will be awakened with signs and gestures of acceptance, until his desire becomes passion, assured of conquest.

Vanity and sensuality are unable to see through Judith's ambiguities, for to be suspicious would be to acknowledge his own vanity and to call a halt to sensuality. Judith praises the power and wisdom of the general, and this is like a challenge. Let his sagacity unmask her; let his power overcome her. Otherwise he will be shown to be weak and naive.

Also, in a long and complicated discourse Judith leads the general along legal and religious paths that he does not understand, where he is lost. She had promised to lead him free of danger along the mountain passes. The general has to accept her guidance and be grateful for her information, while being unable to understand or criticize her. To crown it all, Judith appears with the impressive aureole of the prophet or confidante of God. Hers is a superior knowledge that all must follow.

Throughout the entire duel, like a permeating light, there is the radical polarity between man and woman and the traditional correspondence, suggested in the narrative, between a city and a woman. The general, whose king "shamed the beauty" of Ecbatana, will conquer the woman Judith before he conquers Bethulia. On her part Judith has been entering the camp, even into the commander's tent and, through his eyes, into his heart. How will this battle of love end? Love walks with death.

11:1-23, An Arcane Report. Holofernes opens the first round of the dialogue to the greater glory of the "king of all earth," whom all either serve or will serve. He addresses the young woman with an air of protective condescension, as lord of life and death, with words that are traditionally heard from God, "Have courage and you will live." Not really knowing what he says, he adds, "tonight and from now on."

Judith responds by glorifying Holofernes, the true creator of the king's victories. With a different intention she echoes the general, calling Nebuchadnezzar "king of all the earth" and foretelling a cosmic domain for him, such as is described in Psalm 8 or in Dan. 2:38 and 4:20-22. (The author of Daniel is almost contemporary with the author of Judith.) She even dares to swear by the king's life.

After a long introduction in which she gains his goodwill, Judith begins to analyze the present situation of Bethulia. To do this she takes Achior's speech as a point of reference. This is a risky move, but the risk is controlled by astuteness. Judith quotes Achior to draw the opposite conclusion—or rather to put forth the alternative that Achior's conditional style left open. In summary, the Jews are invincible only if they obey the commandments of their God. But they are about to break them, and therefore their downfall is near.

While entangling the inexperienced general in religious considerations, Judith (or rather the author) is also issuing a warning to Jews in the collaborationist party. Take care not to give way in the observance of the commandments! Whoever surrenders a wall surrenders the city. The worst of all is that this party is in control of Jerusalem (11:14-15).

In v. 16 Judith thrusts with one of her mysterious phrases aimed at the same time in two directions, at Holofernes and at readers. "God has sent me to accomplish with you things that will astonish the whole world, as many as shall hear about them" (RSV).

The following verse prepares and justifies a fundamental maneuver in her plan of action and also shows her trust in God. She concludes with a promise. She, with her own hand (neither the king nor he himself), will give the general the attributes of David, the title of shepherd and a throne in Jerusalem.

Holofernes' answer is extravagant. He will either accept Judith's God in his pantheon, or he will convert. (On this expression, "your god," see Ruth 1:16 and Dan. 2:47.) Judith will be a wife or a concubine to the king. (Or is Holofernes keeping her for himself?) The general has allowed himself to be carried away by Judith, and his tone becomes religious, even devout. His last phrase closes the passage with a sharp irony. It is as if he were saying, "Thanks to me, you will be famous in all the world." Let it be! (suggests the author). So it is! (say readers).

12:1-20, A Guest of Honor. The dialogue becomes more terse, and the setting changes. With her words Judith has built around herself a sacred aura of fascination as well as a refuge to which she can go to maneuver. She will be able to invoke religious motivations as needed, giving her freedom of movement.

In the new field, that of amorous conquest, Holofernes leads the gallant siege. First he makes a gesture of generous vanity, exquisite food on silver dishes. This offer might impress and bribe the young and hungry refugee. Judith takes shelter in the religious observances that she has so wisely discussed and declines the offer. Second, the eunuch seeks to transform Judith into "one of the daughters of the Assyrians who serve in the house of Nebuchadnezzar" (v. 13, RSV). Judith accepts with renewed ambiguity. Third, as the two sit face to face, eating and drinking, Judith's ambiguity reaches its apex.

The details underline the sensuous atmosphere that pervades the explicit words—the food, the soft fleeces on which to lie, the wine, and "her woman's finery." The language is carefully chosen, and one must listen attentively. The characters will interpret it in one way and the readers in another. While the general substitutes insinuation for direct proposition, the young woman, with feints of verbal fencing, pushes her enemy to the place where she wants him. Holofernes is too sure of himself to doubt or suspect. When she declines, he has to respect her convictions. When she does not object or agrees to a proposal, he takes the final answer for granted. The result is that the general abandons himself to her looks, to overwhelming passion, to the excitement of wine. In the end the powerful general is at the mercy of the young woman.

There are three responses by Judith that should be underlined: 12:4; 12:14; and 12:18. Each has a temporal reference. The first is to the framework of five days (of which the narrator opportunely reminds us). The other two are to the immediate present ("at once" and "today") as an exceptional occasion. Also, the term "lord" changes its meaning. The first time it refers to Judith's God. In the other two instances it could refer either to Holofernes or to the Lord.

The general's words to the eunuch Bagoas clearly express what today we would call machismo. "It will be a disgrace if we let such a woman go without enjoying her company" (v. 12, RSV). In the context of the story, such machismo fits well with the arrogance of power.

13:1-10, The Fatal Night. The dialogue ends. The action begins. It is all on Judith's part. For Holofernes lies prostrate, "overcome with wine." The narrator adds some earlier details that are necessary to have the plan work.

The servants all retire to their various tents. Outside the general's tent the maid waits. In the bedchamber the man and woman are alone. But Judith does not feel alone, for with her is the Lord whom she twice invokes, mentally and briefly.

Following the traditional models of Hebrew narrative, the action is now expressed in a series of brief strokes, with a great density of verbs, thus giving speed to the narrative. Among the details, one should note that Judith uses the enemy's own sword (like David beheading Goliath) and that she takes the canopy (a private and reserved possession) as her proof.

By the time Judith reaches the gates of Bethulia, the story could be over. At least it could for modern readers. But not for readers of those times, who wished to complete, to exploit, and above all to celebrate.

13:11-14:10, The Victorious City. At this point the narrative takes on a festive tone. Hymns and praises overshadow the action. Judith speaks three times before her fellow citizens can recover from their surprise and respond to her. Twice her words are those of a hymn. The third time they are more informative. When those in Bethulia respond, they pronounce blessings.

In the first speech (13:11), the initial words, rather than a petition, are quotations or echoes of Pss. 24:7; 118:19; and Isa. 26:2. "God is with us" is an oracular formula, reminiscent of "immanuel." In the second speech (13:14), praise continues. The previous statement spoke of "today"; the second speaks of "this night," echoing the Passover ritual (see Exod. 12:12). In this second speech Judith begins the report of the enemy's death. In the third speech (13:15-16), this statement is more informative, with exhibit of proof and an oath of innocence ("He committed no act of sin with me," RSV). Readers can imagine the effect of the head of Holofernes raised by Judith in the wavering light of the fire.

The people respond to Judith's words by praising and blessing God. The chief of the city pronounces a more elaborate blessing, including the two traditional components, "may God bless you" and "the Lord be blessed" (cf. Gen. 14:19-20). The choral "amen" of the people is the third part, which underscores the almost liturgical tone of the scene. The more informative details are interspersed in that setting.

In Jth. 14:1-4 Judith takes military command of the city. In the form of orders she foretells what will take place. The pattern of events is familiar from other biblical descriptions of the death of an enemy leader. For the hanging head, see 1 Sam. 31:9-10 (the head of Saul) and 1 Macc. 7:47 (the head of Nicanor; cf. 2 Macc. 15:30-35). For the mobilization of the Israel-
